and the fact that only she (not Saul) sees the apparition, leave no doubt that technical illusion and magical deception was here employed. But this does not prove that there was absolutely nothing but a refined, conscious deception, proceeding from special motives, as Thénius, for example, supposes that she was impelled by desire of revenge, having perhaps been ill-treated during the expelling of the sorcerers. Against such a merely conjectural pragmatic view, we must distinguish and combine an objective and a subjective element in the explanation of the event; the former a religious-historical, the latter a psychological. The former, which is presupposed in the whole account, consists in the fact that necromancy, according to the passage of the Law in which it is forbidden (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 5, 6, 26, 27; Deut. xviii. 9-14), was regarded not as a mere deception, but 1) as a heathen superstition, that is, as a wicked dealing with evil powers, which pertain to the domain of heathendom, out of which the Lord has chosen His people to be sanctified to Him; and 2) as an apostasy from the living God and a negation of the covenant-relation between Him and His people as a heathen abomination. That Saul and the woman undertake a wicked, ungodly, illegal thing, is the obvious judgment of the narrative; but there also appears here (as in the passage of the Law) the assumption, which was founded on universal belief, that in this magic art, as in the others borrowed from heathendom, there was not a mere deception with magic formulas, but a real contact and co-operation with mysterious ungodly powers, and with a secret, specifically heathenish mode of action—though the opinion of the older orthodox theologians as to the operation of wicked spirits or devils here is excluded by the narrative. Gradually came the perception that, as the idols of the heathen are "naught," so all heathen existence connected with idolatry is empty and vain. (Comp. Schultz, Alltest. Theol. I. 158 sq.) The second element in our explanation is the psychological in the woman's state of mind and soul. Proceeding on the supposition of a connection with mysterious powers, and perhaps under the excitation of narcotics, the women especially (as in heathen magic) who made necromancy a trade, might, through a fit psychical-somatal character, fall into an ecstatic, visionary state (as modern science supposes in somnambule and magnetic phenomena), in which with superstitious self-deception they had inward perception of the things or persons inquired for (the inquirers of course seeing nothing), and uttered their recollections or anticipations in dull, suppressed tones, so that it seemed as if the utterance came from other voices, particularly as if the professedly summoned person spoke. See Tholuck: Die Proph. und ihre Weissagung, § 1, "Die Mantik und die dort angeführten Thatsachen nebst literarischen Nachweisungen." The seeing and speaking of the woman of Endor must be thought of in accordance with the nature and characteristic phenomena of ancient and modern mantic (magic), and like the visionary-somnambule states, of which there are so many examples in our time, especially among women. What the woman in this condition (in which she identified herself with Samuel) said of Saul in the name of Samuel was partly nothing but what Samuel had repeatedly said, partly nothing beyond the reach of natural conjecture and inference; for after the universally known divine rejection of Saul, after the sad line of experiences which showed that God had forsaken him (he having forsaken God), and especially after the fact, which the woman learned from Saul herself [v. 15], that in the presence of the Philistine army he had inquired of the Lord in vain, the fatal issue of this war could not be doubtful. Calvin has touched the correct view of the woman's condition when he says that "her senses were deceived, so that she wrongly supposed that she saw Samuel," though he errs in ascribing this effect to devilish powers. Along with the deceit which was necessarily connected with this necromantic trade, we must suppose a psychological fact (attested by the history of magic [magic] and by modern science), which raises that part of the procedure that relates to Samuel's apparition and words out of the sphere of conscious deception and illusive magic. It is only in this way that we can explain the fact that the narrator, according to whom the essential point is that only the woman, not Saul, sees the apparition of Samuel, represents it as if Samuel really appeared and spoke.

The significance of this event for Saul is to be seen not merely from the announcement of his fall in battle, as the completion of the divine judgment, but also from the attitude towards the living God into which he has brought himself by his impenitence and self-hardening. Winer (s. v. Saul) takes a simple and correct view of the case when he says: "It is a shame that the king, who had expelled all sorcerers, etc. (vers. 3, 9), must himself at last fall into the hands of a sorceress." Saul's rejection as king was not his definite banishment from the presence of God. Even if the theocratic kingship to which he had been called had become impossible for him and his house in consequence of his disobedience against God, the king of his people, yet he individually might be saved. But he persisted in his self-blinding, and the sentence was complete in his personal rejection. A tool of heathenish superstition, which he as king ought to have punished, must serve as a means of announcing to him his sentence of death as the conclusion of the divine judicial process, the Lord having preserved silence, and thus already passed sentence on him. The heathen Philistine nation, the hereditary enemy of God's people, constant war against whom was to be a holy state-affair for the theocratic king, becomes the executor of the divine decree, and carries out against him and his house the sentence of death announced by the necromantic impostor. Calvin: "Saul called not on God with humility, prostrate mind and penitent, believing heart, and therefore God rightly rejected him, and the divine threatening was verified in him (Ye shall call on me, but shall not be heard). He himself shows plainly that he approached God as one in despair, because he had no root of true faith in his heart." In his life-course up to this time Saul had descended step by step deeper into the abyss of unbelief; he stands now on the last step, about to plunge irretrievably into the depths of endless destruction.

2. There is a silence of God that is the dumb reply to perverse invocation of His name, wherein man seeks to make the divine will subservient to his own, instead of humbly bowing under the will of God. Such a persistent silence on God's part is the result of persistent opposition of the heart to Him, and of the thence resulting hardening. When man makes his own sinful will his god that he worships and his lord that he serves, he shows the religious perversity of his soul when, like Saul, he nevertheless calls on God and inquires His will, in order to make this will subservient to his selfish desire. Thus from unbelief follows necessarily superstition [Germ.: aus unglanben folgt aberglaube.—Tr.]

[Of the three schemes of explanation of this difficult passage now held—namely, that which regards the affair as a mere deception (Chandler, Thenius), that which supposes a sort of mesmeric clairvoyance in the woman (Keil, Erdmann), and that which sees here a real appearance of Samuel by divine power, the last has found most favor among English orthodox expositors. In many cases the exegesis is determined by dogmatic considerations, as that such a real appearance of a dead person is impossible, or not in keeping with Scripture, or that the summoning of Samuel by a witch is contrary to the holiness of God. Such considerations must, however, be put aside when our object is to discover simply what the narrator affirms. It is clear that the writer says that Samuel appeared and spoke (so Ewald, Erdmann). How are we to accept this? The writer, says one class of critics, shared the superstitions of his day, and believed that the conjurations of the witch really had power over the dead. Erdmann, however, is not satisfied with this explanation, and accounts for the narrator's affirmation that Samuel really appeared on the ground that besides the element of trickery in the woman's procedure, there was a real psychological identifying of herself with the deceased prophet, so that the narrator might represent her personation of him as his personal appearance. But certainly this explanation is hardly satisfactory, and it is not easy to see how we can avoid finding in the narration a distinct declaration that Samuel actually appeared and spoke. The only thing in the account itself that opposes this view is the fact that the woman only and not Saul saw the apparition. But it is quite possible that the apparition may have been in a different room from that in which Saul found himself—though this is not mentioned. Such seems to be the plain statement of the text. The dogmatic and other difficulties are discussed by Erdmann. Chandler, in his Life of David, gives a full and forcible presentation of the grounds for supposing the whole affair to be an imposture by the woman.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE: Ver. 1. Pious men are walls and pillars of cities and lands, Ezek. xxii. 30; therefore if such men have to start away, all misfortune starts forth too. (Gen. vii. 7 sq.). Ver. 2. Virtue and bravery deserve to be rewarded; but the world is wont to promise believers reward, in order to draw them off from the right way (Matth. iv. 9).—[Ver. 3: SCOTT: Hypocrites are frequently very zealous against those crimes to which they are not tempted at the time, or from which they may suffer detriment; and apostates frequently commit those sins, which they once were most earnest in opposing.—TR.—Vers. 4, 5. J. LANGE: So it goes with the ungodly, that here already they feel in themselves a hell, when their evil conscience awakes in them.—SCHLIER: Saul fears before men, because he no longer feared God; if we see things rightly, all fear has no other ground than lack of the fear of God.—The fear of man has its ground in unbelief; true fear of God makes one strong and courageous.—Ver. 6. STARKE: To go to God when in distress is good and necessary; but it must be done without hypocrisy, with true repentance and from the heart (Isa. xxvi. 16).—If we do not hear God's voice when it goes well with us, God can and will refuse to hear our voice also, when it goes ill with us (Prov. i. 24 sq.). S. SCHMID: Ungodly men and hypocrites care little for God and His service in good days: but when misfortune comes, then they wish to become pious also, and seek God's counsel and help in every way.—SCHLIER: The Lord gave Saul no answer. To turn to the Lord Saul has not wished; had he wished that, he would also have found the Lord's grace. But Saul had no concern about that; he wished to use the Lord for his own ends, he needed a disclosure about his situation, and such a disclosure he wished to force for himself without returning to the Lord.—CALVIN: By this example we should learn to draw near to God with all humility when we wish to ask His counsel in prayer, far from all obstinate self-will and passion; for His arm is not shortened that He cannot help those who take refuge in Him. Whence comes it that so often our prayers are in vain, and our hopes deceive us? Our sins shut off the grace of God from us, and our unrighteousness separates us from our God, and fixes an immeasurable gulf between us and God.—Ver. 7. S. SCHMID: Happy is he who so receives God's punitive silence or other signs of His wrath, as to be led thereby to true repentance; but hardened hearts take refuge, when God is silent, in wicked men and Satan.—SCHLIER: An example of the fact that the unbelief which has lost the living God is always full of superstition instead, and thereby is turned over not merely to empty delusion and vain deception, but also to the powers of darkness.—The human heart needs something to cling to, something to which it may hold fast, a prop which its tendrils may firmly clasp; therefore when it leaves Him for whom it was made, when it sinks into unbelief, then it clings to the power of superstition and of darkness. Nothing frees from superstition but true faith.—[Ver. 7. TAYLOR: Here is the great difference between Saul in his sins, and David in his backslidings. From each of his falls you hear David come sobbing out a sorrowful confession and appeal like that in the fifty-first Psalm; in each of Saul's wickednesses you see him assuming the attitude of sterner defiance toward the Almighty; or if there be any sorrow in his heart at all, it is for the loss he has himself sustained, or the suffering he has himself endured, and not for the dishonor which he has done to God.—TR.—Ver. 8. HEDINGER: So great is the power of conscience that even those who desire evil are ashamed to have it known.—CRAMER: The ungodly love darkness and shrink from the light (John iii. 19), but God knows their works (Prov. xvii. 16).—

Vers. 11, 12. HEDINGER [from HALL]: It is no rare thing to lose even our wit and judgment together with graces; how justly are they given to sottishness, that have given themselves over to sin!—Ver. 15. SCHLIER: We see here quite clearly that the souls of the righteous rest in God's hand, and no torment touches them. He who dies in faith enters into rest in the Lord his God; and since, though the whole world come and use all its arts of sorcery, it brings no such soul back to the earth any more, it follows that we men have no power over departed spirits.—[SCOTT: Many who despise the servants of God while they live, are so far convinced of their wisdom and fidelity, that they vainly wish for their counsel and instruction, in distressing circumstances, after their death. But in that blessed world to which they are removed, they have done with fear, favor and affection, and are become far more determined than ever in the service and cause of God; and were they to appear they would denounce the doom of impenitent sinners with more awful decision than before.—Ver. 15. TAYLOR: "I am sore distressed." Oh! the wild wail of this dark misery! There is a deep pathos and a weird awesomeness in this despairing cry; but there is no confession of sin, no beseeching for mercy; nothing but the great, over-mastering ambition to preserve himself.—TR.—Ver. 16. S. SCHMID: He is highly unfortunate and foolish who, when God forsakes him, prefers to seek help and counsel from creatures, rather than by true repentance to make himself again a reconciled friend to God.—SCHLIER: Wilt thou have light for all the riddles and dark questions of this life, betake thyself to God's Word; there enough is revealed, there is what is necessary to find everything, and what goes beyond that, comes of evil.—Ver. 18. SCHLIER: God's wrath is so dreadful, that when all has been in vain He utterly gives up the sinner to His judgments, and unsparingly causes him to learn that sin is ruin to a people.—The judgment of hardening comes only when the crime of hardening has first entered. When we shut ourselves against the voice of God, then on the part of God also must hardening follow, as surely as God is a holy and righteous God, who does not allow Himself to be trifled with.—Ver. 20. CRAMER: The ungodly do not grow better after God's wrath is made known, but always worse (Acts vii. 54). [TAYLOR: Alas for Saul! how changed is he now from that day when Samuel communed with him concerning the kingdom, or when, in the first noble assertion of his royal right, he delivered the men of Jabesh-Gilead from their threatened destruction! Did ever promise of so fair a life ripen into such bitter fruit?—TR.]

[Vers. 1, 2. One of two things David must now do, and either will be grossly wrong, disgraceful, and hurtful both to himself and to others. To this miserable alternative he had brought himself, by distrusting God and relying on deception. It is one of the severest earthly penalties of wrongdoing, that it often leads to the apparent necessity of doing other and greater wrong.

[Vers. 4-20. Contrast between Saul and David at this crisis of their history: 1) Both are in great distress. We see David in the camp of the Philistines, seemingly compelled to fight against Israel and against the anointed of Jehovah (comp.

xxvi. 11); and presently we see Saul journeying in fasting and fatigue, in peril and gloomy desperation across the mountain, and entering in disguise the witch's abode. Both are entirely unable to decide what to do or what to hope for. 2) Each is suffering the consequences of past sin. 3) But one has utterly forsaken God, and feels that "God is departed" from him, and now the sad story of his disobedience comes back (vers. 17, 18), and his worst fears are confirmed (ver. 19), till at last, behold his mighty frame prone on the earth in an agony of despair. The other has yielded to distrust and fallen into sin, but has not at heart abandoned the Lord; it may have been in no such lively exercise then as to give him any comfort, but sinning, sorrowing David had still in his heart the fear of Jehovah. 4) And as a result, the fallen king, ruinously defeated and despairing, dies next day by his own hand (xxxi.); while the merciful over-ruling of God's Providence extricates David from his position (xxix.), and prepares for him a new chastening, which brings him to repentance and trust (xxx. 4, 6-8). Behold the difference between a sinning man impenitent, unbelieving, proud, and a sinning man ready to repent, clinging to faith and really humble before God. (Comp. below on chap. xxx., "Hist. and Theol.").—Tr.]

[Vers. 21-25. Even in a sorceress, with all her deceptions and delusions, her wild and dreadful life, the true woman comes out at the mute appeal of misery. How kindly persuasive her words; how prompt her hospitable labors. We take leave of her, as she took leave of the ruined king, with a pitying heart.—Tr.]

II. David's Dismissal from the Philistine Army.

CHAPTER XXIX. 1-11.

- 1 Now [And] the Philistines gathered together all their armies¹ to Aphek; and
- 2 the Israelites pitched by a [the] fountain² which is in Jezreel. And the lords³ of the Philistines passed on by hundreds and by thousands, but [and] David and his

And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the [om. the] king of Israel, which [who] hath been with me these days or these years,⁵ and I have found no

And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him, Make this fellow [the man] return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him, and let him not go down with us to battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary⁶ to us; for wherewith should he reconcile himself [make himself accept-

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² [Ver. 1. Sept. Endor, Arab. "near the city (יִזְרְעֵל) Jezreel," Syr. apparently "in In" as proper name. Eng. A. V. is correct.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. The ordinary word לְרִיבֵי, which Eng. A. V. renders "princes" throughout this chapter.—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. An indefinite phrase, but not therefore suspicious. The versions have dealt variously with it. Chald. and Vulg. follow the Heb. literally (as Eng. A. V.), except that Vulg. has "multis diebus." Syr. has "this time and time and months," which is understood by some to mean "these two years and some months," but it is more probably a reproduction of the phrase in xxvii. 1, and — "a year and some months" (so Arab.). The Sept. ἀμῆρας τοῦτο δεῦτερον ἔτος perhaps contains a duplet, as Wellh. suggests, and the text of Stier and Theile (eclectic) gives δεῦτερον ἔτος σήμερον "two years to-day." Sept. probably read דְּשָׁנִים "two years," not, however, דְּשָׁנִים יָמִים (suggested by Wellh. as basis of the Heb. and Greek texts) which would not be rendered "two years" but "two days." It seems better, on the whole, to retain the present Heb. text, and regard Sept. and Syr. as free renderings.—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 4. Heb. שָׂטָן satan, used in the general sense of "adversary" in the earlier books of the Bible, and with the Art. as a proper name in Job and Zechariah, and without the Art. in 1 Chr. xxi. 1. The verb. שָׂטַן "to hate, be hostile to," is used only in the general sense. Fürst refers to the curious view of Justin Martyr (Dial. cum Tryph. 103) that Zaratras = שָׂטָן הַנָּחַשׁ "the apostate serpent."—Tr.]

- 5 able] unto his master? should it not be with the heads of these men? Is not this David, of whom they sang one to another in dances, saying, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands?
- 6 Then Achish called David, and said unto him, Surely [om. surely], as the Lord [As Jchovah] liveth, thou hast been [art] upright, and thy going out and thy coming in with me in the host is good in my sight; for I have not found evil in thee since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day; nevertheless the lords favour thee
- 7 not [but in the eyes of the lords thou art not good]. Wherefore [And] now return, and go in peace, that thou displease not the lords of the Philistines. And David said unto Achish, But' what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant so long as I have been with thee [from the day^a when I was in thy presence] unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?
- 9 And Achish answered and said unto David, I know^a that thou art good in my sight as an angel¹⁰ of God; notwithstanding [but] the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go up with us to the battle. Wherefore [And] now, rise up early in the morning with thy master's servants that are come with thee;¹¹ and as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart. So David and his men rose up early to depart in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines. And the Philistines went up to¹² Jezreel.

⁷ [Ver. 8. 'ב is here a cohortative and illative particle, and might be rendered "then" (so Erdmann), but, as it is also adversative, the translation of Eng. A. V. is better.—Tr.]

⁸ [Ver. 8. כִּי. Wellhausen: Either omit אֲשֶׁר or write the Art. before אֲשֶׁר.—Tr.]

⁹ [Ver. 9. Perhaps better with Thenius and Philippon: "I know it, for (or, yea) thou art, etc." This avoids the redundancy of the translation of Eng. A. V. and Erdmann: "I know . . . in my eyes." The guida of the Vulgate = "quod"—Tr.]

¹¹ [Ver. 10. Here the Sept. inserts: "and go ye to the place where I have appointed you, and set thou nothing evil in thy heart, for thou art good in my sight." Thenius and Wellhausen favor this insertion on the ground that after the "rise early" follows usually the mention of the thing done, while the Heb. text has the unnecessary repetition "rise early . . . and rise early" (the "as soon as" of Eng. A. V. is not expressed in the Heb.). On the other hand, we cannot well account for the omission of this clause, if it formed a part of the original text, while the insertion might have been made by a copyist (or the phrase added on the margin) to soften the repetition. We may suppose the verb here repeated because of the intervening clause, which called for a change in the Number of the Verb.—Tr.]

¹² [Ver. 11. Some MSS. contain the preposition, which is here obviously involved in the construction. Sept. Vat.: "went up to fight against Jezreel," but Alex. has "against Israel," which is adopted by Thenius, on which Wellh. says: "Thenius is misled by Eusebius into putting Aphek in the vicinity of Endor (Lagarde, Onomast. 216, 28); in that case, of course, the expression 'the Philistines went up to Jezreel' would be meaningless, since they were already there. But Aphek is the same in xxix. 1 as in iv. 1, near Mispheh and Ebenezer." Yet, from Aphek near Mispheh to Jezreel would be going down, not up. From some lower place (as near Shunem) they would naturally advance to seize the hill Jezreel, which lay between their camp and Saul's. The fountain in Jezreel (ver. 1) is perhaps the grand spring at the foot of Gilboa, regarded as being in the district of Jezreel.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Resumption of the narrative of the war between the Philistines and Israelites, xxviii. 1-4, with an exacter description of the positions of the two armies. Aphek—to be distinguished from the places of the same name in Asher (Josh. xix. 30; Judges i. 31), in Judah on the mountain (Joshua xv. 53), and near Ebenezer (1 Samuel iv. 1)—belonged to Issachar, and is probably the same with the present el Afuleh near Solam=Sunem (v. d. Velde, Mem., p. 286; Ew., Gesch., III, 142, A. 2). Southeast of this Philistine rendezvous the Israelites were encamped "at the spring near Jezreel" the present Zerin (Rob., III, i. 395) [Am. ed., ii. 319-323, where Robinson explains the identity of the names Jezreel and Zerin, the Heb. el often becoming in in Arabic, as Beitin = Bethel; so Zereel=Zerin.—Tr.] Ain [= "spring"] is not = Endor, as the Sept. wrongly gives it, whence it is adopted by Euseb. in the Onomasticon, but the present Ain Jalud,* a very bold spring on the northwest declivity of Gilboa, whence flows a brook through the Wady Jalud into the Jordan. There the Israelitish army encamped opposite the Philistine in a well-watered spot near Jezreel. "Elsewhere also a spring gives name to a stopping-place or border line, 2 Sam. xvii. 17; Num. xxxiv. 11" (Böttch.).—Ver. 2. Vivid description of the array of the Philistine army, not at the mustering (Bunsen), but in their movement to Aphek. In divisions of hundreds and thousands, at the head of their divisions the "Princes [lords] of the Philistines" marched on, properly "marched over," that is, over the plain of Esdraelon to Jezreel (comp. ver. 4). Here in the north they advanced with their whole force, in order to bring about a decisive battle in the plain with the Israelites, not being able to maintain themselves permanently in the mountains. Their advance to Jezreel forced Saul to lead his whole army thither. There is no ground or necessity for supposing that they had occupied or ravaged the middle portion of the country where Saul's royal residence, Gibeah lay, in order then to carry the war into the extremely fruitful northern district, and thus soon conquer all Israel (Ew., Gesch., III, 142), "for towards the end of his reign Saul's military strength was probably not so great that he could have divided it" (Then). The Philistines having begun their march, Achish found himself with David in the rearward.—Ver. 3. The other leaders object to the presence of David and his men: What do these Hebrews here? As it is said in ver. 11 that David returned to the land of the Philistines, and according to xxx. 1 they reached Ziklag after a three days' march, the objection of the Philistine princes must have been made on Israelitish soil, or near the Palestinian border, but not at the commencement of the march. From Achish's reply it appears that the princes distrusted David, suspecting that he would go over to his own people and fight against the Philistines. Achish observes 1) that David is servant of Saul, king of Israel, thus alluding to his enmity with Saul, 2) that he has already been allied with him a long time against Saul, "these days or these years" = "a year and a day," indefinite statement of the time mentioned in xxvii. 7: "a year and four months,"—and 3) that in all this time he has seen nothing in him to awaken suspicions of treachery. From the day of his falling (יָבֹל), instead of [rather, used alongside of—Tr.] יָבֹל, see Ew., § 255, d). The vss. add "to me," according to the usual construction of the verb, though we need not therefore insert "to me" (יָבֹל) in the text (Then.), "since it is understood from the context" (Keil). On these grounds Achish thought himself quite sure of David, comp. xxvii. 12.—Ver. 4. The twofold designation of the Philistine leaders, here "chiefs" [Eng. A. V. "princes"], in ver. 2, "princes" [Eng. A. V. "lords"] comes from the circumstantial character of the narration, not from oversight (Then.), though the Sept. and Vulg. omit the second name. The chiefs of the Philistines did not accept Achish's explanation, but were angry with him, and demanded of him that he send David back to his place, which he (Achish) had appointed him, that is, to Ziklag. They said: He shall not go down with us into the battle. "Go down" (יָרַד) is a regular technical military expression, derived from the necessity in that mountainous country of descending into the plain to fight,* comp. xxvi. 10; xxx. 24. To Achish's defence of David they reply: 1) he might become an adversary to them in battle, though he had hitherto been an ally; 2) he might wish to recommend himself to his lord, though he had up to this time opposed him,—with the heads of these men. The Hithpael of the verb (יָרַד) indicates zealous self-activity, "earnestly to commend one's self," or, "to seek to make one's self acceptable" (Ew., § 124 a). "These," they say, pointing to the Philistine troops. By defeating a part of our force, said they, he would try to regain Saul's favor. Herein is a recognition of David's bravery and military ability, which they would be the less disposed to doubt when they recollected the defeat he had formerly inflicted on Goliath and the Palestine army. For they say 3) Is this not David, of whom they sang in dances? &c. Comp. xviii. 7 with xvi. 11. It is the same argument that Achish's servants used against him on his first visit to Achish's court. The Philistines' recollection of that achievement is here to be the means of rescuing David from the painful necessity of going into battle with the Philistines against his own people.

Ver. 6. Achish is obliged to yield to the decided demand of his comrades. He assures David that his confidence in him is unshaken, that he regards him as an honorable and faithful man. Achish's oath "by the life of Jehovah" is to be explained not by the fact that a Hebrew is here the narrator (Then.), or that Achish had learned from David to know and honor the God of Israel (S. Schmid), but by his desire to attest more strongly the truth of his words by invoking the God whom David worshipped. Achish, however, does not say that he had been pleased with David in former wars (Tremell., Vatablus), but his words refer to this campaign, he assuring him of his confidence in contrast with the distrust of the princes. He means to say: To me thou art the object of undoubting trust, but the princes do not wish thee to take part in the campaign. Thus he excuses himself, as it were, to David for the fact that he must now (ver. 7) bid him return, that he may do nothing evil in the eyes of the princes of the Philistines.—Ver. 8. As Achish remains true in word and deed to his honorable confidence in David, so David remains true to his rôle (xxvii.) of dishonorable prevarication to Achish; for, when he says: that I should not go and fight against the enemies of my lord, the king—this "my lord, the king," may refer as well to Achish as to Saul; and, for the rest, he could not have been in earnest in saying that he would fight, for he certainly would not have fought against his own countrymen (Then.).—Ver. 9. Achish trustingly accepts David's words as referring to himself, and renews the assurance of confidence in his honor. The I know is the reply to David's assertion of his faithfulness in the question: "What have I done?" etc. [Translate: "I know it, for thou art good," etc.—Tr.] Achish's testimony to David's fidelity and honor (on the words: "yea, thou art in my eyes," etc. comp. Gen. xlviii. 19) rises to the point of comparing him with an "angel (= messenger)* of God," see 2 Sam. xiv. 17; xix. 27. I esteem thee as highly, he would say, as if thou wert sent to me from God—but the princes say: "he shall not go up with us to the war." The word "go up" refers to the progress of the march from the south upwards towards the north.—Ver. 10. With the servants of thy lord, that is, of Saul; whose subjects they were. [On the text see "Textual and Grammatical."—Tr.]—Ver. 11. David returns to Philistia, to Ziklag (xxx. 1).—That David, in order to avoid a sad alternative, himself artfully roused the opposition of the Philistine princes to his participation in the campaign (as Thenius thinks not impossible), is, even

* [This is a sufficient reply to Wellhausen's remark that "the narrator here forgets that he is dealing with a Philistine, who [as dwelling in a plain] would probably use the opposite expression [go up]."—Tr.]

* [This word is probably to be taken here in a supernatural sense. We need not suppose this a Hebrew idea put into the mouth of the Philistine; the conception of superhuman messengers of God (= our "angels") is so general and natural that there is no difficulty in supposing it to be known and used among the Philistines.—Tr.] if possible, too bold a conjecture; the narrative gives no ground for it.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. God's patience is such that the sins of the members of His kingdom are not visited with expulsion from communion with Him, so long as they, like David, direct their inner life to Him in faith, and are willing to be guided by Him. But such sins as we here see in David—fear of man, unfaith, having recourse to heathen protection, deceitful behaviour towards the kind and honorable king Achish—God does not pass by, on the one hand, without the exhibition of His punitive righteousness, partly punishing sin with sin, as we here see in David from a fundamental sin (doubt and little faith) all other sins issuing, these again coming one from another, partly inflicting internal anguish and external perplexities and painful experiences; but, on the other hand, he restrains evil consequences, and brings into play former exhibitions of His helping might (as here in the Philistines' recollection of David's victory over Goliath and the army), so to order all things according to His mercy and wisdom that the blame-worthy evil does not lead to destruction, and sub-serves the ends of His providential government of the world.

2. Certainly David's untruthfulness is not to be measured by Christian morality (Then.), for the mingling of the standpoints of the Old and New Testaments by introducing the latter into the former, both as respects moral knowledge and biblical ethics, and as respects religious truth and biblical dogmatics, is set aside by the difference of the two Testaments in the development of the history of revelation and the kingdom of God. Especially in judging of individual, concrete, ethical phenomena in the relation between man and man, where the principle of love is limited by national relations, we must take into consideration the limitation of the theocratic principle of life to the sphere of the national life in respect to those peoples that were outside of the theocracy. Nevertheless all ethical phenomena in the life of the Old-Testament bearers of the divine revelation and the theocratic principle must be looked at from the highest point of view, which is given in God's holy will itself, and judged as to their ethical character and value by the absolute standard. The God of absolute truth (Num. xxiii. 19; 2 Sam. xv. 29) demands truth from his "saints" (comp. Ex. xx. 6 with xix. 6 and Prov. vi. 16-19; Deut. xix. 11). To the God of truth and faithfulness (Ps. xl. 10-12 [9-11]) the lips must not speak falsehood (Ps. xxxiv. 15 [13]), as David himself declares. Apart, however, from the stand-point of revelation, David's conduct to Achish is condemned from the stand-point of natural-human morality by the unsuspecting faithfulness and honor of the heathen king.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. S. SCHMID: The sins of the princes of the people put weapons into the hands of the enemies of God and the Church.—Ver. 3 sq. [SCOTT: While presumptuous sinners are given up to the effects of their own counsels and driven headlong to destruction, the sins of the upright are repented of and pardoned; and the Lord takes care both of their peace and reputation.—TR.]—HEDINGER (from HALL): O the wisdom and goodness of our God, that can raise up an adversary to deliver us out of those evils which our friends cannot!—SCHLIER: When the Lord thinks on us, He comes at the right time with His blessing also. He has ways, even where we know no further expedient, and can give counsel and help where we might already despair.—Ver. 4. SCHLIER: God's children are not people that have no failings and weaknesses any more. But on account of such failings God does not yet cast off His children. Even if we sin, He does not yet at once give us up; He chastens us, but He does not cast us off.—[Ver. 6. SCOTT: When worldly people have no evil thing to say of us, but will bear testimony to our uprightness, we need desire no more from them: and this we should aim to acquire by prudence, meekness and a blameless life. But their flattering commendations are almost always purchased by improper compliances, or some measure of deception, and commonly may cover us with confusion.—TR.]—Ver. 7. CRAMER: God guides His saints wonderfully (Ps. iv. 4 [3]), and holds them back from sins which if they were given up to themselves, they would commit, acting against their own conscience, and rescues them from great peril also, into which they would otherwise have fallen through their thoughtless projects.—HEDINGER [from HALL]: One degree of dissimulation draws on another; those which have once given way to a faulty course cannot easily either stop or turn back.—[HENRY: No one knows how strong the temptation is to compliment and dissemble, which they are in that attend great men, and how hard it is to avoid it.—TR.]—What wholesome effects are produced under God's guidance by that intercourse which in the world is indispensably necessary between those who have part in God's kingdom and those who stand aloof from it? 1) For those who stand aloof from the kingdom of God: a) that they involuntarily give honor to the living God; b) that they recognize in those who belong to His kingdom the power of a higher divine character, and are compelled to bow before that power (ver. 9); c) that in themselves the remains of the divine image again come forward, and they find pleasure in that which is ethically good and beautiful. 2) For those who have part in God's kingdom themselves: a) the consoling perception that even they who stand aloof from God's kingdom have to serve as instruments for the fulfilment of the divine purposes and designs of salvation (Prov. xvi. 7); b) the wonderful confirmation of the truth that all things must work together for good to them that love God (Rom. viii. 27), and c) humbling self-knowledge in respect to their own sins and faults, in view of the morally noble behaviour of those who stand aloof from the kingdom of God, while they themselves are wanting therein.

III. David's Victory over the Amalekites who destroyed Ziklag.

CHAPTER XXX. 1-31.

- 1 AND it came to pass, when David and his men were come¹ to Ziklag on the third day, that the Amalekites had invaded the south² and Ziklag, and smitten Ziklag
 2 and burned it with fire; And had taken the women captives [captive the women] that were therein [ins. both small and great];³ they slew⁴ not any either great or small [om. either great or small], but carried them away [off] and went on their
 3 way.⁵ So [And] David and his men came to the city, and behold, it was burned with fire, and their wives and their sons and their daughters were taken captives.
 4 Then [And] David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and
 5 wept, until they had no more power to weep. And David's two wives were taken captives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite.⁶
 6 And David was greatly distressed [was in a great strait];⁷ for the people spake of stoning him, because the soul of all the people was grieved [bitter], every man for his sons and his daughters; but David encouraged [strengthened] himself in the Lord [Jehovah] his God.
 7 And David said to Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, I pray thee, bring me hither [om. hither] the ephod.⁸ And Abiathar brought thither [om. thither] the 8 ephod to David. And David inquired at the Lord [of Jehovah], saying, Shall I pursue⁹ after this troop? shall I overtake them? And he answered him, Pursue! for thou shalt surely overtake them and without fail recover all [for thou shalt
 9 overtake and deliver]. So [And] David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind
 10 stayed.¹⁰ But [And] David pursued, he and four hundred men; for [and] two hundred abode behind, which were so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor.¹¹
 11 And they found an Egyptian in the field, and brought¹² him to David, and gave

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Some MSS. have נָסַב, and in the better codices the Inf. is written fully נָסַבָּ.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 1. Vulg. and Arab. read: "the south of Ziklag," but negeb is probably here a proper name, the "South-country;" this may account for the absence of the Art.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 2. The order of words in Eng. A. V. here is opposed to the accents and to the syntax. The reading of the Heb. text, however, is harsh; we do not expect the descriptive phrase: "both small and great" to be applied to "women," and therefore the reading of the Sept.: "the women and all that was in it" (comp. ver. 19) commends itself as better. Dr. Erdmann, however, rejects it.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 2. "And slew no one," as in Chald., Vulg. and some MSS., is much easier. Syr. and Arab. strangely omit the negative, and read: "they slew the men."—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 3. Some MSS. of Kennicott and De Rossi have "the Carmelitess," referring to Abigail. See note on xxvii. 3.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 6. That is, "was in difficulty and danger," an idea not now so well expressed by the word "distress." For "grieved" or "bitter" the Bib. Com. suggests "exasperated," which conveys the sense with precision.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 8. As this is a principal, not a subordinate question, Wellh. would insert the Interrog. ִי before this verb.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 10. Wellh. suggests that the two halves of this verse have changed places; but this is unnecessary, for, though the second half would fit on to ver. 9, the present order is quite in accordance with Heb. form of narration, in which the explanation is often made to follow the principal statement.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 11. Some MSS., and Sept. and Ar. read: "took him and brought him."—Ta.]

- 12 him bread, and he did eat, and they made him drink water. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters [cakes] of raisins; and when he had eaten, his spirit¹³ came again to him; for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any
- 13 water, three days and three nights. And David said unto him, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? And he said, I am a young man of Egypt,¹⁴ servant to an Amalekite; and my master left me because three days ago¹⁵ I fell sick.
- 14 We made an invasion upon the south of the Cherethites, and upon the coast [on the region] which belongeth to Judah, and upon the south of Caleb, and we burned
- 15 Ziklag with fire. And David said to him, Canst [Wilt] thou bring me down to this company [troop]?¹⁶ And he said, Swear unto me by God that thou wilt neither kill me nor deliver me into the hands of my master and I will bring thee down
- 16 to this company [troop]. And when he had [And he] brought him down, [ins. and] behold, they were spread abroad upon all the earth [over the whole land], eating and drinking and dancing [revelling]¹⁷, because of all the great spoil which they had taken out of the land of the Philistines and out of the land of Judah.
- 17 And David smote them from the twilight even [om. even] unto the evening of the next day,¹⁸ and there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men,
- 18 which rode upon camels and fled. And David recovered [rescued] all that the
- 19 Amalekites had carried away; and David rescued his two wives. And there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither sons nor daughters, neither [nor] spoil, nor anything that they had taken to them; David recovered all.
- 20 And David took all the flocks and herds, [;] which they drove before those other cattle [they drove before him this flock],²⁰ and said, This is David's spoil.
- 21 And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom they²¹ had made also [om. also] to abide at the brook Besor. And they went forth to meet David and to meet the people that were with
- 22 him; and when David came near to the people, he saluted them. Then answered all the wicked men and men of Belial [all the wicked and worthless men], of those that went with David, and said, Because they went not with us, we will not give them ought [aught] of the spoil that we have recovered, save to every man his
- 23 wife and his children, that they may lead them away and depart. Then said David [And David said], Ye shall not do so, my brethren, with that which the Lord [Jehovah] hath given us, who hath preserved us, and delivered the company
- 24 [troop] that came against us into our hand. For [And] who will hearken unto you in this matter? but [for] as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall
- 25 his part be that tarrieth by the stuff; they shall part alike. And it was so [it came to pass] from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance
- 26 for²¹ Israel unto this day. And when [om. when] David came to Ziklag, he [and]

¹³ [Ver. 12. נִפְּחַת, not the nephesh, the "breath of life," but the breath considered as vigorous and truly alive, somewhat as in Eng. the word "spirit" has come to mean "courageous vigor and alertness."—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 13. Sept. has against connection and accents: "the young man of Egypt said, I am servant," etc.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 15. Sept. transfers ἑδούρη; in other Greek VSS. we find σύνταγμα and λόχος, and also οὐδυνος (perhaps, as Schleusner suggests, from the Chald. נִיחָ).—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 16. Properly "keeping festival."—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 17. Erdmann renders: "towards the next day" (after Luther), which is doubtful. Eng. A. V. is supported by Vulg., Chald., Sept. Chald., however, instead of using the same word as the Heb., has "the day which was after it," and the Syr. has a similar form "in their rear," as if they read נִיחָ, which does not suggest any good emendation. As the Heb. word stands, the ׀ may be regarded as pronom. suffix, "to their morrow" (redundant), or as adverbial ending. Wellhausen emends the text and reads נִיחָ, which would suit the letters of the present word, but does not particularly commend itself.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 20. So Erdmann renders, reading (with Vulg. and Then.) נִיחָ instead of נִיחָ. The sense will be still better if we further read in the beginning of the verse: "And they took," instead of "And David took." The taking and driving seem to be the work of the same person (as Wellh. remarks), and it would be appropriate for David's men rather than for himself to set aside his spoil. This change would require very little alteration of the lettering. As for the words: "this flock," they seem unnecessary (Wellh. would reject them as clerical explanation), yet do not interfere materially with the sense.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 21. The Sing. "he" is found in some MSS., and in Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., Chald., and is better.—At the end of the verse instead of נִיחָ, the VSS. and some MSS. have נִיחָ.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 25. There is a good deal of authority (about forty MSS., several printed Edd., and the Vulg.) for reading "in Israel," which is better.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-6. Description of the calamity inflicted by the Amalekites, who plundered and burned Ziklag, the grief of David and his men at their loss, the danger to which he was exposed from the exasperated people who threw the blame on him, and his strengthening in the Lord.—The construction of the four first verses is as follows: the protasis extends through the three first verses, but with two parentheses, the first extending from "and the Amalekites," in ver. 1 to the end of ver. 2, the second including all of ver. 3 after the word "behold;" the apodosis is ver. 4.—On the third day, namely, after his departure from Achish. The Amalekites had used David's absence and the defenceless condition of Ziklag to revenge themselves for his invasion of their territory (xxvii. 8). The south and Ziklag, the general term preceding the particular. The Negeb is the south-country, so called by the Israelites as being the southern part of Palestine or Judah, while it was north of the Amalekite territory. According to ver. 13 they had plundered Ziklag three days before David's return. In verse 2 only the women are said to have been carried away; the children, mentioned in vers. 3, 6, are omitted here for brevity's sake. The Sept.'s addition to the text of the words "and all" is unnecessary (against The-nius).* So the words "nor woman" after "man" are an explanatory insertion of the Sept. It is expressly remarked that the women were not slain, because they intended to make slaves of them and the children [in contrast with David's conduct, xxvii. 11.—Tr.]. The two wives of David, Ahinoam and Abigail, are especially named, xxv. 42 sq., xxvii. 3. The great sorrow that they all, David and his men, expressed with tears and cries, corresponds with the great peril that threatened David, the people charging their misfortune on him and thinking of stoning him.—The soul of all the people was bitter, they were deeply agitated. But he strengthened himself in the Lord his God, he had recourse to Him in order (ver. 7 sq.) to inquire of him by the ephod, as he had done, xxiii. 9. His strengthening in the Lord consisted in the fact that, being assured through his inquiry of the Lord's assistance, he straightway set out with his embittered men to recover the spoil from the Amalekites.

* [On this reading see "Textual and Grammatical."—Tr.]

Vers. 7-10. David's arrangements to secure his end: 1) the religious preparation, verses 7, 8; he first assured himself of the Lord's will that he should pursue the enemy, and of His promise that he should be successful,—on the words "bring me the ephod," which indicate that the ephod was exclusively the property of the high-priest,* comp. Hengst., Beit. [Contributions, etc.] 3, 67 sq.—2) his military disposition of his men, ver. 9, 10. The six hundred men appear here as before. They are divided into two parts, four hundred pursue the enemy, two hundred remain behind, when they have reached the brook Besor. [But this arrangement was not at first intended by David; it was a necessity forced on him by the exhaustion of the two hundred.—Tr.]. The brook Besor is probably the present Wady el Sheria, which begins in the hill-country of Judah and flows in a south-westerly direction south of Gaza into the sea. See Raumer, Pal. p. 52. [Rob. thought it the Wady Ar arah, and Grove and Porter think it yet unidentified.—Tr.].—At this brook and in its valley—both must be considered here, because the staying behind of some of David's men, afterwards referred to their exhaustion, supposes an insurmountable difficulty in the ground—"the rest" (הַיְתָרִים ver. 9) remained in a position adapted to the protection of the baggage which was left here (see ver. 24). The narrator here anticipates what is told in ver. 10; it is a proleptical expression, arising from the vivacious description of David's rapid march with four hundred men, and there is no need to change the text into the Vulg. lassi "wearied" (= יָבִיזוּ), as Then. proposes, especially as the ancient VSS. had it and explained it by periphrases (Keil).† The verb (יָבִיז) = "to be weary" in Syr., occurs only here and in ver. 21. Weariness was the reason of their remaining behind. At the same time they served to guard the baggage (ver. 24).

Vers. 11-16 a. David gets information of the Amalekites from an Egyptian straggler. Ver. 11. And they found an Egyptian; from the proximity of Egypt the Amalekites had Egyptians as slaves (comp. ver. 13). And they took, that is, brought him to David, a pregnant expression in keeping with the rapidity of the action. The insertion of the Sept. "and they brought him," is clearly an explanatory reading (against Then.).

* [The inquiry was probably conducted by the high-priest, in a way unknown to us, but more probably the answer came through the priest's mouth.—Tr.]

"Bread" (לֶחֶם) = food; they gave him to eat and to drink;" the general statement stands first.—Ver. 12. The sort of food which they gave him. On the "fig-cakes" see on xxv. 18. His spirit returned to him, he revived; having been left behind sick, and having been three days and three nights without food, he had lain exhausted on the field.*—Ver. 13 sq. The Egyptian's answer. To whom belondest thou? that is, as slave, for as such he was recognized by his exterior. "Whence art thou?" (מֵיָמָיְךָ, the "מ" remains unchanged, the יָמָי changes according to the relations of the sentence. Ew. § 326 a).—"We invaded;" the verb here only stands with the Accus., usually with a Prep. (אֶל, לְ, מֵ, עַל, ver. 16).

—The first geographical statement [ver. 14]: On the south of the Cherethites,† a Philistine tribe dwelling in the south and on the sea (see ver. 16), which came originally, as the name indicates, from the island of Crete. See in Steph. Byzant. s. v. Gaza, the tradition that the Cretans under Minos made an expedition against the neighboring coast of Gaza. Reasons for the view that Caphor, the home of the Philistines (who were not indigenous to Canaan, but immigrants, Deut. ii. 23; Amos ix. 7), is identical with Crete, may be seen in Bertheau sur Gesch. d. Israel, p. 186–200. Comp. Ewald Gesch. [Hist. of Israel] I. 336. Against this view see Starke's Gaza, p. 66 sq., 99 sq., Dunker's Gesch. d. Alterthums I., 339 A. [See also Vaihinger's Article "Philistiner," and Müller's Art. "Kanaan" in Herzog's R.-E., and Müller's more recent book "Die Semiten," in which he wrongly makes the Philistines Japhethites. The whole question is obscure, but there is some ground for holding that the Philistines first passed from the neighborhood of the Persian Gulf into Lower Egypt (Gen. x. 14, "whence came the Philistines"), thence through Crete to Canaan, to which country they have given the name Palestine. This would explain the Phœnician-Canaanitish type of their language.—Tr.]—The second statement: On what pertained to Judah, the southern regions of Judah, forming the eastern portion of the Negeb or Southland, which stretched across from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea. The third statement: On the south of Caleb.—Caleb, one of the twelve spies, as reward for his faithfulness and believing courage, he alone with Joshua, daring, and advising the people, to enter the land (Num. xiii. 6, 30: xiv. 6 sq.), was, with Joshua, alone considered worthy to tread the land of promise; the city of Hebron and its environs was given to him and his posterity as a lasting possession. When the city of Hebron was afterwards assigned to the priests, the race of Caleb yet retained all the adjacent fields and villages (Josh. xxi. 11 sq.). Though it belonged to the tribe-territory of Judah, the district of Caleb is regarded as a distinct region; it formed the eastern part of the Negeb as far as the Dead Sea, comp. xxv. 3. The three regions, which the Amalekites invaded, are named from West to East. We hence see that the plundering expedition of the Amalekites extended over the whole South-country, and was not intended for Ziklag alone.—Ver. 15. David's question: Wilt thou bring me down to this troop? supposes the Amalekites had marched southward, and dwelt there south of Judah and Philistia. The Egyptian assures himself by an oath (by "Elohim," not by "Jehovah"), from David that he will not kill him, "because informers and guides, after having been used, were often so disposed of" (Thenius), and that he would not deliver him up to his master, because the latter would have killed him for his service to David.—Ver. 16 a assumes that David gave him the oath. He brought him down.—It is unnecessary (with Sept. and Then.) to insert "thither." Though the slave was left behind sick, he yet knew the direction which "this troop" had taken.

Vers. 16 b–20. David surprises the Amalekites and recovers the booty. Ver. 16 b. After "behold" we ought perhaps to suppose "they" (הֵמָּה) fallen out (so Then. after Sept.). The narrative gives a lively description of the Amalekite troop, scattered over the ground (so David found them), revelling after their successful foray, and "celebrating a feast because of all the great spoil."—Ver. 17. Thus abandoned to jollity David surprises them. The statement: from the twilight to the evening is understood by some to mean from the morning-twilight, by others to mean from the evening-twilight, the Heb. word (עֶרְבָּה) being used in both senses, for example, in the former in Job vii. 4. In favor of the morning-twilight is 1) that David could only have surprised the revelling Amalekites by a night-march; and 2) the counter-limit: "to the evening." Luther: "from morning to evening." The succeeding word (לְכֹחֵהֶם) means not "on the following day," but (because of the Prep.) "towards the next day" (Luth.). According to the former rendering the fight would have lasted two whole days, which is improbable. According to the latter it lasted (as agrees with the circumstances) only one day, from morning to evening, when according to Heb. reckoning the following day began. The suffix (וֹ), which the ancient VSS., except Syr. and Arab.,* do not express, is perhaps an adverbial ending† (Maurer, Ges., Then., Keil). That David had to fight the Amalekites a whole day shows that after the first surprise in the twilight they made obstinate resistance. [Instead of "the next day," Bib.-Com.

proposes to read "to wipe them out" (לְמַחֲמָה), and similarly Wellhausen. The present text is difficult. The addition "towards the morrow" (Erdmann) is unnecessary, and the phrase itself is strange, though sustained by the ancient versions. No explanation yet proposed is satisfactory.—Tr.]—Ver. 18 sq. Statement of David's complete success; he recovered all the goods and persons that the Amalekites had carried away.—Ver. 20. All the sheep and oxen David took away, namely, from the Amalekites, not merely what they had taken from him, but other rich booty in cattle. "That flock" (הַצֹּמֶה הַהוּא) [Eng. A. V. wrongly "those other cattle"] is not the flock that belonged to David, and was now recovered by him from the Amalekites. So some expositors take it, explaining it that David caused the flocks captured from the Amalekites to be driven before the rest which belonged to him, with the cry: "this is the spoil of David;" but there is no previous special mention of stolen cattle which would justify such a retrospective designation: "before that (David's) flock." "That flock," in such a demonstrative or retrospective sense, can only be the previously-mentioned cattle captured from the enemy [ver. 19]. Nor can we render with De Wette "they marched," properly "they led," that is, led the train of women and children; for the verb (לָקַח), as Thenius properly remarks in opposition, "never (even Gen. xxxi. 18; Ex. iii. 1; Isa. xi. 16; Ps. lxxx. 2 (1) Song of Songs viii. 2) means lead except in so far as the leader is at the same time the driver (so vers. 2, 22; 2 Sam. vi. 3), and never means draw forward, lead on." Taking the verb in the sense of "driving," there is, however, no object to the verb in the Heb. text (לָקַח); the "women and children" cannot be the object, since only cattle has been spoken of. We must therefore (with Then. after Vulg.) make a slight change in the text (read לָקַח) and render: "they (the drivers) drove (or, one drove) before him," that is, before David (who stood of course at the head of the troop) this flock, namely, that which had been captured from the Amalekites, to which the outcry "this is David's spoil" answers very well.*

Vers. 21-25. David's return with the recovered property and the booty to the two hundred men who were left behind, and the adjustment of a strife which was made by some wicked men of his band in regard to the division of the booty with them.—Ver. 21. Follow David, more precise statement of what is said in ver. 10, that they could not go over the brook Besor for weariness. The Sing. "he made to abide" (found in all ancient VSS. except Chald., and in 5 MSS. of De Rossi) instead of the Plu. is preferable (Then.), not only because it pertained to David to permit them to stay behind, but also because he is mentioned immediately before and after. David, who had left the tired two hundred to guard the baggage, now gives them friendly greeting as they come joyfully to meet him. On the phrase "he saluted them," lit., "asked after their peace," see xxv. 5; Judg. xviii. 15.—Ver. 22. But in this joyful meeting a discordant note was introduced by certain "wicked and worthless persons" of the band, who had marched with David against the enemy and fought them. The translation of the Sept. "the men of war" is obviously an explanation, and does not require (Then.) a corresponding change in the Heb. text (אֲנָשֵׁי הַפְּלִיחָה). The Sing. "with me" refers to the individual man who speaks in the name of the rest [Eng. A. V., ad sensum "with us."—Tr.]. Because they went not, because they did not share the danger, they shall not share the spoil, but each one must content himself with his wife and children. The "every one" (כָּל־אֶחָד) is not dependent on "we will give" [as Eng. A. V. has it], so as to read, "we will give them nothing, except to every man his wife, etc.," but the proper translation is (Thenius): "but every one his wife and children, these let them lead away, etc.," because the "every one" (כָּל־אֶחָד) is too far from the "to them" (לָהֶם) to be governed by the preposition "to."—Ver. 23. In a gentle and friendly way David repels their demand. By the address "my brethren," he speaks to their hearts, and at the same time alludes to the fraternal association in which they all stand with one another, so that they that remained behind must receive their share by fraternal division. Do not so, my brethren, by that which the Lord has given us.—אֲנִי is not Prep. = "with that which" (De Wette), but the sign of the Acc. [= "in respect to that which" freely rendered "with" as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. Ewald, taking it as Acc., renders the phrase as an ejaculatory oath "by that which . . ." (Gr., § 329 a), and so as an exclamation: "think on that which." In favor of this translation, instead of the usual "in respect to that which" is partly the interpunction (a strong pause at the word "my brethren," אֲחֵי), as even Then. admits, partly the excited feeling with which David speaks notwithstanding his friendly and gentle tone, so that this rendering cannot be rejected (Then.) as "less natural."* Translate "for he has guarded us, etc." (the ל in לְשָׁמְרָנוּ as causal).—Ver. 24. And who will hearken to you in this word; we must here beyond doubt render "word" (דָּבָר) and not "thing" [as in Eng. A. V.] because of the reference to the "word" so emphatically spoken by the men. "For" [כִּי Eng. A. V. "but"] refers to the negation involved in the question, the reason for which is given in the following words; according to the sense, therefore, it = "but" or "rather." The Sept. inserts by way of explanation the words: "they are not inferior to us, wherefore," but there is no ground for inserting this into the Heb. text (against Then.). As is the part . . . so be the part . . . These words are explained by the brief declaration: together shall they share, which ordains the procedure corresponding to that rule.†—David repels the opposition with two arguments, 1) a divine, drawn from the so manifestly experienced goodness of the Lord, pointing a) to the gift bestowed on them in this booty; b) to the protection vouchsafed them; c) to the victory granted them; 2) a purely human, in which a) he affirms that no one will support them in their demand, since they were "wicked and worthless people," b) in proof of this he points out the equality of soldiers in position and merit, whether they take part in battle, or act as guards of baggage in reserve, and thence c) declares the demand of human justice "every one his own," every one shall share in that which has fallen to all together. An admirable speech, which set forth most fitly everything essential, and completely settled the dispute. [See in Patrick's Comm. in loco, a citation from Polybius on the ancient rule of partition in war, and the procedure of Publius Scipio, like David's, given in Polyb. X., XVI. 5 (Bib. Comm.).—Tr.].—Ver. 25. So it was from that day forward.—David's decision ruled from thenceforth. "He made it," the Subj. is David, not indefinite "one made it" (Sept., Vulg., Chald.). [A similar law in Numb. xxxi. 27, only there the division is between the soldiery and those that stayed at home, the former having the advantage. David's rule was perhaps a special application of the general principle; it was in force in the time of the Maccabees (2 Macc. viii. 28, 30). See Bp. Patrick's further illustrations.—The translation "upwards" referring back to Abraham, Gen. xiv. 23, 24 (Rashi cited by Gill), is plainly wrong.—Tr.]

* [This rendering will hardly commend itself. An oath would naturally be by what God "has done for us," or by His "mercy towards us," not by what He "has given us." Sept. has "after (אֲחֵי) the Lord has given us," and Cohen "after what the Eternal has given us." The ordinary rendering seems most satisfactory.—Tr.]

Vers. 26–31. The dividing out of the booty.—Ver. 26. David retained enough of the booty in the division among his own men, to send considerable presents to the elders of Judah, his friends.—The territory of the tribe of Judah had been the scene of his wanderings during his persecution by Saul; see the express reference to this in ver. 31. Here only his kingdom could and was to come to historical realization through the adhesion to him of the elders of Judah and through them of the whole people. Because they were his "friends," therefore he sent them presents from the spoil taken from Judah's old hereditary enemies; he did not send them gifts to make them his friends. [Probably for both reasons.—Tr.]. It is besides probable that many localities in Judah had been plundered by the Amalekites in this foray. F. W. Krummacher: "This was already a royal act in vivid anticipation of his impending accession to the throne. Already the crown of Israel was unmistakably though dimly visible above his head." David's point of view in sending these gifts is declared expressly to be the religious-theocratic in his accompanying words: Behold a gift of blessing for you of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord.—"Blessing" (נְסִיכָה) = "gift" which comes from God (see xxv. 27). The enemies, from whom the booty was taken, he calls enemies of Jehovah, because they were enemies of God's people and so of God's cause and kingdom in Israel, yea, of God Himself, who as covenant-God identified Himself with His people. Israel's conflict against its enemies was a "conflict of the Lord" see on xvii. 47. The booty taken in battle from the Amalekites by the Lord's help was therefore a gift of God and thus a "blessing," in which all Judah, where was the factual foundation for David's kingdom, was to share through its elders and in all its separate localities. It must, therefore, have been a very rich booty, as we might also infer from the long duration of the battle.—The term Judah embraces all the territory of that tribe, together with certain after-mentioned cities of Simeon scattered on the south border of Judah, as in Josh. xv. 21 sq. some cities of Simeon are mentioned among the cities of Judah.—Ver. 27. Bethel cannot (according to ver. 31) be the city in Benjamin (now Beitin); the Sept. Vat. has Baith-sour, which Then. would adopt into the text as Beth-sur, the name of a city in the hill-country of Judah between Jerusalem and Hebron (Josh. xv. 58; 2 Chron. xi. 7), which, however, is undesirable from the great difference between the syllables el and sur. It is probably the same place which is called Keil in Josh. xv. 30, identical with the Simeonite town called in Josh. xix. 4 Bethul and mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 30 between Tolad and Hormah under the name Bethul; according to Knobel = Elusa or el Khalasa, now a large ruin about twelve miles south of Beersheba, comp. Rob. I. 333 sq. [Am. Ed. I. 201, 202], Fay [in Lange's Biblework] and Keil on Josh. xv. 30, V. Raumer, 180.—Ramoth-Negeb, so called, in distinction from other cities of the same name, as lying in the "south-country" belonging to Simeon, Josh. xix. 8. ["Shimei the Ramathite (1 Chr. xxvii. 27), who was over David's vineyards, was evidently a native of this Ramah" (Bib. Comm.).—Tr.].—Jattir, probably the present Attir, Rob. II. 422 [Am. Ed. I. 494, II. 204], a priestly city, Josh. xv. 48; xxi. 14; 1 Chron. vi. 42, in the southern part of the hill-country of Judah, in Eusebius' time (Onom. s. v. Jether) a large place inhabited by Christians, twenty Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, called in Seetzen, R. III. 8, 6, Ater.—Ver. 28. Aroer, 1 Chron. xi. 44, in Judah, now a city with colossal ruins of foundation-walls in Wady Ar'ara, about six miles south-east of Beersheba and eight miles south of Hebron, Rob. III. 180 [Am. Ed. II. 199].—Siphmoth, not identified, not = Shepham on the north-border of Canaan, Num. xxxiv. 10, 11, the places here mentioned being all in the south (see ver. 31), according to Keil, "perhaps found in Zebdi the Siphmils in 1 Chron. xxvii. 27." [Bib. Comm. in loco, remarks on the number of cases in which David's officials are the companions of his youth.—Tr.].—Eshemoa, now the large village Semua, according to Schubert 2225 feet above the level of the sea, on the south-western part of the hill-country of Judah, Rob. II. 422, III. 191 [Am. Ed. I. 494, II. 204, 205], with numerous remains of walls, once a priestly city (Josh. xv. 50; xxi. 14).—Ver. 29. Rachal, unknown. Instead of this the Sept. has five different names: Ged, Kimath, Saphek, Themath, Karmel, which Themius would insert in the text, supposing that they might easily have fallen out through the repetition of the phrase "to them which" (לָהֶם). But only two of these names (Gad and Karmel) are found elsewhere, and Then. is obliged therefore to suppose changes in the original Greek forms* in order to get known names. But besides the complicated character of these changes, the conjecture is opposed by the fact that Gath, as a Philistine city, cannot according to ver. 26 come into consideration here. And so the conjecture that Rachal is a corruption of Karmel is untenable.—The cities of the Jerahmeelites and the Kenites were in the south of Judah (xxvii. 10).—Ver. 30. Hormah, in Judah, also in the Negeb or south-country (Josh. xv. 30), assigned to the Simeonites according to Josh. xix. 4, called by the Canaanites Zephath (Judg. i. 17), situated on the southern declivity of the mountains of the Amalekites or the Amorites, now called Sepata [the pass es-Sufa, Rob. ii. 181,—Tr.], a ruin on the western declivity of the elevated plateau Rakhma, five miles south of Khalasa (Elusa), see Ritter 14, 1085 [Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Hormah; see Josh. xii. 14.—Tr.]. Comp. Num. xiv. 45; xxi. 3, the latter as to the meaning of the name: banning, ban-place.—Chor-ashan probably=*Ashan (Josh. xv. 42), according to Josh. x. 7 a city of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 32).—Athach, only here, otherwise unknown; Then. conjectures the reading to be Ether (אֶתֶר), a Simeonite city (Josh. xix. 7; xv. 43), which is possible from the similarity of the third letters [ך. ך]. In ver. 30 the Sept. has Jarmuth for Hormah, and inserts two additional names, Beer-sheba (Josh. xv. 28; xix. 2) and Nombe, for which Then. refers to the Nuba visited by Tobler.—Ver. 31. Hebron, fourteen miles south of Jerusalem, a primeval city (Gen. xxiii. 17; Num. xiii. 22), in a deep and narrow valley in the hill-country of Judah, now el Khalil, that is, Friend of God, so called with reference to Abraham's residence there.—And to all places, etc.—David showed himself grateful to all who befriended and adhered to him as a fugitive, and bound them still closer to him.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. It is a wonderful providence of God in the development of the parallel-running fates of Saul and David that, just before the catastrophe which overwhelmed Saul and his house and kingdom, the ways of both men seem to sink into the depths of misfortune, and lose themselves without a trace, Saul's way in battle with the Philistines, David's in hostilities with the Amalekites. And so the nation Israel, already divided in fact between Saul and David, seems to be carried along to destruction with its two heads, and given up beyond salvation to its two mightiest hereditary foes. And on both sides God's punitive justice is seen controlling human sin, for not only Saul, on whose head God's final judgment of wrath descends, is guilty, David's strait also is the result of his sin. This consisted 1) in his sinful weakness of faith and despair, which led him to have recourse to Israel's enemy, instead of remaining trustfully in Judah according to the Lord's direction (xxii. 5); 2) in his untruthfulness and prevarication, which led him to join the enemy against his own people, the Amalekites meantime, while he was marching north, plundering his possessions in the south, and 3) in his extremely cruel and bloody foray against the Amalekites (xxvii.), for which he had received no commission from the Lord, by which their vengeance was kindled against him. All this teaches us, as we look at David and at Saul, that sin is destruction. And yet, notwithstanding this similarity in suffering, which appears, on the one hand, as a divine punishment, and, on the other hand, in sin as cause of destruction, there is here completed to the eye that can recognize God's ways, in a summary and epoch-making manner that most important contrast, whose history runs through the whole development of the kingdom of God in the Old Covenant and in the New. Saul's way vanishes in the darkness of an unfortunate battle with the old enemy of the nation, into whose hand God gives him and the people, and his life ends in despair; the sentence of rejection is executed. David's way emerges from the gloom, he returns as victor over the foe, dispenses presents with princely munificence, his kingdom flourishes in the south over the whole territory of the mighty tribe of Judah, whose power southward against the tribes of which Amalek was the most dangerous in its enmity, and westward against the powerful Philistines, was the protection and guard of all Israel. While Saul's star sinks in the north, the star of David rises in the south, and there begins the long line of fulfillments of the prophecy concerning the Star that should come out of Jacob (Num. xxiv. 17). While in the north Israel, involved in Saul's destruction and the divine judgment passed against him, lies prostrate before the Philistines, David's victory frees the south from the enemy, and in Judah the foundation of the new kingdom of the future is laid by the heroic achievement of David and his men, and by his noble and winning behaviour. This great contrast in the fates of Saul and David is, however, founded in the contrast in their posture of heart to the Lord: Saul has lost sight of God, hardened himself against Him in pride, self-will and hate to David, lost ethical ability to repent, and in his time of need applied to anti-godly powers and deceitful human counsel. David, on the contrary, shows us his heart, as it bows in sorrow before Him (ver. 4) under the painful, but not undeserved strokes of God's hand (vers. 5, 6), but in the bitterest experiences, when his own men turn against him, does not yield to despair, but looks to the Lord for strength. And so he receives the consolatory revelation of God's will and promise of divine help, and experiences the Lord's saving and blessing power. From these gloomy paths David comes forth as a man after God's own heart, to whom has come the experience that God gives grace to the humble and causes the upright to succeed.

2. The strengthening of the inner life in the Lord in time of need (as David here found) consists in the undoubtful experience and knowledge of what is well-pleasing to God through enlightenment from above, in fulfilling it with pious confidence and hope in His help through the consolations of His word, and in the permeation of one's own will by the sanctifying might of the divine will, which lifts up the sunken courage, and makes the crushed or depressed will to mount to bold resolution and energetic action. Such a strengthening attests itself particularly in the casting of all care on Him, and in brave struggle against all the powers of flesh and blood, which oppress and take captive the inner life. The condition of such an inspiriting and strengthening of the inner life of the member of God's kingdom is his open-heartedness and receptivity for the divine vital powers, which are at the disposal of every one who will appropriate them, and constant intercourse with the Lord in unchangeable association of life with him founded on thorough humble devotion to him, without which neither can man be God's property, nor God man's; all this being involved in the words: "David strengthened himself in the Lord his God."

* [A priestly city, 1 Chron. vi. 44 (Eng. A. V. vi. 50).—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. SCHLIER: What else were the Amalekites than the Lord's rods of chastening, to chasten David for all his improprieties in the land of the Philistines? For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and with His children He is always strictest.—BERL. BIB.: God does not leave His people long in sin, but soon raps them over the knuckles when they go off on their own ways, in order that they may come into the track again.—S. SCHMID: When we go out of the house we should heartily pray, for we know not in what manner we shall return.—Ver. 2. STARK: That is God's custom in dealing with His people; before He exalts them, He humbles them first. Prov. xv. 33; 1 Sam. ii. 7.—CRAMER: God still cares for His own, and lays on them no more trouble than they can bear (1 Cor. x. 13), and also restrains their enemies from making their cross heavier by a hair.—Vers. 3-5. BERL. BIB.: David was guided in a way so universal, that one cannot experience nor even know anything which was not to be found in him. And those who shall read attentively what is said of David, will therein certainly meet with their own condition; and this the more exactly, in proportion as they have gone further and become more conformed to Jesus Christ.—[Ver. 4. HENRY: It is no disparagement to the boldest and bravest spirits to lament the calamities of relations and friends.—Tr.]—Ver. 6 sqq. SCHLIER: David was strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, for in prayer he had won over again the Lord his God and gained His gracious promise.—[TAYLOR: As sometimes the partially intoxicated man will be sobered in a moment by the occurrence of some terrible calamity, so David, who had been living all these months under the narcotic influence of sin, was by the violence of the Amalekites and the threatened mutiny of his own men roused to his nobler self, and he "strengthened himself in the Lord his God."—Tr.]—BERLENB. BIBLE: He strengthens himself in God through an increased composure and through the union of his will with the will of God, as himself doing or permitting all this.—Roos: David saw no means before him of recovering his wives, children and property and those of his followers. But he strengthened himself in faith in the omniscience, wisdom and almightiness of God, and obtained through the Light and Right [Urim and Thummim] good instruction from God. Now as David did, so should the believing seed of Abraham in every need. We should not give way to gloomy unbelief, but strengthen ourselves in our God. We should and may do this all the more because the heart of God is in Christ Jesus or revealed to us yet more clearly than to David.—Ver. 8. BERL. BIBLE: If it was a duty under the Old Testament, in an enterprise pertaining to war, thus to turn first to God before resolving on anything, that yet the spirit of the Old Testament carried along with it, and did not absolutely forbid, how much more among Christians under the New Testament should nothing of the sort be done without the divine consent, without first duly consulting thereupon with Christ and His Spirit. [TAYLOR: Very suggestive is this contrast. "David said, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul; there is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape to the land of the Philistines." "David strengthened himself in the Lord his God, and said unto Abiathar, Bring hither the ephod." On the one hand despair, leading to prayerlessness and self-will; on the other, faith, leading to prayer and eager willingness to submit to the guidance of Jehovah.—Tr.]—Vers. 9, 10. HEDINGER: He hopes in vain for consolation from God, who will not make use of God's counsel.—S. SCHMID: As man acts towards God so God acts towards man (Levit. xxvi. 27, 28).—SCHLIER: As David humbled himself before God, God also acknowledged him again and took him up.—We men cannot enough humble ourselves before the Lord, but neither can we have enough confidence in the Lord.—Ver. 11. HEDINGER [from HALL]: Worldly wisdom teacheth us to sow small courtesies where we may reap large harvests of recompense.—Verses 13, 14 [from HALL]: Wonderful is the providence of God, even over those that are not in the nearest bonds His own.—Ver. 16 [from HALL]: Destruction is never nearer than when security has chased away fear. The world passes away with its lust; well for him who is on his guard and seeks in time what promotes his peace.—Ver. 17. CRAMER: God blesses the possessions of the pious and causes all to go well with them (Ps. i. 3, 4).—Vers. 18, 19. God gives more than we could have desired and hoped for from Him.—SCHLIER: Only for children of God who in trying times seek the Lord does it hold good, that when the need is highest God's help is also highest. We will never forget that a few days after David's own people were about to stone him on the ruins of Ziklag, the royal crown was laid at his feet.—[Ver. 24. This principle will apply to soldiers and non-combatants, ministers and their wives, missionaries and those at home who sustain them.—Ver. 26. How delightful when the prompting of gratitude for the past coincides with the dictate of policy for the future.—Tr.]

Vers. 3-8. Right behaviour before God in need and anguish: 1) These men do not pretend to stoical indifference, but let their grief have free course, as the Lord has brought it on them (ver. 4); 2) They bow low in humility under the hand of God, renouncing all self-help, and seeing human support vanish before their eyes (ver. 6 a); 3) They lift themselves cheerfully up again in power and strength, procured from the Lord (ver. 6 b-8).

Vers. 8-20. The Lord is His people's mighty rock of defence against the opposers of his kingdom: 1) He gives them his counsel upon their inquiry when in straits; 2) He fills them with his power for the conflict enjoined upon them; 3) He leads them according to his promises to glorious victory; 4) He causes them to come forth from the conflict with a rich blessing.

The Lord's help in great need: 1) To whom is it given? a) To him who betakes himself to the Lord with prayerful inquiry (ver. 7); b) To him who humbly gives himself up to the Lord's guidance; a) in obedience to His commandment; β) in trust upon His promises (ver. 8). 2) How does the Lord render His help? a) Through His word—answering the inquiries addressed to Him in need—putting an end to uncertainty by its decision—banishing all anxiety and despondency from the heart of consoling promises (ver. 8); b) Through His deed—in often quite unexpectedly pointing out the right ways and means that lead to the end (vers. 11-16)—in often wonderfully rendering his assistance amid threatening perils (ver. 17 sq.)—and in causing a rich gain to be obtained from the most trying times of need.

The subjects of God's kingdom in conflict with the world: 1) They enter into the conflict, strengthened in the strength of the Lord; 2) They conquer in the conflict, under the guidance and support of the Lord; 3) They come out of the conflict, crowned with the rich blessing of the Lord.

[Ver. 11. The forsaken slave: 1) Even the meanest may not be neglected with impunity. 2) Even the poorest may richly reward his benefactors. 3) Even the weakest may be the means of accomplishing great results (David's recovering possessions and family, regaining the devotion of his followers, and reviving the friendship of his tribesmen, thus smoothing his way to the throne). 4) Even the lowliest is cared for by Providence, and his fortunes linked with the highest, in the providential network of society.

[Vers. 1-26. Returning Home—Two Pictures.

I. The sorrowful return. 1) He had left home without seeking the Lord's guidance—apparently to fight against the Lord's people—uncertain and unhappy. 2) He had returned, because distrusted, and sent away in dishonor. 3) He found his home in ashes, and his family carried captive. 4) His personal wretchedness was enhanced by the natural wrath of his followers. II. The subsequent joyful return. 1) He leaves with explicit Divine direction and promise—to fight national as well as private enemies—hopeful and happy. 2) He returns victorious and honored. 3) He has regained greater wealth than he had lost. 4) His personal joy is increased by the privilege of sending gifts to his friends. And now what unites the two pictures; His sorrowful return led him to deep penitence, revived faith (ver. 6) and humble prayer (ver. 8); and from these resulted the joyful return. Sore afflictions, when rightly borne, often open the way to life's sweetest joy.—T.B.]

The parallel passage, 1 Chr. x. 1, has the Perf., which Wellh. prefers here on the ground that the statement is too important to be made in the form of an adjectival sentence; but the principal thought in the mind of the writer was Saul's death, not the fact of the battle.—T.B.]

²[Ver. 1. Erdmann: "And there fell down slain men," which is so far better, as the Eng. A. V. seems to represent all the men of Israel as falling down slain. But this general, indefinite phrase, would not be strange in Heb.—T.B.]

⁵[Ver. 3. Fully: "The archers (or, throwers), men with the bow," in which the מִשְׁלֵחַ (omitted in 1 Chr. x. 3) makes a grammatical difficulty. But, as its harshness will account for its omission in Chron., and we could not well account for its prevalence here by clerical error, it is better to retain it as a phrase explanatory of מִשְׁלֵחַ, which Chron. also explains by the word "bow"—"throwers with the bow."—Wellh. conjectures that מִשְׁלֵחַ is not connected with מִשְׁלֵחַ, but = מַעֲרֵה and means any "caster," coming to the Hebrews from the Phœnicians.—T.B.]

- me through⁶ and abuse me. But his armour-bearer would not, for he was sore 5 afraid. Therefore [And] Saul took a [the] sword and fell upon it. And when his armour-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise [he also fell] upon his 6 sword and died with him. So Saul died, and his three sons and his armour-bearer 7 and⁷ all his men that same day together. And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of [beyond]⁸ the valley [plain] and they that were on the other side [beyond] Jordan saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities and fled; and the Philistines came and dwelt in them.
 8 And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, 9 that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa. And they cut off his head and stripped off his armour, and sent⁹ into the land of the Philistines round about, to publish it in the house [houses]¹⁰ of their idols and among the people.
 10 And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth, and they fastened¹¹ his body to the wall of Bethshan.¹² 11 And when [om. when] the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead heard of that which the 12 Philistines had done to Saul, All [And all] the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons from the well of Beth-13 shan, and came to Jabesh and burnt them there. And they took their bones and buried them under a tree [the tamarisk] at Jabesh, and fasted seven days.

⁶ [Ver. 4. The verb. "thrust through" is not found in 1 Chr. x. 4, and Wellh. proposes to omit it here because Saul could not in any case hope to escape this fate at the hands of the enemy. But Saul asks only that he may not be slain by the enemy. Bertheau's view that the word is here a copyist's erroneous repetition of the preceding "thrust through" is replied to by Thénius: if Saul had only feared capture, we should have had in the text besides the "come" some such word as "seize."—Ta.]

The substitution of "all his house" in 1 Chr. x. 6 for "all his men" does not warrant us in changing this text. Our phrase is not to be considered as a "slight exaggeration," nor as foreign to our author (as, namely, a weakening of the tragic impression made by the simple truth), but as a general phrase — his whole army, not unusual among historical writers.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. Instead of "on the other side" or "beyond," Erdmann renders "on the side of," which conveys the sense here, though it is not a literal rendering. The word עַל means "beyond" (so Gesen. against Fürst) and describes either side of a river according to the position of the speaker or writer; thus it may in some instances — the country on the side of a river or plain. As it apparently here describes the western side of the Jordan, it might seem that the narrator lived east of the river (Bib. Com.); but this is not necessary, as the phrase may have the general meaning above stated.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 9. Whether they sent messengers (in which case the Qal would be the appropriate form of the verb) or the head and armour (as the Piel of the text would indicate) is doubtful.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 10. On the supposition that this verse and 1 Chr. x. 10 are both parts of a longer statement, various attempts have been made to re-establish the original complete text. Ewald (Gesch. III. 162 Rem.) inserts in our verse after "Ashtaroth" the words: "and his skull in the house of Dagon," the Chronicler then inserting חָקַע from the last clause. The difficulty in this attempt is not so much to account for the חָקַע in Chron. (Wellh.), as to account for the omission of the clause in Sam. Why not state that Saul's skull was hung up in the temple of Dagon? Wellhausen's view that the "body" (גִּידָה) and "skull" (גִּלְגֻּלִּית) refer to the same fact is in itself not improbable; one account might use the general word "body," the other might mention the most striking part, the "skull." In that case the "Beth-Dagon" must be identified with the "wall of Bethshan" by supposing that the temple of Dagon was in Beth-Shan. This, however, is an improbable supposition, and there remains the view that the two texts were not originally identical, but that the two accounts vary by mentioning different circumstances in the general fact. Wellhausen also holds that the two verses are not constructed from one original text.—Observe that instead of the גִּידָה of Samuel, Chron. has גִּלְגֻּלִּית, perhaps in obedience to a change in good usage.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-7. The battle lost. Death of Saul and his sons.—Ver. 1 is connected with xxix. 1 (comp. xxviii. 1, 4 sq.). The partic. "were fighting" [so the Heb.] presupposes the account given in xxviii. 1, 4 and xxix. 1 of the preparations for the battle, and thence forms an adjectival sentence, which is to be understood thus: "When now the Philistines," etc., "the men of Israel fled," etc. Driven from the place the men of Israel took refuge in mount Gilboa (see xxviii. 4), and were thither followed by the Philistines and alain. [Or, less probably, the mountain itself may have been the scene of battle.—Ta.]—Ver. 2. Sept. renders: "the Philistines press closely on, come up with (συνάπτονται);" it does not, however, thence follow that they read Impf. Qal (of רָכַב) with לָ, for the Hiph. with Acc. (so 1 Chron. x. 2 it is used with the Prep. "after," comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 22; Judg. xx. 45), also means "to hang closely at one's feet, overtake him" (comp. Judg. xviii. 22).—On the three sons of Saul see on xiv. 49.—Ver. 3.

"The battle went sore to (אֵל) Saul." It is unnecessary to read "against" (עַל) instead of "to," since the phrase describes the movement of the battle "towards" Saul; the battle was sore "towards" Saul, after his three sons had fallen. [Vulg.: "the whole weight of the battle turned against [or towards] Saul."—Tr.] The archers especially harassed him. Men with the bow is in apposition with "shooters" (מִלְחָמִים). Render: They hit him (taken absolutely), not "hit him with the bow," the verb not being elsewhere so used.* And he was sore afraid (from חָלַל or חָלַל), not, as Sept. and Vulg., "was sore wounded," this signification for the verb חָלַל (= חָלַל) "being not proved" (Keil). [The signification "wounded" would be permissible but for the masoretic pointing and the following Prep.—Tr.] He "trembled, was frightened" at the archers, because, the battle going hard against him, he saw no way of escaping them, or of resisting the enemy's superior force, especially as, since the death of his sons, he was alone with his armor-bearer. And even if we suppose that it was not despairing fear that he felt (which, however, after the scene at Endor, might well get control of him, notwithstanding his old heroism of character), but only failure of resources (Thenius), yet his fear and trembling at the shame that threatened him (ver. 4) may be easily explained. Thenius thinks that his request to his armor-bearer to kill him is intelligible only on the supposition that he was badly wounded, and so unfit for resistance, and properly also for self-destruction. But, as he finally killed himself, he could not have been too badly wounded for this. It is quite in keeping with Saul's condition of soul (abandoned to despair) that, at the mere possibility of being slain by the Philistines he sought death at the hands of his attendant. Clearly in favor of this view, and against the other, is Saul's address to his armor-bearer: Draw thy sword and pierce me therewith, lest these uncircumcised come and pierce me and abuse me. Saul had a strong consciousness of the sacredness of his person as the Anointed of the Lord, and must therefore have held it a great shame to be slain by the idolatrous, unclean heathen. The armor-bearer would not, for he was sore afraid; he had, indeed, to defend the king's life, and was responsible for its preservation. And Saul took the sword and fell on it; that is, having set the hilt on the ground, he threw the weight of his body on the point, and thus killed himself. The scene is clearly and vividly portrayed with a few admirable strokes. [For the meaning of the contrary account 2 Sam. i. 10 see notes on that passage.—Tr.]—Ver. 5. The armor-bearer's fear, here again brought forward, was based, no doubt, on the above-named consideration; he was answerable for the king's person, and might also be apprehensive that he would be regarded as his murderer. He followed his lord's example, and slew himself. At the same time also all his men were slain. 1 Chron. x. 6 has "all his house" instead of "all his men." Certainly Abner, who was no doubt in the battle, had not fallen, 2 Sam. xi. 8 (Then.), but that is not inconsistent with the statement, since he, as Saul's General (xiv. 50 sq.) belonged, strictly speaking, neither to the "house" nor to the "men," by which term we must understand the soldiers who were near the king's person, his body-guard, as it were.—Ver. 7. A distinction is here made between the "men of Israel" who were non-combatants and dwelt east of the field of battle, and the "men of Israel" who formed the army. The former are described as those who dwelt "on the side of the plain and on the side of the Jordan."* The "plain" is the lowland between mount Gilboa on the south and little Hermon on the north, the continuation of the plain of Jezreel, into which the battle passed, so that the Israelites fled to mount Gilboa and were there slain. The Jordan with its western bank-terrain formed the border. Those who, from the station of the narrator (which we must take with Keil to be the battle-field in the plain of Jezreel) dwelt beyond, that is, opposite him on the mountain-terrain beside the plain and in the Jordan-flats, fled from their abodes when they saw the total defeat of the Israelitish army in the plain. They left the cities; Sept., Vulg., Syr., Chron. read "their cities," a correct interpretation, but not proof of a different original text here (Then.). And the Philistines came and dwelt in them, not immediately, before the occurrence of what is next related (Then. against Bertheau), but from now on they took possession of the district with all its cities, settled themselves on the whole north and thence seized the rest of the country, so that they held the whole land except Perea on the east [beyond Jordan] and Judah in the south.

Vers. 8-10. The Philistines' cruel and abusive treatment of the corpses of Saul and his three sons.—Ver. 8. After the anticipatory ethnographic statement in ver. 7 the narrative returns to the field of battle. And it came to pass on the morrow.—On the day after the battle, which had therefore probably lasted till evening, the darkness preventing plundering. On mount Gilboa they found Saul and his sons fallen (comp. ver. 1), the Israelitish army, and with it Saul and his sons, having fallen back thither from the plain before the victorious Philistines.—Ver. 9. Comp. 1 Chron. x. 9: "And they stripped him and took his head and his armor and sent" Here it reads: And they out off his head and stripped off his armor.—The And they sent is not to be connected with the "to publish it" (Then.), as if the Philistines had "beforehand" published the victory around, meantime retaining Saul's head and armor, in order to carry them in triumph on their return, but according to the contrast we must supply "head and armor," which they sent around to announce the good news to their idol-temples—that is, to the priests serving in the temples—and to the people.—Saul's head and armor were the signs of victory for priests and people. Instead of "idol-temples" * Chron. and Sept. have "idols" in accordance with the idea that the power of their idols was manifested in this victory.—Ver. 10. The Ashtaroth-houses† are identical with these idol-temples. Instead of "Ashtaroth" Chron. has "their gods" [the general for the particular—Tr.]. And they fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan.—The Chronicler has: "And they fastened his head on the temple of Dagon;" that is, he omits the statement about the corpse and adds this about the head. According to ver. 12 the Philistines act in the same way with the corpses of Saul's sons. Our narrator, being occupied from this point of view chiefly with Saul's fate, was concerned to relate first what was done with Saul's body. As Bethshan (the present Beisan, Rob. III, I, 408 [Am. ed. II. 320, 328, 354; III. 326–332]), according to this, was in the hands of the Philistines (so ver. 7), they held the country as far as the Jordan [Bethshan is four miles west of the Jordan and twelve miles south of the sea of Galilee—Tr.]. The corpses were fastened on without the heads, the latter, with the armor, being fixed on the temples as trophies of victory.

* [See "Text and Gramm." where Erdmann's translation: "on the side of the plain and on the side of Jordan" is accepted as conveying the sense. But the ordinary rendering "beyond Jordan" may be retained (as in Eng. A. V.) by supposing that the panic was so great as to extend to the other side of the river, and that the Philistines temporarily occupied the transjordanic cities. Similarly the people "beyond the plain" were panic-struck and fled.—Tr.]

Vers. 11–13. The interment of the corpses by the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead.

—Ver. 11. When the Jabeshites heard what the Philistines had done to Saul, they thought of what Saul had once done for them (ch. xi).—[Bib. Com.: a touching and rare example of national gratitude.—Tr.].—Ver. 12. They went the whole night and took (under cover of darkness) the corpses from the wall and brought them to Jabesh-Gilead and burnt them.—The bodies were burned (a practice peculiar to heathendom, allowed in Israel only in the case of the worst criminals, Lev. xx.)‡ instead of being buried, as was usual, not because the Jabeshites feared further insult to the corpses if the Philistines should take their city (Then. [Philippa.]), but probably because their mutilation rendered them unfit for ordinary burial. The Chaldees, in contradiction with the text, understands the "burning" to refer to the solemn burning of spices, which was afterwards customary at the burial of kings.—Ver. 13. They took their bones and buried them; only the flesh, therefore, was burned, perhaps because it had already putrefied. They buried the bones under the tamarisk at Jabesh; the Chronicler: "under the oak at Jabesh." The Art. indicates a well-known tree. The Chronicler, omitting the "night-march," does not mention the taking of the bodies from the wall, as he had not mentioned their being fastened there, and also omits the burning of the corpses "because it was contrary to the prevailing custom" (Then.), not because he could not reconcile it with the burial of the bones (Keil). With grateful remembrance of Saul's rescue of Jabesh, a public mourning with a seven days' fast was made for him. David afterwards caused the bones to be interred in Saul's family burial place at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 11–14).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The deepest and the real ground of Saul's last dark act of self-destruction is not the extremity of the moment nor fear of insult from the enemy (Wuttke, Eth. II. 171), though his words make this the immediate occasion of his suicide, but the decay of his inner life, which we have traced step by step, through unchecked self-will and unbending pride towards the living God, and through the complete severance of his heart from God. The straitened and disgraceful position to which the Philistines had brought him, whence there was no escape with life, was the result of his persistent, stubborn disobedience to God, and of the inward judicial infliction of self-hardening. As self-willed lord of his life, unbending, haughty controller of his fate over against God, he will put an end to his life; this is the end of the insoluble contradiction in which he had placed himself towards the holy and just God; this is the act of completed despair, in which God's judgment is exhausted, and he himself must be its instrument.

2. In consequence of Saul's misgovernment and his last unfortunate war with the Philistines, the kingdom of Israel had become disorganized. The latter part of his reign was a time of disintegration of the people, which had lost its proper unity under the theocratic king, and fallen into a disorganized condition like that of the Period of the Judges. A glimpse into this state of confusion is given us not merely by the indication in the First Book of Samuel of the support that David found during his persecution by Saul, but also by the additional statements in First Chronicles of the adhesion of fighting men to him and his cause. 1) 1 Chron. xii. 8–18 mentions not merely men of Judah, but also Gadites and Benjaminites, who came to him in the wilderness of Judah, comp. 1 Sam. xxii.–xxiv. 2) 1 Chron. xii. 1–7 relates the coming of the brave Benjaminites while David was in Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxvii. 1–7. 3) 1 Chron. xii. 19–22 tells of the Manassites who joined him after his return to Ziklag before Saul's last battle with the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxix. 3 sq. Thus David had an army in Ziklag (comp. 1 Chron. xii. 21), composed of fighting men from various tribes, who had gradually gathered around him, with which he was able immediately after Saul's death to establish (first in Judah, in Hebron) the theocratic kingdom that had been delivered to him by divine calling and choice (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 1–11).—Ewald: "The city became in fact the foundation of David's whole kingdom."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

‡ [Other supposed cases of burning of corpses are Amos vi. 10; 2 Chr. xvi. 14; Jer. xxxiv. 5, of which the two last, however, refer to spice-burnings, and the first may be rendered "his uncle and his kinsman," or the cremation may express the extreme suffering and religious declension of the nation.—Tr.]

ished.—STARKE: They who share the sin are justly made to share the punishment also. Even God's people do not always carry off the victory, and their sins are commonly to blame for it.—Ver. 2. CRAMER: In common punishments pious people must often suffer along with the ungodly (Ezek. xxi. 3; Eccl. ix. 2). But let no one take offence at this, let him rather believe that to them that love God, even such things must work together for good (Rom. viii. 28).—[HENRY: Jonathan falls with the rest. 1. God would hereby complete the judgment that was to be executed upon Saul's house. 2. He would hereby make David's way to the crown clear and open. Jonathan himself would have cheerfully resigned all his title and interest to him; but his friends would probably have been zealous for the right line of succession. 3. God would hereby show us that the difference between good and bad is to be made in the other world, not in this.—TR.]—TURB. BIBLE: God bears long with sinners, especially the revengeful; but at last His judgments break in so that they can no longer be kept back.—Ver. 3. BERL. BIB.: Saul's death is a mournful picture of the dreadful death of a soul that forsakes the tranquillity and the way of God, in which through the goodness of God it had been led, and falls from one sin into another.—From what the Scriptures relate of Saul it can be seen how in souls that have swerved from the right path one sin is wont always to follow upon another.—Ver. 4. HEDINGER [from HALL]: Wicked men care more for the shame of the world than the danger of their souls (Judg. ix. 54).—SCHLIER: So ends the man who formerly began well. How frightful it is to die in one's sins, to depart impenitent, to go uncalled before the judgment-seat of God! How terrible it is to have nothing to show but a wasted time of grace!—[HALL: Evil examples, especially of the great, never escaped imitation; the armor-bearer of Saul follows his master, and dares do that to himself which to his king he durst not.—TR.]—Ver. 6. CRAMER: When God's wrath blazes out, there is no ceasing. And it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x. 31).—S. SCHMID: The judgments of God, which befall the pious and the ungodly alike, are rather to be wondered at than curiously investigated.—

SCHLIER: A fearful end is only the conclusion of a foregoing life; sin begins little and invisible, hardening goes on step by step. Sin is a frightful power: first man commits sin, and when he has long continued to commit it, he is at length unable to cease from it, and the end is that he no longer wishes to cease from it. Think of Saul's end and learn in time to be wise.—Ver. 7. BERL. BIB.: So finely has Saul presided over the kingdom of Israel through his perverse ways, that even so many cities have been lost. O how there does arise even in temporal things nothing but injury through perverse ways, especially those of the shepherds and leaders of the people!—STARKE: When God designs to punish His people, He takes away their courage, so that even at a rustling leaf they fear and flee (Lev. xxvi. 36).—CRAMER: No one sits too high for God; He can easily cast down even the mighty to the ground (Luke i. 52; Ezek. xxi. 6; Sir. x. 5).—[Vers. 9, 10. HENRY: Thus did they ascribe the honor of their victory, not, as they ought to have done, to the real justice of the true God, but to the imaginary power of their false gods; and by this respect paid to pretended deities, shame those who give not the praise of their achievements to the living God.—TR.]

[Ver. 4. Suicide, as illustrated by the case of Saul: I. Causes: 1) Not merely accumulated misfortunes, but long-continued wrong-doing; 2) Cowardly fear of suffering (ver. 3), even in a man formerly brave; 3) Caring more for disgrace than for sin; 4) Abandonment of trust in God, as to this life and the future life. II. Effects: 1) Others led by the example into the same folly and sin (ver. 5); 2) Personal dishonor not really prevented (vers. 4, 9, 10); 3) A crowning and lasting reproach to the man's memory.

[Vers. 11-13. The exploit of the men of Jabesh-Gilead: 1) It was a brave deed; 2) A patriotic deed; 3) A grateful deed (chap. xi.); 4) But the bravery, patriotism and gratitude had been better shown before Saul's death by helping him (which they do not appear to have done). Honors after death make poor amends for neglect and unfaithfulness during life; 5) And care of the poor remains could avail little for the man's reputation in this world, and nothing for his repose in eternity.—TR.]

David after Saul's Death.

CHAP. I. 1-25.

1. The News of the Death. Vers. 1-16.

- 1 Now [And] it came to pass¹ after the death of Saul, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites,² and David had abode [that David abode] two days in Ziklag [in Ziklag two days]. It came even [And it came] to pass on the third day that, behold, a man came out of [from] the camp from³ Saul with his clothes⁴ rent and earth upon his head; and so it was [om. so it was] when he
- 3 came to David, that [om. that] he fell to the earth and did obeisance. And David said unto him, From whence comest⁵ thou? And he said unto him, Out of [From] the camp of Israel am I escaped. And David said unto him, How went the⁶ matter?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² [Ver. 1. Some MSS. and EDD. read וַיִּמָּלֵךְ, the usual form. Whether the present Heb. text (with the Art.) is impossible (Wellh.) may be considered doubtful. A final Yod may, however, have fallen out from similarity to the following Waw.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 2. Thenius thinks that the Sept. reading: "from the people of (בְּמִן) Saul" suits the connection as well as the Heb.; against which Wellhausen remarks that the Greek reading contradicts ver. 6, from which it appears that the Amalekite did not belong to the army. This reason of Wellh. does not seem decisive (for in ver. 3 he seems to say, that he had been in the army); but the Heb. phrase is more natural than the Greek.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. The Impf. (אָמַרְתָּ) may represent the action as incomplete, — whence art thou now engaged in coming?—Ta.]

4 I pray thee, tell me. And he answered [said], That [om. that]' the people are fled from the battle, and many of the people also^a are fallen and dead, and Saul and 5 Jonathan his son are dead also.^a And David said unto the young man that told 6 him, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead? And the young man that told him said, As [om. as] I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa, [ins. and] behold, Saul leaned upon his spear, and lo, the chariots and [ins. the] 7 horsemen¹⁰ followed hard after him. And when [om. when] he looked behind him [or turned round], he [and] saw me, and called unto me. And I answered [said], 8 Here am I. And he said unto me, Who art thou? And I answered [said to] 9 him, I am an Amalekite. He [And he] said unto me again [om. again], Stand I pray thee, upon¹¹ me, and slay me, for anguish is come upon me [the cramp]¹² hath 10 seized on me], because [for] my life is yet whole in me. So [And] I stood upon him and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen; and I took the crown [diadem¹³] that was upon his head and the bracelet 11 that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord. Then David took hold on his clothes and rent them, and likewise all the men that were with 12 him; And they mourned and wept and fasted until [ins. the] even for Saul and for Jonathan his son and for the people of the Lord [Jehovah¹⁴] and for the house 13 of Israel, because they were fallen by the sword. And David said unto the young man that told him, Whence art thou? And he answered [said], I am the son of a 14 stranger,¹⁵ an Amalekite. And David said unto him, How wast thou not afraid to 15 stretch forth thine hand to destroy the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed? And David called one of the young men, and said, Go near and fall upon him [Approach, 16 fall on him]. And he smote him that he died. And David said unto him, Thy blood¹⁶ be upon thy head, for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed.

⁷ [Ver. 4. The וְהָיָה here — וְהָיָה , introducing a remark as oratio indirecta (Then. and Erdmann: — “namely”), and we might render: and he said, that the people were fled and . . . fallen, etc. (so Philippeon); but “that” with oratio directa (as in Eng. A. V.) is not Eng. idiom.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 4. This “also . . . also” is not a very good rendering of the Heb. $\text{וְגַם} . . . \text{וְגַם}$, since it does not clearly bring out the collocation and climax in the two clauses. On the other hand Erdmann's rendering: “not only are many of the people dead, but also Saul and Jonathan are dead,” makes a sharper contrast than the Heb. expresses. Perhaps the sense would be more exactly given by translating: “the people fled, and moreover many are dead, and moreover Saul,” etc.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 5. Lit.: that Saul is dead, and Jonathan his son? The Syr. has: “David said to the young man, Tell me how died Saul and Jonathan his son?” a reading which seems to have nothing for it. The repetition of the descriptive phrases “that told him” — “his informant,” is in accordance with the ancient manner of writing; compare the standing epithets of the Homeric gods and heroes.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 9. So Aq. (ὁ ἐκράνισεν) and probably Syr. (وَجَعَلَ), rendered badly in Walton's Polyg. caliginis. Castellus gives vertigo, and J. D. Michaelis spasmus, and so most moderns. See Gesenius, Thesaur. s. v.—The last clause of the verse is literally: “for all yet is my life in me,” which is given by Saul as the reason why the young man should slay him.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 12. Sept.: “for the people of Judah and for the house of Israel,” the other VSS. as the Heb. Wellh. thinks “people of Judah” the true text-reading, but supposes that this may be a corruption of “people of Jahveh,” and that it called forth the addition “house of Israel.” But, on the other hand, the Sept. reading looks like an attempt to smooth away a supposed difficulty, and the Heb. text gives a clear and deeply theocratic sense, which is well brought out by Then. and Erdmann. The Synopsis Criticorum and Wellh. are wrong in saying that “people of Jahveh” and “house of Israel” are identical expressions.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 13. Or: “an Amalekite stranger.” Aq. προσέλαβον , and so Gill.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 16. The text has the Plu., the Sing. is found in many MSS. (De Rossi) and in Qert. apparently as if the Plu. alone meant “blood-guiltiness.” But in the Heb. of O. T. both Sing. and Plu. are used in both senses, of “blood” and of “blood-guiltiness,” see Lev. xvii. 4 for the latter sense in the Sing. The Sing. in the VSS. decides nothing for the Heb. text, because elsewhere (as Gen. iv. 10) the Heb. Plu. — "blood" is given by the Sing. in Syr. and Chald. Wellh. thinks that this Qeri may have been determined by the use in 1 Kings ii. 33, 37.—After "saying" Sept. has ver. of orat. indirecta as in ver. 4, and De Rossi mentions that one MS. in his possession here has '3, which is perhaps a copyist's imitation of later usage.—Ta.]

Others regard "Israel" as Vocative, on account of the following "thy," which otherwise would have no antecedent; against this (otherwise most natural) rendering is, as Erdmann remarks, the hardness of the first word: The beauty, O Israel, is slain, etc. Bib. Com. therefore translates: Thy beauty, O Israel; but it is questionable whether the "thy" can lawfully be supplied. The rendering: "O beauty of Israel slain," etc. is harsh, because we should expect "thou art slain." Perhaps the second of the above translations is the preferable.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 22. The reading מִשְׁחָה, "sword," found in some MSS., is perhaps a mere textual error (found in no VB.), or perhaps a correction for dignity.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 23. These Adjectives have the Art. in the Heb., whence Then. and Erdmann render: "Saul and Jonathan, the lovely and pleasant, in life and in death they were not divided." Eng. A. V. is supported by all the ancient VSS. and by most modern commentators.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 24. לְ instead of מִלְ in some MSS.; but the change is unnecessary since מִלְ — "in respect to, for."—In מִלְ some codices substitute the fem. suffix לָהּ, as in the last word of the verse; it is probable, however, that the masc. form was used (especially in poetry) for both genders.—Ta.]

Very pleasant hast thou been unto me,
Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Vers. 1-16. The news of Saul's death, and David's reception of it.

Ver. 1 sq. This narrative is closely connected with that of David's return to Ziklag and Saul's death in chaps. xxx. and xxxi. of the First Book. The words: "and it came to pass after the death of Saul," attach themselves immediately to 1 Sam. xxxi., thus continuing the narrative after the account there given of his death. The words: "and David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites," resume the narrative in ch. xxx., and connect themselves especially with vers. 17, 26.—The grammatical apodosis begins with "and abode" (וַיָּבֹד), though according to the sense and the connection ver. 2 forms the factual apodosis. The narrator desires to make an exact chronological statement for the following account, to bring out prominently that the news of Saul's death was closely connected with the events related in chs. xxx., xxxi. The precise statement that "after David had stayed two days in Ziklag, the messenger came on the third day with the news of Saul's death," indicates, on the one hand, that the narrative is drawn from exact, minute original sources, and, on the other, that David's return from the battle with the Amalekites happened about the same time as the battle of Gilboa.

Ver. 2. And behold, a man came, according to ver. 6 a youth; he had belonged to the Israelitish army as a combatant.—[See the doubt as to this fact in "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—"From with Saul" (מִצִּיּוֹן) = "from the neighborhood of Saul," comp. vers. 3, 4. The rent garment and the earth on the head are signs of grief. See 1 Sam. iv. 12. His "falling down" recognizes David as future king. See xiv. 4; xix. 18; 1 Kings xviii. 7.

Ver. 3. "Escaped," as all the people had fled from the battle, according to ver. 4.

Ver. 4. David's question: "How was the affair, that happened?" is at the same time the expression of dismay at the news of the flight. The answer is introduced by a Conj. (וַיֹּאמֶר, Eng. A. V. "that"), here = our "namely;" comp. iv. 10; 1 Sam. xv. 20 ('ִי is sometimes used). Three statements follow one on another in the rapid, curt account of the informant, who, in keeping with David's word "tell me," is repeatedly termed "the young man that told him," vers. 5, 6, 13: 1) "The people are fled from the battle," the whole army broken up in flight; 2) "Many of the people are fallen and dead." This is not in opposition with 1 Sam. xxxi. 6: "and all his men," because the latter refers to the men immediately around Saul; 3) "And also Saul and Jonathan his son are dead." We may render: "not only many of the people, . . . but also Saul and Jonathan are dead." The climax in the three statements is obvious. To David's question (ver. 5), which refers only to the last statement respecting Saul and Jonathan, the messenger replies (vers. 6-10) with a full account of Saul's death.

Ver. 6. I happened by chance, that is, in the press of battle, and in the flight, which took the direction towards Mount Gilboa, see 1 Sam. xxxi. 1.—Behold, Saul leaned on his spear. This does not mean (Bunsen) that Saul was lying on the ground, "propping his weary head with the nervously-clutched spear," no support for this view is found in vers. 9, 10, for the "after he was fallen" in ver. 10 does not refer to his fall to the ground. Nor is it to be understood (Cler. and others) of the attempt to kill himself (according to 1 Sam. xxxi. 4). We must rather suppose that Saul was leaning on his spear (which was fixed in the earth, 1 Sam. xxvi. 7) in order to hold himself up, being perfectly exhausted. While he was standing there, "lo, the chariots (that is, the chariot-warriors) and the horsemen followed hard on him," came so near that they must soon have reached him, see Judg. xx. 42. Death or captivity stared him in the face. It is not probable that "chariots and horsemen" followed the flying Israelites on the mountains; according to 1 Sam. xxxi. 4 the pursuers were the archers. Cler. justly: "This seems to be the beginning of the young man's falsehoods."

Ver. 7. And he turned round, which could not be said of him, if he had been lying on the ground.—Ver. 8. The marginal reading "I said" [so Eng. A. V.] is to be preferred to the text "he said," which seems to have come from the "he said" in the beginning of the following verse (Then.).—[Some take the Heb. 3 pers. to be oratio obliqua; but this is not probable.—Tr.]—Ver. 9. For the cramp has seized me. So we must render this subet., "cramp" as a twisting of the body (from a stem meaning "to weave, interwork, work together"), not "death-agony" (Vulg.), not the "cuirass" or other part of the armor (S. Schmid), nor "vertigo or fainting" (Gesen., De Wette), to which the following: "all my life is yet in me" does not suit. In consequence of his excitements and exertions, Saul found himself in a bodily condition in which he could not defend himself against the onpressing enemy. The "because" (the second 'ִי) gives a further reason for the request to slay him, since Saul feared that in his defenceless condition he would suffer the indignity of falling alive into the Philistines' hands.†—[Paraphrase of ver. 9:*

* [The Heb. (וַיִּפְּסֵם) means "turned his face, looked round," which seems possible for a man lying on the ground, half-raised on a spear.—Tr.]

† This insertion of וַיִּפְּסֵם between לִי as nomen regens and the nomen rectum occurs in a few other cases, Job xxvii. 3. See Ges., § 114, § R. 1.

* On the adverb. use of the Inf. Abs. (וַיִּפְּסֵם) see Ew., § 280 c.—On וַיִּפְּסֵם . . . וַיִּפְּסֵם, see 1 Sam. xvii. 36 and Ew. § 289, 1.

Kill me, for the enemy will soon be on me, I am too badly wounded to defend myself, yet, not being mortally wounded, I shall be taken alive.—Tr.]—Ver. 10. The Amalekite says, that he slew Saul in accordance with his request, because he saw he "would not live after his fall," could not survive his fall. The "fall"* does not mean "apostasy from God" (O. v. Gerlach), for, apart from the impossibility of the Amalekite's using such an expression, we should expect some corresponding additional phrase; nor "falling after a severe, but not mortal wound," inflicted by himself (Cler., Schmid et al.), for this view presupposes a wrong conception of the "leaning on his spear," the account in 1 Sam. xxxi. 4 being mixed up with this account. The "fall" here means "defeat," see Prov. xxiv. 16.—He took from his head his golden diadem (not "crown," קִטְוֹן), the emblem of the royal dignity. The "bracelet or arm-band" was worn not only by women, but also by men, see Num. xxxi. 50. So the army-commanders are adorned on the Assyrian monuments (Layard's Nineveh), and the *king*s on the Egyptian. The Amalekite brings from Saul's corpse the symbols of the royal dignity in order to confirm his words, and thus secure the favor of David, whom he looked on as king, and gain a rich reward.—The narrative of the Amalekite contradicts 1 Sam. xxxi. 3, where Saul kills himself with his own sword. The explanation of this difference by the assumption of two different original accounts of Saul's death (Gramberg, Religionsid. II. 89, and Ewald) is totally baseless (Then.). Winer (R.-W. II. 392): "In any other than a biblical writer, this difference would certainly not be regarded as proof of the composition of the Book from two narrations." Equally untenable is the attempt at harmonizing the two (Joseph., Ant. 6, 14, 7, some Rabbis, and especially S. Schmid) by saying that Saul had only wounded himself severely by falling on his sword, and received the death-stroke from the Amalekite; this contradicts the statement in 1 Sam. xxxi. 1.—A careful comparison of the Amalekite's account with the other shows that, although his statement about Israel's defeat and the enemy's pressing on Saul was true, he lied in saying that he killed Saul, in order to gain favor and a royal reward from David; so Theod., Brenz, Calov., Serar., Sankt., Cler., Mich., Winer, Then., Keil.—[A. Clarke, Kitto, Bib. Com., Philippon reject the Amalekite's story as a fabrication; Patrick and Gill seem to think it in general true, though distorted here and there; Wordsworth defends it (appealing to Josephus), taking it to be supplementary to the other—if it were not true, he asks, why did the Amalekite not deny it, when he saw that he was to be put to death for it? To this it may be replied, that no time was given him, or perhaps he did deny it, and his denial was disregarded. As for the diadem and bracelet, he might easily have picked them up before the Philistines came to strip the slain. His account of Saul's death cannot well be harmonised with that of 1 Sam. xxxi., and then he had an obvious motive for his story.—Tr.]

Ver. 11 sq. "Weeping and mourning aloud"

and rending the garments on the breast were signs of grief and sorrow for the dead. See Gen. xxxvii. 34, 35; 1. 1; 2 Sam. iii. 32, 34; Judg. xi. 35.—The whole body of soldiers took part in David's deep grief. The Sept. adds at the end: "rent their clothes" as explanatory of the terse Heb. text. The numerous signs of sorrow here mentioned, rending the garments, mourning, weeping, fasting ("till evening") exhibit the greatness of David's sincere grief. The order of mention of the objects of the lamentation is the inverse of that in ver. 4: Saul, Jonathan, the people. His grief for Saul shows his heart to be free from bitterness, revenge and malignant joy; he mourns the fall of the anointed of the Lord. His heart must have been filled with deep sorrow for the death of Jonathan, whom he had not seen since the incident recorded in 1 Sam. xxiii. 18. He laments over the slain and scattered people for the misery and ignominy that had befallen them through defeat by the uncircumcised heathen. He calls them "the people of the Lord" with special reference to their position as a people chosen by the Lord from all nations, thus His special property by a holy covenant, whose wars against foreign nations, out of whom he had separated them, are the Lord's wars, comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 28. The house of Israel denotes the people as a unit, with reference to their common descent. The people of the Lord was in this battle abandoned by the Lord; the house of Israel as a whole and in all its parts was cast down.—[On the alleged difficulty in the text of the latter part of this verse see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

Ver. 13 sq. To David's question concerning his origin the young man answers that "he is the son of an Amalekite stranger," that is, of an Amalekite who had settled in Israel.*—Ver. 14. From the same reverence for the sacred life of Saul that he showed before in the words: "I will not lay my hand on my lord, for he is the Lord's anointed" (1 Sam. xxiv. 11), springs David's indignant question to the Amalekite: How wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thy hand against the Lord's anointed?—Comp. 1 Sam. xxxi. 4 where the armor-bearer "fears" to do such a thing. This question supposes that the young man, as a foreigner at home in Israel and living under its law, might very well know what a crime he committed in laying his hand on the king's person, even at the king's request. The question shows beyond doubt that David took his account to be true, and his indignation at the crime shows how far he was from any sort of revenge against the (in his eyes) sacred person of Saul.—Ver. 15. David causes the Amalekite to be straightway slain for his self-avowed crime. He slays him not merely that, after the Amalekite has confessed the regicide, he (David) may not be supposed to countenance such a crime, and especially not Saul's murder (Thenius), but he punishes him for his crime against the person of the anointed of the Lord, and that on the ground of his right as the king now chosen and appointed by the Lord. It was a theocratic, not a political act, as Clericus thinks ("it is to be attributed to political reasons"), and so Thenius and other moderns.—Ver. 16. While the preparations for the execution of the judgment are going on, David pronounces the formal sentence of capital punishment: Thy blood* be on thy head.—"Thou hast brought this bloody punishment on thyself, having confessed thy crime."—For thy mouth hath testified against thee.—The ground of the sentence of death was the statement of the Amalekite himself; he affirmed that the ornaments he brought were taken from the body of Saul, designing thus to prove that Saul had been killed by his hand, and hoping to receive a rich reward. See ch. iv. 10.—Theodoret remarks that it was becoming that the "Prophet and King" should be astonished at this deed, but not blame it.—[It was so obvious and dreadful a crime that he could only express astonishment at it.—Tr.]—What David himself with holy horror had refused to do, namely, to lay hands on Saul's sacred person, this murderer (so it seemed to him) had done.—[The Commentators refer to the fact that the law requiring two witnesses in a death-sentence was here set aside from the peculiarity of the circumstances. There is no trace of special anger and haste because of the nationality of the supposed regicide; but the execution may without difficulty be regarded as having a political character—not that David, looking to his own accession to the throne, wished to ward off such attempts against himself, or to curry favor with Saul's friends, but that, regarding himself as in fact the highest political authority in the land, he dispensed punishment for a notorious and shocking political crime. It can hardly be suspected (Philippson) from the words: "thy mouth hath witnessed against thee," that "David saw through the Amalekite." Against the allegation that David's conduct here was hypocritical, Chandler cites the cases of Alexander weeping over Darius, Scipio over Carthage, Cæsar over Pompey, and Augustus over Antony.—Tr.]

II. David's elegy. Vers. 17-27.

Ver. 17. And David sang this lament.—That David was the author of this elegy is proved by this history, as well as by the vigor of the song and its harmony with David's situation and feeling. For the general defeat of Israel David and his men expressed their sorrow as is above related. Here follows the voice of mourning from David's heart especially over Saul and Jonathan, the deaths of both of whom must powerfully have moved him, though for different reasons.

Ver. 18. Two notices are prefixed to the Song: one as to its destination; the other as to its source. As respects its destination it is said: "and he said (commanded) to teach it to the children of Judah," they were to learn and practice it (comp. Deut. xxxi. 19; Ps. lx. 1), probably that they might sing it in their military practice with the bow (Grot., Delitzsch in Herz. XII. 280). For נֶחֱמָה is best understood (from ver. 22) as the title: Song of the Bow.—[Eng. A. V. improperly supplies: "the use of."—Tr.]—With all its notes of sorrow the whole Song has a warlike ground-tone, celebrating Saul and Jonathan as warriors, and "the bow was a principal weapon of the times, and used especially by Saul's tribesmen, the Benjaminites, with great success, see 1 Chron. viii. 40; xii. 2; 2 Chron. xiv. 7; xvii. 17" (Keil). Böttcher connects "bow" with "children of Judah" and renders: "to teach the archers of Judah;" but against this restriction to Judah, Thenius rightly remarks that David's purpose doubtless was that the whole people should preserve a faithful remembrance of Saul and Jonathan. Instead of "bow" (קֶשֶׁת). Then. and Ew. substitute adverbial accusatives, the former "heedfully" (בְּשֵׁשׁ, Isa. xxi. 7), the latter "exactly" (בְּשֵׁשׁ). Against this see the admirable remarks of Böttcher.—[Böttcher points out that Thenius' "heedfully" applies to hearing, and does not suit here, and that Ewald's conjectured word means "truth," not "correctness," and further requires (if he write שֶׁשׁ) the substitution of the late Aramaic נ (in this word) for the Heb. ט. To regarding "Bow" as the title of the Song Böttcher objects that this ought in that case to be its first word; or, if the mention of the bow in ver. 22 justifies this title (as the second Sura of the Koran is called "The Cow" from the incidental story of Moses' cow in it), the word should at least have the Art, and we should indeed expect "the song of the bow." On the other hand we may refer to such titles as those of Ps. xxii. lvi., xlv., lx. (Kitto). A new suggestion is made by Bib. Com., that there was in the Book of Jashar a collection of poems, in which special mention was made of the bow (2 Sam. i. 19-27; 1 Sam. ii. 1-10; Num. xxi. 27-30; Lam. ii.; Lam. iii.; Gen. xlix.; Deut. xxxii.; perhaps Deut. xxxiii., etc.), that this collection was known as Kasheth (the bow), and that the author of 2 Sam. transferred this dirge from the Book of Jashar to his own pages with its title as follows: "For the children of Israel to learn by heart. Kasheth from the Book of Jashar," the "and he said" must then be regarded as introducing the Song, the title being a parenthesis. The objection to this rendering is the position of the "and he said," which it is hard to attach to the dirge, and the way in which the Book of Jashar is referred to, which does not suit a title like those in the Psalms.—So far no satisfactory translation has been given from the existing text, nor any satisfactory emendation suggested. The rendering of Erdmann is adopted as offering the fewest difficulties.—Tr.]—The source whence the author drew this Song was "the Book of the Upright" (Sing.), or if the subst. (Jashar) be taken as collective, of the upright ones (Vulg. liber iustorum). Comp. Josh. x. 13. It was in existence before the Books of Joshua and Samuel, and contained (judging from the two extracts here and in Joshua) a collection of Songs on specially remarkable events of the Israelite history, together with celebration of the prominent pious men, whose names were connected with these events (see Bleek, Introd.); Maurer: "songs in praise of worthy Israelites."—[On the Book of Jashar or The Upright, the various opinions as to its origin and character (including Donaldson's fanciful and unsound book), the two Rabbinical works of this name, the anonymous work of 1625 (an English translation of which was published in New York in 1840 by M. M. Noah; it abounds in fables, and was apparently the work of a Spanish Jew), and the "clumsy forgery" which appeared in England in 1751 under the name of the "Book of Jasher" (reprinted in 1827 and in 1833)—see Art. "Book of Jasher" in Smith's Bib. Dict., and Gill's Commentary in loco and on Josh. x. 13. Patrick holds the opinion that it was a book concerning the right art of making war (Jasher=right), and quotes Victorinus Strigelius, who says that it was "an ecclesiastical history like those of Eusebius and Theodoret." The author has been surmised to be Gad or Nathan, inasmuch as no extract is given from the work later than the death of Saul. Dr. Erdmann states in the text the substance of what we know about it.—Tr.]

Ver. 19. The glory of Israel on thy heights slain!—This lament is the superscription of the whole song; herein David addresses "the people of the Lord, the house of Israel" (ver. 12). "Israel" cannot be taken as Vocative, "O Israel" (Buns., Keil, et al. [Kitto, Stanley, Bib. Com.]), because then the expression "the glory" would stand too isolated and undefined, especially at the beginning of the song; we must therefore suppose it to be defined by the following word.—[Bib. Com., to avoid this difficulty, renders: "thy glory;" Chandler, Philippeon and Cahen: "O glory of Israel," which is easier as supplying an antecedent for the "thy heights;" but perhaps less suitable in the connection, where we should not so naturally expect a mere exclamation, and where the subet. verb could not with this translation be supplied. Still it is a quite possible rendering, and deserves consideration.—

Tr.]—Some render the opening word (גִּזְרֵי) "Gazelle" (De Wette, et al. [Kitto, Stanley]), and Ewald then refers this to Jonathan, who, he says (Thenius: "a high-handed way, in truth, of dealing with history"), was generally known among the warriors as "the Gazelle;" but this, apart from the absence in the song of any comparison with the gazelle, or any allusion to its swiftness and agility, is untenable simply because the song speaks throughout not of one hero (Jonathan), but of two (Saul and Jonathan). As the composition has the ring of a hero-song in honor of these two, who were in fact the hero-glory of Israel, we must render the word "glory, ornament." The "heights," on which these the "ornament of Israel" were slain, are the mountains of Gilboa, on which David looks as the scene of the tragic end of the two greatest heroes of Israel. At the outset of his song he laments the heavy loss which Israel suffered in noble hero-power. This sorrowful lament is still more definitely expressed in the following words: "How are the heroes fallen!" Thrice it appears as the ground-tone of the whole song. Here at the beginning it introduces the lament for the two strong heroes, Saul and Jonathan (vers. 20-24), which forms the greater part of the song; in ver. 25 it is the basis for the lament over Jonathan alone, the deeply loved friend. At the close (ver. 27) it sounds out the third time, strengthened by a parallel exclamation, that the whole song as a hero-elegy may not merely "die away in a last sigh," but close with an exclamation aloud of deepest grief over the loss of these great heroes.

Ver. 20. The two Philistine cities Gath and Askelon, as the most prominent, are named in the language of poetry, for the whole land, which they represent (Gath very near, Askelon at a distance on the sea). The singer will not have Israel's great calamity known among the heathen [he did not know that the Philistines had possession of the bodies of Saul and his sons.—Tr.], for they are the "uncircumcised," the enemies of Jehovah and of His people. The latter's shame is already great enough in being overcome and trodden down by the uncircumcised nation; may it not be increased by Philistine songs of triumph over vanquished Israel.—Tell it not in Gath, so Mic. i. 10. "The rejoicing of the daughters of the Philistines" refers to the common oriental custom of the celebration by the women and virgins with songs and dances of the heroic deeds and triumphal return of the men (see 1 Sam. xviii. 6).—David's expression: "Tell it not," etc., must be conceived and understood throughout according to its poetical significance: he wishes that Philistia may not learn of this defeat, that Israel may be spared the shame of becoming the object of the Philistines' scornful joy over victory. In fact the defeat of Israel could not possibly remain unknown; news of it had already gone through the whole land (1 Sam. xxxi. 9 sq.). It would be in contradiction with the poetical type to suppose (as Sack does) that David's words are an exhortation to the men assembled about him on Philistine soil [at Ziklag], that they themselves at least should not announce the sad news to the enemy. Nor is ver. 21 to be taken as a real imprecation against Nature (Then.), but as a poetical image.—Ver. 21. Over against the exultant joy of victory of Israel's enemies, which he would gladly be spared, David sets the attitude of mourning, in which he would behold the mountains of Gilboa, the scene of his heroes' death-struggle: ye mountains in Gilboa, poetical for the usual prose-form: "mountains of Gilboa" (ver. 6; 1 Sam. xxxi. 1), the Preposition further defining the Stat. Const. (see on this construction Ew. § 289 b, Gen. § 116, 1).—[Others suppose, not so well, that Gilboa is here named as a tract of country.—Tr.]—Be there neither dew nor rain on you!—May you lack that which makes you green and fruitful, and dispenses fresh life. Waste and desert they were to lie, that their death might present forever a picture of the dreadful end of those that were slain there, and so Nature might, as it were, mourn for them.—And fields of first-fruits (be not on you).* The fields from which were taken the firstlings (as best), were the most fruitful. The expression therefore means: may these places be destitute (not only of fructifying dew and rain, but also) of the products of a fruitful soil, may there be here no fruitful fields whence might be gathered offerings of first-fruits. This is a poetical elaboration of the thought expressed in the figure of the dew and rain, and is by no means "meaningless" (Then.). There is no need for changing the text, as Thenius, for example, after Theodotion would read: "ye forests and mountains of death."* Equally untenable is Böttcher's conjecture (Aehrenlese, p. 24, and Neue Aehrenlese, p. 139): "on the fields of Jarmuth,"† especially as "the name of the city in question [Jarmuth] is doubtful, and its location near Gilboa arbitrary" (Then.). The translation "lofty fields" (campi editi, Cler., Maur.) is opposed to the usual meaning of the Heb. word (תְּרִימוֹת), is here without special significance, and requires too much to be supplied in order to connect it with the preceding: "and on you, ye lofty fields," come neither dew nor rain.—For there is defiled the shield of the heroes, defiled with dust and blood, not "cast away" (Vulg.).—[Eng. A. V.: "vilely cast away," combining, not badly, the two shades of meaning of the word.—Tr.]—The shield of Saul is specially mentioned as the military emblem of the leader of the army.—Not anointed with oil. This is not an explanation of the words "defiled is Saul's shield," as the Vulg. has it: "the shield of Saul, as if it were not anointed with oil," nor a reference to Saul: "as if he were not anointed," 1 Sam. x. 1 sq. (J. H. Michaelis, S. Schmid, Dathe, et al. [Eng. A. V.]), the "as if" and the reference to the royal anointing being both wrongly introduced; but it expresses the fact that the shield is not "anointed with oil," as was usually done to the metallic shield (יָדָן), in order to clean and polish it when it was stained with blood and defiled by dirt and rust (see the description in Isa. xxi. 5). In the individualizing poetical language the defiled and uncleansed shields denote the unfitness for war and the helplessness of the glory of Israel lying powerless in dust and blood. If the shield of Israel lack its ornament and grace, so mayst thou also, O field of slaughter, lack thine, mourn thou waste and dreary! Let Nature respond to the shame and wretchedness of the people.—Ver. 22 celebrates the bravery of the two heroes, which impelled them ever onward to victory, that thus the contrast to their sad end may come out more prominently. To Jonathan is assigned the bow (comp. 1 Sam. xviii. 4; xx. 20), to Saul the sword. They thus represent the weapon-power ("Wehr und Waffen"‡) of the whole people. The sword, and in a sort the arrow, drinks the blood and devours the flesh. This frequent poetical conception (ii. 26; Deut. xxxii. 42; Isai. i. 20; xxxiv. 6; Jer. ii. 30; xli. 10) mingles in the words: Saul's sword returned not empty [Jonathan's bow turned not back]; these heroes were accustomed to gain complete victory, to overthrow and destroy all opposing power (comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 15).—Ver. 23. The singer sets forth how the two met death not only together, but also in a deep, cordial union of war-comradeship. They were "beloved" and "lovely, amiable," the latter quality being the cause of the former; important data for the characterization of the two men, both adjectives being referred to each. Comp. the corresponding description of Saul in 1 Sam. ix. 2 sq. and x. 24. David here looks at him only in the light of his God-given noble endowments and qualities, and praises them, turning his glance away (in view of his death) from the time during which the "evil spirit" had darkened and destroyed his nobility, and not thinking of the persecutions he himself had suffered.—In life and in death—not divided.*—On the one hand David here bears witness to the cordial love that Saul felt for his son, traces of which we find in 1 Sam. xix. 6; xx. 2, though according to 1 Sam. xx. 30 sq. the evil spirit in him burned in hot anger even against Jonathan. On the other hand David here praises the filial love of Jonathan, in which he remained true to his father in spite of the latter's hatred and persecution of his friend, not permitting his friendship to diminish his filial piety. Equal in noble qualities of heart, bound together in life and death in cordial personal association, they had also the noblest heroic qualities in common: each was distinguished for eagle-like swiftness and agility (Isa. xl. 31; Deut. xxviii. 49; Jer. iv. 13; Lam. iv. 19; Hab. i. 8), for lion-like courage and strength (xvii. 10; Judg. xiv. 18; Prov. xxx. 30). How sorrowful, then, the loss!—Ver. 24. Saul's gracious free-handedness in dividing out the booty of war. Scarlet-red, purple or crimson (שָׁרָב, Ex. xxv. 4; Judg. v. 30; Prov. xxxi. 21).—With delights = in an amiable manner [or the "with" may = "and;" in scarlet and (other) delights.—Tr.].—To this costly clothing for women he added golden ornaments, brought along in the spoil of war. As the men are to mourn for the hero, so the women for the gracious king, who out of the booty of his battles has bestowed on them costly adornment.—[The poetical power of this appeal to the women of Israel, beautiful in itself, is heightened when we recollect that these women had once sung the war-praises of Saul, and were therefore the admirers of his prowess as well as the grateful recipients of his bounty. Womanly tenderness is to mourn the fallen hero, whom in his life womanly enthusiasm had celebrated.—Tr.]

* As שָׁרֵי is Sing. (the Plu. is שָׁרֵי), all explanations based on the Plu. are wrong. מְרִימָה is used of the bringing of first-fruits, Num. xv. 19 sq.; 2 Chron. xxxi. 10 [but also of other offerings.—Tr.]

Vers. 25, 26. The special lamentation for Jonathan. Ver. 25. The first part is a repetition of the lamentation in ver. 19 b with the addition: in the midst of the battle. Then follows first the lamentation over the fact of his death: Jonathan on thy heights slain, comp. ver. 19 a. David mentions him alone, in order to bemoan what he had lost in him, the dearly-loved friend. His union of heart with his friend differences this lament sharply from the foregoing over him and Saul as heroes.—I am distressed, etc., thus standing first indicates that David's heart was deeply moved, and utterly given up to grief. My brother—the expression of the cordial brotherly love that united them.—Very pleasant wast thou to me must be understood as setting forth the deep impression that Jonathan made on him by his faithful, absorbing love. On this account, and because of the expression: "I am distressed," the "thy love" can only = "thy love to me," not "my love to thee" (Bunsen). "David mourns for him not because he himself loved him, but because he has lost him" (Then.). "More wonderful, extraordinary" * than the love of women, the love that women bear—thus he sets forth the deep devotion of Jonathan's love, like that which is peculiar to women, and is the basis of the completest loving union between man and woman. Theodoret: "As they that are married are made one flesh by their union, so they that love one another perfectly are made one in soul by their disposition of mind." In these words David has not only reared to Jonathan a monument of friendship, but also borne testimony to that highest ideal of friendship (realized in him), which in the Old Testament was possible only on the basis of a common covenant of heart with the living God.

* יָעִיר וְחָרִי כוֹת [which is "unhebraic, and the first word ungrammatical" (Wellh.).—Tr.]

† יָרְמוֹת יִרְמָתָא

* [On the translation see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

Ver. 27. The climactic expression of sorrow after this declaration of highest loss in Jonathan's love: How are the heroes fallen! At this culmination of grief the lament again sounds the key-note of the whole, and returns in conclusion to its chief object, the sorrow for the hero-glory of Israel destroyed in Saul and Jonathan. For the concluding words: The weapons of war are perished, refer not to materials of war (Vulg., De Wette, Böttcher, al.). This would be a psychologically inconceivable transition, in sharpest contrast with the lofty tone of the Song, from the deepest, tenderest, innermost sorrow of heart for what the singer and all Israel had lost in these two heroes, to a lament which, as Theinus admirably says, a Napoleon might have made, but not a David. The "weapons of war" are the heroes considered as instruments of battle and war; comp. Isa. xiii. 5; Acts ix. 15 (αὐτοὶ). [The exquisite beauty of this Ode has been noted by all commentators. The artistic skill with which its successive thoughts are introduced is equal to the beauty and passionate tenderness of the thoughts themselves. The lament over Israel's glory slain—the picture of exulting foes—the imprecation on the spot of ground that witnessed and, as it were, permitted the misfortune—the praise of the military exploits of the heroes, their oneness, their strength—the appeal to the women—the picture of Jonathan's deep and faithful love—these are all exquisitely expressed and connected; the ode has unity, and yet, short as it is, has wonderful variety.—It is to be observed that the divine name does not occur in the song, nor does it contain any theocratic or religious thought. There is no reference to Jehovah's wrath, no prayer for Jehovah's interposition, no expression of resignation to the divine will. Whatever David may have thought of these things, he here says nothing about them. The elegy, therefore (though noble in feeling), is not religious; it is a national song, as the title seems to indicate, and is here chronicled by the historian as the speech of Jotham (Judg. ix.) or that of Tertullus (Acts xxiv.) is recorded—a gem of ancient Hebrew poetry, not only pleasing as poetry, but instructive in the light that it throws on the personages and events of the time. —TR.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David's noble, kingly disposition is here splendidly attested in the temptation that the announcement of Saul's death brought him. Suddenly he sees himself freed from the persistent murderous persecutions of Saul, and the way open for his accession to the long-promised royal power and honor; how easily might his heart have abandoned itself, if not to malicious joy, at any rate to joy at God's righteous judgment on his enemy, and the restoration of quiet in his life and peace in his land! How human and natural it would seem if he expressed satisfaction at Saul's end and its results for himself! Instead of this we see in David's words and conduct in the presence of this terrible catastrophe the noblest and purest unselfishness, and concern only for the sacred interests of Israel as the people of the Lord. Looking altogether away from himself and his royal calling, he immerses himself with his men in mourning for the national calamity, for the downfall of the army of the Lord, for the violation done to the Lord's honor in the defeat of His people. He shows deep, true sorrow for Saul's death, looking away from all that Saul had done to him, and taking note only of what he was for Israel in his royal calling as Anointed of the Lord. Further, he without envy celebrates him as the glory of Israel in the elegy, which contemplates Saul only as military hero, but as such from the theocratic point of view in his quality of leader of the people and army of the Lord. As he acted theocratically with perfect justice in slaying in holy anger the Amalekite as the murderer of the Lord's anointed, giving no room in his heart to revenge, so he stands on the summit of the theocratic view, when in his elegy he celebrates Saul as the national hero and consecrated leader of Israel, being wholly free from bitterness and anger at the suffering that Saul had so long inflicted on him. All selfish feeling vanishes, in the presence of the slaughtered people and the slain king, in the general theocratic concern for Israel and in the consciousness of the Lord's control over His people with the army and its leaders. "David's lament over Saul and Jonathan is the consecration of completion that is poured out over the attestation of his royal disposition" (Baumgarten). It is "a monument of his noble unvengeful spirit. He who can so speak of the enemy who has for years sought his life and inflicted on his soul wounds that never heal, can certainly not be charged with revenge" (Hengst., Pa. iv. 298 sq.).

2. While he thus exhibits a noble, high-hearted disposition, David also presents an example of true love of enemies, being not merely free from all feeling of revenge in the heart, making no complaint or accusation concerning the wrong done him, uttering no word of joy over the judgment that has befallen his enemy, but mourning his fall as that of a friend, avenging in holy anger the insult offered to God in his person, and dwelling with just recognition and praise on the good with which God has endowed him.

3. As David did, so must every servant of God

keep the good and righteous cause for which he fights and suffers (whether it be merely personal, or also a matter of God's kingdom) free and pure from the self-seeking that mingles therewith under the pretence of furthering and completing it, that he may not set himself at variance with God's holy will, whose wise direction prepares right ways for it, nor with the ends of his kingdom which can never be furthered by sinful means. He who employs the sin of the world for a cause good and holy in itself, so as to make himself partaker of this sin, treads the path of falsehood and destruction, and desecrates the name and the aims of the kingdom of God.

4. Sincere love of enemies has its root in a heart purified from selfishness and in fellowship with the living God, which seeks not its own, but looks only to God's love and honor. For God's sake the truly God-fearing man loves his enemy. And so love to enemies shows itself in such main features as are here described: in the putting away of all revengeful feeling, in the refraining from a strictly justifiable condemnation in view of God's completed judgment, in silence of heart and mouth before God and man as to the evil that the enemy has done, in covering the sin that the Lord has visited or will visit, in recognizing what was good and praise-worthy in the enemy, and what he was and what he accomplished by God's will and endowment for his kingdom, in praising the name of God for all whereby the Lord even in the person and life of the enemy has maintained His honor and exhibited His merciful and long-suffering love.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Wonderful is God's management in the life of His people. When through the entanglement of their life with the world their anxieties and afflictions have risen highest, the Lord suddenly causes things to take a turn that puts an end to all need and conflict, and introduces a thorough-going help that brings all temptations and trials of faith to a wholesome conclusion.—To those who are distinguished in the kingdom of God as specially called and favored instruments of His grace, falsehood and hypocrisy draw near most pressingly and corruptingly in the guise of humility and self-abasement.—Children of God should not betake themselves to the ways of unrighteousness and self-will, in order to attain the goal set up for them; they can reach this only through decided rejection of the means offered and commended to them by the tempting world.—The God-fearing man sees in the misfortune that strikes his enemy the judicial righteousness of God, and accordingly lets no feeling of revenge or of rejoicing at injury to others gain a place in his heart, and is humbly silent when the Lord speaks. Rather does he mourn over the fall of his opponent, and over the damage that has been done not only to the opponent, but to the common good cause.—Love to an enemy is righteous in that it recognises the good in an opponent without envy and without reserve, and thankfully recognises what God has done in his case according to His own goodness and mercy.—Even amid the most painful experiences we should be quick to discern the stamp of divine nobility in an immortal human soul.—When we behold God's hand righteously smiting men from whom as our persecutors and foes we have had to suffer for the sake of God's cause and kingdom, we should keep our eyes open against the sin which wishes to anticipate God's will and assail the life of our opposers: we should by word and deed testify in holy wrath against conduct so offensive to God.

Ver. 1 sq. SCHLIER: God the Lord has for every one of us also fixed His aim, and though it be no royal crown that is destined for us, yet about us all God has long ago formed His special plan. The way to reach this end is the way of duty, the way of quiet, faithful obedience to God's will. In such a way we come to the goal. Think of David, to whom the crown was promised, and who in order to obtain it did absolutely nothing else than his duty, and how beautifully did David reach the goal! without his asking, the crown was laid at his feet.—Ver. 2. CRAMER: Hypocrites turn their cloak according to the wind, and worship the rising more than the setting sun; but He who deals hypocritically with his neighbor prepares a net for his own feet (Prov. xxix. 5).—Ver. 3. OSLANDER: Those who wish to deceive other people mix truth and falsehood together, in order that they may sell one along with the other, like good and bad wares (Ja. iii. 10-12).

[Ver. 10. HALL: Worldly minds think no man can be of any other than their own diet; and because they find the respects of self-love, and private profit, so strongly prevailing with themselves, they cannot conceive how these should be capable of a repulse from others.—HENRY: David had been long waiting for the crown, and now it is brought him by an Amalekite. See how God can serve His own purpose of kindness to His people, even by designing men, who aim at nothing but to set up themselves.—Th.]

Vers. 11, 12. For him who has the Holy Spirit it is not impossible to love his enemies.—SCHLIER: Who among us has such a persecutor as David had in Saul? What we have in the worst case is one or another opposer, who injures us or hurts our feelings. And yet how full we are of hate! and even if we do our opposer no evil, how glad we are when evil befalls him! Of this we will be ashamed, we will learn better the love of enemies. We are Christians, and as Christians have double cause to follow Him who for us, His enemies, gave up His life.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: O how it should shame us, already in the days of the Old Testament to meet with a love of enemies such as here manifests itself in David, while it must with sincerity, truth and candor be confessed that among us, though we know the revelation of love to sinners in Christ, it belongs, alas! to the rarest pearls.—Ver. 16. It was indignation at such an outrage when David caused the regicide to be slain, and such indignation proceeded from fear of God, and at such a moment there was nothing like calculating prudence to be found in David. But in truth the fear of the Lord is always at the same time true prudence.—[David's course in this matter was the best policy for him; but we have no right to conclude from that fact that he was led to it by considerations of policy. He had himself shown, on an occasion of great temptation (1 Sam. xxiv. 6), that reverence for the Lord's anointed of which he here speaks. The fact that "honesty is the best policy" will not of itself alone make a man honest; but neither does it prevent a man's being honest, or give us a right to suspect a good man's motives.—TR.]

Ver. 17. S. SCHMID: When a man dies, it is for the first time seen how people have been disposed towards him during his life.—Ver. 20. KRUMMACHER: The word: "Tell it not in Gath," etc., has since become a proverb in believing circles. It is often heard when one of their number has not guarded his feet, and has somewhere given offence. Would that this call were but more faithfully lived up to than is for the most part the case! Would that the honor of the spiritual Zion lay everywhere as near the heart of the children of the kingdom as to David's heart that of the earthly Zion! But how often it happens that they are even zealous to uncover the nakedness of their brethren, and by this renewal of Ham's offence become traitors in the Church which Christ has purchased with His blood. They thus make themselves partakers in the guilt of calumniating the gospel, in that they open the way for it by their perhaps thoroughly malicious tale-telling.—SCHLIER: Do but let us once learn to love our fellow-man, not for the sake of what he is or deserves, but for the Lord's sake who demands it of us; then shall we, even when we suffer injustice, for all that not be wanting in love, but shall understand the blessed art of showing love even where we find no love! How it ought to shame us though that David, after long banishment and tribulation, feels nothing at the death of Saul but mourning and lamentation.—Where office and calling does not otherwise demand, we should be silent as to the evil done by a dead man, especially when it was a prince or a king; love should cover all that, should find no joy in saying much of the faults of others. But it should be to us a rightful concern and a holy joy to bring to light the good that another has done.—["De mortuis nil nisi bonum."—TR.]

[Ver. 23. How could David sincerely speak thus? There came back to him now the recollection of those bright days when he dwelt peacefully as Saul's son and Jonathan's brother, and his heart melted into tenderness as he recalled the amiable traits which not only his dear friend Jonathan, but even Saul in his better moments, had manifested. Eulogies over the dead often seem insincere or exaggerated to those who know not the memories awakened.—Ver. 26. To say, as is sometimes done, that the Scriptures speak of the love of Christ as "passing the love of women," is utterly unwarrantable "accommodation."—TR.]

[Vers. 1–16. A cunning schemer failing and perishing; 1) Amid bloodshed and mortal agony he coolly lays a deep scheme to promote his own interest. 2) He makes a cunning mixture of truth and falsehood (David could not know, and we cannot tell, just how much of it was true)—as deep schemers usually do. 3) He calculates on the narrow selfishness of human nature—commonly a very safe basis of calculation. 4) He is foiled by encountering such generosity, loyalty and justice as he has not been used to and did not look for (vers. 11–15). The shrewdest schemers sometimes mistake their man. 5) His plan issues in benefit to another, but only ruin to himself. In this world which so abounds in selfish schemers and tempters there is yet a grace that can sustain and a Providence that overrules.—TR.]

[Vers. 19–27: HENRY: The excellent spirit which David here shows: 1) Very generous to his enemy, Saul; a) conceals his faults, b) praises what is worthy. 2) Very grateful to Jonathan, his sworn friend; a) nothing more delightful in this world than a true friend, b) nothing more distressful than the loss of such a friend. 3) Deeply concerned for the honor of God (ver. 20). 4) Deeply concerned for the public welfare. ^a [Ver. 3. Sept. reads "the men," which better accords with Greek and Eng. idiom (Erdmann so has it in the Exposition), but hardly calls for a change in the Heb. text. Further on Sept. omits the verb "did bring up," thus attaching the noun "men" to the verb of the preceding verse. The Syr. also has difficulty with this sentence, making the Hiphil into Qal, and inserting "and David" at the beginning of the verse, so as to read: "and David and his men were with him; and David went up and the men of his house, and they abode in Hebron."

These readings seem to substantiate the Heb. text, only they had וְעָלָה instead of וְעָלָה, which the Sept. then omitted as superfluous. The Heb. Hiphil is preferable because it introduces a new statement, while the Syr. merely repeats.—Ta.]

^b [Ver. 4. So Erdmann, Philippson, Maurer; but Wellhausen declares it to be an impossible construction in prose. If not impossible, it is unusual and hard, and the simple rendering of the Syr. and Vulg.: "the men of Jabesh-Gilead buried Saul," commends itself, except that, as this is probably the answer to a question: "who buried Saul?" we should expect the subject "the men of Jabesh-Gilead" to be put as the principal and essential part of the answer. The true form of the sentence is not apparent.—Ta.]

^c [Ver. 6. The Fut. rendering is found in Sept., Sym., Vulg., and the idea "requite" in the two last; but the context (with the present text) points to the Pres., and it is better to render the Heb. verb (עָשָׂה) uniformly. Against Thenius Wellhausen insists that the עָשָׂה cannot be rendered as Pres. (this would require עֹשֶׂה), and, since the Fut. does not accord with the נָתַן, he would for the latter substitute נָתַן, and render: "I will do you good because (— in place that) ye have done," etc. (so the Vulg.), which certainly gives a more appropriate sense, though the rendering of Thenius (and Erdmann) is not impossible.—Ta.]

^d [Ver. 9. The literal rendering of the Prep. (מֵעַל) is here (with Erdmann) in these three cases retained, in contrast with the following עַל, "over," because an error of text does not here seem probable, in spite of the fact that ancient and modern translators (without exception, as far as I know) neglect the difference. Erdmann attempts in the Exposition to point out the difference of meaning between the two Prepositions in the connection.—Instead of "Ashurites" many read "Geshurites."—The last word of the verse עָלָה presents an example of a 3 pers. masc. suffix (לָהּ) usually considered to be archaic for l; the fem. pointing (לָהּ) would be possible, if "Israel" were considered in its national unity, or as a land.—Ta.]

^f [Ver. 10. Vers. 10 and 11 are variously handled. Erdmann inclines to follow Thenius in regarding 10 b and 11 as parenthesis, Wellhausen regards 10 a and 11 as interpolations, connecting 10 b with ver. 12. The difficulties in the figures do not prove unguineness of the text, since these may be corrupted by copyists, and the summary chronological statements are natural and in accordance with the manner of our Book. The better view is that the Redactor has inserted as summary statement in his narrative either vers. 10, 11, or 10 a, 11. The objection to Thenius' view (which connects 10 a with 12) is that 10 a is clearly the ordinary formula for the length of a king's reign and his age at his accession, and therefore an independent sentence. See the remarks on I Sam. xiii. 1.—Ta.]

^g [Ver. 13. The use of the Acc. suffix and also the adv. יַחַד is remarkable, since either (as expressing the idea of concurrence) would seem to exclude the other. We should expect either simply: "they met them at the pool," or "they met at the pool together." The present text may have arisen from the combination of the two constructions.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 15. The 1 is either appositional, — “namely,” or it indicates that Ishbosheth had other soldiers besides Benjaminites.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 23. ܕܝܢܐ. Not one of the ancient VSS. renders this word “fifth rib,” Sept. “loins” (ψέλα), Syr. “breast,” Chald. “side of the loins,” Vulg. “inguen,” among moderns only Cahen maintains it, after Rashi and the Talmud (Sanhedrin 49, a). Gesenius and Fürst connect the word with a root (found in Arabic), meaning “to be fat or strong.”—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 24. To the reading of the verse Wellhausen objects: 1) that a way is stated to be the goal of the pursuit; 2) that the pursuit, starting from Gibeon (ver. 16), nevertheless ends on the way to Gibeon; 3) that the name Giah is unknown and suspicious. He therefore substitutes גַּי, “ravine,” for ܕܝܢܐ, supposing that the scribe designed to locate the hill Ammah appropriately by a valley; but as the combination “valley of the way” thus obtained gives no sense, he finally throws out the גַּי and reads: “opposite the way of the wilderness” (remark- ing very justly that roads in Palestine, being unchangeable, answered as well as rivers for topographical definition). Here this generally acute critic has made difficulties for himself. For 1) the pursuit ends not on a road, but at a hill on a certain road; 2) the pursuit is not said not to have reached Gibeon, but to have reached a point on the road to the wilderness of Gibeon, which may have been of considerable extent; 3) as to Giah, many other- wise unknown names occur once in the Old Testament. It is not necessary to suppose that the hill of ver. 25 is identical with Ammah in ver. 24, or to change the ܕܝܢܐ into ܕܝܢܐ or something else.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 27. Literally: “at that time from the morning.” The second ܕܝܢܐ, rendered in Eng. A. V. “surely,” is better taken as repetition of the first, the Conj. introducing the clause, — that, and usually omitted in Eng- lish.—Ta.]

 5 son of Haggith; and the fifth, Shephatiah the son of Abital; And the sixth, Ith-
 6 ream, by Eglah David's wife. These were born to David in Hebron. And it came to pass, while there was war between the house of Saul and the house of David, that Abner made himself strong for the house of Saul.

¹⁶ [Ver. 31. The text here is corrupt; but it is not easy to restore it. The Chald. follows the Heb. word by word; the Vulg. inserts the Rel. Pron.: "three hundred and sixty who also died;" the Syr. omits the verb "died" in ver. 31, and inserts it (Sing.) at the end of ver. 30. Literally the Heb. reads: "smote of Benjamin, etc., three hundred and sixty men, they died." Not only is the syntax impossible, but also the addition of the statement that the smitten men died is unusual, being involved in the word "smite" (according to the Heb. usage). The simplest course would be to omit the word "died," and read "smote . . . three hundred and sixty men." Perhaps a marginal explanation has here gotten into the text (Wellh.).—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Ch. ii. 1-7. David's elevation to the throne of Judah, and his residence in Hebron.—Ver. 1. The inquiry of the Lord was made through Urim and Thummim, comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 2, 10 sq.; xxx. 7, 8 sq. The high-priest Abiathar with the Ephod was with David, 1 Sam. xxii. 30; xxiii. 6. At this decisive turning-point of his unquiet life he wished to know the will of the Lord. The "after this" refers to all that is narrated in ch. i. and 1 Sam. xxxi. The motive for inquiring of the Lord is thereby at the same time indicated. He saw that the promise of the kingdom was now to be fulfilled to him. As he could no longer remain in the land of the Philistines, but must return to his country, and as the northern part of the land was held by the Philistines, the return to the territory of his own tribe was most natural; for there, where he had a long time found refuge (1 Sam. xxii. 5), he might count on a large following (1 Sam. xxx. 26 sq.) and firm support and protection against the remains of Saul's army under Abner. To the first question he receives from the Lord the definite answer that he is to return to Judah. To the second question: "Whither?" the answer is: "To Hebron." This city, situated in a valley (Gen. xxxvii. 14) in the most mountainous, and therefore the safest part of Judah, held to be a holy place from the recollections of the Patriarchal time, one of the principal places in the Tribe of Judah, an ancient royal city and a priestly city (Josh. xii. 10; xxi. 11), must now have had for David a very special importance, which appeared all the clearer from the divine decision and in respect to his future life became indubitable; here now was to be fulfilled the old Patriarchal promise (Gen. xlix. 8 sq.), the establishment of the theocratic kingdom in the Tribe of Judah.

Ver. 2 sq. In accordance with the will and direction of his God he went thither with his whole family. But also the men that were with him (comp. 1 Sam. xxvii. 2), he led thither into the cities of Hebron, that is, the places that belonged to the district of Hebron; every man with his house, a complete and permanent colonization of David's entire following took place, the foundation of David's royal authority, which was established with its seat in Hebron. For it is forthwith declared in ver. 4 a that the "men of Judah" that is, the elders as the representatives of the Tribe anointed him king over the house (the tribe) of Judah. See ch. v. 3, where the elders of all Israel come to make him king over the whole nation. The first anointment received from Samuel (1 Sam. xvi.) denoted the divine consecration to the royal office; this second one, performed by the Elders of Judah, was the public solemn installation of David (based on that anointment) into this office.

* [On Hebron (twenty miles south of Jerusalem) see the books of travel and Bible-dictionaries. Stanley has given in his "History of the Jewish Church," Vol. I., App. II., an interesting account of the visit of the Prince of Wales thither in 1862. Bib. Com. calls attention to the unusual phrase "cities of Hebron," as if Hebron were the name of a district, the common designation of dependent towns being "villages" or "daughters" (Josh. xv. 36; Num. xxi. 25). No doubt the name of the city Hebron attached itself to the surrounding district.—Ta.]

Comp. Saul's first anointment by Samuel (1 Sam. x. 1) and his subsequent public inauguration as king by the Elders, 1 Sam. x. 24; xi. 15.—So two anointments of Solomon are described, 1 Chron. xxiii. 1 sq.; xxix. 22. The anointing of David was perhaps hastened because Abner's purpose (ver. 8 sq.) was already known. [On the motives of the Tribe of Judah in making David their king see Chandler's "Life of David," Bk. II., ch. 30.—Tr.]

Vers. 4 b-7. David's first act as king. The message to the Jabeshites with thanks for their burial of Saul and the announcement of his anointing as king.—And they told David, saying (Luther: And when it was told David that) the men of Jabesh are they that buried Saul. (The form) of this sentence would certainly be somewhat "hard and ill-constructed" (Then.), but for the obvious pre-supposition that David, having heard of and deeply lamented Saul's death on the battle-field, inquired whether the body of the "Anointed of the Lord" had been rescued from the hands of the uncircumcised and buried in the sacred soil of his native land. S. Schmid well remarks of this explanation (which Tremellius has) that "it accords with David's piety." It is thus natural to suppose that David, now by God's providence king in Saul's stead, in consequence of the afflicting news that had wrung from him such a lament, purposes to give a becoming royal burial to the man whose person had always been sacred to him, and whose heroic greatness and virtues he had so passionately celebrated. There is therefore no need for the bold emendation of Thenius (after Vulg. and Sept.), who would read simply: "it was told David that the men of Jabesh buried Saul"—On the burial by the faithful and grateful Jabeshites of the bodies of Saul and his sons brought away from Bethshean, see 1 Sam. xxxi. 11 sq.—Ver. 5. The message to the Jabeshites was couched in the tone of royal authority. It conveys 1) a grateful invocation of blessing for the noble deed of love that they have wrought on Saul by burying him; the phrase "your lord" indicates that they had herein acted as became their relation to Saul as their king and lord.—Ver. 6. And now the Lord do to you kindness and truth.—This is the expansion of the wish of blessing in ver. 5. The first noun (רַחֲמֵי), favor, kindness is not merely pardoning grace (Keil), but in general the gracious love that God shows His people on the ground of His covenant with them. The second (אֱמֻנָה), truth is the trustworthiness and attestation of all His promises. David wishes them all exhibitions of the love and faithfulness of the Lord for the faithful love which they showed king Saul even in his death.—And I also do you this good, because ye have done this thing; the good that he does them is not merely this wish for the divine blessing (Keil), or therewith a gift of honor (Bunsen), but this honorable royal embassy with expression of thanks and invocation of blessing. The rendering: "And I also wish to show you such kindness" (S. Schmid, Clericus, De Wette) gives no appropriate sense, whether the comparison be referred to God's goodness or to the deed of the Jabeshites. Thenius excellently: "greeting you with blessing by my ambassadors."—[Eng. A. V., Patrick and Philippon give the incorrect future rendering.—Tr.]—Ver. 7 adds 2) encouragement and exhortation: let your hands be strong means not: be consoled! but: "be of strong courage." And be sons of power [valiant], that is, show yourselves brave men and unappalled. [The phrase means in general "men of force," the context showing whether the force intended is moral, intellectual or physical. The word (גִּבּוֹרִים) is used of Ruth (Ruth iii. 11) and of the "virtuous woman" in Prov. xxxi. 10, and elsewhere of warlike valor and of wealth. Bib. Com.: the opposite of "men of virtue" are "men of Belial," that is, men of no force of character.—Tr.]—The ground (פֶּה) of this exhortation is at the same time the explanation of its importance for the interests of David as anointed king. In the reason assigned he shows them not directly, but indirectly that he has been made king of Judah, their king Saul being dead. But his exhortation to valor and courage is intelligible only on the supposition that he gives them to understand that for them also he has taken Saul's place as king, and that they must valiantly espouse and defend his cause against his enemies, the party of Saul under the lead of Abner. It is not clear whether or not Ishbosheth had at this time been already set up as king by Abner. But from ver. 9 (which states that Gilead was one of the districts gained by Abner for Ishbosheth) it is evident that David, seeing Abner's movement thither (comp. 1 Sam. xxvi. 7), must have been concerned to secure to himself the capital city [Jabesh] of this province (Joseph., Ant. VI. 5, 1). Whether he succeeded in this is questionable. His demand that it should recognize him as king was justly founded on his divine call to be king over the whole people in Saul's stead, comp. iii. 9, 10. So certainly along with sincere gratitude "there was policy in this embassy" (Then.), but it was a thoroughly justifiable theocratic policy.

II. Chap. ii. 8—iii. 6. Ishbosheth's antigodly elevation to the throne of Israel by Abner and the thence resulting war.—Ver. 8. On Abner see 1 Sam. xiv. 50.—He had taken Ishbosheth the son of Saul, and brought him over to Mahanaim, that is, across the Jordan. Ishbosheth had probably taken part in the unfortunate battle of Gilboa, and as he survived, Abner his uncle saved him together with the force under his command in the flight across the Jordan (1 Sam. xxxi. 7), in order to keep the kingdom in the house of Saul. This retreat across the Jordan passed from Bethshean or Mount Gilboa south-east into Gilead, where not the city Jabesh (as we might expect from the foregoing), but Mahanaim (that is, "two camps," Gen. xxxii. 2) be-

* Sept. has רַחֲמֵי (—quod) after רַחֲמֵי, and the latter is omitted by Vulg.; Thenius hence supposes that רַחֲמֵי got into the text by mistake (through careless looking) for רַחֲמֵי, and that the latter, being added by way of supplement in the margin, thence got into the wrong place in the text. [See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

came the abode of Ishbosheth. In the division of the land this place was assigned to the Tribe of Gad, and lay on the border between it and the half-tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 26, 30) on the Jabbok [the present Wady Zerqa]. It was afterwards given to the Levites, Josh. xxi. 38. At a later period David found refuge there in his flight from Absalom, xvii. 24.—Ishbosheth according to 1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 39, was Saul's fourth son, while in 1 Sam. xiv. 49 only three are named, who also fell with him in the battle, 1 Sam. xxxi. 2. But in Chronicles he is called Eshbaal, that is, "Fire of Baal" [or "man of Baal."—Tr.]. For the name of the god Baal in Hos. ix. 10; Jer. iii. 24, is put as equivalent bosheth [shame] in order to indicate the reproach and shame of idol-worship (comp. Isa. xlii. 17; xlv. 16). So for Gideon's surname Jerubbaal (Judg. vi. 32; viii. 35) we find Jerubbesheth (2 Sam. xi. 21). Similarly the name Eshbaal was changed into Ishbosheth—"man of shame or disgrace." Ewald's supposition that bosheth was originally used in a good sense—"reverence, awe," is without foundation, and is in opposition to the fact that the word occurs only in a bad sense. It is therefore a natural conjecture that the change of Eshbaal to Ishbosheth had reference to the shame and disgrace that befell Saul's house in the person of this his last son, Ps. xxxv. 26 being thus fulfilled.—[It seems more probable that the name Baal = lord was in early times given to the God of Israel, and proper names were formed from it, as Eshbaal or Ishbaal = man of the lord; afterwards when the worship of the false Baal was introduced into Israel, the change above-described was made. Possibly this change was made by later editors and scribes, and the original form was retained in the Book of Chronicles because this book was less read than the prophetic historical books.—Tr.]—That Ishbosheth was a weak, characterless tool in the hand of Abner for the maintenance of the interests of the fallen royal house is already intimated in the words: And Abner took Ishbosheth and carried him over.—Mahanaim was fitted by its position to be a refuge for Ishbosheth and the remains of the defeated army.—Ver. 9. And made him king, as being in his view the legitimate heir to Saul's royal throne. Then follows the statement of the districts over which Abner extended Ishbosheth's authority: he made him king for Gilead, in which was the central point of his dominion, Mahanaim, whence consequently the territory of the two and a half east-jordanic tribes in the first place, which in contrast with the west-jordanic Canaan (Josh. xxii. 9, 13, 15, 32; Judg. v. 17; xx. 1) is put as equivalent to Gilead, was claimed for Ishbosheth. The change of prepositions, three times "to, for" (לְ), and three times "over" (עַל), is neglected by all the versions, which take the first as equivalent to the second. The difference, however, is to be retained; see Ew., § 217; and c. The former, as sign of movement "to" [occurring in the Hebrew text with Gilead, the Ashurites and Jezeel], indicates those regions over which Abner gradually extended Ishbosheth's authority, being obliged to wrest them from the Philistines by continued wars; for it cannot be doubted that the Philistines followed the flying Israelites across the Jordan, and that after the battle of Gilboa the districts of the Ashurites and Jezeel remained securely in their possession. It is obvious that the "Ashurites" here cannot be the Arabian tribe of Aashurim in Gen. xxv. 3 (Maur.) nor the Assyrians. The Chald. has "over the tribe of Asher;" but, apart from the in that case strange insertion of the Article (Then.), this explanation does not accord with the position of the other districts here mentioned, according to which the territory of Asher must have embraced also that of Zebulun and Naphtali, which is not supposable. According to the view of Bachienne cited by Keil the reference is to the city Asher (Josh. xvii. 7) with its territory, since this city lay south-east of Jezeel, and Abner might well from Gilead have first subjected this region to Ishbosheth. But in that case (Keil) no reason appears why the name of the inhabitants (Ashurites) is given instead of that of the city (Asher), and the mention of a city among districts is improbable. The best way out of the difficulty is to adopt the reading "Geshurites" found in Vulg., Syr. and Ar., and approved by Then., Winer (R. W. I. 414) and Ewald. This misreading might easily have gotten into the text. This Geshur cannot, however, be the district whose inhabitants, "Geshurim,"—"bridgemen," appear in the south of Palestine in connection with Philistia (Josh. xiii. 2), and are mentioned along with Girzites and Amalekites (1 Sam. xxvii. 8); nor can it be the little kingdom of Geshur which belonged to Syria (xv. 8), and there formed an independent State (iii. 3; xiii. 37; xiv. 23). From this latter is to be distinguished (against Keil) a district of the same name which (Deut. iii. 14 sq.; Josh. xii. 5 sq.) with the region of the Maachathites on the west formed the border of the kingdom of Basan and at the same time touched Gilead. But the Maachathites dwelt on the southwestern declivity of Hermion, at the sources of the Jordan (so Jerome). We shall therefore have to look for the Geshurites (whose district is named also in Josh. xiii. 11 along with both Gilead and Hermion) together with the Maachathites south of Hermion in the upper Jordan-region on both sides of the river. That this district is to be distinguished from the independent "kingdom" of Geshur in Syria is clear also from Josh. xiii. 13: "the children of Israel drove not out the Geshurites and the Maachathites, and Geshur and Maachath have dwelt among Israel to this day," whence it appears that it belonged to the Israelitish territory. The name Geshur (Bridgeland) it doubtless received from the numerous crossings that connected the two banks of the Jordan (Winer, Thenius).—And for Jezeel—this district called after the city of the same name, the scene of the great battle in which Israel succumbed to the Philistines, was the great fruitful plain (το μέγα πεδιον, 1 Mac. xii. 49; Jos., Ant. XV. 1, 22 u. s.) whose recovery must have particularly occupied Abner.—To these three great regions, which are mentioned in geographical order, are added, going from north to south (with the preposition עַל, "over"), the tribe-territories of Ephraim and Benjamin.—He made him king over

Ephraim and Benjamin, these tribes, which had not yet been conquered by the Philistines, holding no doubt to the House of Saul.—And over all (the rest of) Israel, that is, over all that country which afterwards formed the kingdom of Israel (Then.).

Vers. 10, 11. Duration of Ishbosheth's reign over Israel and of David's in Hebron.—Forty years old was Ishbosheth when he became king over Israel.—The words: over Israel connect themselves with and take up the closing words of ver. 9: “and over all Israel.” The following: and he reigned two years, might therefore be understood of his reign over all Israel excluding Judah, the words “over Israel” being naturally supplied from the context. Abner, in fact, on account of the wars necessary to conquer from the Philistines at least the three regions mentioned in ver. 9, could only gradually establish Ishbosheth's royal authority, and could not make him king over all Israel till after the clearing of those districts. It may well be supposed that this reconquering process took five and a half years. This explanation (Ewald, Bunsen, Keil) sets aside the seeming discrepancy that arises when we compare the statements that Ishbosheth was king two years, and that David reigned in Hebron over Judah seven years and six months; and it yet remains beyond doubt that Ishbosheth's elevation to the throne was nearly synchronous with David's anointment as king over Judah, and his murder (ch. iv.), up to which he was king, with the anointing of David as king over all Israel. Ishbosheth occupied the throne as long as David was king over Judah; but he was only two years king over Israel, which he could really become only after the gradual expulsion of the Philistines. However, instead of this explanation the reading of The-nius (which, it must be confessed, does some violence to the syntax) commends itself as better: he takes the passage from “but the house of Judah” to the end of ver. 11 as parenthesis, and renders: and when he had reigned two years (only the house of Judah followed David, and the time that David was king in Hebron over the house of Judah was seven years and six months), then went out Abner, etc. The harmonistic attempt of S. Schmid, Cler, and others who hold that David reigned two years over Judah till the murder of Ishbosheth and then further five and a half years over Israel in Hebron till the conquest of Jerusalem, is in direct contradiction with the words (ver. 11): David reigned over Judah seven years and six months. Equally untenable is the view that the two years of Ishbosheth's reign were the time of quiet till the outbreak of the war with David, during which Abner played the chief part (Grotius)—for Ishbosheth was king till his murder after Abner's death.—[Wellhausen connects ver. 10 b with ver. 9, and throws out 10 a as chronologically wrong, and ver. 11 as interrupting the narrative. It seems probable that 10 a and 11 are parenthetical chronological statements; but they are not on that account to be rejected; they may be regarded as explanatory insertions by the editor of the book. As to the chronology, there is no objection to be made to ver. 11, which is well supported (1 Kings ii. 11), and the two years of ver. 10 is reasonably explained by Ewald as above stated by Erdmann, or if the numeral be incorrect, this merely leaves doubtful the duration of Ishbosheth's reign (as Saul's in 1 Sam. xiii. 1), and does not invalidate the clause. Exception is, however, specially taken to Ishbosheth's age as here given, forty. The context, it is said, represents him as a youth or child, and moreover, as probably Saul's youngest son, he must have been several years younger than Jonathan, who was the oldest son, and Jonathan seems to have been nearly of the same age with David, about thirty, when he died. To this it may be answered that Ishbosheth need not have been much younger than Jonathan (especially if Saul had more than one wife), that Jonathan may have been twelve years older than David without bar to their friendship, that Jonathan may easily at the age of forty-two have left just one infant child (2 Sam. iv. 4), and that Saul might have been a husband and a father at the age of twenty-one, and, dying a stout warrior at the age of sixty-three, have left a son of forty-two. There is no difficulty in these suppositions single or combined. But if the number forty be incorrect, this does not affect the genuineness of the clause. The editor thought it well to insert here these chronological statements at the beginning of the narrative of the war between the house of Saul and the house of David. It is quite possible, but by no means certain, that the numerals have been lost or corrupted by copyists. See “Text. and Gram.”—Tr.]

Ver. 12 sq. From ver. 12 on is related how Abner, after actually establishing Ishbosheth as king over Israel, begins the conflict against David in order to subject Judah also to Ishbosheth. He could not have undertaken this war, if he had not finished the war against the Philistines for the establishment of Ishbosheth's authority over Israel, so that he knew that he was secure on that side. It is to be noted that David had at no time and in no way planned or begun hostilities against Ishbosheth. Rather he was forced into war by the latter through Abner. From Mahanaim, where Ishbosheth's headquarters had hitherto been, Abner advanced with his army against David to Gibeon (the present Jib in the western part of Benjamin, five miles north of Jerusalem) in order thence to march southward on Hebron to attack David.—[Bib. Com.: To go out is a technical phrase for going out to war.—Tr.]

Ver. 13. Though David had no hostile designs against Ishbosheth, he was yet fully prepared against such a foreseen attack.—[Some hold less well that war was already going on between the two princes.—Tr.]—To Ishbosheth's army under Abner he opposed a force under Joab. Joab, the son of David's sister Zeruiah (1 Chron. ii. 16), had no doubt already, as his brother Abishai (who was with David during his persecution, as David's family also, 1 Sam. xxii., came to him for protection against Saul), had a military training with his uncle, and taken a prominent position among his warriors; else he would not now appear as the chief leader of David's forces. In the roll of heroes in ch. xxiii. 8 sq. his name is not given, probably because he already then stood above them all as General, as we may conjecture from xxiii. 18, 24 (Vaihinger in Herzog VI. 712). As General-in-chief he appears in the official lists, viii. 16; xx. 13.—The two armies met at the pool of Gibeon, David having hastened to anticipate Abner's attack on the territory of Judah, and to carry the war into Ishbosheth's territory. The pool of Gibeon is the "great water" mentioned in Jer. xli. 12; there is still in Jib (the ancient Gibeon) in a cave a copious spring [forming a large reservoir], and not far beneath [on the side of the hill] the remains of an open tank which Robinson (II. 353 sq. [Am. ed. 455 and ii. 256]) saw, one hundred and twenty feet long and one hundred feet wide, about equal to the pool of Hebron. Comp. Tobler, Topographie von Jerusalem II. 515 sq. [and Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Gibeon.—Tr.]. The armies encamped at this pool opposite one another, the one on this side, the other on that side.

Vers. 14-16. To avoid a bloody civil war and perhaps also to escape personal conflict with his near friend (ver. 22) Joab, Abner proposes to Joab to decide the contest by a duel between individual warriors ("young men," גִּיּוֹרִים, comp. ver. 21) put up on both sides. This word "play" (פִּיגְוִי) is used of children in the street (Zech. viii. 5), of beasts in the sea (Ps. civ. 26), and so here of warlike play, = to wrestle, but not to denote a game of arms for entertainment (Ew.), but a serious battle-play to decide the matter for both armies (comp. I Sam. xvii.) as the result (ver. 16) shows.—Joab accepts the proposal immediately, a sign that it was agreeable to him. Twelve warriors from each side, the number probably derived from the number of the Tribes, meet in single combat on one side of the pool. The "went over" is to be understood of one party only, while the preceding arose refers to both.—[The "went over" refers from the wording to both parties; probably they met at some intermediate point.—Tr.]—And they seized every man the head of his fellow, that is, they rushed on one another, in order by the stunning seizure of the head the more quickly and thoroughly to finish the struggle. It is not necessary (Then. and Ew. after Sept.), to supply "his hand" after "man" ("they thrust each his hand on the head of his opponent") in order to get a verb for "his sword" [Eng. A. V. inserts "thrust"]; there is no need to repeat the verb "seized," for we may without forcing render: and his (every one's) sword in the side of his opponent! The rapidity with which, at the same time with the seizure of the head, the sword entered the adversary's side is vividly set forth by the absence of the verb, it being logically necessary to supply merely the word "was."—And they fell together.—This result shows the embittered feeling of the young men, but also their military skill and training.—[Bp. Patrick understands that only the twelve Benjaminites were slain; but it was clearly a mutual slaughter, the twenty-four fell dead. Bib. Com. cites the strikingly similar combat of the Horatii and the Curiatii; as the Alban Mettius there urged the desirableness of avoiding bloodshed because the two people had in the Etruscans a common powerful enemy, so might Abner have here urged the same argument in reference to the Philistines (Livy I. 25).—The hair was often worn long in those days; but it was a custom also to cut the hair (and sometimes the beard) before going into battle, that the enemy might not have a hold thereby.—These single combats still occur among the Arabians.—Tr.]—The place (of combat) was called (by the people in consequence of this result).—Field of knives (or edges) (חֵלֶקֶת הַיָּדָיִם). The narrative indicates that this name was connected immediately with what was peculiar in the occurrence, namely, the mutual synchronous slaughter by the edge of the sword, so that they fell down together. To this corresponds the meaning of יָדָיִם, "knife, edge" (comp. Eng. knife), which is found also in Ps. lxxxix. 44, and is established from the ground-idea of the Arabic stem by Fleischer in Delitzsch's Comm. on the Ps. in loco (2 vols., 1859-60). Thenius after the Sept. (τὸν ἐπιβοῦλον, "the plotters") renders field of adversaries (drängerfeld, דְּרֹאֲגֵרִים); but this does not answer to the characteristic fact that occasioned the name, which was not the mutual attack, but the mutual slaughter with swords. Thenius' objection to the rendering: "field of edges"—that it would apply to every place of combat—holds rather against his own translation. Ewald's rendering: "field of the artful" (דְּרֹאֲגֵרִים) unwarrantably introduces the notion of "artifice" into the affair, and changes the Heb. text, which is supported by all the versions. Vulg.: ager robustorum, Aq., Sym.: κλῆρος τῶν στερεῶν, "field of the strong," a rendering derived from the signification "rock" (which also belongs to the Heb. word), as if the rock-like firmness of the combatants (which, however, is not specially mentioned in the narrative) were here indicated.—[Bishop Patrick follows the Vulg. in the translation of this name, Syr., Philippeon. Bib. Com. (which, however, also suggests "field of aides," יָדָיִם) give it as Erdmann. Chald. has "possession of the slain."—Tr.]

Vers. 17-25. In consequence of the undecided result of the single combat, a general and fierce battle between the two armies, which issues in the defeat and flight of Abner. To the bitterness of the bloody duel answers the violence of the general conflict that arose the same day, which is described as "very sore" (ver. 17). Its result, in allusion to the single combat, which had not proved decisive, is straightway given: Abner and his army were beaten.—In vers. 18-23 we have a very vivid and interesting description of a special battle-scene or rather pursuit. In this scene the three nephews of David come forward, Joab, Abishai (comp. I Sam. xxvi. 6 with 2 Sam. xvi. 9; xviii. 2; xxi. 17; xxiii. 18) and Asahel, who are expressly described as sons of Zeruiah (as Joab in ver. 13) in order to indicate the prominent part taken in this battle by the family of David. Ver. 18. Asahel, distinguished for agility and swiftness, and therefore compared to a "gazelle in the field" [Eng. A. V.: wild roe], see Prov. vi. 5.—Ver. 19. He pursues Abner in order by conquering the General to strike the decisive blow that must end the battle.—He turned not to the right hand nor to the left from following Abner, pressed hard and straight on him.—Ver. 20. Asahel was doubtless already known to Abner, comp. ver. 22. Abner's speaking supposes that Asahel had almost overtaken him, and might now infer from his silence that he would surrender himself prisoner.—Ver. 21. Abner's address to Asahel is based on the supposition that the latter is anxious only for the glory of making a prisoner and for booty.—Take his armor, that is, after having slain him.—[Such was the custom; see Homer for example.—Tr.]—Ver. 22. Abner speaks again, since Asahel will not desist from the pursuit. He gives as reason for his exhortation that he wishes to spare Asahel's life, and not, by slaying him, make a deadly enemy of his brother Joab, with whom, therefore, he must previously have stood in friendly relations (Thenius). "From regard and former friendship to Joab, he was unwilling to kill the young hero" (Keil), [who was also "probably but a stripling and no fit antagonist for so great a warrior" (Bib.-Com.).—Tr.]—How should I lift up my face? that is, present myself with a good conscience before him. [Bp. Patrick not so well: "because Joab was a fierce man, and would study revenge."—Tr.]—Ver. 23. Asahel, however, did not desist from pressing on Abner, who, not wishing to kill him, was compelled to defend himself, and so, not with the front part of the spear, which was designed for war, but with the hinder part, which was stuck into the ground (1 Sam. xxvi. 7), and therefore no doubt was furnished with a sharp edge (perhaps of metal) smote him in the abdomen so that it came out behind in his back, and he fell dead on the spot. It hence appears that Asahel pressed violently on Abner, who was defending himself with the point of the spear, which must have been very sharp. In proof that there was a lower metallic point to spears, Böttcher cites Hom. Il. vi. 213; x. 153; xiii. 443; Herod. vii. 41.—[On the translation "abdomen" instead of "fifth rib," see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.] This place, too, where Asahel fell, received importance among the people from the general mourning over the young hero. This is pathetically and vividly described by the single expression: "Every one that came to the place stood still," comp. xx. 12.—Ver. 24. The pursuit continues with all the more violence. The two brothers Joab and Abishai follow Abner till the evening. At the same time the locality (now unknown) where the pursuit ended, "the hill Ammah in front of Giah on the road to the wilderness of Gibeon," is stated with precision; an evidence of the exactness of the narrative. The wilderness of Gibeon lay east of Gibeon in the tribe of Benjamin.—Ver. 25. The "children of Benjamin," as the nearest tribesmen, who must have been most interested for the kingdom of Iahobesheth. They gathered themselves together from the dispersion produced by flight into one body after Abner on a hill, that is, to protect Abner, and from this more favorable position to defend themselves.—[Bib.-Com.: Abner's skill and courage in rallying his followers to a strong position in spite of so crushing a de-

Vers. 28–28. On Abner's appeal to Joab the conflict is straightway stopped, and the pursuit on Joab's part ceases. A truce is concluded. Abner's first word: Shall the sword devour forever? expresses decided aversion to this bloody combat. The second question: Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness at last? points not to outward destruction, but to the empoisoning and brutalizing (the necessary result at last of such a war) of the feeling that the members of a people, and especially God's covenant-people, ought to cherish towards one another. Just at this moment the bitterness had reached its highest point, and the result of the continuation of the war would necessarily have been bitter and sullen despair on the part of the Benjaminites and an increase of military fury in the army of Judah. Vulg.: "Dost thou not know how dangerous is desperation?" The third question is a pressing demand to Joab to suspend hostilities immediately and agree to a truce. Joab answers Abner with an oath, in which he partly charges him with the blame of the day's bloody struggle, partly affirms his own perfect willingness to cease hostilities without following up his victory. The first 'פ = "surely" (imo), the mark of emphatic asseveration in an oath, Ew. § 330 b; comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 44; xx. 3; Gen. xxii. 16 sq.; 1 Ki. i. 29 sq.; ii. 23 sq., where, as here, it follows real oaths and introduces their contents. [This first "surely" is not in the Eng. A. V.—Tr.] If thou hadst not said this, surely then.—The second "surely" ('פ), strengthened by "then" (אם) as elsewhere by "now" (עַתָּה), Num. xxii. 29; Gen. xliii. 10; 1 Sam. xiv. 30, takes up the first in order to bring out more expressly and strongly what would then have happened. What Abner said is his proposition for the single combat (ver. 14), which resulted in this obstinate battle. Yea verily, then had the people gone up—that is, returned (Niph. of עָלָה in reflexive sense "get up," Ew. § 123 b). There would then have been no fraternal war. Thenius (after Syr. and Ar.) explains: If thou hadst not (now) spoken (about a truce), then surely in the morning, (namely to-morrow) would the people have been led back. But 1) The "to-morrow" is not in the Hebrew, and 2) Joab's answer would then amount to nothing, as it was then evening, and a return on the next morning was a matter of course. To our interpretation Thenius objects that Abner's proposal of a duel was meant for good, and the two armies had originally marched out with intention to fight; but this objection is of no force against that interpretation, which follows the original word for word, for Joab means to say simply: if thou hadst not by that challenge given the signal for the battle, which, as a matter of fact, continued the whole day, then early in the morning one side would have retreated before the other, and the battle would not have occurred. Joab herein assumes that Abner, with the disposition which he has just expressed, would have avoided the battle if he had not excited it by his well-meant arrangement of the duel, and in his whole address and his bearing to Abner it may be seen that he (Joab) would not have made the attack, and that his march against Abner was simply to protect the territory of Judah. We must read between the lines: but for thine unfortunate word, which has had such results, we twoshould have avoided the battle. Here is to be noted what is indicated in ver. 12 as to the personal relation of Abner to Joab, and how afterwards (chap. iii.) Abner passed from "the House of Saul" to David's side. [Vulg., Lightfoot, Patrick, Philippon agree with Erdmann in the interpretation of this clause—Bib. Comm. with Thenius. A common explanation is: even if thou hadst not spoken (for a truce), the pursuit would have ceased to-morrow morning. This answer would not (as Erdmann declares) be meaningless, for it was by no means otherwise certain that the battle would not have been continued the next day. Moreover the phrase "from the morning" might be understood of the following morning. Two facts seem to favor this latter interpretation: 1) the phrase "from after their brethren" repeated by Joab after Abner, would naturally have the same meaning in both cases, "desist from pursuit;" 2) the form in which Joab couches his answer, that is, an oath, better refers to something which lay in his power, not the non-occurrence of a battle that day, but the cessation of the battle going on. Joab would then say (agreeably to the context): I did not design to continue the battle, but, if you had said nothing, my purpose was to withdraw my troops in the morning—the context showing (as in Ex. xxix. 34) that the following morning was meant.—Tr.] Ver. 28. Joab straightway causes the trumpet to sound the signal "Halt! Arms at rest!" The army halts, the pursuit is discontinued, the battle is ended.

* עָרַץ, not azuvia, "spoil" [so margin of Eng. A. V. and Bib.-Com.—Tr.], from עָרַץ, "to strip off," since then the suffix would be meaningless, but Armor from עָרַץ, "to gird" (from עָרַץ, "loins"), Niph.: "to arm one's self for battle," Num. xxxii. 21, 27, 29 sq.; Josh. vi. 7 sq.; Isa. xv. 4; comp. with Jer. xlviii. 41.—Sept.: σάρεα τῶν ἀνδρῶν.

Vers. 29-32. The withdrawal of both armies from the scene of battle, and the loss on both sides.—Ver. 29. Abner and his men marched through the *Arabah (that is, the valley or plain of the Jordan) from the south northward, having marched from the battle-field first directly eastward towards Jericho. The distance from the entrance into the Jordan-plain (to reach which point, however (vers. 3, 4), cost them some hours) up to the point where they crossed the Jordan to go to Mahanaim, was so great that it took them at least the whole night to pass through the Arabah. They marched "the whole night," not from fear of pursuit (for the pursuit was discontinued and a truce concluded), but probably to avoid the heat of the day. After crossing the Jordan they traversed "all the Bithron." The word "all" forbids us to understand here a city—it is therefore not Bethoron (Aq., Vulg.), apart from the fact that this lay in the opposite direction north-west of Gibeon—but it must mean a district beyond the Jordan, probably a mountain-gorge or a plain on the Jabbok between the Jordan and Mahanaim, which lay on the Jabbok. These specific geographical statements also about Abner's return-march show the historical exactness and value of the narrative.—Ver. 30. At the same time Joab began his return-march "from after Abner (who was withdrawing)," as it is vividly described. Not till the whole force was assembled for the return was a muster held in order to learn the loss. Only nineteen men and Asahel were missing from David's army. [Among these nineteen some reckon the twelve that fell in the single combat.—Tr.]—Ver. 31. The Benjaminite loss, on the other hand, was much greater, "360 men dead," as might easily be determined by counting the slain. Joab had in his army only veteran "servants of David," tried by many severe battles and privations, while Abner led into the battle the remains of the army that was beaten by the Philistines at Gilboa, who moreover in previous battles with that people "might have been still more weakened and discouraged" (Keil). The disproportion in the losses "may, however, have been due also in part to the character of the ground," comp. ver. 25 (Then.). [On the apparently corrupt text of this verse see "Text and Grammar."—Tr.]—Ver. 31. Asahel is buried on the march back in the burial-place of his father at Bethlehem, which lay only a little to the left of the direct road to Hebron. "They went the whole night thence," and came at break of day to Hebron. Gibeon is distant from Hebron about 26 miles; they might therefore have gone from Gibeon to Hebron in one night, even if they stopped on the way to bury Asahel, which need not have taken much time (against Then.). [However, the text says only that they went all night from Bethlehem to Hebron, fifteen miles. They had previously marched from near Gibeon to Bethlehem, after having attended to the duties incident to the close of a battle.—Tr.]

Chap. iii. 1-6. Further general and summary account of the long duration of the conflict between the houses of David and Saul and their different fortunes.—Ver. 1. And the war was protracted between the house of Saul and the house of David.—The former stands first because the attack came from it. From the account of the particular incident at Gibeon, where the contest assumed the form of open war, which was suddenly ended by the two generals, the narrator turns to the summary description of the condition in which the two houses from now on found themselves in respect to the contest, notwithstanding the discontinuance of external war. While this long-continued struggle lasted, outward hostilities were not renewed [at least there were no pitched battles—Tr.], Ishbosheth lacking courage and energy therefor, Abner, as his bearing (chap. ii.) towards Joab showed, having no special interest in continuing the bloody strife, and David, as before, so now holding back from attack, since, though he had power and courage to maintain his claims, he yet hoped to gain his promised royal authority over Israel, not by his own military power, but only by the interposition of the Lord. Further is related the fortune of the two houses during the long contest.* David grew stronger and stronger.†—David's advance in strength means, however, not the increase of his family (Keil), but of his adherents, of the number of those that recognized him as king over all Israel, and came forward as supporters of his authority over the whole country, as is fully and clearly narrated in 1 Chr. xii. 23 sq. On the other hand the house of Saul grew weaker and weaker in consideration and power. The reason of this was Ishbosheth's incapacity for royal rule and Abner's afterwards related defection from the house of Saul. During the time of struggle he was the only person that sought still to maintain this house (ver. 6), and it rapidly sank and disappeared when he went over to David. Ver. 1 and ver. 6 are therefore connected; ver. 1, according to this view, not only continues the preceding chapter (Then.), but at the same time begins a new section (vers. 1–6) which forms a transition to the narrative from ver. 7 on, in which is related how David's elevation to the throne of all Israel was prepared by the sinking and disappearance of the house of Saul under his last son.—The statement (vers. 2–5) concerning David's family during his residence in Hebron, and the sons there born to him certainly interrupts the progress of the narrative (Then.); for it is not to be connected with ver. 1 as being a factual proof of the strengthening of David's house (Keil). But it is quite in place here, since it is in keeping with the habit [of the biblical writers] of inserting at the beginning or at a turning-point of the history of the reign of each king, information about his house and family. Comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 49–51; 2 Sam. v. 13 sq.; 1 Ki. iii. 1; xiv. 21; xv. 2, 9. The same list of the sons born in Hebron, with the names of their mothers, is found in 1 Chr. iii. 1–3. The two first are the sons of the two wives Ahinoam and Abigail (1 Sam. xxv. 42 sq.), whom he brought with him to Hebron. On Amnon see chap. xiii. The Prep. "to" (so the Heb. ל) in these cases, where a corresponding noun is to be supplied, expresses immediate belonging [property], as "a song of (ל) David;" so here "son to (or of, Germ. von) Ahinoam," comp. Ewald, § 292 a.—Ver. 3. The second son is called Chileab, in Chron. Daniel; he had perhaps two names (Keil). [The name Chileab is suspected by Wellhausen to be a collateral form of Caleb (see the two in the Heb.), while Bib. Comm. thinks it a copyist's erroneous transcription of the first letters of the following word. The Midrash derives it from כלה אב = "exactly his father," the name indicating his likeness to David against those who said that he was the son of Nabal. Similarly the name Daniel, "God has judged me," is said to refer to God's judgment on Nabal. These are all conjectures, and the relation of the two names is involved in obscurity.—Tr.] The third, Abshalom (called in 1 Ki. xv. 2 Abishalom), son of Maachah, daughter of king Talmi of Geshur. This was a small independent kingdom in Syria. See xv. 8, comp. ii. 9. Perhaps this marriage of David with a foreign un-Israelitish princess had a political ground. Comp. 1 Ki. iii. 1, Solomon's marriage with a daughter of Pharaoh. The origin of the three wives, Haggith, Abital, and Eglah, whose sons were Adonyah, Shephatiah, and Ithream, is not given. The last is strangely described in an especial way as "David's wife." Bertheau

* [On the Arabah (which is in general the deep gorge of the Jordan, extending from the sea of Kinnereth (Gennesaret) to the Gulf of Akabah), see Smith's Bible Dict. s. v. and Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, 481.—Tr.]

* וַיִּשְׁׁרַח with Vb. or Adj. (1 Sam. ii. 26) indicating progressive increase. Ges. §131, 3, Rem. 3.

† וַיִּשְׁׁרַח is not—וַיִּשְׁׁרַח "strong" (Böttcher on Ex. xix. 19), but Partep. or Verbal Adj.—"strengthening" (new-ter), as וַיִּשְׁׁרַח (1 Sam. ii. 26).

(on 1 Chr. iii. 3) holds that the unknown and undescribed Eglah is so called for the sake of a fuller conclusion; but Thenius justly remarks against this reason that Haggith and Abital also are otherwise wholly unknown. Thenius' suggestion that Michal originally stood in the text is opposed by the fact that with the exception of the Cod. Vat., which has Aigal, the correctness of the text-reading is supported by all the witnesses. Probably this in itself superfluous addition is made in order to give a fuller conclusion by this epithet which suits each of the six women (Berth., Keil). [On this reading see "Text. and Gramm.—Tr."]—Ver. 6 resumes ver. 1 in relation to the continuance of the conflict between the two houses, and the statement: Abner showed himself strong (= a strong support) for the house of Saul, concludes the period during which the house of Saul was able through Abner to maintain itself against the house of David. In contrast therewith follows now the narrative of the events which, in consequence of Abner's ceasing to work for it, through Ishbosheth's unwise conduct, farther and farther depressed the house of Saul; comp. ver. 1 b. So vers. 1–6 form the bridge to the following history (from ver. 7 on).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David's personality, bearing and doing after Saul's death, and the consequent turn of his life towards the fulfilment of his call to the theocratic kingdom, show in all points, as here detailed in the prophetic narrative, absolutely free, trustful and humble dependence on the will of God, as it has up to this time shown itself as the foundation of David's life-development, and a determination of conduct solely by the carefully sought, distinctly apprehended and clearly recognized divine decision, as it had before been obtained by him at many important and difficult moments (1 Sam. xix. 19; xxii. 5; xxiii. 2, 4, 10, 16; xxx. 8). That this was accomplished here also through the Urim and Thummim is not doubtful; for the high-priest with the ephod was with him, while nothing is said of a prophet in his retinue, apart from the fact that the expression "he inquired of the Lord" cannot be applied to a prophet; it cannot, therefore, be supposed that David received a declaration from a prophet.

2. David's pathway from Ziklag to Hebron, till he gained the crown of Judah, and thence passed to that of Israel, is the way of the Lord. For 1) he asks concerning the will of the Lord, which way he shall go (ver. 1), humbly subjecting his will to that of the Lord, in his heart relying firmly on the Lord's decision, which could be only for his good, and seeking by repetition of his question to obtain a clear and secure knowledge of the way he is to go. 2) He goes the way appointed him by the Lord (vers. 2, 3) in unconditional obedience towards His command, in the faithful discharge of his duties towards all about him, who had hitherto shared all sufferings with him, and in joyous reliance on the further help of the Lord. 3) He finds in this way appointed by the Lord after the cross the crown, and mounts up from lowliness to glory (ver. 4). 4) He pauses on this way, which has led him to royal honor, in order quietly to wait in patience till the Lord direct him to go forward to the final goal, the kingdom over all Israel, and in order to unfold the noble royal virtues in which he proves himself the Anointed of the Lord (vers. 5-7). 5) He advances on the same way according to the Lord's direction to ward off the attack of the adversary (vers. 8-13), to bloody war, into which he is drawn against his will (vers. 14-23), to splendid victory over his opponents (vers. 25-32), and to the attainment of increasing power and glory in respect to the sinking house of Saul.

3. Grace (חֶסֶד) and Truth (אֱמֻנָה) are the fundamental attributes of God, which set forth His relation to the people of Israel as the covenant-people; grace is the special exhibition of His love, by which He 1) chooses the people, 2) establishes the covenant with them, and 3) in this covenant-relation imparts favor and salvation; truth is God's love unchangeable and continuing over against the people's sin, love that 1) does not suffer the choice of free grace to fall, 2) maintains the covenant, and 3) fulfils uncurtailed the promises that correspond to the covenant-relation. Comp. Ex. xxxiv. 6; Ps. xxv. 10.

4. Every human work well-pleasing to God, wrought out of genuine love and truth, is a reflection of God's love and truth, of which the heart has had experience, an offering brought to the Lord, the impulsion to which has come from this inwardly experienced love and truth, an object of God's love and truth which repays with blessing and salvation, and of men's honoring recognition in respect to its ethical value.

5. Invocation of the Lord's blessing (ver. 5) presupposes the presence of the conditions under which alone this blessing can subsist.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. Faith's inquiry of the Lord. 1) Whereon it is founded; a) Upon an entire looking away from human prudence and wisdom; b) Upon unconditional trust in the divine love and faithfulness, and c) Upon previous experiences of His gracious help. 2) What sort of answer it finds; a) A certain decision, which puts an end to all doubt; b) A definite direction which way to go; c) A safe security that this way leads to the goal.

Vers. 1-4 a. From Ziklag to Hebron—the way of humility from the depths to the heights. 1) After humble subjection to sore trials, which the Lord had imposed ("after this," ver. 1). 2) After humble inquiry of the Lord's will as to the way he must further go. 3) In humble submission to be directed and guided by the Lord in the way appointed for him. 4) In humble and patient expectation of the fulfilment of His promises.

The way of faith through cross to crown. 1) How it is surely found (ver. 11), a) inquired for of the Lord; b) pointed out by the Lord. 2) How it is confidently pursued, a) under the guidance of the Lord's hand; b) in communion with those united in the Lord (vers. 2, 3). 3) How it is joyfully completed, a) at the goal set up by the Lord; b) under the direction of faithful human love, the instrument of the Lord's love (ver. 4).

Vers. 4 b-7. Faithful love to our neighbor in time of need. 1) How it is in a noble and unselfish manner shown and attested amid the misfortune of our neighbor (ver. 4 b). 2) How it is blessed by God in the manifestation of His grace and the at-testation of His faithfulness (vers. 5, 6). 3) How it is honored by men through thankful recognition and righteous requital (ver. 6). 4) How it is exalted in itself to a stout heart and to great joy (ver. 7).

[Ver. 6. "And now the Lord do kindness (grace) and truth unto you." See points for the homiletical discussion of this text in "Hist. and Theol." No. 3.—Vers. 1-13. See outline of a sermon in "Hist. and Theol." No. 2.—Tr.]

Vers. 8-32. God's judgment in war: I. How the divine decision falls: 1) Against him who has begun the war unrighteously, a) to fight out a pretended right; b) to extend an assumed power and dominion; c) in conscious resistance to God's right and command. 2) For him who has been innocently drawn into it, a) to repel injustice; b) to defend His righteous cause; c) to uphold God's command and righteousness. II. How men should submit to this divine decision: 1) The conquered have to bow in humility under God's hand, and to abandon the war, a) in order to avoid further bloodshed; b) to ward off further mischief; c) to preserve the people from spiritually and morally running wild. 2) The conquerors must, a) in the course of victory and honor stop immediately with self-denial when the Lord commands it; b) give the conquered the hand of peace when they ask a cessation of hostilities on the ground of the divine decision which has been reached, and c) testify to the readiness for peace which they have felt, and against the unrighteousness which has constrained them to the conflict.

Chap. iii. 1-6. By justice divine are decided all conflicts that men have divided. 1) What comes from God, alone can last; 2) What stands against God, soon is past.*

Ver. 1. CRAMER: When the righteous are oppressed and have stood the test, God leads them by a right way that they may go to a city of habitation, Ps. cvii. 7; so let us wait patiently for the right time, Heb. ii. 3; Ps. lv. 22. OSIANDER: A Christian should never undertake anything without good forethought and effort to learn God's will from His word, and should often seek to strengthen his faith therefrom, Ps. cxix. 106.

—BERL. B.: David rests not in all the illuminations and promises he has before received, but only in the will of God, and looks to the divine nod and glance, the truest and only guide for tranquilly trusting souls. Thereby the soul remains free in all things from selfishness and vain joy.

[HENRY: He doubted not of success, yet he uses proper means, both divine and human. Assurance of hope in God's promise will be so far from slackening, that it will quicken pious endeavors.—Tr.].—Ver. 3. CRAMER: Faithful friends, proven in time of need, are a great treasure. STARK: When God gives us prosperity, we should cause this also to be shared by those who have shared with us in distress. [HALL: Thus doth our heavenly leader, whom David prefigured, take us to reign with Him who have suffered with Him.—Tr.].—Ver. 4. OSIANDER: The hearts of subjects are in God's hand, and God can incline them so that they must love their rulers. What God has promised is sure to come at last. After enduring sufferings thou shalt receive the crown of life, 2 Tim. iv. 8.—S. SCHMID: Praiseworthy deeds always get their praise and their reward even among men, although they are not performed to that end, but from love to righteousness.—Ver. 6. CRAMER: By gentleness and friendliness rulers may easily win the hearts of their subjects, and also quiet much contention, Judg. viii. 2.—Ver. 7. J. LANGE: Kings derive their kingly majesty immediately from God, but also mediately from their subjects.—F. W. KRUMMACHE: People gained here the conviction that this man, unmoved by the lower affections of revenge and malice, knew how to forgive and to forget, and that all the wrong and injustice he had experienced had not been able to darken for him in his predecessor the dignity and sacredness of an Anointed of the Lord. Besides, this conduct of David's made on the people the decided impression that they might expect of him a humane rule, since he would reckon even the most trifling and insignificant praiseworthy thing that might happen anywhere in the land to be worthy of grateful recognition and consideration.

Vers. 8, 9. CRAMER: The whole life of pious men is and remains a continual school of the cross. In them holds good the saying: Must not man be always in strife on earth? Job vii. 1. [So LUTHER. Similarly CONANT: Has not man a term of warfare on the earth?—TR.]—S. SCHMID: Carnal prudence and pride is never willing to submit itself to God's will, but will always oppose itself, Exod. v. 2.—Ver. 10. SCHLIER: He wore the crown that had been promised him, but the cross also did not yet cease for him. Still he must persevere and wait till the whole kingdom fell to him, still he must now also bear patiently whatever new burden was allotted to him.—BERL B.: When he came into possession of his kingdom, even yet he remained quiet awhile, without considering how he might increase it, because he cast all this care upon Divine Providence. He thus shames the behaviour of those spiritual men, who when they recognize that God wishes to do something through them, are constantly making attempts and all sorts of beginnings to see whether they may perhaps achieve the work, and are never willing in patience and self-forgetfulness to wait on God, until God Himself performs His will. The hour must come itself, and so it must simply be waited for.

Ver. 12. STARKE: A Christian must not let his courage sink because when he has gained a victory in a good cause, unexpectedly new obstacles and hindrances are found.—SCHLIER: When a king takes the sword in an ambitious spirit, and wishes only to subjugate other peoples in order to extend his dominion, that is an unrighteous war, and woe to all the princes who in base ambition set at stake the blood of their people!—A bad prince, who wilfully conjures up war upon his land. But also shame upon the prince who would not help his people when wrong is done them. A righteous war is a royal duty, from which no prince can venture to withdraw, even if it were fraternal war! It may have come hard enough to David to take up arms against his brothers, and yet he could not do otherwise. God the Lord had Himself given the arms into his hand.—Vers. 13–32. CRAMER: Bloodthirsty warriors count men's blood as water, and have their pastime in it, but to God that is an abomination. SCHLIER: In such times there is only one consolation, namely, that the Lord sits as ruler, and that we should accept the war, if there is one, from the hand of the supreme Lord of war, that we should not regard what princes and kings of the earth do and design, but see in war the chastening rod of divine wrath, which visits the sins of the peoples even through the horrors of war.—Vers. 18, 19. CRAMER: Let no one rely on the powers of his body, for the race is not to the swift, Eccl. ix. 11.—Ver. 23. LANGE: Bravery is certainly very far different from foolhardy temerity. [HALL: Many a one miscarries in the rash prosecution of a good quarrel, when the abettors of the worst part go away with victory. Heat of zeal, sometimes in the indiscreet pursuit of a just adversary, proves mortal to the agent, prejudicial to the service. HENRY: See here (1) How often death comes upon us by ways that we least suspect. Who would fear the hand of a flying enemy, or the butt end of a spear? (2) How we are often betrayed by the accomplishments we are proud of. Asahel's swiftness, which he presumed so much upon, did him no kindness, but forwarded his fate.—TR.]

Ver. 24 sq. SCHLIER: The bloodshed was at an end, the horrors of fraternal war were over, the victory had been won by David, who had begun the war in the name of the Lord, and now from the Lord had also received the victory. For of this we should be certain: victory comes from the Lord. As surely as the Lord our God is no dead but a living God—as surely as He sits in government and orders everything as the Almighty God, so surely must it also be true that victory comes from the Lord, Ps. xx. 8.—Vers. 24–26. CRAMER: A wretched wisdom when one grows prudent only with losses. Therefore in the beginning think of the end. [HENRY: See here (1) How easy it is for men to use reason when it makes for them, who would not use it if it made against them! (2) How the issue of things alters men's minds! The same things which looked pleasant in the morning, at night looked dismal.—TR.]—Ver. 27. It is an honor to a man to stay out of contention; but they who love it are altogether fools, Prov. xx. 3.—Ver. 28. STARKE: Even he who has been injured by another should show himself ready to be reconciled to the other if he desires forgiveness, Matt. v. 5.—Vers. 30, 31. CRAMER: Prosperity should be used reverently and with moderation, lest we fly too high.—God punishes in war the sins of both parties.—Ch. iii. 1 sq. ROOS: What is not devised, done, collected and set up in God's name, has no permanence. God in His holy wrath is the fire that consumes such a thing, however specious it seems; on the contrary, what He wills and approves, is through His good pleasure obtained, advanced and made strong.

[Ver. 11. David at Hebron: 1) His choosing the place by divine direction (ver. 1). And we can see that it was a fit place. The city of Abraham, Caleb and the Levites—a city of refuge—the principal town in David's tribe, and somewhat remote from Saul's tribe—and David had taken pains to conciliate its inhabitants (1 Sam. xxx. 31). Divine directions are seen to coincide with true human wisdom, wherever we sufficiently understand the facts. 2) His "apprenticeship to monarchy." Through several previous years he had been in a course of providential preparation for reigning; and now he begins to reign on a small scale. He has occasion to learn a) from the apparent failure of wild schemes (ver. 5 sqq.), b) from open hostility, long continued (ver. 12 sqq.; iii. 1), c) from the base cruelty of his trusted commander (iii. 27). Amid all these he grew in popularity and strength (iii. 1, 36). The lessons he learned were especially, to be prudent (ver. 5 sqq.; iii. 28), and to be patient (ver. 11; iii. 1). 3) His founding a family, (iii. 2-5). a) To have sons born to him is the joy of any man, especially of a monarch. b) But here polygamy was already paving the way to sore family dissension. c) And three of these sons born at Hebron, Amnon, Absalom, Adonijah, were destined to bring wretchedness and shame on their father and his house, and ruin on themselves. O the mingled hopes and fears with which a father must look on his little children!—Tr.]

[A Sunday school address. Vers. 18-23. The rash young prince. 1) He had a shining gift, ver. 18. (In ancient warfare, more were often slain in the pursuit than the battle; and so swiftness of foot was important to a warrior). 2) He was ambitious—pursuing the distinguished general of the enemy. 3) He had decision and perseverance—turning not to the right or left, and yielding to persuasion. 4) He fancied himself superior to an old man—a common and natural, but grave fault in the young. (The old man at length killed him with ease, in mere self-defense). 5) He was slain as the penalty of self-confidence and rashness—besetting sins of many gifted youth.—Tr.]

III. Abner's quarrel with Ishbosheth, defection from the House of Saul and transition to David.

CHAPTER III. 7-21.

- 7 AND Saul had a concubine whose name was Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah, and Ishbosheth¹ said to Abner, Wherefore hast thou gone into unto my father's concubine?²
8 Then was Abner [And Abner was] very wroth for the words of Ishbosheth, and said, Am I a dog's head which against Judah³ [a dog's head on Judah's side?] [ins. I] do show kindness this day [to-day] unto the house of Saul thy father, to his brethren and to his friends, and have not delivered thee into the hand of David, that 9 [and] thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this [the] woman? [!] So do God to Abner and more also except, as the Lord [Jehovah] hath sworn to David, even so I do to him, To translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel and over Judah, from Dan even to Beersheba.
10 And he could not answer Abner a word again, because he feared him.
11 And Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf [or in his stead⁴], saying, Whose is the land?⁵ saying also [om. also], Make thy league [covenant] with me,

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² [Ver. 7. In וַיִּשְׁלַח the quiescent Jod instead of dagh. forte (as is frequent in Chald.). The origin of the word is unknown; comp. Chald. פְּלִינִים "vigorous beast," perhaps "one that has reached years of puberty," (Levy); but comp. Arab. falhas and ufud.—Tr.]

and behold, my hand shall be with thee to bring about [to turn] all Israel unto thee. And he⁶ said, Well; I will make a league [covenant] with thee; but one thing I require of thee, that is, Thou shalt not see my face except⁷ thou first⁸ [om. first] bring Michal, Saul's daughter, when thou comest to see my face. And David sent messengers to Ishbosheth, Saul's son, saying, Deliver [Give] me⁹ my wife Michal, which [whom] I espoused to me for an hundred foreskins of the Philistines. And Ishbosheth sent and took her from her husband, even from Phaltiel the son of Laish.⁹ And her husband went with her along weeping behind her to Bahurim. Then said Abner [And Abner said] unto him, Go, return. And he returned. And Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, Ye sought for David in times past¹⁰ to be king over you; Now, then, do it; for the Lord [Jehovah] hath spoken of¹¹ David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will¹² save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines and out of the hand of all their enemies. And Abner also¹³ spake in the ears of Benjamin; and Abner went also¹³ to speak in the ears of David in Hebron all that seemed good to Israel and that seemed good [om. that seemed good] to the whole house of Benjamin. So [And] Abner came to¹⁴ David to Hebron and twenty men with him. And David made Abner and the men that were with him a feast. And Abner said unto David, I will arise and go, and will gather all Israel unto my lord the king, that they¹⁵ may make a league [covenant] with thee, and that thou mayest reign over all that thine heart desireth. And David sent Abner away, and he went in peace.

IV. Murder of Abner by Joab. Vers. 22—39.

22 And behold the servants of David and Joab came from pursuing a troop [came from an expedition¹⁶], and brought in a great spoil with them. But [And] Abner was not with David in Hebron, for he had sent him away and he was gone in peace. 23 When Joab and all the host that was with him were come, they told Joab, saying, Abner the son of Ner came to the king, and he hath sent him away, and he is gone 24 in peace. Then Joab came to the king and said, What hast thou done? behold, Abner came unto thee; why is it that thou hast sent him away, and he is quite [om.

in which θαλάμ seems to be corrupted out of תחתו למ. על פי is for על פיך, while παράχρημα is translation of תחתו. It appears that the question and the second לאמר were not understood; Chald.: saying, I swear to him who made the land, saying—Syr.: what is the land?—The best course seems to be to omit the second לאמר, and seek a meaning in the question.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 13. Some VSS. and MSS. have "David," which is merely the expression of the obvious subject.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 15. Such is the form in the Qeri or margin; the Kethib or text has Lush, which perhaps means the same thing "lion." Apparently by inversion the Sept. writes the name Selle.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 17. Literally, "both yesterday and the day before."—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 18. אל—so Sept., Syr., Arab., Kell, Cahen; but Vulg., Philippeon, Erdmann "to David." Thenius would read על "concerning" (as the context requires) on the ground that אל cannot so be rendered; but see Jer. xxii. 18.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 18. The text has the Inf., which after אמר some would render "Jehovah said to save" — "said that He would save," but this is hard on account of the intervening לאמר. and the Impf. is now generally read with many MSS. and printed EDD., and all the Ancient VSS.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 19. The ואל "also" qualifies not the succeeding word "Abner," but the preceding "spoke," "went" (Wellh.).—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 20. The Heb. has no Prep. here, employing the Acc. of the point reached; but some MSS. and EDD. insert ב, and so all VSS. except Chald., which has ל.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 21. The Sept. has the first person, "I will make a covenant with him," which is against the syntax of the context.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 22. Lit. "from the troop (or predatory band)," so the VSS. except Aquila, who has "Geddur" (גדר) which he renders μοροδύου or εὐδύου. The Heb. expression is somewhat hard and obscure, but may have been a technical one.—The Heb. Perfects are here from the connection properly rendered by Eng. Plupa. "had sent," "was gone."—Ta.]

- 25 quite¹⁷] gone? Thou knowest Abner the son of Ner¹⁸ that he came to deceive thee, and to know thy going out and thy coming in, and to know all that thou doest.
- 26 And when [om. when] Joab was come out [went out] from David he [and] sent messengers after Abner, which [who] brought him again from the well of Sirah; but David knew it not.
- 27 And when Abner was returned to Hebron, Joab took him aside in [to the middle of] the gate to speak with him quietly, and smote him there under the fifth rīb
- 28 [in¹⁹ the abdomen] that he died, for the blood of Asahel his brother. And afterward when David heard it [when David afterward heard it], he said, I and my kingdom are guiltless before the Lord [Jehovah] for ever from the blood of Abner the son
- 29 of Ner; Let it rest [be hurled] on the head of Joab and on all his father's house, and let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a staff [crutch²⁰], or that falleth on [by] the sword, or that
- 30 lacketh bread. So²¹ Joab and Abishai his brother slew Abner because he had slain their brother Asahel at Gibeon in the battle.
- 31 And David said to Joab and to all the people that were with him, Rend your clothes and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner. And king David
- 32 himself [om. himself] followed the bier. And they buried Abner in Hebron; and the king lifted up his voice and wept at the grave of Abner, and all the people
- 33 wept. And the king lamented over Abner and said,

Died Abner [Must Abner die] as a fool²² [or villain] dieth?

- 34 Thy hands were not bound
Nor thy feet put into fetters.
As a man falleth before wicked men
So fellest thou.

- 35 And all the people wept again over him. And when [om. when] all the people came to cause David to eat ²³ meat [bread] while it was yet day [ins. and] David sware, saying, So do God to me and more also, if I taste bread or aught else till the
- 36 sun be down. And all the people took notice of it, and it pleased them; as²⁴ what-
- 37 soever the king did pleased all the people. For [And] all the people and all Israel
- 38 understood that day that it was not of the king to slay Abner the son of Ner. And the king said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man
- 39 fallen this day in Israel? And I am this day weak, though anointed king, and these men the sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me; the Lord [Jehovah] shall [om. shall] reward the doer of evil [wickedness] according to his wickedness.

¹⁷ [Ver. 24. The Inf. Abs., the force of which cannot be exactly given in English. Perhaps the Sept. "in peace" here was designed as a rendering of this Inf. though it is not improbable that it is merely a repetition from the two preceding verses; it is therefore not to be inserted in the Heb. text (against Wellh.).—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 25. The phrase "the son of Ner" is omitted by Syr. and Ar., and its points are omitted in one MS. (224 Kenn.)—why, is not clear.—The Sept. rendering: "dost thou not know the wickedness of Abner?" is a weakening of the original; the Syr. also has the neg-interrog. form, and renders very well "that he came to flatter thee."—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 27. The Prep. is omitted in the text, but some MSS. insert לְ, and so the VSS., according to the Heb. usage.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 29. Böttcher and Erdmann (with Vulg. and Syr.) render: "one that holds a distaff," that is, an effeminate man (Prov. xxxi. 19). See the Exposition.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 30. Erdmann renders: "but Joab and Abishai had slain Abner," as if the purpose of the verse were to give the reason for the murder. Wellhausen holds the verse to be an interpolation on the ground that it adds nothing except the inclusion of Abishai in the guilt in order to justify David's curse on Joab's family. It seems better, however, to regard the verse not merely as giving the reason for the murder (which is given in verse 27), nor as superfluous, but as a concluding summing up of the incident, as is so common in Heb. narration.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 33. Sept.: "Will Abner die according to the death of Nabal?" taking נָבָל (fool) as a proper name. So in ver. 34 it has οὐ πορεύσας ἐν Νάβαλ, misunderstanding the נָבָל of the Heb., which it read נָבָל.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 35. De Rossi cites a reading in some MSS. לְהַכְרִית "to make a feast" (2 Kings vi. 25), which Kimchi said was written but not read, perhaps a clerical error.—Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 36. וְ. Wellhausen objects that this וְ cannot be rendered as a conjunction (as in Eng. A. V.), and therefore prefers the Sept., which omits the וְ. Syr. accords with Sept., and Chald. and Syr. insert "and" before וְ. The reading of Greek and Syr. ("and good in their eyes was all that the king did, and good in the eyes of all the people"), however, contains a weak repetition, and something like the Heb. text is required by the connection.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

III. Ch. iii. 7-21. Abner quarrels with Ishbosheth, and goes over to David.—Vers. 7, 8. The falling out. Its occasion was Abner's taking Saul's concubine, Rizpah,* the daughter of Aiah. The Harem was part of the property of the reigning house, and therefore fell to the successor, comp. xii. 8. Taking possession of it was a political act, and signified actual entrance on royal rights, comp. xvi. 21, and of this act Abner was guilty. Supply from the connection Ishbosheth (comp. my father and ver. 8) as subject of the verb said. His question: "Why," etc., might be taken as the expression of suspicion that Abner was thus seeking the throne, for in the ancient Orient claim to the harem was claim to the throne, so especially with the Persian, comp. Herod. 3, 68; Justin. 10, 2. But, if Ishbosheth really had such a suspicion, Abner's conduct gives no ground for such a view; his act seems rather the outflow of passionate self-will and presumptuous contempt towards Ishbosheth. If he had really wished to seize the throne of Israel for himself, his conduct towards David (ver. 9 sq.) would be inexplicable. His answer in ver. 8 shows how loose his relation to Ishbosheth and concern for his cause already was. "Dog's head," as in our language also, is the expression for something perfectly despicable. The words: "which is to Judah" omitted by Sept., are not to be connected with the preceding (Clericus: thinkest thou that I am worth no more to the Tribe of Judah than a dog's head? Syr.: Am I the head of the dogs of Judah? Ewald: Am I then a Judahite dog's head?—such an adjectival periphrasis would be very strange)—nor in sense to be connected with the following (Vulg.: who against Judah to-day show kindness; De Wette: who in respect to Judah now show kindness), but to be rendered simply as they stand: "who is for Judah, pertains to, holds with Judah" (Buns.). Abner is angered by the insult he thinks shown him by Ishbosheth's reproachful question. The sense of his reply is: that Ishbosheth treats him as a despicable man, who takes no interest in him, as one who belongs to his opponents, the party of the Tribe of Judah, whereas he 1) is showing only kindness to the whole house of Saul, and 2) especially has not delivered him, Ishbosheth, into the hand of David. By adducing these his services to the royal house Abner repels the reproach based on his appropriation of the concubine.† His words express the extreme contempt towards his king, and the strongest consciousness of services, to which the house of Saul and Ishbosheth owed everything. The "to-day" is significant; even "now" he occupies this position towards Saul's house; comp. the "made himself strong, was a strong helper" in ver. 6. The contrast to this comes out sharply in what follows. There follows—

Vers. 9-11, the sudden complete breach with the house of Saul and the solemn oath in respect to the house of David. This is the culmination of what is said in ver. 1 of David's advance in strength over against the house of Saul. (On the simple 'פ in oaths see on ii. 27; 1 Sam. iii. 17.) The history does not show a formal divine oath, such as Abner here refers to. But the divine choice of David to be king, his anointment performed by Samuel at the divine command (1 Sam. xv. 28, 29; xvi. 1-12), and the therewith conjoined divine declaration which Samuel declares to be inviolable (1 Sam. xv. 29) because based on God's truthfulness (comp. Num. xxiii. 19)—all this had in fact the significance and weight of a divine oath. Abner's words presuppose that acquaintance with the promises given to David was, through the prophetic circles, widely extended. Abigail is an example of such acquaintance among the people (1 Sam. xxv. 28-31).—So will I do to him; Abner does not consider himself (as Cler. thinks) as the Lord's instrument for fulfilling his declaration to David, which he in fact was not. He merely says, that he will now make David king, as had been promised him by divine oath. The remark of Cler. that "military men do not sufficiently weigh what they say" does not apply here; for in Abner's words there is the distinct consciousness that over against the divine promise concerning David the cause of Saul and Ishbosheth is a lost one, but at the same time also the mortified ambition that thinks its services not sufficiently recognized, and the overweening pride of a vigorous and energetic man who thinks that he can of himself make history. In spite of his reference to a divine declaration, his conduct is anything but theocratic, is rather throughout autocratic, comp. ii. 8, 9: "he took Ishbosheth, and made him king." How far his previous energetic, autocratic activity for Saul's house was connected with ambitious, high-reaching plans for himself, is uncertain. In any case, however, so much is true: 1) that he knew David's divine call to be Saul's successor, and therefore stood in conscious opposition to the known will of God, and thus in conflict with himself, and 2) that it was only after his defeat in the battle with Joab (which he himself began, ii. 12 sq.) and his gradually confirmed recognition of the fact that Ishbosheth was wholly unfit for the kingly rule and its maintenance in the house of Saul, and in truth the personal insult now offered him by Ishbosheth—that he suddenly decided to break with the house of Saul and go over to David. How far ambition herein influenced him along with political insight, we cannot tell; but it is not probable that he showed so much energy in gaining over all Israel to David, as is afterwards related, without hope of a high and influential position with David.—With the words: "to translate the kingdom from Saul" comp. Samuel's word, 1 Sam. xv. 28.—From Dan to Beersheba, as in Judg. xx. 1; 1 Sam. iii. 20.—[Bib. Cbn. thinks it probable that Abner had before this begun to incline towards David, so that Ishbosheth had some ground for the taunt: "which belongeth to Judah," and this made it all the more stinging to Abner.—Tr.]—Ver. 11. And he (Ishbosheth) could not answer, because he feared him. This characterizes Ishbosheth sufficiently for the explanation of the whole situation. Having with an effort plucked up courage to ask that reproachful question, he here shows the greatest feebleness,

* [See xxi. 8-11 and Gen. xxxvi. 24.—Tr.]

cowardice and timidity towards Abner. This also contributes to the explanation of what is said in ver. 1 concerning the house of Saul.

Vers. 12-21. Abner's covenant with David.—Ver. 12. The threat against Ishbosheth is straightway carried out by sending an embassy to David. מוֹרֵחַ is not "in his place" (Vulg. pro se, Cler., De Wette, Keil [Eng. A. V.: "on his behalf"]), which would be superfluous and unmeaning (Buns.), but, in keeping with Abner's passionate excitement in ver. 9, "on the spot, immediately," παρὰρῆμα (Sept., Chald.), as in ii. 23, where Keil also adopts this meaning, though he here declares that there is no ground for it.—[On this whole passage see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—

The first "saying" (דָּבָר) can be taken here only in the usual sense as introduction of direct discourse, not as "to say" in reference to the messengers. And the second "saying" is also so to be taken, and not as "that is to say" (Buns., Then.), since it introduces another direct discourse of Abner: "Make a covenant," which cannot except by forcing be regarded as an explanation of the question: "to whom belongs the land?" rather the demand contained in it, as a consequence of the silent answer to this question, is, on account of its importance as the chief thing in the commission of the ambassadors, naturally appended by means of a repeated "saying." The saying: To whom belongs (or whose is) the land? does not relate to David, as if = "to whom does it belong but to thee?" This interpretation, that the land properly belonged to David by virtue of his anointment (Vat., S. Schmid, Ew. [Patrick, Bib. Com.]), would agree indeed with Abner's acknowledgment in ver. 9, but not with the following words: Make a covenant with me to turn all Israel to thee, which rather indicate that Abner means to say: "the land belongs to me" (Sanct., Thenius [Scott, Phillips]). This is quite in keeping with his proud, haughty nature, as hitherto manifested in his words and conduct, and also with the facts of the case, since in fact the whole land except Judah was still subject to Saul's house, that is, to him (Abner) as Dictator. Because he still as influential ruler controlled the greatest part of the land, he could 1) demand of David, as one standing on the same plane with him, to make a covenant with him, and 2) give him the promise (the product not only of strong self-consciousness, but also of extensive power): "my hand is with thee to turn all Israel to thee." Obviously there is here not merely implicitly involved as answer to the above question, the declaration: "the land is his whom I, the leader of the army, shall favor" (Cler.), but also the expectation that, after the fulfillment of this promise, David would assign him the highest position in the army and in the nation next to himself. Abner's proud and haughty words hardly permit us to doubt that he was filled with such thoughts.—Ver. 13. David replies with a condition, namely, the restoration of his wife Michal.*

* הַכִּיָּאָה (as elsewhere after לָפָנַי) like the Perf., instead of the usual הַכִּיָּאָה (Ex. xxiii. 30; Lev. xxiii. 14 sq.; Deut. iv. 28). לָפָנַי here = "before." Ew., § 238 d, § 337 c.

Thou shalt not see my face before (= except) thou bring Michal, etc.—Certainly we should have the opposite of David's meaning (Then.) if we rendered: "Thou shalt not see my face except before thou bring Michal." But, if we retain the text (לִפְנֵי), this explanation is unnecessary, rather it quite answers to the original signification of the word to render literally: "except in the face of thy bringing Michal . . . in thy coming to see my face," that is, thou shalt not see my face except by at the same time bringing me Michal when thou comest to see my face; thy coming to me to see my face shall not occur except in the presence of this fact, namely, that thou (= unless, before thou) bring Michal. It is therefore unnecessary either to omit the Prep.

(לִפְנֵי) after the Sept., and change the following Inf. into a Perf., = "unless thou bring" (Then.), or to omit the "but" (DM 'פ) = "thou shalt not see my face before thy bringing (= before thou bring)" (Böttcher).—Ver. 14 presupposes the acceptance of this condition by Abner. In realization of what Abner had threatened him with, Ishbosheth finds himself compelled to fulfil David's condition himself, and that immediately by Abner's own hand, to whom was assigned the duty of bringing, and who really did bring Michal to David (vers. 15, 16). To this end David sends a formal embassy to Ishbosheth, in order legally to demand and receive Michal back, she having been illegally taken by Saul and given to another man (1 Sam. xxv. 44). Seb. Schmid: "that it might be manifest that he had acted legally towards Phaltiel before his king, and taken her back, not carried her off by force from a husband." Whom I espoused to me, that is, purchased as bride, married.—For a hundred forekins, comp. 1 Sam. xviii. 27, where two hundred is the number given. David thus justifies his claim that Michal lawfully belongs to him, since he had lawfully won her as his wife. Besides this right to Michal, which he was now for the first time in position successfully to assert, he was led to a reunion with her partly by love ("she loved him," 1 Sam. xviii. 27; xix. 11 sq.), partly by a political motive; as king he could not in the presence of the people leave Michal in a relation into which she had been forced against her will,* and he wished the people to see from his relation to Saul as son-in-law that he was free from hatred towards the latter.—Ver. 15. And Ishbosheth sent, that is, to Gallim, where Phaltiel, the present husband of Michal, dwelt, 1 Sam. xxv. 44, and sent Abner himself (ver. 16). Her husband cannot part with her without sorrow. [The Jewish tradition represents Phaltiel as the guardian merely, not the husband of Michal—a view that the text does not permit.—Tr.]—Ver. 16. A touching scene, briefly but vividly sketched. The faithful husband follows his wife weeping to Bahurim, where Abner, who therefore had himself brought Michal from Gallim, ordered him to return. Bahurim, the home of Shimei (xix. 17; 1 Kings ii. 8), a village near Jerusalem (Jos., Ant. 7, 9-7) north-east, on the road between the Mount of Olives and the Jordan

* [Whether she was divorced from David does not appear.—Tr.]

(Gilgal), not far from or in the plain of the Jordan (comp. xvi. 1, 5; xvii. 18).

Vers. 17-19. Abner's preparatory negotiations with the Elders of Israel and especially of Benjamin, and his report thereon to David.—Ver. 17. Before Abner carried out David's condition (the restoration of Michal), he had a conversation (הִתְחַוָּה אֲדָמִי) with the Elders of Israel, that is, the Northern Tribes with the exception of Benjamin.—Both yesterday and the day before (= in times past) ye desired [= sought] David to be your king—a striking testimony to the fact that outside of Judah also there had been a favorable sentiment towards David, against which Abner had energetically established and hitherto maintained Ishbosheth's authority. The existence of this favorable feeling towards David in the Northern Tribes is confirmed by 1 Chron. xii.—Ver. 18. Now, then, do it, that is, fulfil your desire, recognize him as your king. As reason for this demand Abner refers to a "word of Jehovah," which indeed in the form here given: I will save my people Israel, is never expressly mentioned as spoken "to David" (so the Vulg.); but it is to be regarded as the word applied in the prophetic tradition (which Abner, ver. 9, is well acquainted with) to David, with which Saul (1 Sam. ix. 16) received this divine commission, which in its completeness could only now be fulfilled by David.*—Ver. 19. The special elaborate and pressing negotiations with Benjamin were necessary not only because this tribe had enjoyed many advantages from the royal house of Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 7 (Then.), but in general because, though numerically the smallest tribe, it had hitherto had the honor of furnishing the reigning family; it was necessary to overcome the tribal ambition and the tribe-interest, to which Saul appealed, 1 Sam. xxii. The "also . . . also" (וְגַם וְגַם), which denotes mutualness (Ew., § 352 a), points out the close connection and relation between the negotiations carried on with Benjamin as the tribe most important for David, and the earnest conversation that Abner therefore had with David ("in the ears of David") at Hebron. He "went," namely, after these double negotiations, in order to bring Michal to David.—All that seemed good, that is, not their demands and conditions (De Wette, Then. Buns.), which does not accord with the context or lie in the words, but (since the negotiations referred to the recognition of David's divine right to the kingdom over all Israel, ver. 10) the willingness to recognize him as king, the recognition of his royal authority.—[Patrick observes that David so effectually attached the Benjaminites to him that, though they had been Saul's closest adherents, they became David's warm friends, and never afterwards left him. However, comp. 2 Sam. xx.—Tr.]—Ver. 20. The twenty men, who accompanied Abner to David and for whom he prepared a feast, appeared "as representatives of all Israel, in order by their presence to confirm Abner's overtures" (Keil).—[Patrick: The feast was not merely an entertainment, but of the nature of a league. Bib.-Com.: "It is remarkable that not a word should be said about the meeting of David and Michal."—Tr.]—Ver. 21. The same quickness with which Abner carried out his resolution to go over to David (ver. 12) fulfilled the required condition (ver. 16), pressed the preliminary negotiations (ver. 17 sq.) in order to inform David about them, he now shows in the further proceedings, that he may institute as soon as possible the solemn installation of David as king of Israel under formal conclusion of a covenant between king and people. The gradation in his following words: I will arise and will go and will assemble all Israel to my lord, is characteristic of the rapidity, excitedness and energy that we everywhere remark in Abner. He now for the first time calls David "his lord." He will "assemble the whole nation (i. e. in its elders and other representatives) to the solemn covenanting." This last was not to consist in the establishment of a constitution after the nature of a "constitutional monarchy" (Then.), which is wholly foreign to the theocratic kingdom, but the words: that they may make a covenant with thee mean: they are to vow to obey thee as the king given them by the Lord, thou promising to govern them as the theocratic king, through whom as His instrument the Lord Himself will rule over His people.—And that thou mayest be king over all that thy heart desireth, that is, not: "in a way or under conditions that thou canst accept" (Then.), but he is to rule as he desires; it does not, however, mean: "as thy soul desires" (Clericus), or "according to thy pleasure" (Dathe), because the conception of the theocratic rule excluded all arbitrariness from it, but "over all, according to which is the desire of thy soul," that is, according to the Lord's will and appointment, over the whole people and land. David had indicated the desire of his heart in his message to the Jabeshites. Abner was dismissed by David as his king who was in accord with his purpose. That he was now looked on by David and his adherents as thoroughly a friend, and received no harm from any body, is indicated by the concluding words: And he went in peace.

IV. Vers. 22-39. Murder of Abner by Joab and his solemn interment by David.—Ver. 22. Instead of the Sing. "came," referring to Joab as leader of the troop, Sept., Syr., Ar. render: "they came." "From the troop" came Joab with the servants of David, who had undertaken an expedition for booty. Whither, is not said, but probably outside the Israelitish territory near the tribe of Judah. In the incomplete organization of David's court, such expeditions were necessary for the support of the large army. "Abner was no longer with David;" probably he had purposely chosen the time when Joab, with the army, was absent, to carry out his plan. "He had gone in peace" is repeated from ver. 21 in contrast with the hostility afterwards shown him by Joab, when (ver. 23) on his return he learns that Abner had meantime been with David and had been dismissed in peace. [For the correction of the rendering of this verse in Eng. A. V. see "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.]—Ver. 24. Joab's reproach of David that he had sent Abner away—so that "he was now quite gone" (וְגַם הָיָה גָּזוּלָהּ Ew. § 280 b)—supposes that Abner had only come with evil and hostile purpose. [Joab, of course, was afraid that he would be superseded by Abner, if the latter entered David's service. He was younger and less renowned than Abner.—Tr.]—Ver. 25. Joab gives a reason for his charge of unwisdom against David in sending Abner away in peace: Thou knowest (or, as a question, knowest thou?) Abner, that In a quick, passionate speech, for the truth of which he appeals at the outset to David's knowledge of Abner's character (against Thenius' remark: "had David known what Joab here says, he would have acted differently"), he makes a threefold charge against Abner, with the intent of thereby branding him as spy and traitor. He declares that Abner came 1) to trick him out of his most secret thoughts. The verb (פָּתַח) means "to be open" (Ps. xx. 19), Piel "to make open, persuade, get one's secrets from him" (Judg. xiv. 15; xvi. 5); so here; 2) to learn David's outgoing and incoming, that is, all his present undertakings, his whole action and course of life (comp. Deut. xxviii. 6; Ps. cxxi. 8); 3) all that he will do, all his plans for the future.—Ver. 26. Without David's knowledge (whether expressly in David's name, falsely used by him, is not stated) he sends messengers and brings Abner back, making him believe, no doubt, that David had something further to say to him. The pit (or cistern) of Sirah, to which Abner had gotten when he was turned back, according to Jos. Ant. 7, 1, 5, distant twenty stadia [= nearly two and a half English miles] from Hebron, is now unknown; the name is perhaps to be derived from a verb (סָרַח) meaning "to turn in" (Thenius), and denotes an inn or caravanserai. [According to others, so-called as surrounded with thorns, Sirim, סִרְיָם (Philippson).—Tr.]—Ver. 27. [Bib. Comm.: Abner's conduct bespeaks his entire reliance on David's good faith.—Tr.] After Abner's return to Hebron, Joab met him in the gate of the city, and turned him "aside to the middle of the gate, in order to speak with him quietly." Clericus: "made him turn aside, took him apart" (the Hiphil פָּתַח is transitive as in Job xxiv. 4; Numb. xxii. 23). Joab could not speak with him in the way where people were going out and coming in. He had therefore to take him aside to the places in the gate-space, where, according to the oriental custom, men used to meet for private or public conversations and consultations. To the middle of the gate.—Joab drew Abner to the middle of the inner gate-space (which was no doubt roofed) between the places of exit and entrance, because it was not so light there, and one could better escape the notice of the passers-by, who, however, were probably not very numerous. Bunsen renders well: "made him turn aside (from the way) near the middle of the gate." For Joab wished, as he made Abner believe, to talk with him "in quiet, undisturbed, in private" (שָׁלוֹם). There he stabbed him in the abdomen (רָחֹקֶשׁ, comp. ii. 23) [not "under the fifth rib," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. For the blood of Asahel his brother see ii. 23; that is, to avenge or punish the death of his brother. According to this it was an act of revenge for bloodshed. But Abner had not wilfully slain Asahel, but in self-defence, when the latter pressed on him, ii. 22sq. But blood-vengeance was appointed only for intentional killing, and he was protected by law from it, who had killed a man unintentionally (Deut. iv. 41sq.; Josh. xx. 1-9). Joab's deed was a murder, like that which he afterwards committed on Amasa, xx. 11. He thereby cast false suspicion on David (comp. ver. 37), whose friendly relation to Abner he yet must have known, since David no doubt informed him in their conversation (vers. 24, 25) of Abner's true position. The avenging of blood was a mere pretext; the real ground of Joab's deed was envy and ambition, as Josephus already rightly holds. He feared that Abner would take a higher position in the new kingdom than himself—especially would cut him out of the rank of general-in-chief of the whole army. Grotius: "an equal and rival in military glory galled him."

Ver. 28sq. What David said of this crime. And when David afterwards heard of it.—The word "afterwards" (as the "David knew it not" in ver. 26) certifies that David had no share in Joab's deed. David 1) declares his innocence of this murder. He distinguishes between himself personally and "his kingdom," that is, his royal house, his "hereditary successors on the throne" (Thenius), who no more than himself could be visited with divine punishment therefor. Comp. 1 Ki. ii. 31-33. On the other hand, he affirms 2) that the righteous punishment of God in requital of this crime must fall both on the person and on the house (the posterity) of Joab. Let the blood of Abner turn, roll, plunge on the head.—This strong expression, instead of the ordinary "let it come," answers to the enormity of the crime and the energy of David's righteous anger. "And let there not fail," literally "not be cut off, separated, exterminated" (נָכַח), so that it no longer exist, comp. Josh. ix. 23. One that hath an issue (צִי), one that pines away miserably with seminal or mucous flow,—comp. Leviticus xv. 2sq., and a leper, see Leviticus xiii. 1-46, and one that holds the distaff.—The word (פָּתַח) means in Heb., Talm., Arab. only "distaff" never "staff" (Böttcher), comp. Prov. xxxi. 19. Usually indeed the phrase is rendered after the Sept. (καρπὸν σκυράλην) "one that holds a staff," that is, a cripple, lame, or blind (the last by Aquila). But against this it is to be said with Böttcher that, apart from the fact that the word cannot be shown to mean "staff," the phrase "one that holds a staff" does not necessarily denote a cripple, since the staff was held by "rulers and men of eminence" (Judg. v. 14; Gen. xxxviii. 18; Numb. xxi. 18), old men (Zech. viii. 4), travellers (Luke vi. 3), shepherds (1 Sam. xvii. 40; Mic. vii. 14), and where a cripple is described with a staff, the expression is quite different (Ex. xxi. 19). It is therefore better (with Böttcher) to take this as a contrast to the next described unfortunate strong warrior who "falls by the sword"—the weakly "spindle-holder, unfit for war." "The Greeks also had their 'Heracles with the distaff' as a type of unmanly feebleness, and for a warrior like Joab there could be no worse wish than that there might be a distaff-holder among his descendants" (Böttcher). So also Vulg., Schulz, Maurer (after Prov. xxxi.

19). [In spite of this forcible and striking argument of Böttcher (which is also adopted by Thenius) it seems better to take the signification "crutch," chiefly because the other terms of imprecation in this verse are all literal, and the term "distaff-holder" would be figurative. The rendering "crutch" or "staff" is adopted by Gesenius, Ewald, Philippon, Bible Commentary, and others, and may be given without violence to the Hebrew word, though in the one other passage in the Old Testament in which it occurs it means "distaff"—Tr.] And that lacks bread.—The indication of bitter poverty. These exclamations of David express no feeling of revenge (as indeed he undertakes no revenge or punishment against Joab and his house), but commit to the holy and righteous God the inevitable punishment of such a violation of the divine command. They are not "genuinely Jewish" (Thenius), but genuinely theocratic, as the expression of the clear, energetic consciousness of God's punitive justice which maintains the laws of the moral government of the world and the foundations of the kingdom of God, and which here he wishes may exhibit itself on Joab's house in a fourfold manner: in miserable, leuitically unclean sicknesses, in despicable weakness and crippling, in violent death, and in bitter poverty. As to Joab's violent end, comp. 1 Ki. ii. 28-34, especially vers. 31-33, and as respects the curse on his house, see Ex. xx. 5. [The ancient Jewish writers regarded this imprecation of David's as sinful. The text passes no opinion on it, but from the religious-theocratic point of view of the time, it would seem even necessary that the wrath of God should be specially and sharply invoked on so high-handed a crime, especially as David was not able to call the criminal to legal account.—Tr.] Ver. 30. Supplementary remark of the narrator, who 1) confirms the fact that the slaying of Asahel by Abner was the ground (pretext) for the murder of the latter just related, and 2) adds the important statement that Joab's act was not merely personal, but also a family-act: "Joab and Abishai slew Abner." Abishai's part in the affair is not related. Literally: "threw themselves on him," the verb being used with Dat. instead of Accus. Isaiah xxii. 13 (Böttcher, Then.).

Vers. 31-39. David's mourning for Abner. Ver. 31. David said to Joab (as him who by his murderous act was chiefly and terribly interested) and to all the people that were "with him" (those about him), not merely to the "courtiers" (Thenius): Rend your garments, etc.—He ordered a public mourning with all the usual ceremonies (rending garments, putting on sackcloth, that is, rough mourning garments of haircloth, and lamentations for the dead). We must distinguish two principal acts: 1) The mourning not over, for, in honor of (Ew.

‡ 217 l) Abner, but "before" him (‡ 217), in the presence of his corpse; 2) the burial, ver. 31 b sq.: And the king David followed the bier. The word "king" is put emphatically first to indicate the official character that he as king gave to these obsequies, in order to show his personal deep sorrow for the death of Abner which concerned the whole people, and to stifle at the outset any suspicion that he had a share in it. His "tears at the grave" showed the genuineness of his grief to the people who shared in his trouble and wept with him. His elegy (vers. 33, 34) is the expression of the deepest sorrow over Abner's innocent and shameful death. In reference to his guiltlessness he exclaims: Must Abner die as a worthless fellow dies?—as a nabal (נָבָל), a fool; where this term is used of immorality and crime, these, like denial of God and godlessness (Pa. xiv. 1), are regarded under the point of view of foolishness; nabal always denotes hollowness, emptiness, insipidity (see Moll [in Lange's Bible-Work] on Psalm xiv. 1), and signifies therefore somewhat more precisely "good-for-naught." [The sentence may be paraphrased: is this the fate that the noble Abner was to meet, to die like a worthless fool? alas that he found so inglorious a death.—Tr.] But he was murdered in shameful wise also: Thy hands were not bound and thy feet not put into fetters—with free hands, with which he might have defended himself; with free feet, with which he might have escaped from overpowering force; without suspecting evil, he was attacked and murdered as a defenceless man, who yet might have defended himself. (De Wette (against the מָלָךְ) wrongly renders: Thy hands were never bound, thy feet never put into fetters.) Only dishonorable, wicked men could so act. This lament of David increased the grief of the people, so that "they wept still more over Abner."—Ver. 35. David's grief is strongest and most enduring—he refrains entirely from food. Fasting often occurs as a sign of sorrow—see i. 12. All the people (that is, as many as were present) came to cause David to eat bread—that is, not to give him to eat (De Wette), as chap. xiii. 5 (an impossible conception in respect to "all the people"), but to demand of him to take food. Josephus: "his friends tried to force him to take nourishment." It was the custom for mourners to fast immediately after the death of their friends, whereupon their relatives and friends exerted themselves to comfort them, and persuaded them to strengthen themselves with food and drink, comp. xii. 16, 17, 20; Jer. xvi. Perhaps the people here acted in accordance with this custom; but their demand may also be referred to the mourning meal that followed the burial. But David refuses with an oath;* up to evening he will eat nothing. The expression of grief here reaches its culmination.—Ver. 36. The people took notice of it—namely, of his deep sorrow, and estimated this expression of his mourning as corresponding to the intensity of his grief. It pleased them, as† all that the king did pleased all the people.—Thus he was not only freed from suspicion of share in the murder of Abner (ver. 37), but won the love and confidence of the people.—Ver. 38. An echo of the elegy: Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?—Not: “great prince” (Thenius, after Sept., omitting the copula), since the distinction between the prince = “army-leader” and the great man is perfectly appropriate. Abner was a “prince” by his distinguished military ability, which (as this exclamation intimates) David might have employed for all Israel; he was a “great man” by reason of his lofty qualities of character and virtues, his power of action, his courage, the honorable self-conquest he exhibited in turning from his previous false course of opposition to David, the obedience that he yielded to the will of God, and the zealous desire he showed to serve by deeds the true king of Israel. On account of his natural noble endowments and these moral* qualities, Abner rightly seems to David to be a great man in Israel, not merely, therefore, in the incorrect sense in which the term has been applied to a Napoleon.—Ver. 39. The usual explanation: “but I am still weak . . . and these men are too strong for me;” that is, as a weak young king I feel unable to bring a man like Joab to justice; I must therefore confine myself to an imprecation, and leave the punishment to God (Jos., Theod., Brent, Tremell., S. Schmid, Clericus, De Wette, Keil [Patrick]), is wholly untenable; for David could not and durst not so express himself. It would have been very unwise to acknowledge his fear and weakness in respect to Joab and Abishai; nor would it have been true; for he who had conquered Abner, by whose side stood 600 heroes, in whose grief over Abner’s murder all the people shared, no doubt had power to punish this crime; such a self-exculpation based on confession of weakness does not at all agree with the courage and fearlessness that form a fundamental trait of David’s character.—Against Ewald’s explanation: “I indeed now live in palaces and am crowned king, and yet the sons of Zeruiah are out of my reach,” it is to be remarked with Thenius that the word רָחַק [Eng. A. V.: “weak, tender”] for whose meaning “well-living” he cites Isa. xlviii. 1; Deut. xxviii. 54–56, is used in those passages in a bad sense=delicatus [luxurious, effeminate], and that the other adj. (רָחַק) cannot mean “out of reach;” and there is the further objection to this rendering that David had as yet no very splendid position, and his dwelling proudly in royal palaces is out of the question. Against Bunsen’s rendering: “hard, out of my reach” (Ex. xlviii. 25), Thenius rightly remarks that hard and out of reach are two different conceptions, and that the former can be used only of things, not of persons. Böttcher translates: “And I am to-day easy, and am crowned king, but these men—are too rough for me,” and finds in the “easy” (רָחַק) a double contrast, on the one hand between David’s present comfortable circumstances and Abner’s sad death, and on the other hand between the easy disposition (natural in easy circumstances) inclined to pardon (as was lawful and right for the king), and the rough deed of the sons of Zeruiah. But 1) “we cannot suppose such a double meaning in the declaration” (Thenius), and 2) the history is in conflict with this supposition of royal well-living on the part of David, who with his men must have depended chiefly for their living on the booty taken in their incursions. Thenius alters the text* after the Sept. and translates: “know ye not that . . . and that I am to-day weak and am raised to the position of the king. Those men . . . are harder than I. Jehovah reward,” etc. But the text of the Sept in the first third of the verse is too confused† to allow an emendation of the Hebrew to be based on it. Nor could David yet have said: “I am raised to the position of the king.” Holding to the text, we might rather adopt Thenius’ explanation, according to which David, over against Abner’s greatness and importance for all Israel (which he had just affirmed), sets his own present situation, in which this distinguished man would have been of the greatest value to him, so that the sense would be: “How well in my situation could I have used such a man as Abner, I who have just been set on the throne! What these men have done I could not have done! (comp. xvi. 10). But God will judge!” Yet in this explanation also a confession of weakness would be the chief point, which in David’s present situation is altogether improbable. David was actually not “set on the throne” in respect to all Israel; that does not take place till ver. 1. The little word “just” is put in. Before the whole people David has avowed the deepest, sincerest grief of heart for Abner by declaring that he would continue his fasting till the sun went down. Then follows in vers. 36, 37 the parenthetical double statement of the impression that his conduct made on the people: they approved his feeling, and were firmly convinced that he had no part in the murder. It is then further related in ver. 38 (which connects itself with ver. 35) how David expressed to the narrower circle of “his servants” (that is, his immediate royal retinue) his grief at the loss that he and Israel had suffered by Abner’s death. In ver. 39 follows immediately the avowal of his disposition of mind, that he as king showed himself soft and weak, while those men showed themselves so hard. The contrast of “soft” and “hard” (here evidently intended) is thus fully preserved in respect not to the political situation, but to mental constitution. The meaning of David’s words would thus be: Wonder not that I so give myself up to grief. You know what a great man we and all Israel have lost. I am then soft and weak, I, an anointed king, while these men, the sons of Zeruiah, are in disposition harder than I. They (at least Joab) were obliged indeed to take part in the ceremony of mourning (ver. 31); their hard, inflexible mind, whence proceeded the evil deed, showed itself in their mien and deportment at the ceremony. This gave David occasion to contrast his weakness, his absorption in grief with their hardness, a contrast that is sharpened by his comparing them with himself as king. The concluding words: The Lord will reward . . . are the natural expression of the feelings and thoughts that filled David's soul when he looked at their hardness and inflexible defiance (comp. ver. 29).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. "The house of Saul grew weaker and weaker," chap. iii. 1. This is the theme of the following narrative of Ishbosheth's kingdom under Abner's lead and guidance. In the first place, the heir to Saul's throne appears as a very weak man, unfit to rule, without character or will, who is merely an object of Abner's mighty, unlimited activity, and never (except for a moment in the affair of the concubine) attempts to take the position of subject [that is, independent agent] in respect to Abner. While David undertakes nothing of his own will and strength in order to overthrow the dynasty of Saul and gain the promised kingdom over all Israel, patiently waiting for the fulfilment of the promise given him, this fulfilment is already introduced by the fall of Saul's house through its own weakness, and by its loss of the royal throne through the incapacity of its representative for the royal office, with the co-operation at last of Abner, who was still its only support. Ishbosheth appears as a will-less, weak mock-king in degrading dependence on the mighty, vigorous, heroic nature of Abner. When the latter, in reply to the charge made against him of high-handed and reckless proceeding against the royal house, breaks forth into anger, discarding all reverence for his royal master and openly announcing his defection to David, Ishbosheth has nothing to answer, because he fears Abner. Indeed in his utter helplessness Ishbosheth seems to have entertained the thought of sharing the royal dignity with David, being perhaps ready to cede to him the greater part of the power. At least he became Abner's passive tool so far as to lend his hand to the fulfilment of the condition on which David was willing to yield to his proposals, namely, the restoration of Michal. "The Scripture presents in him a living example of how the sacredly held right of legitimate inheritance has no root when it is not ennobled by a vigorous personality. When the divine calling is lacking, no legitimate pretensions help" (P. Cassel, Hers. s. v.).

2. "David grew stronger and stronger." This second statement also in iii. 1 is in respect to David the title of this section. While David bears himself patiently and humbly in respect to his royal interests, the spirit of the people, under the misrule of Ishbosheth, turns to him more and more in the desire that he may be king over the remaining tribes also (ver. 17). Even the bearer and support of Saul's kingdom, the mighty Abner, inclines secretly to him on the ground of his ever clearer consciousness and conviction that it is Jehovah's will that the kingdom of Israel should depart from the house of Saul and pass over to David; till his rupture with Ishbosheth leads to his open transition to David's side. Abner had indeed, against his better convictions, maintained his partisan position against David and continued his hostile efforts against him, and it was only after the overthrow of his hitherto unlimited power and the violence done to his self-esteem and ambition, that he came to the conclusion to abandon his position as David's opponent; and certainly ambitious plans and views for his position in the new kingdom were not wanting in his transition to David and his energetic efforts for David. But all this could give David no ground to reject Abner's offer; rather he was under obligation to employ this unsought change in Abner's mind and position (which entered into his life as a factor permitted by the Lord) for the end (fixed not by himself, but by the Lord) of his kingdom over all Israel, the kingdom of Saul falling to pieces of itself, when the Dictator, who had furnished its outward support, left it. Abner's defection from Ishbosheth and effort to gain from the whole people the recognition of David's authority was an important preliminary step thereto. But further, by a wonderful providence of God, Abner's shameful murder by the envious, ambitious Joab was to lead to this result, namely, that, after the Elders of the people had already shown themselves willing to recognize his authority over all Israel, the whole people gave him their love and confidence; "all that he did pleased them" (ver. 36).

3. The realization of the plans and aims of the wisdom of God in the development of David up to his ascension of the royal throne in Israel is secured by the co-operation of human efforts and acts (like Abner's and Joab's), which have their ground not in zeal for the cause of the kingdom of God, but in selfish ends and motives of the self-seeking, sinful heart. Human sin must subserve the purposes of God's government and kingdom.—The absolute freedom of control in the things of His kingdom takes the activity of human freedom into its dispensations, and weaves them into the fast closed web of divine arrangements and acts, in which they fulfil the plans of divine wisdom.—J. Hets (Geschicht. Davids I. 309) remarks on ver. 18: "Here also it is to be noted how, merely by preparing circumstances, the free actions of men have been forced to accord with divine declarations, of which fact this theocracy gives so many examples."

4. David's words concerning Joab and his house are no more the expression of revenge than the orders that he gives to Solomon in his last words (1 Kings ii. 5 sq.) respecting the punishment of Joab for this bloody crime (against Dunker, Gesch. des Alterth. I. 386); but they express his moral horror at this evil deed, and at the same time the everlasting law of God's requiring justice, which reaches not merely the person, but also the posterity (Ex. xx. 5) of the offender. David (though, as theocratic king, he had the right to do it) does not himself execute the deserved act of divine righteousness on Joab, not, as the common view is, because he felt himself too weak in his royal office, but because he wished to avoid the appearance of personal revenge, especially now when Abner had just done him such great services. He therefore committed to the Lord the requital and expiation of this crime, ver. 39. This could be accomplished, however, only through a human instrument. The commission to this end he accordingly gave to his son Solomon (1 Kings ii. 5 sq.), who, not as his son, as a private person, but as his successor on the throne and as theocratic king, had therein an official duty to fulfil. For "in the kingdom of God, in which ruled the law of earthly requital, such a crime might not go unpunished" (O. v. Gerlach).

5. In David's ethical conduct in this important episode also, which immediately precedes his ascension of the promised throne, we see individual prefigurations of his humble obedience to the Lord, without whose will he will take no step in life. Under the strongest temptations to arbitrariness and violence, which were the rule with the ancient oriental princes, he maintains strict self-control, exhibits uniform circumspection, a wisdom and discretion cognizant of God's ways, and does not permit anger at the deed of horror that had been done under his eyes to lead him to immediate, bloody punishment. We must guard against exaggerated demands on the morality of the Old Testament men of God, that we may not unfairly judge them by an improper standard, and that we may not pervert the truth of the divine development of revelation by confounding the stand-points of the Old and New Testaments. David's invocation of divine punishment on Joab (ver. 29) (wherein, indeed, we must distinguish between the eternal truth of the divine justice and the sinful element of subjective passion) is held by some to be unjustifiable from the Christian point of view. To this it is to be replied once for all, that David belongs to the Old Testament, not the New Testament economy, stands on the stand-point of the Law, not of the Gospel, and therefore is not to be ethically judged according to the New Testament stand-point.

[Dr. Erdmann's remarks on David's moral motives are determined in part by his interpretation of ver. 39, about which there is much room for doubt. It may be merely a confession of political weakness that he here makes privately to his friends, in which case his self-control is simply political sagacity. David had high moral and spiritual qualities; at the same time we must guard against the determination to find the loftiest theocratic motives in every act of his life. Dr. Erdmann holds that in ver. 39 David affirms his own softness of nature as reason for his deep grief over Abner, in contrast with the hardness of Joab. The objection to this is that it does not explain sufficiently why David immediately appends an appeal to God for the punishment of the doer of evil. Further, the reason assigned by our author for David's failure to punish Joab (namely, his desire to avoid the appearance of revenge) seems unsatisfactory; nobody would have accused him of personal vengeance. To the usual interpretation Dr. Erdmann objects that a confession of political weakness on David's part would have been unwise and untrue. But, what more natural than that he should make such a statement to a select body of friends; and that it was not true, we are not warranted in saying, since we do not know Joab's power and position. The words of the Heb. may refer to political relations, and such a statement would accord with the whole history. It must be allowed, however, that the words are obscure.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 7 sq. The designs that God has with His chosen ones for the furtherance of His kingdom often have the way smoothed for them through human sins.—Single wicked deeds, proceeding from momentary passionate excitement, do often in God's government give occasion for changes having important consequences.—Division among the opposers of God's kingdom must subvert the furtherance of His aims, and on the contrary, discord among those who, on a like ground of faith, wish to live and labor for the same tasks in the kingdom of God must help the wicked one and further his aims.—Ver. 12 sqq. When an opposer of God's word honestly turns, we should without reluctance give him the hand, without undertaking to pass judgment on the motives that are hidden in his heart.

Ver. 13. Where the honor of God and His holy ordinances are concerned, a man should guard his rights, and demand reparation of a right that has been impaired.—Ver. 17 sq. He who has left the ways of unrighteousness, upon which for a long time he had consciously or unconsciously gone, and returned to the way of truth and righteousness, will exhibit the sincerity of his change by a so much the more earnest striving to restore the damage done by his previous conduct, and to carry into execution the previously hindered aims of divine wisdom and love.

Ver. 23 sq. That there is a kingdom of evil is proven by the fact that a man's turning from evil to good, which pleases God and is a joy to the angels, commonly excites bitterness and hate in wicked men, who see their aims and plans thereby interfered with, and awakens an envy and jealousy that does not shrink from the most wicked deeds.

Ver. 28 sq. The honor of one's good name is too precious a possession to let even the suspicion cleave to it of participation in other men's guilt. Manly honor demands that in every way, by word and deed and behaviour, one should set forth his innocence when the circumstances and relations give occasion to untrue and unjust accusations.

Ver. 33 sq. In lamenting the loss of great men who were prominent in advancing the kingdom of God, we not merely render to them the honor they deserve, but also praise God who gave them.—Ver. 36. That king will be most honored and loved by his people who walks in the ways of God, and by a noble disposition, magnanimity and hearty goodness himself awakens the nobler feelings of his people.—Ver. 39. In patience and humility must we refer to God the Lord the righteous requital for wicked transgression of His holy commandments. Indifference thereto makes one a partaker of like guilt.—[Comp. above at close of "Hist. and Theol."—Tr.]

On ver. 8. SCHLIER: How many stand together and seem the most inseparable friends, so long as each hopes to gain his end; but only let this aim remove to a distance, only let it become manifest that a selfish or ambitious desire is not going to be fulfilled, and how soon is all rent in twain! For there is nothing that really unites men but the fear of God. No friendship is permanent and progressive that is not rooted in the fear of God.—[Vers. 9, 10. SCOTT: While men go on in their sins apparently without concern, they are often conscious that they are fighting against God.—TR.]—On ver. 16. F. W. KRUMMACHER: It appears from this occurrence that, amid the wilderness of ruined domestic relations by which Israel was then overgrown, there was yet here and there to be found the flower of a true and inward love and fidelity. This bloomed in David's house also, but not unstunted, and he has not remained untouched by the curse which God had laid upon the abomination of polygamy in Israel.—On ver. 21. "When a man's ways please Jehovah, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." Prov. xvi. 7.

[Ver. 27. HENRY: In this, 1. It is certain that the Lord was righteous. Abner had against the convictions of his conscience opposed David, and had now deserted Ishbosheth, under pretence of regard to God and Israel, but really from pride and revenge. 2. It is as certain that Joab was unrighteous. (1) Even the pretence for what he did was very unjust. (2) The real cause was jealousy of a rival. When he could not call him a saint and a good man, he said nothing of that; but what was true he gave him the praise of, that he was "a prince and a great man."—Ver. 39. (2) To David's goodness; he ought to have done his duty, and trusted God with the issue. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.—TAYLOR: Had he put Joab to death, public opinion would have sustained him in the execution of justice; and even if it had not, he would have had the inward witness that he was doing his duty to the state. For a magistrate to be weak, is to be wicked. . . . O what suffering—may I not even say what sin?—David might have saved himself from, if he had only thus early rid himself of the tyrannic and overbearing presence of Joab!—WORDSWORTH: He would have probably prevented other murders, such as that of Ishbosheth and of Amasa; and he would have been spared the sorrow of giving on his death-bed the warrant of execution against Joab, to be put in effect by Solomon. "Impunity invites to greater crimes." "He is cruel to the innocent who spares the guilty."—TR.]

But consider a little, and it may appear that this is only the consequence of a wrong action he committed long ago (1 Sam. xxv. 44). Our pity is not thereby destroyed; but its character is greatly changed.—Vers. 17, 18. How gracefully rulers can yield to the popular wish when they conclude that it is their own interest to do so. II. Punishment of Ishbosheth's Murderers by David. Vers. 9-12.

9 And David answered Rechab and Baanah his brother, the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, and said unto them, As the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity, When one [He^a who] told me, saying, Behold Saul is dead, thinking to have brought good tidings—I took hold of him and slew him in Ziklag, who thought that I would have given [in Ziklag, to give him^b] a reward for his tidings; How much more when wicked men have slain a righteous person in his own house upon his bed? shall I not therefore now [and now, shall I not] require his blood of your hand, and take you away [destroy you] from the earth?^c
12 And David commanded his [the] young men, and they slew them and cut off their hands and their feet, and hanged them up over [at]^d the pool in Hebron. But [And] they took the head of Ishbosheth and buried it in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.

III. David anointed King over Israel. Ch. V. 1-5.

1 THEN came all the tribes of Israel [And all . . . came] to David unto Hebron, 2 and spake,¹ saying, Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh. Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest [led]² out and broughtest [brought] in Israel; and the Lord [Jehovah] said to thee, Thou shalt feed my 3 people Israel, and thou shalt be a [om. a] captain over Israel. So [And] all the elders of Israel came to the king to Hebron, and king David made a league [covenant] with them in Hebron before the Lord [Jehovah], and they anointed 4 David king over Israel. David was thirty years old when he began to reign, and¹⁴ 5 he reigned forty years. In Hebron he reigned over Judah seven years and six months, and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel and Judah.

He introduces a verb קָרַח, "to purify," from the Arabic, and does not account for the Heb.: "smote him in the underbody."—Ewald adopts Thenius' reading except that he puts אֲשֶׁר עָלָיו for the Heb. בְּאֵזָרָא, and instead of לָקַט writes סָקַל. Wellhausen: וְהָיָה וְכָל־בְּנֵי־יִשְׂרָאֵל יָבִיאוּ אֶת־רֹאשׁ הַיָּשׁוּרִים וְהָיָה דָּוִד בְּהֶבְרֹן וְיָשָׁם אֶת־רֹאשׁ הַיָּשׁוּרִים בְּקִבְרֵי אֲבִנֵּי אֲחִיו נְמָלוֹט, "and behold, the portress of the house was stoning wheat," where the סָקַל makes a difficulty.—If the suggestion made above be adopted, we may take the masoretic text as the original (though a blending of two contemporary accounts), and then with the help of these emendations explain the emergence of the Sept. text from it.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Chap. IV. 1-8. Murder of Ishbosheth.

Ver. 1. In consequence of the news of Abner's murder, Ishbosheth's hands became "slack," the opposite of the "strong" (פִּיף) comp. q. 7; xvi. 21—that is, he completely lost heart. And all Israel was troubled, because people knew Ishbosheth's incapacity, and that Abner alone had been the prop of his kingdom (iii. 6). [Things were generally in an unsettled state. Patrick: By Abner's death the treaty with David was broken off, or there was nobody to manage it like Abner; Plato observes: "when any calamity is about to befall a city, God is wont to take away (the) excellent men out of that city."—Tr.].—Ver. 2. The son of Saul had* two band-leaders, Baanah and Rechab, sons of Rimmon.—Noteworthy is the designation "son of Saul" for Ishbosheth, who is never called "the Anointed of the Lord."—The two "band-leaders" in Ishbosheth's service were no doubt bold, adventurous men. The part that they play, as well as Abner's conduct, suggests the supposition that the firm military organization that Saul had called into being had relaxed, and a disintegration of the army into separate bodies under adventurers and partisans was imminent, if it had not already occurred. Of the sons of Benjamin; for Beeroth also was reckoned to Benjamin.—Beeroth, according to Rob. II. 345 sq. [Am. Ed. i. 451-453, ii. 262] and Later Bibl. Researches 190 [Am. Ed. III. 289], the present village Bireh, seven miles north of Jerusalem in an unfruitful and stony region on a mountain, with old foundations, not far from Gibeon on the western border of Benjamin. Comp. Josh. ix. 17; xviii. 25. As from its border-position, it might easily be reckoned to another tribe, it is here expressly mentioned as belonging to Benjamin, that there might be no doubt that these murderers were really Benjaminites, fellow-tribesmen of Saul's son.—Ver. 3. An explanatory statement about Beeroth with reference to the time of the narrator, when that Beeroth was no longer in existence. Not: "they had fled" (for at the time of Ishbosheth's murder Beeroth no longer existed), but: "they fled to Gittaim." They dwelt there as strangers (דִּיָּיִם) not protégés (against Ewald, Then.). Neither the reason for their flight, nor the position of this place is known to us. In Neh. xi. 33 a Gittaim is mentioned among the places inhabited by Benjaminites after the Exile. If that is the same with our Gittaim, we yet cannot certainly conclude that it belonged to Benjamin before the Exile; the contrary rather is probable. The word "strangers" points to the fact that the fugitive Beerothites dwelt there among non-Israelites. It was perhaps one of the places on the border of Benjamin belonging to the non-Israelitic Amoritic Gibeonites. [Patrick and Philipson suggest that Beeroth was abandoned by its inhabitants at the time of the Philistine invasion, 1 Sam. xxxi. 7. Bib.-Com. (supposing the Beerothites to be Gibeonites) conjectures that the flight was occasioned by Saul's attack, 2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, and that the act of Baanah and Rechab was one of vengeance.—But we know nothing certainly about it.—Gittaim has been supposed to be the Philistine Gath (Then. and others) or Gath-Rimmon, Josh. xix. 45; xxi. 24 (Wellh.).—Tr.].—Ver. 4. A historical remark in respect to the then condition of Saul's house. Its only representative besides Ishbosheth was Jonathan's son Mephibosheth, five years old at the time of the catastrophe at Jezreel, lame in both feet, helpless therefore, and neither a support to Ishbosheth nor fit to succeed him on the throne. In view of this the narrator here inserts this statement in order to make clear how, on the murder of Ishbosheth related below, the kingdom of Saul's house was necessarily extinguished. For further notices of Mephibosheth see ix., xvi. 1 sq.; xix. 25 sq. Instead of this name we find (parallel with Eshbaal for Ishbosheth—see on ii. 8) in 1 Chron. viii. 34; ix. 40, Meribbaal = "opponent, conqueror of Baal," and Mephibosheth* also perhaps means "exterminator of Baal." [This statement about Mephibosheth also prepares the way for the subsequent notices of him.—Tr.].—Ver. 5. "In the heat of the day" the murderers came to Mahanaim where Ishbosheth dwelt, see ii. 8. He lay on the midday-bed, that is, in a quiet, remote, cool spot of the house. They chose this time of midday-rest as favorable to their purpose.—Ver. 6. "And hither."† The phrase "fetching wheat" explains how they could penetrate "into the midst of the house," where Ishbosheth was lying; they came as persons that wished or were directed to fetch wheat. The Partic. is sometimes put for the Impf. as our Fut., as Ex. x. 8, "who are they that are going?" (= that purpose going), and so in narration does the duty of the Pret., as Gen. xix. 14, "marrying his daughter" (= who were to or wished to marry). Ewald, § 335 b. They came not as "purchasers of wheat" (Buns.), but as band-leaders, to get wheat for the support of their men, "corn [grain] to divide out to their soldiers, which was kept in the middle of Ishbosheth's house" (Cler.). We need not suppose that this was merely a pretext; rather their entrance into the midst of the house is the more easily explained when we suppose that this was a usual practice in accordance with their military position, and that they had done it before. Thus without attracting attention they could slay Ishbosheth, and quickly make their escape.—The Sept., departing completely from the Masoretic text, here reads: "and behold, the portress of the house was cleansing wheat and had fallen asleep and slumbered; and Rechab and Baanah, the brothers, escaped (or, slipped by)." Thénius' restoration of the original text after the Sept. is rejected by Böttcher as "frightfully far" from the Masoretic text, while Thénius disapproves Böttcher's reading (which Ewald with some modifications adopts) as more circumstantial than his own. If the original text accorded with these conjectures, it is not easy to see how the present masoretic text (which differs from it so much) came from it, while it is easy to suppose that the Sept. (according to its custom), tried by an interpretation to explain partly how the two murderers could get into the house unopposed, partly the strange repetition of the account in ver. 7. The Vulg. (which, through the Itala on which it is based, is dependent on the Sept.) has the corresponding insertion: "and the portress of the house cleansing wheat fell asleep," while in the rest of the verse it follows the masoretic text against the Sept. All the other ancient versions follow the Heb. According to the latter there is certainly a tautology in vers. 6, 7, the entrance into the house and the murder being twice mentioned. But in the first place, it is to be observed that in the attempted restorations of the original text the phrase "came into the house" remains in ver. 5 and ver. 7. But we must further bear in mind a peculiarity of Heb. narration (referred to by Königsfeld, Annot. ad post. libr. Sam., and Keil), by which a previously-mentioned fact is repeated in order to add something new. So in iii. 22, 23 the coming of Joab, and in v. 1, 8 the coming of the Tribes is twice mentioned. Here the "coming" of ver. 5 is more fully described in ver. 6, and the "slaying" of ver. 6 is defined in ver. 7 as beheading, and this makes the transition to the account in ver. 8, that the murderers brought the head of Ishbosheth to David, having during the night traversed the Arabah or plain of the Jordan. Comp. ii. 29.—Ver. 8. To the king.—Notice that David is always here so termed, while in respect to Ishbosheth the title is avoided. Behold the head of thy enemy, who sought thy life.—The better to justify their deed, and to gain favor and reward from David, the risen star, they stigmatize Ishbosheth as one that sought after David's life, thinking perhaps that the recollection of Saul's persecution and Abner's hostility would give the color of truth to their false assertion. [Others hold less well that Saul is the enemy here meant.—Tr.] Nothing is said in the history of attempts on David's life by Ishbosheth, and David's designation of him as a "righteous man," who was guilty of no evil deed stamps that assertion as a lie. They have the effrontery indeed to represent their crime as an act or judgment of God, the better to commend themselves to David, though they had committed the murder of their own accord without any commission at all.

II. Vers. 9-12. Punishment of Ishbosheth's murderers by David.

Ver. 9. The words: Who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity—are therefore not a confirmation of the murderers' assertion about Ishbosheth, but contain the thought "that David is not obliged to free himself by crime from his enemies" (Keil).—Ver. 10. He who told me . . . thinking himself a messenger of good—a recapitulation of the history of the Amalekite (ch. i.), here put in the absolute construction, and the words and I seized him follow as principal assertion, instead of: "if I seized and slew him who told me" (ch. i. 15). "In order to give him a reward for his tidings," that is, to inflict on him the punishment he deserved.* [See "Text. and Gram." The last clause of this verse is of the nature of biting irony—David gave the man a reward, and it was death.—Tr.]—Ver. 11. "How much more!" (עַד מְאֵד) the apodosis to the protasis in ver. 10. The words: wicked men . . . on his bed are (as in ver. 10) proposed in absolute construction, instead of: "how much more shall I require his blood from your hand, ye wicked men!" The "wicked men" stands in sharp contrast with the "righteous man." David characterizes Ishbosheth as a "righteous man," that is, as one who had never done anything wicked (so Josephus). This judgment accords with the character given of Ishbosheth in chaps. ii., iii. (he was a "good man," without falsehood and blameless), and is at the same time a decided refutation of the charge by which the murderers think to palliate their crime. "David declares that Ishbosheth was blameless, having done nothing to occasion this end" (Cassel). With the phrase "and now" David brings his speech to a close, pronouncing sentence of death, by the same royal authority as in i. 14, 15. The form of the thought is a progression from the less to the greater: If I executed in Ziklag him who avowed having killed at his own request on the battle-field my adversary Saul, under whose persecutions the Lord delivered me from all adversity, how much more must I demand at your hands the blood of this righteous man whom ye murderously slew in his house on his bed. On the phrase "require blood," see Gen. ix. 5, according to which God Himself is the avenger of blood, comp. Ps. ix. 13. David recognizes himself as king in God's service and His instrument, when he causes these criminals to be slain in expiation of intentional homicide. Comp. Num. xxxv. 31.—"Take away, destroy;" the verb (וָצַד) is used of extermination by death, for example, in Deut. xiii. 6 (5); not "from the earth," but "from the land" (וָצַד), since according to the law (Num. xxxv. 33), the murderer lost his abode in the land of promise.—Ver. 12. The order for execution is given and carried out. It is specially severe in two points: the dismemberment of the corpses by cutting off hands and feet, the deepest indignity, and the hanging up of the mutilated corpses at the pool in Hebron, a place where many persons came and went; this was for a public testimony to David's righteous severity against such evil-doers, as well as his innocence of the murder, and for a terrible example, comp. Deut. xxi. 21, 22. [Hands and feet were cut off because these were the offending members (Abarb. in Philippon). This sort of punishment has always been common in the East.—Tr.]—David had "Ishbosheth's head" buried in "Abner's sepulchre in Hebron" on account of the relation that had existed between the two men.

III. Vers. 1-5. David anointed king over all Israel.

Ver. 1. These incidents (the murder of Abner and that of Ishbosheth), which made a deep impression on the whole people, taken in connection with the growing inclination to David in all Israel, necessarily favored and hastened the attainment of the end after which Abner had striven in his negotiations with the elders (iii. 17, 18). The tenor of the history leads us to hold with Ewald that the recognition of David as king over all Israel occurred immediately after Ishbosheth's death, against Stähelin, who thinks that there was an interval of several years after his death, during which the tribes gradually came over to David. [Here the Book of Chronicles again falls in with our history (1 Chron. xi.), and runs parallel with it in general (though with many differences) to the end of David's life. The differences will be noticed as they present themselves.—Tr.].—Thus, then, appear at Hebron "all the tribes of Israel," that is, the elders (ver. 3) of all the tribes except Judah. The elders give three reasons (arranged in order of importance) for raising David to the throne over the whole nation: 1) Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh.—This expression denotes blood-relationship in the family, Gen. xxix. 14; Judg. ix. 2; it here refers to their common descent from one ancestor: "we are thy kinsmen by blood," in view of which the enmity between us must cease.—Ver. 2. 2) Before, when Saul reigned over us, it was thou that leddest Israel out and in—the same thing is said of Joshua in Num. xxvii. 17. The expression "lead out and in" does not refer to the affairs of Israel (Keil), but the people itself ("Israel"), and "the whole people" indeed. This is expressly affirmed in 1 Sam. xviii. 16 in the words: "And all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and in before them," and that this "going out and in" is to be understood of military leadership is clear from ver. 5, ver. 13, and from the whole connection. The bond of fellowship and love, which had bound him to them (even under Saul) as leader in their military undertakings, is the second ground of their proposal.—3) Their last and strongest ground is the immediate call by the word of the Lord to be shepherd and prince over Israel. And the Lord said to thee; on the word "feed" (רָעָה) see Ps. lxxviii. 70-72, and on "prince" [captain] see 1 Sam. xxv. 30. No such word of the Lord, spoken immediately to David, is ever mentioned. The declaration of the elders is to be explained as Abigail's in 1 Sam. xxv. 30, and Abner's in 2 Sam. iii. 9, 18 [that is, as belonging to the circle of prophetic thought.—Tr.]. It is perhaps based on the word of the Lord to Samuel, 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 2, by which David was chosen to be king over Israel, comp. with 1 Sam. xv. 28.—The first and third grounds answer exactly to the precept in Deut. xvii. 15: "Thou shalt make him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose; out of the midst of thy brethren shalt thou make a king over thee." [Patrick: Ver. 1. They were not overcome by the arms, but by the piety and justice of David, to acknowledge him their king.—Ver. 2. This is the first time we find a governor described in Scripture as pastor of the people; afterwards the name is much used by the prophets, particularly Ezek. xxxiv. 23 and many other places. Whence our Lord Christ is called "the good Shepherd" and "the great Shepherd."—Evil rulers are called "roaring lions, hungry bears, and devouring wolves" etc., Ez. xix. 2.—Comp. the Homeric epithet ποιμένες λαών, and the emblematic animals in Dante's Inferno. Bk. I.—Tr.].—Ver. 3. And the elders . . . came to Hebron—resumption of the words of ver. 1 with exacter definition of the expression "tribes" by the mention of their representatives "the elders," for the purpose of further detailing the solemn covenanting of David with the people and his anointing as king of Israel. And king David made a covenant with them before the Lord.—Comp. iii. 21, "that they may make a covenant with thee." In this word of Abner is given one side of the covenant, namely, the obligating of the people to obey him as the king given them by the Lord; here the other side is given, namely, David promises in this covenant, in accordance with his divine choice and call to the throne, to rule the people according to the will of the Lord. Notice the expression of the Heb. "made to them a covenant"

(כָּרַת), which does not permit us to regard this as a mere bargain, wherein both parties have equal rights and authority" (Efler, Herz. VIII. 11). The relation of both parties to the Lord is indicated by the expression "before." The view that an agreement was here entered into of the nature of a modern constitution* (Then.), does not accord with the relation that the theocratic principle of the Davidic kingdom established between king and people in their common obligation to the Lord, the true king of His people. And they anointed David king over Israel—to which the Chronicler adds (1 Chr. xi. 3): "according to the word of the Lord by Samuel," an explanatory addition referring to the Lord's command to Samuel to anoint David king over Israel, 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 2. David's anointing by Samuel (1 Sam. xvi.) is now confirmed by the anointing of the people, they having expressly and solemnly recognized his divine call to be king of Israel (1 Sam. xv. 28), made by Samuel and witnessed by Samuel's anointing. The Chronicler, deriving his information from precise accounts, declares that there was a large attendance of military men from the whole nation at this royal festival (1 Chr. xii. 23-40).—Vers. 4, 5. The statement in ii. 11 is here resumed, and we have stated, 1) David's age (30 years) at his accession to the throne; 2) the whole time of his reign (40 years), and 3) the time of his reign over Israel (33 years). See on ii. 11. These statements of time are given in 1 Chr. xxix. 27 at the close of David's reign. [Bib. Com.: The age of David (30 years) shows that the events narrated from 1 Sam. xiii. to the end of the book did not occupy above 10 years—four years in Saul's service, four years of wandering, one year and four months among the Philistines, and a few months after Saul's death.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. In the section chap. iv.—v. 5 we have the completed fulfilment of the statement made in

* [There was probably gradually established between king and people some recognition of mutual rights and duties—an unwritten, or possibly in part a written law. This would not be out of harmony with the theocratic conception of the government. Philippien points out some apparent indications (as 1 Kings xii.) of such a law.—Tr.]

iii. 1 concerning the theocratically contrasted fortunes of Saul's house and David, up to the culmination of the latter's rise and the uttermost point of the former's depression. The spiritual weakness, moral slackness and personal insignificance of Saul's heir on the throne, the unfaithfulness, ambition, selfishness, rude violence and dissolution of all discipline and order about the royal court, the increasing favor of the people to David and the entire absence of prospect for the physical maintenance of the kingdom in Saul's house, whose last scion was a cripple—all this co-operated to bring about the fall of this kingdom before the eyes of the people and the fulfilment of the divine judgment on Saul's house, without David's doing the slightest thing to produce the catastrophe or staining his hands with Ishbosheth's blood, holding, as he did, to what he had sworn to Saul, 1 Sam. xxiv. 22, 23. Amid the affecting events that introduce the final fall of Saul's house, and the severe temptations with which he is beset to make a compact with sin, or at least to come in contact with crime in order to gain his end, David holds, as from the beginning, firm and unshaken to his stand-point of humble obedience to and complete dependence on the will and leading of the Lord, knowing himself to be in person and life and in his destination for the throne of Israel solely in the hand of God. The anger with which he repels self-commending crime [iv. 8-11], appealing to the guidance of his God who had brought him through all adversity, is at the same time a positive witness to his determination to take all further steps also up to the attainment of his promised dominion only at the hand of his God, and to guard against all tainting of his divine mission by sin and crime. "His way to the throne had hitherto been always the way of obedience to God's will; it was ever the way of the fear of God and of conscientious fulfilment of duty, and with such crimes he had never had anything to do. How could he now defile himself with them! The execution of these two murderers was a testimony to all the people, what ways David went and wished further to go, and that whoever would avail anything with this king, must tread solely the path of godly fear and duty" (Schlier).

2. Ishbosheth's violent end is not to be regarded as a natural step in the fall of Saul's house, or as a necessary consequence thereof, but as a revelation of the divine justice against his guilt in permitting himself (by his good-nature and moral weakness) to be misused by his ambitious and high-aiming general Abner, to be made a rival king and seduced into hostile undertakings against David (ii. 12). Such an end must Ishbosheth's kingdom according to the divine justice have had, since it was founded on opposition to God's will.

3. And so, in respect to God's judgments on men's sins, the God-fearing man, like David, with all his holy anger against evil, which is a reflection of God's holy anger, and with all his obligatory energy of punitive justice, must yet exhibit recognition of the good that exists in his neighbor who is smitten by the judgment of God, and especially cherish gentleness and forbearance where personal wrong has been done him.

4. The covenant, which David made with the people on his accession to the throne, is not to be thought of as a contract between two parties, who by negotiations and mutual concessions produce a constitutional relation, in which their mutual rights and duties are to be considered and carried out.—This would be directly contradictory of the fundamental idea of Israel's constitution, namely, that the God of the fathers, who had chosen the people, separated them to be His people, redeemed them from the bondage of Egypt, and made a law-covenant with them at Sinai, was their king, and that they owed Him obedience as their ruler according to the demands of His law. People and God-given king had to obey the Lord as their proper, true king; there is no contrasting of king and people, but both have to render unconditional obedience to the invisible God as their Lord and Ruler. See 1 Sam. xii. 20-25. The conviction that David was called immediately by the Lord to be king of Israel had spread from Samuel and the prophets throughout the nation, and announced itself expressly in the formal and solemn recognition of David as king in accordance with the demand in Deut. xvii. 15: "Thou shalt set as king over thee him whom the Lord thy God shall choose." This recognition of the divine call precedes the covenanting and the anointing. On the basis, now, of this recognized fact, the covenanting could include nothing but what followed necessarily from the principle of the theocratic kingdom, to govern the people in the name of the Lord, and according to the law that the invisible King of the people had given. David promised, in accordance with Dt. xvii. 19, 20, faithfully to perform the law given by the Lord for him as well as for the people, and not merely a constitutional law agreed on between him and the people; and the people promised to obey the Lord their God in His royal government, and to be subject to David as God-appointed instrument of the theocracy. [While this statement of the joint subordination of king and people to the divine law is perfectly just, so that there could not be in Israel a political constitution, political progress, or free institutions according to modern conceptions, we may still suppose that in carrying out the details of the government there came to be recognized certain principles (subordinate to the central principle) which controlled the customary action of sovereign and people, and were of the nature of Common Law or a Constitution.—TR.].

5. The establishment of David on the throne of Israel as an act of God (completed by the people, in the knowledge and recognition of God's will, by the anointment as an act of choice and homage) restored externally and internally on the old deep theocratic basis, the unity of the people introduced by Samuel, which was gradually weakened under Saul's government, and after his death destroyed by the division of the nation into two parts and the establishment of two kingdoms, so that a recurrence of the disintegration of the Period of the Judges was imminent. The perfect unity of all the tribes shows itself at David's anointment in Hebron, 1) in the avowal of the blood-relationship of the whole people with David through their common descent from one ancestor —in contrast with the nations that were corporally foreign to them (comp. Deut. xvii. 15); 2) in the recognition of David's services to the whole nation even in Saul's time as military leader against foreign nations, and of the bond of love and confidence that consequently bound the whole people to him; 3) in the declaration that David was called by the Lord Himself to be king over all Israel (comp. Deut. xvii. 15), and 4) in the covenant that the two, king and people, make with one another before the Lord as their King, on the basis of the law-covenant that God had made with His people (comp. Deut. xvii. 19, 20, with 1 Sam. xii. 20 sq., and Ex. xix., xx.)

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, 1) Because of the frailty of all flesh and of all human supports, with which fall the hopes based on them. 2) Because of the faithlessness of men, in whom blind confidence is placed instead of putting all confidence in the faithfulness of the Lord. 3) Because of the danger of ruin of body and soul, to which one thereby exposes himself.—Ver. 8. How evil seeks deceitfully to clothe itself with the appearance of good, 1) by falsehood, in alleging something evil in others as a pretext to make itself appear right and good; 2) by hypocrisy, in representing itself as in harmony with God's Word and will; 3) by the pretence of having promoted the interest of another.

Vers. 8-12. How the children of God should guard against the power of evil which presses upon them. 1) By repulsing every service of evil that is to their advantage, and pointing to the Lord who alone is their help. 2) By avoiding all participation in others' guilt. 3) By energetically testifying, in word and deed, against evil.

Chap. V. 3. What kingdom is in truth a kingdom by the grace of God? That which, 1) is based on the solid ground of the word and will of God; 2) conducts its government only in the name and service of the living God, fulfilling its office of shepherd and leader, and 3) strives after the welfare of the people only in the covenant of love and obedience towards the holy and gracious God.

Ver. 1. STARKE: Let no one trust in men, Jer. xvii. 5; for they are nothing, Psa. lxxii. 10 [9], and when they fall, all hope falls, too, Psa. cxlvi. 3, 4.—S. SCHMID: At last the will of God does come to pass, and His promises go on to their fulfilment, Rom. iv. 21; Heb. ii. 3.

[Ver. 2. SCOTT: Wretched indeed are they who are engaged in undertakings in which none can serve them without opposing the known will of God! The more exalted their station, the greater is their danger; for the very men in whom they repose their chief confidence are destitute of principle, serve them only for gain, and will betray or murder them when their mercenary schemes require it.—Tr.].—Vers. 2, 3. BERL. B.: A true king is nothing else than the shepherd of the people, vii. 7; Psa. lxxviii. 71, 72. Accordingly God made David a shepherd of men, as Peter a fisher of men.—Ver. 3. STARKE: God causes His own people, whom He wishes to exalt, first to come under the cross awhile, Prov. xiii. 12.—S. SCHMID: Kings and princes must know that they stand under God, according to whose will and direction they have to judge themselves.—WUERT. B.: Although God does not cause that which He has promised the pious, to come to them immediately, yet He does at least give it to them, and indeed the longer He delays the more glorious it becomes. So let men patiently wait for the right time.

Ver. 4. OSIANDER: What often seems most hurtful to us, must often be most helpful to us.—WUERT. B.: When God with His grace turns away from a man or a whole race, there is then no more prosperity, but all gradually goes down.—Ver. 8. CRAMER: Ungodly men boast of their trickery and villainy, and imagine they will thereby gain praise, and glory in their sin.—BERL. B.: They wish, as it were, to spread the name of God and His Providence as a mantle over their knavery, as bad boys are wont to do.—[WORDSWORTH: It has been often so in the history of the world and of the Church, where zeal for God is sometimes a color for worldly ambition, and an occasion for deeds of cruelty and treachery.—Tr.].—SCHLIER: Where is there a human heart that knows nothing of selfishness? O do let us recognize such an enemy in ourselves, and humble ourselves therefor, do let us all our days fight against the enemy with real earnestness! Either thou slayest selfishness or it slays thee, and plunges thee into sin and shame, and thereby into ruin and damnation. It was selfishness that made these two Benjaminites become murderers of their king.—[Ver. 8. SCOTT: Many are conscious that they should be pleased with villainy, provided it conduced greatly to their profit: thus they are led confidently to conclude that others will beset too; and as numbers are rewarded for villainous actions, they expect the same.—Tr.].

Vers. 9-11. To hate and avoid sin is to be prudent, to keep out of sneaking ways is to build one's fortune, and to put away from us even enticing offers that are not in accordance with duty and the fear of God is to be sensible for time and eternity.—Ver. 9. CRAMER: True Christians should commit and commend all their affairs to God, who judges righteously; He can and will make all well, 1 Pet. ii. 23; Ps. xxxvii. 5.—Ver. 10. CRAMER: God-fearing rulers should not bring territory and people to them through treachery, assassination, unfaithfulness, apostasy from known truth, hypocrisy and such like villainous tricks; for to be pious and true will alone protect the king, and his throne is established by righteousness, Prov. xx. 28.

[Ver. 11. HENRY: Charity teaches us to make the best, not only of our friends but of our enemies, and to think those may be righteous persons who yet in some instances do us wrong.—Chap. V. 1. WORDSWORTH: And thus God overruled evil for good, and brought good out of evil. He made the crimes of Abner, Joab, and of the two Beerothites to be subservient to the exaltation of David, and the establishment of his kingdom over all Israel. Thus God will make all the sins of evil men to be one day ministerial to the extension and final settlement of the universal dominion of Christ.—Tr.].

[Ver. 1. When the sudden death of one man completely disheartens a whole people, it shows that he was a great man, but also that the people were already in an evil condition. And this man

6 AND the king¹ and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land. Which [And they] spake unto David, saying, Except² thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither; thinking [saying], David

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 6. Instead of "king" we find "David" in several MSS., in Sept., and in 1 Chr. xi. 4, and "king David" in Syr., Ar.; we can feel the differences that these readings make in the tone of the narrative, but it is hardly possible to decide which of them is original.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 6. Eng. A. V. has here unnecessarily inverted the clauses; read: "thou shalt not come in hither except, etc.," so Sym., Chald., Syr., Vulg., pointing קִרְיָתֵי as Inf. But others point it Perf. plu. קִרְיָתֵי and render: "thou shalt not come in hither, but (דָּמָה 'ב) the blind and the lame will keep thee away" (Sept., Then., Bötth., Wellh., Bib.-Com., Erdmann and others), which rendering (making "the blind and the lame" the subject of the sentence) Philpsson declares to be unnecessary and ungrammatical. The sentence presents serious grammatical difficulties: on the one hand the דָּמָה 'ב requires a finite verb after it (when a noun follows it, it is always as object of a preceding verb, which the Inf. cannot here be), on the other hand the verb should here be Impf. (Philpsson's difficulty is not serious). The difficulty might be removed by prefixing ב to the Inf. (so Sym.,

- 7 cannot [shall not] come in hither. Nevertheless [And] David took the stronghold 8 of Zion; the same is the city of David. And David said on that day, Whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the lame and the blind that are hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain. Wherefore they said [say], 9 The blind and the lame shall not come into the house. So [And] David dwelt in the fort [stronghold], and called it the city of David. And David built⁴ round 10 about from Millo and inward. And David went on and grew great [David kept growing greater and greater], and the Lord God [Jehovah the God] of hosts was with him.
 11 And Hiram king of Tyre sent messengers to David, and cedar trees and carpen-12 ters and masons; and they built David an house. And David perceived that the Lord [Jehovah] had established him king over Israel, and that he had exalted⁵ his kingdom for his people Israel's sake.
 13 And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, after he was 14 come from Hebron; and there were yet sons and daughters born to David. And

- 17 But when [And] the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, [ins. and] all the Philistines came up to seek David; and David heard of 18 it, and went down⁶ to the hold. The Philistines also [And the Philistines] came and 19 spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. And David enquired of the Lord [Jehovah], saying, Shall I go up to the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into mine hand? And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto David, Go up; for I will doubtless 20 [certainly] deliver the Philistines into thine hand. And David came to Baal-perazim,⁷ and David smote them there, and said, The Lord [Jehovah] hath broken forth upon [broken asunder] mine enemies before me as the breach of waters. Therefore 21 he called the name of that place Baal-perazim. And there they left [they left there] their images,⁸ and David and his men burned them [took them away].
 22 And the Philistines came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of 23 Rephaim. And when [om. when] David enquired of the Lord [Jehovah], [ins. and]

* [Ver. 8. In this sentence there are three points of difficulty: 1) the construction of וַיֵּלֶךְ , whether it is to be joined to the preceding protasis, or regarded as beginning the apodosis, that is, whether the whole sentence is to be taken as protasis, the apodosis being omitted (so Then., Philipsson, Cohen, Eng. A. V., which supplies the apodosis from 1 Chr. xi. 6), or as containing protasis and apodosis (so Böttch., Ew., Erdmann). 2) The pointing and construction of וַיֵּלֶךְ , and 3) the meaning of וַיֵּלֶךְ . * [Ver. 17. 1 Chr. xiv. 8: "And went out before them (= against them)." The Chr. omits the details of the movement, but this does not show that he could not reconcile the "went down" of Sam. with the preceding (against Wellh.). Nor is there any good reason why the same narrator should not apply the same word (וַיֵּלֶךְ "hold") to two different places in consecutive paragraphs. It is a common noun, and moreover the use in ver. 9 is defined in ver. 7 by the phrase "of Zion."—Ta.]

The difference between the texts in Sam. and Chr. is obvious, perhaps in the latter an attempt at greater clearness; the meaning is the same in both. It is not necessary to supply anything here after "go up" (לָעָלוֹ), since the word implies "going to meet."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Vers. 6-16. Victory over the Jebusites, conquest of the citadel of Zion, and fixing of Jerusalem as the capital.—In keeping with the reminder of the elders that he had before led the people out and in to battle and victory, David now proceeds without delay to fulfil the warlike duties that devolved on him as king of Israel against the external enemies of the kingdom; for a principal condition of the establishment of internal unity and of the vigorous theocratic development of the national life was the purging of the land from the still powerful remains of the Canaanitish peoples.

Vers. 6-10. See the parallel 1 Chron. xi. 4-9. The two accounts agree substantially; being taken from a common source, they complement and confirm one another in particular statements, of which each has some peculiar to itself. [In respect to these differences it is important to remember that in general "Samuel" is more biographical and annalistic, "Chronicles" more historiographical.—Ta.]—Ver. 6. And the king and his men went—that is, according to the Chronicler, the Israelitish warriors who gathered around him from "all Israel," and were now united with his former soldiers—to Jerusalem against the Jebusites.—This undertaking followed immediately on the anointing in Hebron, as is evident from the statement (ver. 5) that David's reign in Jerusalem was co-extensive with his reign over all Israel (Keil). After the word "Jerusalem," instead of "unto the Jebusites . . . saying," "Chronicles" has: "that is Jebus, and there (are) the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land, and the inhabitants of Jebus said to David." Which of the two forms is nearer to the original account in the common source must remain undetermined. [Wellhausen remarks that "the original author would not have written 'Jerusalem, that is, Jebus,' but more naturally 'Jebus, that is, Jerusalem;' the Chron. inserts this statement in order to explain the transition from Jerusalem to the Jebusites—and this leads to the further remark that the Jebusites were dwelling in the land." According to this, the author of Chronicles (who wrote after the Exile) introduces this historical explanation as necessary for his time.—Ta.] The Jebusites* belonged to the great Canaanitish race (Gen. x. 6), who dwelt, when the Israelites took possession of Palestine, in the mountain-district of Judah by the Hittites and Amorites (comp. Numb. xiii. 30; Josh. xi. 3), especially at the place afterwards called Jerusalem, and under kings, Josh. x. 1, 23. Neither Joshua (Josh. xv. 8, 63; xviii. 28), who conquered the Jebusites along with other Canaanitish tribes in a battle (Josh. xi. 3 sq.), nor the children of Judah, who only got possession of the lower city (Judg. i. 8; comp. Jos. Ant. V. 2, 2), nor the Benjaminites, to whom the city had been assigned (Josh. xviii. 28), could conquer the strong citadel of Jebus on Mount Zion, which was the centre of their dwellings spread out "in the land," that is, around Jerusalem (Judg. i. 21; xix. 11 sq.). In the time of the Judges Jebus is still called "a strange city, in which are some of the children of Israel" (Judg. xix. 12). But as long as this point was unconquered, the possession of southern and middle Palestine was unassured; and so David's first act was the siege and capture of the citadel. Relying on its hitherto invincible strength, they declared that David could not get into it; but the blind and the lame repel thee—that is, if only blind and lame defend it, thou canst not take the citadel,* "saying" (=namely, the Jebusites meant to say), "David will not come in hither." Some have supposed (after Josephus) that the Jebusites had really in derision of David put lame and blind men on the wall, trusting to the strength of their citadel; an expression that is by no means so strange (Then.) as that which regards the blind and lame as the idol-images of the Jebusites, which they had placed on their walls for protection, and had so called in order to scoff at the Israelites, who (Psalm cxv. 4 sq. et al.) described heathen idols as "blind and lame" (Cler., Luth., Wasse [de cæcis et claudis Jebusæorum, Witt., 1721]). Would the Jebusites have used such expressions of their gods?† This saying of the Je-

busites is not found in "Chronicles." [Omitted in Chron. perhaps as being obscure, or else as unnecessary to the general sense, "Chronicles" avoiding details that do not bear on its main aim, the history of the development of the theocratic cultus.—Tr.]—Ver. 7 it is briefly remarked that in spite of this braggart reliance of the Jebusites on the impregnability of their fortress, David took it. This old Jebusite city and fortress lay on the highest of the hills or mountains that surrounded Jerusalem, "Mount" Zion (2 Ki. xix. 31; Isaiah iv. 5; xxix. 8; Ps. xlviii. 3), which stretched out in the south and south-west of the city, mount Ophel and Moriah on the east (more precisely north-east) lying opposite, separated from it by a precipitous ravine. See more in Winer a. v. [and in the Bible Dictionaries and books of travel; Philippon has a good description of Jerusalem in his Comm. on this passage. It is not yet possible however to restore with precision the Jerusalem of David's time.—Tr.] The name "Zion" probably—"the dry mountain" (from צִיּוֹן "to be dry"). [See Ps. lxxviii. 17; cv. 41; Isa. xxv. 5, where the root occurs. Some take the name to mean "sunny" (Ges.), others "lofty" (Abarb. in Philippon). The rock-formation on which the city stands is limestone.—Tr.] The explanatory addition, "city of David," anticipates what is narrated in ver. 9. From this mountain, where David built (whence arose the city of David, that is, the Upper City) and resided, the city extended itself northward and eastward. [The name "City of David" was sometimes given afterwards to Jerusalem, Isa. xxix. 1; and see 1 Ki. xi. 43; xv. 8 for its use as burial-place of the kings.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. "David had said," the sense requiring the Plup. (Then.)—an appended incident of the capture in connection with the derisive words of the Jebusites. We must undoubtedly assume a reference to those words in the treatment of the following difficult and variously explained saying of David. The "blind and lame" are the Jebusites themselves, so called by David in answer to their scornful words. We must further suppose that the assailants had a difficult task before them, and were all the more embittered by the derisive remarks of the Jebusites, as David's words indicate. In the attempt to explain this obscure passage, the principal point is the meaning of the expression ba-sinnor, צִיּוֹן [Eng. A. V.: "to the gutter"]. Zinnor occurs elsewhere only Ps. xlii. 8, where the meaning assigned by several expositors (mostly with regard to our passage), "conduit, canal," does not suit at all, but the connection (in which the Psalmist speaks of the roaring of violently swelling and plunging waves) indicates the signification to be that adopted (after Sept. καρῶν καὶ ὕδατος) by Keil, Moll, Delitzsch, and others, "cataract, waterfall." Ewald accordingly translates: "Every one who conquers the Jebusites, let him cast down the precipice both the lame," etc.; and this of all the attempts at explanation is the simplest in sense and construction, suiting the locality also, since Mount Zion had steep declivities on the east, south and west, which, with the opposite-lying heights, formed deep gorges. Yet it is better with Keil to keep more strictly to the signification of the word according to Ps. xlii. 8, and to take it as meaning not with Ewald the precipitous declivity of the rock that produces the waterfall, but the waterfall itself. We are therefore not to think of an aqueduct, by cutting off which the capture of the citadel was decided (Stähelin), nor water pipes for carrying off the rain from the height (Vatab., Cler.), nor gutters (Luther), nor a subterranean passage (Joseph.). But there is nothing opposed to the supposition of a waterfall on one of the declivities. At present the south-east part of the ridge, which slopes somewhat toward the north-west (the ridge running from south to north) is still the point where appear the only springs in Jerusalem, at the foot of the declivity (comp. E. Hoffmann, Das gelobte land, 1871, p. 116 sq.). There is the pool of Siloah in the valley Tyropæon [cheesemongers' valley], on the border of Zion and Moriah, which receives its water from a lofty-lying basin hewn out of the rocky side of Zion,* into which it flows from springs that break forth higher up. Might not this be conjecturally the precipice spoken of in our passage, if the question of locality (a precise answer to which is impossible) is to be raised? But in another place also, for example, on the west, where is found the lower pool under the highest part of the north-western corner of Zion, there might be waterfalls which in the precipitous descent of the rocky declivity plunged into a gorge. According to this view, David gives strict orders that when the Jebusites are overcome in the fortress, where the space was relatively limited, their slain should be thrown into the waterfall. He calls them "the lame and the blind," taking up their own words, with reference, perhaps, at the same time, to the expression "every one that smiteth," etc.; the fallen and slain in the battle (regarded as a victory) are to be cast down † the precipice, that the citadel may be free and habitable for the Israelites. The next clause may be rendered "they hate," or "who hate," pointing the verb as 3 pl. Perf.; the absence of the Rel. Pron. (Keil) is not a decisive objection to this rendering; comp. Gen. § 123, 3; Ew. § 332, 333 b. But the connection and warlike tone make the marginal pointing (Pass. Partep.) also appropriate: "who are hated of David's soul," that is, hated by David in his "soul." Both of these admissible renderings point to the fact that the Israelites had to maintain a furious, embittered combat with this enemy who so confidently and scornfully boasted of his strong fortress, and they were directed to make short work of it with the "blind and lame" in the assault, and clear the ground of the enemy straightway. Therefore they say: Blind and lame will not come into the house.—That is, one holds no intercourse with disagreeable, hateful people like the Jebusites; or, with reference to the crippled condition of lame and blind persons, the sense is: "will not get home," like those blind and lame plunged into the precipice and unable to get back.‡ "Into the house." Some (Buns., Then.) understand by this the temple, and assume (with reference to Acts iii. 2; John ix. 1; viii. 59) an old law, forbidding the blind and the lame to enter the temple, which law the narrator derives from this incident; but this view is wholly without support. This explanation [Erdmann's explanation of the whole passage] avoids the difficulty that ensues when David's address is taken as protasis merely, and the apodosis supplied [as in Eng. A. V., Philippon]. Against Thenius' rendering: "he who smites the Jebusites (paves the way to the capture of the city, in that he first) reaches the bailllements and the lame and the blind—him David's soul envies" apart from its unwarranted changes of text*—it is rightly remarked by Böttcher that its tone is too modern: one cannot well think of David as showing envy at such a military exploit (unfortunately not open to him), in order to inflame the ardor of his warriors. Böttcher translates: "he who smites the Jebusites shall attain the staff," that is, become captain; against which it is to be remarked with Thenius that he has not succeeded in showing (Zeitschr. d. morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1857, p. 541 sq.) that sinnor means "captain's staff," and that, according to the unrestricting phrase "every one that smites," David would have had a good many staffs of the sort to bestow; and for the same reason the remark of the Chronicler (1 Chr. xi. 6, which omits our ver. 8) that "David announced that whoever first smote the Jebusites should be chief and captain, and Joab won this prize," is not to be taken as an exhibition of the sense of our passage (against Böttcher). Maurer changes the text and translates: "He who has smitten the Jebusites and reached the canal, let him slay those blind and lame," to which the objection is the tautology in protasis and apodosis. Maurer's other rendering: "whoever shall slay the Jebusites and reach with the sword either the lame or the blind, him will David's soul hate" [that is, as Maurer explains, David forbids his men to slay the Jebusites with the sword, in order that these boasters might die a shameful death.—Tr.], contains, as Thenius rightly remarks, a contradictio in adjecto, "and David would, according to this, have desired something impossible." Joab, having led the stormers in the attack, was named by David "head and prince," that is, elevated to the rank of general-in-chief of the whole army of Israel, which, according to ii. 13, he could not yet have been. [The decisive objection to Erdmann's rendering: "let him cast into the waterfall the blind," etc., is that the verb (V11) whether in Qal or in Hiphil, cannot be so translated. In Qal it means only "to reach, touch, strike," the object reached being usually introduced by 3; in Hiph. it means "to cause to touch, to join, to raze," usually followed by אל, על, עַל, or ל. In the passages most favorable to Erdmann's rendering, such as Ezek. xiii. 14; Isaiah xxvi. 5, the object introduced by the Prep. is that to which something is brought (corresponding to the signification "touch" of the verb), not that into which it is cast. Similarly, for reasons derived from the construction of the verb, we must reject the interpretation of Bib. Com.: "whosoever will smite the Jebusites, let him reach both the lame and the blind, who are the hated of David's soul, by the water-course, and he shall be chief," which, moreover, hardly renders the 1 in the first אִם (it must here = "and," though it might as an emendation of text be omitted). The natural conception of the passage would lead us to take sinnor as the object reached (so Eng. A. V., Philippon, Cahen), but it is very difficult in that case to find a satisfactory meaning for this word, or to construe the following words. Wellhausen would take it to mean some part of the body, a blow on which or violent grasping of which produces death, and Hitzig suggested the ear, others the throat (sinnor being supposed to mean a "tube"); but the absolute form of the word ("let him seize the throat") is opposed to this rendering, and the construction of the following words presents a difficulty, even if we suppose the אִם to be used as equivalent to 3. Taking sinnor (as seems safest) to mean "channel, canal," the whole context and tone suggests that "the blind and the lame" is the object of the verb "smite," or some similar verb, and it is not unlikely that the inversion of the Eng. A. V. (though an impossible translation of the present text) gives the general sense. The supplying of an apodosis is harsh, but we have here only a choice of difficulties. No defensible translation of the passage has yet been proposed, and it is natural to conjecture that the text is corrupt, though its restoration is now perhaps impossible.—Tr.]

Ver. 9. Two things are here said: 1) David took up his abode in the conquered Jebusite citadel, which with its buildings formed the Upper City, and called it the City of David. Chron.: "therefore it is called the city of David." He made it the royal residence (which was equivalent to making Jerusalem the capital), on account of its remarkable strength, through which alone the Jebusites had been able to hold it so long, and on account of its very favorable position on the border between Judah and Benjamin, almost in the centre of the land. 2) The building up of this city. And David built round about from the Millo and inward.—The Def. Art. before "Millo" shows that this work was already in existence at the time of the capture, having been founded by the Jebusites. From the connection the Millo must have belonged to the citadel on Zion and have formed a part of the fortification. This alone would set aside the explanation of the word (founded on the etymology = "a filling out") as = "outfilling embankment," an earth-wall, which ran aslant through the Wady and connected Mount Zion with the opposite-lying temple-mountain (Krafft's Topog., p. 94, Schultz, Jerus. 80, Ewald and others)—apart from the fact that that connection is shown by the latest investigations to have been not an earthwall, but a bridge resting on arches (Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, p. 223 sq.). But a comparison of Judg. ix. 6, 20, 46-49, puts it beyond doubt that Millo is the castle proper of the citadel or fortification = Bastion, a strong fortified tower or separate fortification which is called "house" in Judg. ix. 6, 20; 2 Kings xii. 21. The fort designed to protect the citadel and Upper City on Zion, lay no doubt at the point most exposed to hostile attack, that is, the northwest end of Zion, where the castle still stands. "From the Millo out" David built "around and inward," that is, while Millo formed the most advanced fortification, he built in connection with it and out from it on Zion, 1) "round-about" the city and citadel for further fortification, as was necessary especially on the north towards the Lower City, where an attack could be most easily made, and 2) "inward," so that the Upper City (City of David or of Zion) was extended by houses and defensive edifices, and more and more covered the mountain. The Chronicler (1 Chr. xi. 8) expresses substantially the same thing: "from one surrounding to the other," that is, the wholeness between the fortifications which were built around. As it is here clearly only buildings designed to fortify and extend the city on Zion that are spoken of, Josephus has misunderstood this passage when he relates (Ant. 7, 3, 2) that David surrounded the Lower City and the citadel with a wall, and united them into one. Comp. Winer, s. v. and Arnold in Herzog, s. v. "Zion" (XVIII. 623 sq.). On the extension of the Millo and the other fortifications by Solomon see 1 Kings ix. 15, 24; xi. 27. [See also 2 Chr. xxxii. 5.—Bib. Com. refers to Lewin's "Siege of Jerusalem." p. 256 sq., where it is argued from the etymology and the mentions in the Bible that the great platform, called the Haram esh-Sherif (1500 by 900 feet) was itself Millo, and Mr. Lewin thinks that Solomon's Palace (Beth-Millo, so called from abutting on Millo) was built on a terrace immediately below, and to the south of the Temple-area.—Patrick: "Some take Millo to be the low place between the fort and the city, which was now 'filled' with people."—On the "Palace of Solomon" see "Recovery of Jerusalem" (Am. Ed.) pp. 84, 91, 222, 249, and see also the remarks on the Haram esh-Sherif.—Tr.]. According to 1 Chr. xi. 9, "Joab renewed the rest of the city," that is, he restored at David's command what was destroyed in the capture. He thus seems as "chief and captain" to have been charged also with other than military affairs.—Ver. 10. General statement of the continuous advance and growth of David in power and consideration. Observe, 1) how this is referred to the highest source, not merely to God's assistance, but to the fact that God was with him, and 2) how God is in this connection called the God of Hosts.

Vers. 11-16. David's house. Building of a royal residence, and extension of his family. Comp. 1 Chr. xiv. 1-7.—And Hiram, king of Tyre, sent messengers unto David.—This name is written variously, Heb. Hiram or Huram (חִירָם 2 Chr. ii. 2), Phœnician Hirom (1 Kings v. 24, 32), Sept. Χειράμ (Cheiram), Joseph., Eiram and Eirom. That this king Hiram, who was in friendly connection with David, is the same Hiram that was Solomon's friend and ally, and his helper in building the Temple and palace, is clear not only from 2 Chron. ii. 2: "as thou hast done to David my father, (so do to me also)", but also from 1 Kings v. 15: "Hiram had always been David's friend." We can neither suppose therefore, with Ewald, that this king Hiram is the grandfather of Solomon's friend of the same name, nor with Thénius that his (our Hiram's) father is here meant, whose name according to Menander of Ephesus (in Joseph. cont. Ap. i. 18) was Abibaal, whether this be considered a surname to the proper name Hiram, or it be held that the two persons are here confounded. The occasion to this hypothesis has been given by the difference that exists between the Biblical chronological statements and those of Josephus after Menander. The latter relates (Jos. ubi sup.) that Hiram succeeded his father Abibaal, and that he died in the thirty-fourth year of his reign and the fifty-third of his life. With this is to be connected the statement of Josephus (ubi sup. and Ant. 8, 3, 1) that Solomon began the temple in the twelfth year of Hiram. Now, according to 1 Kings ix. 10 sq., Hiram was still living after twenty years of Solomon's reign, counting from the beginning of the Temple-building (and therefore twenty-four years of his reign in all) had elapsed, namely seven years for the building of the Temple (1 Kings vi. 38, and thirteen years for the building of the palace (vii. 1). On comparing these statements of the Bible and Josephus, it appears that Hiram reigned at the most eight years contemporaneously with David, and that therefore David began his palace in about the seventh year before his death, that is, in the sixty-third year of his life, and that his determination to build a temple to the Lord (which was after the completion of his palace, 2 Sam. vii. 2) was not made till the last years of his life. Both these conclusions, however, are incompatible with our passage and with ch. vii.; for the position of these two narratives in the connection of the history leaves no doubt that both things belonged to David's prime of manhood. It has indeed been declared, in order to set aside the discrepancy, that the Books of Samuel narrate events not so much in chronological order as in the connection of things, and that here the building of the palace, which occurred much later, is related in connection with other buildings (Movers, Phœniz. II. 1, 147 sq., Rüttschi in Herzog, s. v. Hiram, Stähelin, op. cit. 107). And in fact it must be admitted that David's palace-building, which must have taken time, and supposes a corresponding period of rest and peace, probably did not (as might appear from the narrative) follow immediately on the conquest of Zion, before the Philistine war (ver. 17) which broke out as soon as the Philistines heard of David's anointment as king over Israel, but after this war. "The historian has rather attached to the conquest of Zion and its choice as David's residence not only what David gradually did to strengthen and beautify the new capital, but also the account of his wives and the children that were born to him in Jerusalem" (Keil). But though in detached instances a topical rather than a chronological arrangement of the material is to be recognized, it is nevertheless not probable in itself that David would have deferred the building of a royal palace till the last part of his life; and further, this, as Winer rightly observes, would not accord with ch. xi. 2, where the palace whence David sees Bathsheba is called the "king's palace," which is to be understood, not of the simple house that David took as his dwelling-place on Mount Zion immediately after its capture, but of the place that he had had built for himself there. Comp. vii. 1, 2. And if the affair with Bathsheba occurred when David was an old man, which is in itself highly improbable, Solomon, who was born a couple of years later, would have been a little child when he ascended the throne. If David had not resolved on the building of the Temple till in advanced life, or towards the close of his life, we could not harmonize this fact with 1 Sam. vii. 12, and 1 Chr. xxii. 9, according to which Solomon was not yet born when David received the divine promise there mentioned. If therefore the account of the palace-building is in this place chronologically anticipatory, the building is nevertheless not to be put towards the end of David's reign. We are therefore forced to assume a longer reign for king Hiram, and to suppose inaccuracies in the chronological statements of Josephus, as has been shown to be true in the periods of reign of the succeeding Tyrian kings, even when he refers to Menander. See more in Movers (ubi supra) and Keil on this verse.—[On Tyre see Movers and Arts. in Bib. Dict.—Ta.]

It is not said that the object of this embassy, as in Solomon's case (1 Kings ix. 15), was to congratulate David on his accession to the throne (Then.), and this is improbable from the length of time (presupposed in his purpose to build) that must have elapsed since his accession. We should rather infer from the sending of cedar wood and workmen along with the messengers, that David had previously put himself in connection with Hiram, partly to maintain a good understanding with a powerful neighbor, partly and especially to obtain the help of this king (who was renowned for his magnificent edifices, Mov. II. 1, 190 sq.) in his building plans.—The eastern part of Lebanon (Antilibanus), which belonged to Israel, produced only firs, pines and cypresses (Rob. Pal. III. 723)*; the northwestern part, which alone was covered with cedar-forests, and furnished the best cedar for building, belonged to Phœnicia. On account of its strength, durability, beauty and fragrance, the cedar-wood was much used for costly building and wainscoting.—Through Tyrian workmen David began the splendid structures of cedar in Jerusalem, which had so increased in Jeremiah's time that he could exclaim to the city: "Thou dwellest on Lebanon and makest thy nest in the cedars" [Jer. xxii. 23].

Ver. 12. And David perceived, namely, from his success externally against Israel's enemies and in the connection with the friendly king of Tyre, and internally in the establishment of unity in Israel and in the execution of his plans, that the Lord had established him king over Israel; the "established" (in contrast with the previous divine choice of David as king and the fate of Saul's kingdom) refers to the divine providences, through which, as David clearly saw, all doubt as to the permanence of his kingdom was ended, and it immovably established. And that he had exalted his kingdom (Chron. : "and that his kingdom was exalted on high" [I. xiv. 2]) for his people Israel's sake, that is, not for the sake of the blessing that rested on his people Israel (Bunsen), nor simply because he had chosen them (Then.), but because he wished to rule them as his (chosen) people through David's kingdom, glorify himself in them and make them a great and mighty people according to his covenant-faithfulness.

Vers. 13-16. Account of the growth of David's house and family, appended to the summary statement concerning the establishment of his kingdom and his palace-building. Concubines and wives.—David follows the custom of eastern princes, and gathers a numerous harem. See the law against this, Deut. xvii. 17. The "concubines" are mentioned first in order to bring out prominently the extension of the harem, as an essential part of oriental court-state, and as a symbol of royal power. The omission of the "concubines" in 1 Chr. xiv. 3 is not to be regarded as intentional (against Then.), for David's concubines are mentioned in 1 Chr. iii. 9.—"From Jerusalem" (יְרוּשָׁלַם) is not "elsewhere than in Jerusalem," which view (Keil) cannot be based on the following words, "after he came from Hebron," but (because of this very chronological statement) = "from, that is, out of Jerusalem," substantially agreeing with Chron.: "in Jerusalem." After changing his residence from Hebron to Jerusalem, David took concubines and wives in the latter place also.—The statement: sons and daughters were born to him shows clearly that, in all these summary accounts concerning family and building, a greater space of time than at the beginning of his reign is assumed; and this statement is here put proleptically not only before the following notice of the Philistine wars, but also before the narrative concerning Bathsheba. For among the sons of David (given in 1 Chr. xiv. 5-7, and also in iii. 5-8) occur here first the names of the four sons of Bathsheba: Shammua, Shobab, Nathan and Solomon. For Shammua Chron. (I. iii. 5) has Shimea, and for Elishua it has (ver. 6) Elishama, a clerical error from the following Elishama. After Elishua, 1 Chr. iii. 6, and xiv. 6 sq. have the two names Eliphalet (or Elpalet) and Nogah. This last is not to be taken as miswriting of Nepheg (Mov.). Thenius supposes that the latter (Nogah) has fallen out of our text by oversight, and that the former (Eliphalet) got into the text of Chron. by mistake from the following verse (ver. 16), that David had, therefore, only eight sons, not nine (as in 1 Chr. iii. 8) born in Jerusalem.—Keil thinks that the names of these two sons are omitted in our passage because they died early, and the late-born Eliphalet (whose name stands last) received the name of his dead brother; but the question is involved in doubt. According to the former view David had in all eighteen sons, according to the latter nineteen, of whom six were born in Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 2 sq.). Instead of Eliada 1 Chron. xiv. 7 has Beeliada, another form of the name, with Baal [= lord] instead of El [= God]. No daughter is named (see ver. 13), because daughters are in general not considered in genealogical lists. The only daughter that appears by name in the following history is Tamar, chap. xiii. 1. [Patrick: Kimchi says that Sam. gives the sons of the wives only, Chron., those of wives and con-

II. Vers. 17–25. David's victories over the Philistines, 1 Chr. xiv. 8–17.—Ver. 17. And when the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel—this was the occasion of the war. From David's elevation to the throne of all Israel and the consequent unification of the people, the Philistines feared (and did their best to prevent) such increase in his power as would endanger their power and foothold not only in Palestine [Israel], but also in their own land. Hence, according to the narrative, their attack followed on the receipt of intelligence of his anointment, which must have come on them as a surprise. Ewald conjectures (but it is a mere conjecture, and unnecessary) that the occasion of the war was David's withholding the tribute that he had paid the Philistines while he was in Hebron.—And all the Philistines marched up, namely, from the lowlands of Judah which they held, or from their own land against the Israelitish army (with which David had attacked the Jebusites) which was on the mountain-plateau of Judah. As this Jebusite war followed immediately on David's anointment (comp. vers. 3, 6), and the gathering of all the Philistines was not the affair of a moment, it is for this reason alone an untenable view that these two victories "probably belonged in the interval between the second anointment at Hebron and the capture of Zion" (Keil). But the following words: And when David heard of it, he marched down to the hold, are decisive, for the reference (as the context shows) is here to Mount Zion, which is mentioned just before (vers. 7, 9); and this is proved also by the Def. Art., which (from the context) cannot refer to some other stronghold in Judah resorted to by David in Saul's time (so Keil, who cites xxiii. 14), but points to the citadel of Zion which is here twice named with emphasis as the centre of David's position. The expression "he went down to the hold" is not against this view; for, though the citadel of Zion was so high that one ascended to it from all sides, yet its plateau was by no means a horizontal plain, but was made up of higher and lower parts, and David of course made his residence on the highest and safest part, the most favorable position for a military outlook, while the fortifications most protective against the enemy (enlarged by him, ver. 9) must certainly have lain on the relatively lower north-western side (in accordance with their design), and with this agrees the fact that the Philistines advanced to the attack from the west. David, accordingly, on hearing of the approach of the Philistines, went down from his residence to the fortifications on Zion, in order to make at this rendezvous and rally-point of his army the necessary preparations whether for defence (Maur.) or for attack. Maurer: "David was not yet certain whether to defend himself at the walls, or to advance to meet the enemy," comp. ver. 19. There is no need, therefore, to change the text*

(Syr., Mich., Dathe) to "siege" (besiegers), the narrative giving no hint of a siege. It is by no means sure (Then.) from xxiii. 13, 14, that the hold here referred to is the cave of Adullam; for, even if the incident here related was an episode in this Philistine war, it may very well have occurred after David had left the citadel to march against the Philistines, while they were encamped in the valley of Rephaim. [Still, the impression made on us is that David went down into the plain against the Philistines; thus in ver. 20 he does not go down, but comes to Baal-perazim, as if he were already in the plain. Perhaps the editor has here inserted a separate narrative of this war, so that the "hold" here may be different from the "hold" in ver. 9. Adullam was a strong place, and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7). If we take the narrative in xxiii. 13–17 to belong to the time of this war, it would show that David was at one time hard pressed; but this cannot be determined with certainty.—Tr.]—The phrase: "to seek David," cannot prove that David had at this time not yet taken up his residence on Zion (Keil), but only that the aim of the Philistines was to get possession of the person of David so dangerous to them.—Ver. 18. The strategical position of the Philistines. Instead of our text-word "spread themselves," 1 Chron. xiv. 9 has "made an inroad" (נכסו). The valley of Rephaim, according to Josh. xv. 8, was a fruitful plain,* nearly three miles long by two wide, separated from the valley of Ben-hinnom (south and south-west of Jerusalem) by a ridge, and large enough to hold a large army in camp; it was named after the old Canaanitish giant-tribe, the Rephaim (Gen. xiv. 5). Comp. Rob. I. 365 [Am. Ed. I. 219, 469], Tobl., Top. Jerus. II. 401 sq., and 8 Wand. 202, Winer II. 322, Thénien in Kämpfer's Stud. II. 137 sq. [For various opinions see Kitto, Porter, Bonar, Fürst.—Tr.] The Philistines had probably advanced from the west by way of Bethshemesh (comp. 1 Sam. vi. 9).

Ver. 19. David inquires of the Lord (comp. ii. 1; 1 Sam. xxiii. 2), 1) whether he shall march out against the Philistines, and 2) whether he shall get the victory over them. The expression "shall I go up?" is explained by the fact that David has led his army down from Mount Zion, the defence of which he had first to keep in view. He now advances to the attack from his position in the plain, which lay lower than the Philistines, perhaps near the cave of Adullam (Then.), after having inquired of the Lord and received an affirmative answer. He no doubt made a sudden impetuous attack, as is clear from the meaning of the name "Baal-perazim," the place where he "smote" the Philistines. He said, namely (referring the victory to the Lord according to the Lord's answer, ver. 19): "The Lord hath broken asunder (or through) my enemies before me as the breach of waters," that is, as a violent torrent makes a rift or breach. All other explanations, that make the point of comparison the division of the water-mass itself, depart from the conception of the expression, and weaken the force of the image. The place where the battle was fought was thus called, from the way that David won it, Water-breach, "Bruchhausen, Brechendorf" (Keil) [Breach-ham, Break-thorpe—the Heb. name = "possessor of breach-es."—Tr.]. It cannot have been far from the Valley of Rephaim. In Isa. xxviii. 21 it is called (with allusion to this battle) "mount" Perazim. This fills out the topographical description of the place, and in exact accordance with the name "water-breach." As a torrent plunging from the mountain rends asunder everything before it, so David rushed with his army suddenly and unexpectedly on the Philistines, from a gorge opening into the valley of Rephaim, burst through and scattered them with impetuous and irresistible power. Perhaps he marched northward around the position of the Philistines, and attacked them from the rocky height (the border of the valley of Hinnom), that bounds the valley of Rephaim on the north, comp. Josh. xv. 8.—Ver. 21. And there they left their images behind, which they were doubtless accustomed to carry with them to war, in order to make the victory more certain.† Clericus: "as if they would feel the help of the gods more present, if they had their statues along. Perhaps they imitated the Hebrews, who sometimes carried the ark of God into camp." Their abandonment of their sacred images confirms the supposition (founded on the name of the scene of battle) that David made a sudden attack. Chron. has (by way of explanation) "gods" instead of "images." According to our passage David took them away as spoil; according to Chron., they were at David's command burned with fire. It cannot be determined whether this text of Chron. is an addition from another source (Movers), or taken from the same source as our text (Keil), or an explanatory remark of the Chronicler himself according to Deut. vii. 5, 25, where the burning of heathen idols is prescribed. Thus the disgrace of the Philistine capture of the Ark was wiped out.

Vers. 22–25. Second invasion by the Philistines and victory over them.—Ver. 22. Their approach is described (as ver. 17) by the phrase: came up. They had therefore fled as far as the lowland on the west, but, as David had not pursued them, soon assembled again. They advance (as ver. 18) to the valley of Rephaim. Chron. (ver. 13) has simply: "in the valley," Rephaim being understood from the context, and in fact supplied by Sept., Syr. and Arab. [Joseph., Ant. 7, 4, 1: "let no one suppose that the Philistines brought a small force against the Hebrews; all Syria and Phœnicia and many other warlike nations fought with them; only thus could they march against the Hebrews after their frequent defeats." But this assertion is unsupported and not necessary to explain the recuperation of the powerful Philistines. Josephus was anxious to magnify the prowess of his own nation.—Tr.]—Ver. 23. David again inquires of the Lord [Jos.: through the high-priest]. The words: "thou shalt not go up," suppose the question (as in ver.

19): shall I go up? The negative answer: "go not up" refers to the height, up to which David had gone in the first battle, in order thence to fall on the Philistines; for this time they had doubtless guarded against a surprise on that side. If their front was now in that direction, the addition of the Sept.: "to meet them," and Vulg.: "against them (= in front)," may be regarded as a correct explanation; but there is no necessity, as Then. supposes, for supplementing the

Heb. text with this expression (לִקְרָאתָם).—Make a detour to their rear.—Chron.: "go not up behind them,* but turn from them, and come on them." David was to fall on their rear opposite the "baca-trees." These (mentioned only here and 1 Chron. xiv. 14) are not pear-trees (Sept., Vulg., Aq., Rosenmüller, Bibl. Pflanzenreich, p. 249) or mulberry-trees (Jewish expositors, Luth. [Eng. A. V.]), but shrub-like baca-trees, which grow especially about Mecca (called Baca by the Arabs), similar to the balsam-shrub, from which they differ only in having longer leaves and larger round fruit (according to Abulfadli in Cels. Hierob. I. 338 sq.; comp. Niebuhr, Beschreibung, 339, Faber in Harmer's Beobacht. über d. Orient, I. 400, and Burckhardt Reise in Syrien, etc., 977, who found a baca-valley near Sinai). See Winer I. s. v. The name is probably derived from a verb meaning "to weep" (בָּכָה = בָּכָה), because when the leaves are broken or cut off, a tear-like sap exudes. Comp. the "valley of Baca" = "valley of weeping, tear-dale" [Pa. lxxxiv. 6].—[For further opinions and details see Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Mulberry-tree.—Tr.]—The connection and the local presuppositions of the narrative put it beyond doubt that these baca-trees stood somewhere in the valley of Rephaim.—Ver. 24.† And when thou hearest the sound of a going.‡ . . . The sound produced by human steps (1 Kings xiv. 6; 2 Kings vi. 32), here the sound of an advancing army, is (as in Gen. iii. 8) employed as the symbol of the approach of the Lord—in the tops of the baca-trees, they, namely, being moved by a strong wind [Jos.: "while no wind was blowing."—Tr.]; the sound thus produced would indicate the advance of the Lord with His invisible hosts; it was to be the sign that He Himself would march before the army of Israel with His victorious might, comp. 1 Kings xix. 11 sq. So Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 2, 3) and Elisha (2 Kings vi. 17) behold in vision the guardian hosts of God. Then be sharp, that is, rush quickly to the attack [bestir thyself]! Chron. weaker and probably not original: "go out to battle." The ground: For then will the Lord go out before thee, etc., he should know by the above sign that the time appointed by the Lord for a sharp attack and for the revelation of His helping power was come. [The sound of going in the trees seems here represented by the narrative as supernatural, not produced by wind.—Instead of "in the tops," etc., Patrick renders: "in the beginnings," etc. (Neh. iii. 10), that is, at the Exact carrying out of the divine directions, and bestowal of the promised divine aid.—David smote the Philistines from Geba as far as the region of Gezer.—The direction of the battle and flight is determined by the position of Gezer to be from south-east to north-west, whatever the position of Geba be held to be. Gezer or Gazer (1 Chron. xiv. 16), Gazer and Gazera (Sept.), afterwards Gazara (2 Mac. x. 32; Jos. Ant. 8, 6, 1) or Gadara (Joseph. Ant. 5, 1, 22; 12, 7, 14) and Gadaris (Strabo XVI. 759)—an old Canaanitish royal city (Josh. xii. 12), belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, who did not drive the Canaanites out of it (Josh. xvi. 9, 10; Judg. i. 29), in the south of Ephraim (whose border passed from Lower Beth-horon over Gezer to the sea north of Jopps), north-west of Beth-horon on the western declivity of Mount Ephraim, where the latter sank into the Philistine plain (Plain of Sharon). Solomon fortified it, along with other important military positions (1 Kings ix. 15-17), inasmuch as it formed a strong defence towards the south against the Philistines; for "from this point an army might penetrate into the country and reach the capital far more easily than over the mountains of Judah" (see Then. and Bähr in loco). It is noteworthy that this place plays an important part as fortress in the Maccabean time also, and that the route taken by Judas Maccabeus from Emmaus to Gazer (1 Mac. iv. 15) and from Adasa to Gazer (1 Mac. vii. 45) is the same as this, namely, the north-westerly. Gerlach), neither of which could here come into consideration as a military position—but it is the place known from 1 Sam. xiii. 15-23 as the camping-ground of Saul and Jonathan, on the southern border of the Wady-es-Suweinit, opposite Michmash (now Mukhmas) which is on the northern border of the Wady, where Rob. found a place Jeba (with ruins) still existing. The battle therefore passed from the valley of Rephaim on the west of Jerusalem about nine miles northward to the plateau of Geba, where the Philistines vainly tried to make a stand, and, having the deep gorge of Michmash before them, took a north-westerly direction towards Beth-horon and Gezer. Here the pursuit ceased, because the Philistines were driven into the plain, and no danger could be apprehended from them. According to Joseph. (Ant. 7, 4, 1) Gazer was then their extreme northern limit. On the great extension of their power northward comp. Stark, Gaza, 170.—[Gibeon (instead of Geba) is here preferred by many critics, because Gibeon lies more nearly on the road from Rephaim to Gezer; but the pursuit may easily have gone first north to Geba and then west to Gezer, as Erdmann points out. It is not to be expected, however, that we can settle with absolute certainty these minute geographical points.—The phrase: "till thou come to Gezer," does not necessarily mean: "up to Gezer," but, like the similar expression: "as thou goest," may = "on the way to." See on 1 Sam. xviii. 8.—Tr.]

In reference to the chronological relation of the account here, vers. 17-25, and that in 1 Chr. xiv. 8-17 it is to be remarked that the two differ, in that the former puts these victories without further statement in the beginning of David's government over all Israel, the latter in the interval between the unsuccessful and the successful attempts to remove the Ark. "Whether this exacter statement of time is correct cannot be determined with certainty" (Stähelin, ubi sup., p. 37).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. In his first royal deed of arms David, by a victory over the last Canaanites of any power that were left, completed the conquest of the land for the Lord's covenant-people, and thus concluded the military work that was first entrusted by divine command to Joshua (Josh. i. 1-9), but had been completed neither by him, nor by the Judges, nor by Saul. The result of this first exploit against the Jebusites was the firm establishment of the royal rule in the strongest position and in the centre of the land.

2. In David's person and government the Covenant-God, the King of His people, takes His royal seat on Mount Zion, and the city that David builds there is (with old Jerusalem under Zion) called, as being the theocratic dwelling-place and holy city of God, the "city of the great King" (Matt. v. 35). In the historical books the "City of David" (ver. 9) always has the narrower signification of the old Upper City or David's city, being used only in poetry of the whole city (Isa. xxii. 9; comp. xxxi. 1) while according to 1 Kings viii. 2: 2 Chronicles vi. 2; 1 Chronicles xv. 1, 29; it is distinctly differentiated from Jerusalem as a whole. So "Zion" in the historical books means originally only Mount Zion, on which the city of David lay, but is used by Poets and Prophets for Jerusalem in general, in allusion to its character as God's royal dwelling-place and throne (see Arnold, "Zion" in Herzog XVIII., Hupfeld in Zeitschr. d. deutsch. morgenl. ges. XV., p. 224, Rem. 67). From the time of David's making his residence on Mount Zion dates in the theocratic language of the Old Covenant the terminology of God's royal dwelling and enthronement in the midst of His people on His regnal seat, "Mount Zion." See Ps. iii. 5 [4]: "He hears me from His holy mountain." Ps. ix. 12 [11]: "Sing ye to the Lord, who is enthroned on Zion." Ps. xv. 1; xxiv. 3; Isa. viii. 18; Joel iv. 16, 21, and other passages. "Zion" is the royal seat of the future Anointed of the Lord, of whom David with his theocratical kingdom is the type, and concerning whom the promise in ch. vii. comes to him, the fulfillment of which is the matter of the prophetic declaration in Pa. ii., lxxxix., cx. Mount Zion is the geographical-historical symbol of the dominion of the Messiah to be sent by God to His people, and of the extension of the Messianic kingdom of God from this as centre. Hengstenberg on Pa. ii. 6: "Zion, the holy mountain of the Lord, is the fitting seat for His king; for as after David's time it was the centre of Israel, so is it destined to become some day the centre of the world, for from Zion goes forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. ii. 3).

3. The military stamp of the first part of David's reign is the pre-indication of the military character of the whole of it. That the theocracy in Israel may be developed, he purges the land of the remains of the heathen, extends the borders of Israel, and secures for the people the possession of the land and the maintenance of their boundaries by mighty victories over all their enemies. In the Psalms of David we hear the echo of this warlike and victorious theocracy. They are mostly songs of conflict and victory in praise of the God who saved His people from their enemies. Pa. ix. may serve as an example of them all, much of it corresponding with David's experiences in these first wars and victories, though it cannot be said that it was composed with special reference thereto.

4. Several prominent features characteristic of the prophetic-theocratical historiography appear in this section (which embraces the elevation of David to the throne of Israel, his wars against internal and external enemies): 1) the relation between king and people is described as essentially a covenant before the Lord (ver. 3); 2) it is declared to be the task and calling of the theocratic king to be shepherd and captain of the people (ver. 2); 3) the reference of all the king's successes to the highest and last source, the God of Sabaoth, who was with him, whereby all his own human merit is excluded (ver. 10); 4) the conception of all these events whereby David's kingdom was confirmed and recognized even by the powerful heathen king of Tyre, through whose friendly relations with David it was exalted and honored at home and abroad, as ordinations of God, the object of which was to establish David's kingdom as a divine institution, and give him the assurance that he was confirmed by the Lord immediately as king over Israel (ver. 12); 5) the repeated exhibition of David's humble subjection of his will to the will of God, which he seeks and asks after, that he may have a sure path in what he is to do, which path the divine answer shows him (vers. 19, 23); and 6) the express declaration of David's unconditional active obedience to the Lord's will, which is revealed to him in a definite Yes and No (ver. 25).

5. All the powers and goods of the world which have their origin in the might and goodness of God, are employed by Him also for the ends of His wisdom in the government of His kingdom of grace (which is founded on His positive self-revelation) and of His people. The help of the heathen king in David's Zion-buildings (and so in Solomon's Temple) sets forth the great truth that all the art and treasures of the lower, natural world are to be subservient to the higher world, which has entered humanity through the kingdom of God, and to contribute to the glorification of the name of God. Bähr on 1 Kings v. 15-32: "Israel was destined not to foster the arts, but to be the bearer of divine revelation, and to secure for all nations the knowledge of the one living and holy God; thereto had God chosen this people out of all peoples, and therewith is closely connected its manner of life and occupation, yea, its whole development and history. To the attainment of this its destiny the other nations had to contribute with the special gifts and powers which had been lent them. Israel, in spite of faults and errors, stood as high above the Phenicians in the knowledge of the truth, as they above Israel in technic and artistic performances (comp. Duncker, Gesch. u. Alterth., p. 317-320); distinguished as was Phoenicia for arts and industries, its religion was nevertheless the most perverted and its cultus the rudest (Duncker, ubi sup., 155 sq.)."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 6-9. The stronghold on Mount Zion*: 1) How it is gained: a) by holy war against the enemies of God's kingdom; b) by holy victory, which God vouchsafes. 2) How it is maintained: a) in defiance of God's enemies, and b) as a reliance for God's friends.

Vers. 10-12. The true kingdom by the grace of God: 1) It is firmly founded through the Lord's power; 2) It grows and prospers under the Lord's blessing; 3) It renders subservient to itself the Lord's enemies; 4) It serves the Lord in the Lord's people.—Ver. 12. The true salutary relation between government and people rests on two things: 1) That the people recognize the authorities as set over them by God's grace, and honor them. 2) That the authorities regard themselves as constituted by God only for the people's welfare, and fulfil their calling to that end.

Vers. 17-25. The war-counsel from on high: 1) How it is inquired after—by looking above. 2) How it is imparted—by the voice from above. 3) How it is carried out—by help from above.—Victory comes from the Lord: 1) When it is beforehand humbly asked for according to the Lord's will and word; 2) When the battle is undertaken in the Lord's name and for His cause; 3) When it is fought with obedient observation of the Lord's directions and guidance.

The Lord will go out before thee (ver. 24): 1) A word of consolation in sore distress; 2) A word of encouragement amid inward conflict; 3) A word of exhortation to unconditional obedience of faith; 4) A word of assurance of the victory which the Lord gives.

The rustling of the Lord's approaching help in the tops of the trees (ver. 24): 1) Dost thou wait for it at His bidding? 2) Dost thou hear it with the right heed? 3) Dost thou understand it in the right sense? 4) Dost thou follow it without delay?

* [There is here an allusion to Luther's famous hymn, Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott.—Ta.]

Vers. 6-9. KRUMMACHER: David dwells now in Mount Zion, the crown of the land, and from here on begins the history of Jerusalem, which as the history of a city has not its like in grandeur, in change of fortunes, and in importance for the whole world.—Now exalted to heaven, now cast down to hell, thrice destroyed to the foundations and always rising again from the ruins, now given up to the heathen, plundered, covered with shame, and then again crowned with the highest honors, the city stands on its seven hills amid the cities of the earth as a high seven-branched candlestick, from which shines forth into the world both the consuming flame of God's holiness and justice, and the mild and blessed light of the divine long-suffering, love, compassion and covenant-faithfulness.—Ver. 6 sq. S. SCHMID: In that which God has commanded, we must not look to what others have done before us, but to God's command (1 Sam. xv. 22, 23).—SCHLIER: The Lord, who delivered Jerusalem's stronghold into David's hand, still lives to-day, and will, so far as it is good for us, always help us still in every time of need, and well is it for all them that trust in Him.

Ver. 10. [HENRY: Those that have the Lord of hosts for them need not fear what hosts of men or devils can do against them. Those who grow great must ascribe it to the presence of God with them, and give Him the glory of it.—TR.]—BERL. BIBLE: The world thinks little of it when it is said, God be with a man. But it is assuredly no trifle, it is the greatest of all things, for one to have with him the God of all the hosts of heaven and earth.—KRUMMACHER: O blessed is the man on whose heart nothing so presses as this, that in all his doings he may be with God and God with him.—Ver. 11. CRAMER: A glorious testimony that even the heathen will serve Christ.—STARKE: God knows how to incline towards pious rulers the minds of neighboring princes and kings, so that they may show them all friendly good-will (Prov. xxi. 1).—Ver. 12. J. LANGE: Great lords exist for the sake of their subjects, not these for their sake: O that the fact might be recognized!—[Vers. 13-16. SCOTT: Alas! even good men are apt to grow secure and self-indulgent in prosperity, and to sanction by their example those abuses which they should oppose or repress; and all our returns for the Lord's mercies are deeply tinged with ingratitude.—TR.]

Ver. 17. SCHLIER: Then might David clearly enough see that there is appointed to man no true resting-time upon earth. David's life was a warfare, and from one strife it went on into another, and when he thought to have found rest, then battle and strife began anew. Our life upon earth is not yet the resting-time; what awaits us is strife and warfare.—CRAMER: The pious never cease to encounter opposition; therefore whoever wishes to be pious, let him prepare for this (Luke xiv. 28).—KRUMMACHER: The old enemy of Israel stood again in arms upon the plain. God the Lord knows how to mingle always with the encouragements which He gives His friends so much also of the humbling as suffices to secure them against the danger of losing their equilibrium.

Ver. 19 sqq. SCHLIER: Whatever we undertake then, we must look to the Lord in beginning it, and it should be to us a matter of earnest concern that we may really have the Lord's word and will on our side.—So long as we have a good cause, we too may comfort ourselves with the help of the Lord; but what does it help if we pray and have a bad cause, or use God's word, and yet do not walk in the Lord's ways! God's word and prayer make no bad cause good, but help only when we undertake a good, God-pleasing work. And there is one more thing we must not overlook if we wish really to have the Lord's help, namely, that we must be acting only and entirely for the Lord's cause and honor. How did it stand, properly speaking, between Israel and the Philistines? On the one side was the Lord, and on the other the idols; there was the Lord's people, and here an idolatrous or heathen people. So the conflict was the cause of the Lord; the Lord's name and kingdom was in question; David's defeat would have been the Lord's defeat; a victory for David was the Lord's victory.

Ver. 20. BERL. BIBLE: David will not agree that the honor of the victory which he has gained by the help of God's goodness shall be ascribed to him, but rather to God.—CRAMER: Believers when they have been rescued from distress should heartily thank God for it, and recognize that the victory comes from Him; for He fights for His Church (Pa. l. 15; cxv. 1).—Ver. 21. BERL. BIB.: Men do not commonly let their idols go until they have been smitten by God, and do not quite let them go even then.

Vers. 23-25. KRUMMACHER: It rustles in the tops of the baka-trees, as if an invisible host were passing over them. We know what this meant for him. Nothing less than what was once meant for Jacob by his dream of the heavenly ladder, for Moses by the burning bush that was not consumed, for Elijah by the still, small voice on Horeb, and for Saul by the light which shone round him from heaven. The Lord was near and would go out for him.—BERL. BIBLE: God Himself gives to those who tranquilly trust in Him to know His will, and also places them in a position to be able to carry it out.—KRUMMACHER: The word of the Lord: "As soon as thou shalt hear the rustling in the tops . . . bestir thyself," applies figuratively to us also in our spiritual conflict with the children of unbelief in the world. There too it comes to nothing that one should make war with his own prowess and merely in the human equipment of reason and science. Success can only be reckoned on when the conflict is waged amid the blowing of the Holy Spirit's breath and with the immediate gracious presence of the Lord and of the truth of His word.—[HENRY: But observe, though God promised to go before them and smite the Philistines, yet David, when he heard the sound of this going, must bestir himself, and be ready to pursue the victory. God's grace must quicken our endeavors. Phil. ii. 12, 13.—TR.]

[Vers. 6, 7. Men are prone to rely on strong fortifications, so as to feel no fear of successful attack, and no need of help from God. So at a later period the men of the southern kingdom were at ease in this same Zion, and those of the northern kingdom trusted in the mountain of

Samaria, which was also a very strong place, and neither Judah nor Israel felt that their help came from Jehovah (Amos vi. 1-8). The same principle applies as to all reliance on mere human agencies, without recognizing our dependence on God; for example, on religious societies and boards, eloquent preachers, active pastors, famous revivalists, beautiful houses of worship, etc.—Tr.]

And David arose and went with all the people that were with him from Baale of Judah, to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubims [which is called by the name of Jehovah of hosts who sitteth on the cherubim].² And they set [transported] the ark of God upon a new cart, and brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah [on the hill]; and Uzzah and

¹ [Ver. 1. Wellhausen supposes that עָרַךְ came from the misunderstanding of הָרָךְ, as if the verb were from רָכַשׁ, which regularly takes עָרַךְ (comp. 1 Sam. xviii. 29); but see the explanation in the Exposition.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 2. So substantially Cahen, Wellhausen, Bib. Com.; Philipsson repeats the word "name," and Erdmann renders: "where (שָׁם) is invoked the name of the Lord of hosts, who is enthroned on the cherubim over it."—It is clear, however, that עָרַךְ is the complement of the Rel. אֲשֶׁר, and the second שָׁם is better omitted with Sept., Vulg., Chald., Arab., and one MS. of Kennicott. As to the number of words between the Rel. and its complement, such a massing up of dependent phrases is unusual, but not impossible; and the sentence may have been originally simpler (as Wellh. suggests) אֲשֶׁר נָקַשׁ שָׁם ^ עָרַךְ, and the appositional phrase afterwards added.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 4. This clause is omitted by Erdmann (so Sept.). But it is doubtful whether the whole verse had not better be omitted (as in 1 Chron. xiii.), for it adds nothing to the preceding. In that case the last clause might be regarded as a marginal explanation which early got into the text.—Thenius thinks that the incorrect repetition of the first clause has occasioned the dropping out of the words: "and Uzzah went," before the words: "with the ark of God," and Wellh. adds that it has also occasioned the change of the appellative אָחִיו, "his brother," into the proper name, אֲחִיו, "Ahio."—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 5. This is the reading in 1 Chron. xiii. 8. Sept.: עָרַךְ.—Tr.]

- 7 the ark of God and took hold of it, for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error;⁸ and there he died [he died there] by the ark of God. And David was displeased because the Lord [Jehovah] had made a breach upon Uzzah; and he called the name of the [that] place⁹ Perez-uzzah to this day. And David was afraid of the Lord [Jehovah] that day, and said, How shall the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] come to me? So David would not remove the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] unto him into¹⁰ the city of David, but David carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. And the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] continued in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite three months; and the Lord [Jehovah] blessed Obed-edom¹¹ and all his household.
- 12 And it was told king David, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] hath blessed the house of Obed-edom and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of God. So [And] David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-edom into the city of David with gladness. And¹² it was so [it came to pass] that when they that bare the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] had gone six paces, he sacrificed oxen and fatlings. And David danced before the Lord [Jehovah] with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod. So [And] David and all the house of Israel brought up the ark¹³ of the Lord [Jehovah] with shouting and with the [om. the] sound of the [om. the] trumpet.
- 16 And as the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] came into the city of David, Michal, Saul's daughter, looked through a [the] window, and saw king David leaping and dancing before the Lord [Jehovah]; and she despised him in her heart. And they brought in the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] and set it in his [its] place in the midst of the tabernacle that David had pitched for it; and David offered burnt-offerings¹⁴ and peace-offerings¹⁵ before the Lord [Jehovah]. And as soon as David had made [And David made] an end of offering [ins. the] burnt-offerings and [ins. the] peace-offerings, [ins. and] he blessed the people in the name¹⁶ of the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts. And he dealt among [dealt out to] all the people, even among [to] the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as [ins. to the] men, to every one a cake of bread and a good [om. good] piece of flesh¹⁷ and a flagon of wine [a raisin-cake]; so [and] all the people departed every one to his house.
- 20 And David returned to bless his household. And Michal, the daughter of Saul, came out to meet David, and said, How glorious was [om. was] the king of Israel [ins. made himself] to-day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the hand-maids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly¹⁸ uncovereth himself!

V., which is a doubtful meaning, and besides the suffix would then be required. Our phrase might be a fragment of the phrase in Chron.: וַיִּשָּׁק אֶת־אֲשֶׁר שָׁלַח (so Bib. Com. and others). It is difficult to see how it gets its translation: "and there were with him seven choruses bearing the ark," unless it takes וַיֵּלֶךְ (steps) concretely as = "persons going or marching;" what follows: καὶ θύμα μύσχος καὶ ἄνθραξ, is also strange.—Tx.]

* [Ver. 20. This adverb in Eng. A. V. is intended to express the force of the second Inf. here; the construction is noticed by Erdmann. Supposing the second Inf. to be genuine and intensive, the meaning would be: "really, thoroughly uncovers," to which Eng. A. V. corresponds substantially.—Tx.]

- 21 And David said unto Michal, It was [om. it was] before the Lord [Jehovah] which [who] chose me before thy father and before all his house, to appoint me ruler [prince] over the people of the Lord [Jehovah], over Israel—therefore will I play [yea, I have played] before the Lord [Jehovah]. And I will yet be more [be yet more] vile than thus, and will be base in mine own sight; and of the maid-servants which [whom] thou hast spoken of, of them shall I be had in honor. Therefore [And] Michal the daughter of Saul had no child* unto the day of her death.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Parallel with 2 Sam. vi. is 1 Chr. xiii. xv, xvi.—Tr.]

Ver. 1. Assembly of all the chosen men in Israel.—"David assembled."* Thenius renders: "and David increased again all the chosen men;" but against this is that nothing has been before said of the numbers of the army (as the "again" would then imply), and that such a completely isolated statement of the augmentation of the standing army would be very strange, [and further this rendering would not agree with the expression "all the chosen men."—Tr.].—The ancient VSS. all have: "assembled."—The expression "all the chosen men" can be understood (as in Judg. xvi. 34; xx. 15; 1 Sam. xxiv. 3) only of the military men chosen expressly for service of war, not of a chosen body identical (according to 1 Chr. xiii. 1-5) with the captains of thousands, etc., that is, with the representation of the nation in stocks and families (Keil), for the term "chosen" (בְּחֹרִים) could not be so employed. And for this reason the word "again" cannot refer to the non-military assembly of the Elders in v. 1, 3, against which further is, that David did not convoke that body, while it is here said that "David again gathered," and that that assembly lay too far back of the two gatherings of the military population for the Philistine wars described just before [ch. v.]. Rather the "again" refers to this latter assemblage of the military men, which is obviously presupposed in the immediately preceding narrative. Thus ver. 1 by the "again" and the "all the chosen men" connects itself immediately with what precedes, while it introduces what follows: for why should David not have brought up the ark with an army of thirty thousand men (against Thenius)? The exhibition of such military pomp accorded perfectly with the importance of the ark for the whole people, whose deity in these "hearts of oak" [Germ. kernel- or core-warriors] (Ew. Gr. § 290 c) the more appropriately took the first place in the solemn procession, since it was their victory over the Philistines that made the transference of the ark possible. Besides, a military escort might be necessary to guard against a new attack of the enemy.—We learn from this "that David already in a certain sort maintained a standing army" (Then.).—The Sept. has seventy instead of thirty thousand, supposing, no doubt, that the whole military force of all Israel was here assembled, a supposition that is excluded by the phrase "chosen men." [The consultation of David with the leaders in 1 Chr. xiii., and the assembling of "all Israel" (that is, probably, through its representatives) is not inconsistent with the statement here. The Chronicler brings out prominently details of organization, especially religious, "Samuel" gives the simplest historical narration.—Tr.]

Vers. 2-10. David's march to fetch the ark from Kirjath-jearim.—Ver. 2. And David went with all the people that were with him.—These are not the above-named thirty thousand chosen warriors, but, besides them, the representatives of the whole nation gathered to the festival, as described in 1 Chr. xiii. 1-16, where nothing is said of a military body, while here in our passage the preliminary conference with the heads of families is passed over, and only a summary statement made in reference to the accompaniment of the ark by the people. The expression "from Baale" is strange, since nothing has before been said of David's going thither. But we cannot make the Prep. (לְ) = "to" (Dathe), nor regard the phrase as definitive of the preceding "all the people," as do the ancient VSS. (Sept. "of the rulers of Judah," Vulg. "of the men of Judah," and so Luther "of the citizens of Judah")—the latter view is untenable because the designation of place presupposed in the expression "from thence" would then be wanting. From what follows "Baale-Judah" can be nothing but the place Kirjath-jearim (comp. 1 Chr. xiii. 6) whither the ark was carried according to 1 Sam. vi. 21; vii. 1, = Kirjath-baal, Josh. xv. 60; xviii. 14; Baal-lah, Josh. xv. 9; 1 Chr. xiii. 6. This original Canaanitish name continued along with the Israelitish. See Josh. xviii. 14, "Kirjath-baal, that is, Kirjath-jearim, the city of the children of Judah," to this last name answers here Baale-Judah, whereby this city is distinguished from others of like name, Baal or Baalah in Simeon (Josh. xix. 8; 1 Chr. iv. 33) and in Dan (Josh. xix. 44). It lay on the border between Judah and Benjamin, westward on the border of the latter tribe and about eight miles west of Jerusalem [identified by Rob. with the modern Kuryet el-Enab or Abu Gosh, on the road from Jerusalem to Jaffa.—Tr.].—Since, now, the Prep. "from" cannot well be taken (with Keil) to be an ancient clerical error, we may either suppose that the writer here gives a very condensed narrative, not mentioning David's march to Baalah, because he took it for granted in relating what was to him the chief matter, the bringing of the ark thence (Kimchi, Maurer), or, if such a condensation seems too hard, we must suppose a lacuna in the text. Thenius thinks it probable that it originally read "to Kirjath-jearim of the citizens of Judah," = "children of Judah," Josh. xviii. 14 (קִרְיַת יְעָרִים בְּנֵי יְהוּדָה) and the two first words except the last letter (ס) have fallen out. This, as explaining how the Prep. (י) came into the text, seems better than the conjecture of Lud. Capell. (Crit. Sac. I. 9, § 8), who supplies the words of 1 Chr. xiii. 6 "to Baalah, to Kirjath-jearim, which is to Judah," or that of Bertheau (and Ewald) "Baalah, it (אֵלֶּיךָ), is K., which is to Judah." [It seems a difficulty in the way of Thenius' ingenious restoration that the word יָרֵם in the sense of "citizen, inhabitant" is found only with names of cities, not of countries. This, if correct, will also set aside Wellhausen's explanation of the Prep. (י), that it arose from a misunderstanding of יָרֵם, which was taken = "citizens or inhabitants." Perhaps the ס is clerical error for ל, the two letters being not very unlike in their ancient forms.—Tr.] To bring up thence the ark of God.—The rest of the verse is descriptive of the "ark of God," but opinions vary as to the exact sense. The rendering (connecting אֲשֶׁר with עָלָיו): "on which (ark) the name, the name of Jehovah . . . is called" (Keil) or "called on" (De Wette), has against it that "there is no example of so many words between the Rel. and its complement" (Then.), and the strangeness of this repetition of the "name" [which is written twice in the Heb.—Tr.]. The translation: "which (ark) is called the name" (Kimchi, and also Bunsen: which is called by name [whose name is called] . . .), is untenable because the ark itself is never so called; equally insufficient is Keil's explanation of his translation: "over which the name of Jehovah is named," that is, above which Jehovah reveals His glory, for the verb "is called or named" must be referred not to Jehovah, but to the human naming of Jehovah's name. Also to Ewald's view, who refers the Relative to "God," and translates "He was named with the name" (Gr. § 284 c) the twice-recurring "name" is an objection. It is better, therefore, to render (with Cler., Maur., Then., Berth.): "where the name of the Lord of hosts . . . is invoked" (reading אֲשֶׁר for אֵלֶּיךָ). Usually indeed the verb "call" is followed by the Prep. ב (in, on) when it means "invoke," but it is found without this Prep., Pa. xcix. 6, and Lam. iii. 55; and though there was no invocation of the Lord's name at the ark itself (since none was permitted to approach it), yet the place where it stood was doubtless a place of divine worship.* "Who is enthroned on the Cherubim," that is, is present with His ruling power in the midst of His people; the expression is never used except in relation to the ark; see on 1 Sam. iv. 4. "Who is enthroned on the Cherubim above it

* יָלַד for אָבַד—אָבַד (as in 1 Sam. xv. 6; Mic. iv. 6, Ps. civ. 29), comp. Ew. § 139 b, Ges. § 88, Rom. 2; it is Impf. of אָבַד [not of יָלַד, "to increase"].

* The אֲשֶׁר-אֵלֶּיךָ refers back to the אֵלֶּיךָ. So in 1 Chr. xiii. 6 this invocation is mentioned, if we read אֲשֶׁר for אֵלֶּיךָ at the end.

† עָלָיו belongs to אֲשֶׁר, but there is no need to supply אֲשֶׁר in reference to "Cherubim" (Then.).

[On the text of this verse see "Text and Gram.—Tr.].—Ver. 3 sq. "Set it on the cart."* A "new cart" must be taken, because the sacred vessel was not permitted to come in contact with anything already consecrated by common use, comp. 1 Sam. vi. 7. "And brought it out;" according to the above translation ("set") there is no need of rendering this verb as Pluperf. "had brought" (Then.).—Carrying the ark on a cart was contrary to the legal requirement (Num. vii. 9), according to which it was always to be borne by the Levites. "The Hebrews here probably imitated a Phœnician or Philistine custom. The Phœnicians, namely, seem to have had sacred carts, on which they carried about their gods (Münter, Relig. der Karthager, p. 120), and the oxen were sacred to Baal (p. 15)." (Stahl, David p. 39). See 1 Sam. vi. 7. Out of the house of Abinadab on the hill, comp. 1 Sam. vii. 1 sq. According to this passage Abinadab's son Eleazar was entrusted with the oversight of the ark; here we find "Uzza and Ahio" mentioned as Abinadab's sons, and as driving the cart in charge of the ark. The ark had been about seventy years in Abinadab's house, twenty years up to the victory of Ebenezer (1 Sam. vii. 1 sq.), forty years under Samuel and Saul, and about ten years under David. Thus the statement that Uzza and Ahio led the ark may (as Keil remarks) be explained without difficulty. "Either these two sons were born about or after the time that the ark was deposited in his house, or the word 'sons' is used in the wider sense of 'grandsons,' as is often the case" (Keil).—Text-criticism of ver. 4. By the mistake of a transcriber, whose eye wandered at the words אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֶּיךָ back to אֵלֶּיךָ, the words from הָיָה to בְּנֵיכֶם were repeated, and are to be omitted. Only thus is the omission of the Art. in the second הָיָה to be explained. [That is, omit the "new" at the close of ver. 3, and in ver. 4 omit the first clause ending with "Gibeah." Some read ver. 4 thus: "and Uzza went with the ark of God, and Ahio (or, his brother) went before the ark," which gives a good sense. The whole verse is omitted in Chron. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

Ver. 5. Whilst Ahio went before the ark, and Uzza went alongside it (ver. 6)—perhaps in ver. 4 the words "and Uzza went" have fallen out before "with the ark of God" (De Wette, Then., Buns.).—the whole procession, David at the head, moves forward with music, song and dance. The whole house of Israel, see vers. 1, 2. Before the Lord, whose presence was symbolized by the ark itself. "Sporting," that is, playing (see Judg. xvi. 25) and dancing (see ver. 14). The Heb. word (שָׁחַק, צָחַק) is the general expression for dancing in its connection with vocal and instrumental music, 1 Sam. xviii. 7; xxi. 11; 1 Chr. xiii. 8; xv. 29; Jer. xxx. 19; xxxi. 4; Prov. viii. 30 sq.—The words of the Heb. text "with all manner of cypress-woods" make no sense; for what signifies the mention of the material, of which the instruments were afterwards made? The Sept. and Vulg. (ἐν ὕψις ἀφυσμένους "with fitted instruments," in omnibus lignis fa- breffactis "with all manufactured woods") presuppose indeed this reading; but the Sept. has also another reading "with might and with songs," to which answer the corresponding words in Chron. (ver. 8): "with all their might and with songs." [This reading of Chron. is now generally adopted here, though not by the Jewish expositors Philippon and Cahen, who retain the text of "Samuel."—Tr.] With the expression "with all might" comp. ver. 14: "and David danced with all (his) might." On the connection of song with festive dance and instrumental music see on 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7. The timbrel (tabret, hand-drum תִּמְרָל) or Aduffe [Arab. and Pers. duff or diff, Span. adufe] was used by the virgins to give the time in dancing.—The menana [incorrectly "cornet" in Eng. A. V.] is an instrument that gave forth a melodious tone when shaken to musical time (from זָנַל "to shake"), the sistrum (σειστρον) of the ancients.—"Cymbals," smaller or larger metal-plates, which when struck together gave a clear sound.* Chron. has "trumpets" in place of "sistra"; the two accounts are doubtless mutually complementary (Keil). [On these instruments see the Bib. Dicts.—Tr.]

Ver. 6. And when they came to a fixed threshing-floor.—Nachon (נָכֹן) is not to be taken (with many expositors [and Eng. A. V.]) as a proper name, since it never so occurs; nor is it—"threshing-floor of the blow" (נָכָה Mov., Keil), for the word is always found as a Pass. Partep. (Niph.), and cannot be derived from the Qal [simple Active] of the verb "smite" (נָכָה), which never occurs; besides, in that case, as Böttcher rightly remarks, "the name would not be connected with Perez (ver. 8)." Nachon (from נָכַן) = "a fixed threshing-floor, which did not change its place like the summer floor (Dan. ii. 35), and therefore probably had a roof and a stock of fodder" (Böttch.). Chron. has "threshing-floor of destruction" (Kidon, כִּידוֹן = כִּיר Job xxi. 10, destruction, properly blow, plaga = Ar. caid), a designation that probably has its origin in the succeeding narrative. Later the name Perez-uzza came into use instead of these appellations. It is not necessary to insert in the Heb. the words "his hand" (יָדוֹ) after the verb "put forth," for the verb is found alone in Ps. xxii. 17; for example, comp. with Ps. xviii. 17; Obad. 13. [Bib.-Com.: the word reach is so used in Eng. without a following hand.—Tr.] Uzza reached out to the ark of God and took hold of it, namely, to keep it from falling over or down; for the oxen shook, jostled it (שָׁטְטוּ), according to the usual signification of the verb,—not "ran away" (Ges. Dietr.), or "had gotten loose" (De Wette), nor "had thrown it down" (Böttch., Then.), since according to the narrative Uzza wished to save it from falling by laying hold of it. Ewald: "they jostled the ark so that it seemed about to fall off." [The Acc. Pron., not expressed in the Heb., is easily supplied from the connection.—Tr.]

Ver. 7. "God smote him for the error." [Erdmann thus agrees in this translation with Eng. A. V., Abarb., Philipps., Keil, Chald.; the difficulty is stated in "Text. and Gram." Some render "for his rashness," some "unawares," and others adopt the reading in 1 Chr. xiii. 10. Consult Kennicott's "Dissertation," p. 456, Levy's Chald. Dict. s. v. נָכָה, Wellhausen's "Text Samuclis."—Tr.] The error consisted in touching the ark, which as the symbol of God's presence (1 Sam. iv. 7), none could look at (Num. iv. 20; 1 Sam. vi. 19), much less lay hold of, without peril of life. For transportation, therefore, it was first covered up by the Levites to whom it was committed (especially the Kohathites, Num. vii. 9), and that with faces covered (Num. iv. 15, 20), and carried on staves which constantly projected (Ex. xxv. 14, 15).—Instead of this brief statement of the offence, Chron. has the descriptive periphrasis: "because he had put out his hand to the ark," which is followed by Syr. and Arab. A suddenly fatal apoplectic stroke was the natural means of the manifestation of the divine anger at Uzza's violation of the majesty of the holy God symbolized in the ark of the covenant.—Ver. 8. "And David was angry that the Lord had made a breach (or inflicted a stroke) on Uzza;" not "was amazed (confounded)," for the verb is always used of anger, the angry person being introduced with the Prep. לְ [= to], 2 Sam. xix. 43; 1 Sam. xv. 11; Gen. xviii. 30, 32; xxxi. 36. The cause of his anger or angry excitement is not the deed of Uzza, but the deed of God, the slaying of Uzza, in so far as he was obliged to look on himself as the cause of this punishment through his non-observance of the legal prescription concerning the transportation of the ark; for the ark was to be borne, not ridden, and touching it was forbidden on pain of death (Num. iv. 15). "To this day" this name had continued the only one in use in commemoration of this occurrence, [that is, up to the writer's time, which was at some considerable remove from the event referred to.—Tr.].—Ver. 9. While David is angry at this justly-incurred misfortune, his heart is filled with fear of the Lord. How shall the ark of the Lord come to me?—This question indicates the ground and object of David's fear of the Lord; in view of what had happened on the touching of the ark, he feels himself guilty before the Lord and unworthy of His presence; he fears to be similarly stricken, if he now bring the ark to him into Zion.—Ver. 10. The procession was broken up, and the effort to bring the ark to Zion abandoned; he carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom the Gittite.—Obed-edom, a Levite of the stock of the Korahites, which was a branch of the family of Kohath (Ex. vi. 16, 18, 21), a "son of Jeduthun" (1 Chr. xvi. 38), appears afterwards as a porter in Jerusalem, and also acts as musician in the transference of the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18, 21, 24; xvi. 5). He is called "Gittite" not from a former protracted residence in the Philistine city Gath (Vatabl.), but from Gath-Rimmon, the Levitical city in Dan. (Cler.), Josh. xxi. 24; xix. 45, where he was no doubt born. Since he was of the Korahites, who were porters during the march through the wilderness, we can the more readily understand how the ark was carried to him. [If Jeduthun is the same as

* Instead of our נָכָה Chron. has נָכָה, see Pa. cl. 5.

Ethan (comp. 1 Chr. xv. 17, 19 with xvi. 41, 42; xxv. 1, 3, 6; 2 Chr. xxxv. 15) then Obed-edom, the son of Jeduthun, was a Merarite. There may, however, have been several of the name. 1 Chr. xxv. 15 is supposed by some to establish the identity of our Obed-edom with the Jeduthunite, though this cannot be said to be certain. If the two are the same, it is suggested that, "though a Merarite by birth, marriage with a Kohathite would account for his dwelling in a Kohathite city." The question can hardly be certainly decided. His name is peculiar, apparently = "serving (servant of) Edom." It is suggested (Wellh.) that Edom is here the name of a god, to which the objection is that there is no trace elsewhere of such a deity, the name occurring only as a gentile one, and in connection with Esau. It having been shown by Erdmann that the man Obed-edom was a Levite, it may be surmised either that he was a foreigner adopted by marriage into the tribe of Levi, or, more probably, that he, or some ancestor of his, had once been in servitude to the Edomites.—See Bib.-Com. in loco.—Tr.]

Vers. 11-19. [1 Chron. xiii. 14; xv., xvi.] Transference of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom to the City of David.—Ver. 11 sq. Three months the Ark remained in the house of Obed-edom.—After the words "with the house of Obed-edom," Chron. has "in its house," "in order to maintain the dignity of the sacred vessel" (Then.). The blessing on Obed-edom's house and possessions (comp. Jos. Ant. 7, 4, 2)* "for the ark of God's sake," that is, by reason of God's gracious presence in His majesty and glory, forms the contrast to that other revelation of God's anger [against Uzza] and to David's fear of misfortune and destruction from the presence of the ark, and now becomes the occasion of David's resolution to bring the ark to himself to Mount Zion. After the words (ver. 12): "because of the ark of God" the Vulg. has: "and David said, I will go and bring back the ark with blessing into my house," which is an explanation of what precedes in reference to Obed-edom's experience of blessing, as motive for bringing back the ark. [Wellhausen: "This addition in the Vulgate of 1590, which pragmatically connects the two facts which in the masoretic texts are merely collocated, does not belong to Jerome—see Vercellone in loco. It is found also in several Greek MSS. Against Thenius."—Tr.] Chron. (xv. 1) connects this narrative with the preceding (the palace-building, xiv. 1 sq.) by the remark that David, while building houses in Jerusalem, prepared a place for the ark of God and pitched a tent for it. And David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-edom (which was not necessarily near Perez-Uzza, but lay perhaps on the outskirts of the Lower City) into the city of David "with gladness," in glad procession, with festive joy, comp. Gen. xxxi. 27; Neh. xii. 43.—Ver. 13. Since bearers of the ark are spoken of, it appears that David now observed the prescription of the Law. In 1 Chr. xxv. 2 sq. David declares that no one should bear the ark but the Levites, because they were thereto chosen by God. The former procedure is thus expressly recognized as illegal (comp. Num. i. 40; iv. 15; vi. 9; x. 17). In Chron. we then find (vers. 2-13) the king's consultation with the priests and Levites about the legal performance of the solemn act of bringing up the ark, and (ver. 14 sq.) David's further regulations concerning the singing and instrumental music in the procession.—And when the bearers of the ark of the Lord had made six steps, he sacrificed (caused to be sacrificed) an ox and a fat calf.—De Wette renders wrongly: "And it came to pass, as often as they went six steps, he sacrificed;" the Heb. would not allow this rendering (it must then be $\text{וַיִּזְבֹּחַ} \dots \text{וַיִּזְבֹּחַ}$, Böttch.), and what a monstrous representation: such an offering every six steps! The meaning is that David, having arranged and started the procession, introduced and consecrated it with a sacrifice. "It was a thank-offering for the happy beginning and a petition for the prosperous continuation of the undertaking" (Böttch.). The halt after six steps is therefore not a "surprising fact" (Then.), nor need we suppose that the bearers stood "a long time" with the ark on their shoulders. The offering of seven bullocks and seven rams, which according to Chron. (xv. 26) was made by the Levites, was not the same with this, but a concluding thank-offering for the happy completion of the undertaking with the Lord's help (comp. ver. 25). [So also Patrick and Keil regard the sacrifice in 1 Chr. xv. 26; but it seems clear from the context that the same offering is here intended as in our passage, for the solemnity is not completed till ver. 28. It is no objection to this that David is the offerer in the one and the Levites in the other (Patr.), for David may have used the Levites as sacrificers (as Erdmann intimates); nor does the apparent difference in the animals make a serious difficulty, for the terms in "Samuel" may be collective, see Gen. xxxii. 6 (so Eng. A. V.), Chron. simply supplying the exact numbers, the special term "bullock" of Chron. may be included under the general "oxen" of "Samuel," and the "rams" under the somewhat indefinite "fatlings" (so Sept. and Vulg.). Or, if it be difficult to take the second word (בָּרָא) as collective, we may suppose a difference in the figures in the two accounts, such as is not infrequent.—Tr.]—Ver. 14. And David danced with all his might before the Lord.—The verb (פָּרַץ , only here and ver. 16) = "to hop, spring, dance in a half circle," comp. the similar word for "camels, dromedaries" (בָּרָאָה). Dances on festive occasions, as in thanksgiving for deliverances (Ex. xv. 20), for victory (Judg. xi. 34; xxi. 19; 1 Sam. xviii. 6) were commonly performed by women alone. The expression "with all his might" sets forth the high degree of David's joyful excitement, comp. ver. 5. "Before the Lord," that is, before the ark of the covenant as the symbol of the presence of the Lord as the king of His people.—Girded with a (white) linen ephod.—As elsewhere the white ephod was worn only by priests as a sign of their priestly character (1 Sam. xxii. 18), there was a special significance in David's wearing the priestly dress now; it lay, however, not in a desire on his part to represent himself, in honor of the Lord as head of the priestly people of Israel, but partly in the general priestly character that the kingly office of David and Solomon still continued to maintain at the head of the people, partly in David's priestly procedure in this festivity; he, as it were, performed the functions of a priest (Thenius), not merely in blessing the people (ver. 18), but also in conducting the whole procession and arranging the sacrifice. While the Chronicler gives elaborate information respecting the dress of David and the Levites, our narrator here confines himself to the statement that David was clothed with the white ephod. On the other hand, David's dancing is omitted by the Chronicler, not because it offended him from a priestly point of view (for he alludes to it in ver. 29, and mentions it xiii. 8 in agreement with 2 Sam. vi. 5), but because he here wished to bring out with special prominence the ritualistic side of the ceremony, for which the priestly dress was important. (See Keil in loco.) [It is suggested by some (see Bib. Comm.) that the first clause of 1 Chr. xv. 27, "and David was clothed with a robe of fine linen," is merely another form (possibly a corruption) of the text of "Samuel," "and David danced with all his might," especially as this same ver. 27 mentions the linen-ephod also. The Heb. letters in the two clauses are sufficiently alike to permit one to be derived from the other, and the context in Chron. is not against such a supposition. But it is impossible to say whether the one text is to be derived from the other, or, under such a supposition, which is the original. — Tr.]—Ver. 15. Comp. 1 Chr. xv. 28, where the names of the several instruments are given. Here we have briefly with shouting and sound of trumpet.—The Chron. draws full accounts from the common source, our author gives a summary statement. [On religious dances among the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, see Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Ant., Arta. Chorus and Salatio, and comp. Art. Dance in Smith's Bib. Dict.—Tr.]

Ver. 16. *Michal is expressly called Saul's daughter, not thereby to characterize her as lacking in true-hearted piety (Keil), but to distinguish her in comparison with David's other wives, as highest in position. She looked through the window—that is, holds herself aloof from the procession,† and criticises David's conduct (as her remark proves) with a cold heart which had no part in his and the people's joyous inspiration. When she saw the king leaping and dancing (Chronicl.: dancing [=leaping] and playing), she despised‡ him in her heart—despised him on account of his presumed degradation of himself, to the shame of his royal dignity (ver. 20).—Ver. 17. The tent that David pitched for the ark being merely a covering on poles without a firm structure of boards, could have been only temporary, since David had the purpose to build a permanent sanctuary, a "house" to the Lord (chap. vii.). Set it in its place in the midst of the tent.—That is, in the space marked off according to the tabernacle which still stood in Gibeon, in the Holy of Holies. The burnt-offerings and thank-offerings that David now offered referred to this provisional sanctuary, and served to consecrate it. Of course he made the sacrifices not in his own person, but through the priests.—Ver. 18. The offerings being ended, he blessed the people in the name of the Lord of Sabaoth.—The blessing was not the Aronic (Numb. vi. 22 sq.), which pertained only to the high-priest, but (like Solomon's, 1 Ki. viii. 55) a concluding benedictory address to the whole people. "The name of the Lord of Sabaoth" is the essential being of God, as it was exhibited in the fulness of all His revelations to His people. The benedictions find their fulfilment only in this self-revelation of God to His people as their source, which is at the same time the pledge for the fulfilment.—Ver. 19. The entertainment of the people. Each one, men and women, received a "bread-cake" (לֶחֶם = כֶּבֶד, 1 Chron. xvi. 3), a round cake, such as was baked for sacrificial meals, comp. Ex. xxix. 23 with Lev. viii. 24 sq. Eshpar [Eng. A. V.: good piece of flesh] occurs only here, is not = "piece of flesh,"* but probably to be derived from a verb "to measure" (Aeth. ሄሾ, De Dieu, Gesenius, Rödiger, De Wette), and = a "measure of wine," which would not be too hard a suppletion [would not be supplying or understanding too much] (Thenius). The third term [Eng. A. V.: flagon of wine] means rain-cake, or a mass of dried grapes pressed into a cake (Ges.), comp. Song of Songs ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1.—Thereupon the people returned home.—In like manner David, having finished the offering and the entertainment, returned to his house to bless it (ver. 20 a)—that is, to invoke on his house the blessings he had pronounced on the people, and (having finished this sacred act) to place it under the protection and blessing of the Lord, of whose presence in his house the ark standing near in the tent was the symbol. The close of verse 19 and the beginning of verse 20 are given at the end of the narrative, 1 Chron. xvi. 43.

Vers. 20-23. Michal's pride and David's humility.—Ver. 20. And Michal came to meet David.—The words here added by the Sept.: "and greeted him" are an insertion, which there is no ground for putting into the Hebrew text. How glorious did the king of Israel make himself to-day!—This bitterly ironical address with which David, returning joyfully to bless his house, is received by Michal, is the outburst of her wicked feeling (ver. 16). Who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants.—That is: exposed, degraded himself, obviously alluding to the fact that David had exchanged the royal robes proper to such an occasion for the light, comparatively short sacerdotal dress. She blames him not so much for dancing as that in such a procession and in such attire, forgetting his royal dignity, he mingled with the common people and put himself on a level with them. As one of the vain fellows uncovers* himself.—"Worthless, bad fellows" (פְּזִיזִים) as Judg. ix. 4; xi. 3; Prov. xii. 11; Vulg.: "buffoons" (acurris), Sept.: "dancers" (ὑποκρίματα), which is an explanation instead of a translation. (Observe the twofold definition of the degradation: "in the eyes of the maids of his servants" over against the reference to the king of Israel.)

Ver. 21. David's answer.—Before the Lord who chose me and I have played before the Lord.—We have here an anacoluthon, the long Rel. clause "who chose . . . Israel" breaking the connection, which is then restored by "and [or yea] I have played," the phrase "before the Lord" (which stands at the beginning) being resumed. [On this verse see the English translation and "Text, and Gram."—Tr.] After the words "before Jehovah" Sept. inserts "I will dance; blessed be the Lord;" and after "and I have played" [which it renders "I will play"] has "and I will dance," in order thus to relieve the anacoluthon, and to introduce the "dancing," which (though the object of Michal's blame) is strangely omitted [in the Heb.] in David's reply. In answer to Michal's cutting irony, which regards David's conduct merely from the point of view of its accordance with the dignity of "the king of Israel," and characterizes it as common and low, he affirms two things: 1) that in his procedure he had an eye only to the glory of God, and that it must therefore not be condemned as common and low, but rather recognized as holy and well-pleasing to God; and 2) that he received his kingdom and his position as king of Israel through the Lord's choice and command. He had therefore acted not counter to, but in accordance with this royal dignity, in that he gave the honor to the Lord, who had raised him from lowliness to this height. The expression "before the Lord" derives a very strong emphasis from its position at the beginning and at the end, and, thus repeated, indicates the holiest and highest point of view whence (in opposition to Michal's profane utterance) his procedure in this festival is to be judged and estimated. Before thy father and before his whole house says David, in order to repel the charge that he had thus lowered the royal dignity which had passed to him from Saul and his house, thus pointing also to the cause of the rejection of Saul and his house, namely, such haughtiness and pride as the "daughter of Saul" had here exhibited.—Ver. 22. "And I will be yet more vile." Instead of this Sept. has the non-sensical rendering: "and I will still thus uncover myself" (נִגְלֵה עוֹד). The less reason then for changing the Heb. "in my eyes" into the Sept. "in thy eyes." Certainly David did not lower himself in his own eyes, that is, in his own judgment, by his playing and dancing (as Thenius, contrary to the text-reading, remarks)—not in the sense of Michal's charge; yet he did lower or humble himself in his own eyes in the sense that he expresses in ver. 21, where he describes his conduct as a self-abasement before the presence of the Lord. "In comparison with this" (that is, with this abasement before the Lord) he continues: And I will be held (= become) yet more vile (Niph. = Qal. as Gen. xvi. 4) in my eyes.—That is, in my own judgment will humble myself yet more than to-day. The expression "in my eyes" cannot be explained as = I will suffer still greater contempt from men than what I have just experienced." And with the maids, of whom thou hast spoken, with them will I be held in honor.—Ewald's explanation: "should I seek honor from them? no, that is not at all necessary" falls to the ground, since Michal's assertion that he had gotten himself honor was not serious, but ironical. Thenius: "of the maids shall I be held in honor" [so Eng. A. V.]—that is, they, the simple souls, will know better than thou how to estimate my humility, and this will compensate me for thy foolish contempt. But this latter is an interpolated thought, which would be farthest from David's soul at this moment of extreme humility before the Lord, and would favor of Michal's ideas about human honor. The "honored" here (obviously contrasted with Michal's "honored, made glorious," ver. 20) refers (as is clear from the throughout recurring words, "before the Lord") to the honor in the sight of the Lord, which will be given those who humble themselves before the Lord. David, having opposed to Michal's "in the eyes of the maids" his "in the presence of the Lord," places himself "before the Lord" on the same level with the maids, expressing by the repeated "with" his fellowship and equality with these humble folk, and pointing to the honor which he with them would have before the Lord, because he humbly showed due honor to the Lord. [The objection to this interpretation is that we should then expect David to say "I will (or shall) be honored by Jehovah," that is, the subject or agent of the honoring must be expressed, and is given in the text only by the word "maids." The Hebrew Prep. may mean "among" or "before" (apud), and thus permits the translation of Eng. A. V., Patr., Then., Philippeon. Besides, in reply to Michal's sneer about the maids, it is a natural and sharp rejoinder on David's part to accept this honor which she regards as beneath contempt.—Tr.]—Ver. 23. Michal's childlessness is specially mentioned as a punishment of her pride. This was the deepest humiliation for an oriental woman. HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. It was not till David had taken Jerusalem from the Jebusites, made Zion his capital and secured it by his victories from Philistine attacks, and thus for a short time at least secured peace,

* כְּהִנְיֹות נִגְלֹות. The explanation of this abnormal combination—according to Ew. 240 c—is "that since according to the sense only the second form must be in the Inf. Abs., both now with slight change of form appear in the Inf. Const., because the whole sentence by reason of the Prep. בְּ follows the train of the Inf. Const."

Maurer: כְּהִנְיֹות is Inf. Abs. (for כְּהִנְיֹות), in order to make periphrasis with the preceding כְּהִנְיֹות. Thenius and Olshausen (Gr. p. 600) explain כְּהִנְיֹות as error of copyist from the preceding word.

that he could proceed to the holy work that he completed in bringing the ark to Zion, and that was of great importance for the religious life of the nation. This act had its root in David's truly pious feeling, was the living expression of his gratitude to the Lord for His favor, and aimed at the elevation and concentration of the religious life of Israel. It needed a new elevation, since under Saul it had partly at least sunk down from the height to which Samuel had brought it, and fallen into a somewhat brutalized condition. The royal house itself, whose influence on the people was so great, had more and more lost living piety; the spirit of pride reigned in it, as Michal (who was herein very like her father) plainly shows here in her bearing towards David; it is a significant fact that in her father's house she has an idolimage. The religious-moral life of the nation fell of necessity into more and more thorough dissolution, the longer Saul's persecutions of David continued and the external unity established by Samuel was destroyed by the wars between Saul and David, and by partisan oppositions. When, now, David by establishing his theocratic kingdom over all Israel had restored the external (national and governmental) unity, he made an important step further, by the act recorded in this chapter, towards elevating and sanctifying the inner life of his people; he laid the deepest foundation for their internal unity by again concentrating their religious life on its centre and source, namely, the dwelling of God in the midst of His people, symbolically set forth in the ark. "In Saul's time it [the ark] had not been sought after" (1 Chr. xiii. 3); the centre of divine service that it indicated had been lost. Now David gathers the representatives of the whole nation around him, in order at the head of the nation solemnly to restore to the centre of the national life the long-vanished sanctuary, and to renew the religious unifying of the people, especially in regard to divine service, about the kernel and star of the innermost life. By the transference of the ark to Zion Jerusalem, representing the national and political unity, becomes now the centre of religion and divine service for the national life. The account in Chron. supplements our history in regard to the part taken by the priests, the divine service and the ordination of the sacred service before the ark (chs. xiii., xv., xvi.). With this was connected the restoration of the unity and arrangement of the priestly service and of the duties of divine service. This unity indeed does not yet reach a complete external representation. There continue to be two holy places; the ark remains apart from the old tabernacle, which abode with the altar of burnt-offering at Gibeon, where also the offerings still went on (1 Chr. xvi. 39; comp. 1 Kings iii. 4). There the high-priest Zadok officiates, the son of Ahitub, of the family of Eleazar, who performs the legal regular sacrificial service at the tabernacle (Lev. xvii. 3). But beside him we find a second high-priest in that Abiathar (of the family of Ithamar), who escaped from Nob to David (1 Sam. xxii. 20), had remained with him, and now resided with the sanctuary on Zion (comp. 1 Kings ii. 26); so the two are named together in xx. 25; 1 Chr. xviii. 16. This double high-priestship, which had arisen from the separation of the tabernacle and the ark, was the reason why David permitted this separation to continue, and did not remove the Mosaic tabernacle also to Mount Zion, since he could remove neither the one high-priest nor the other from his office. We see also two sacred tents, besides the old one at Gibeon a new one pitched by David over the ark. While the sacrificial service is still continued in Gibeon according to the Law (1 Chr. xvi. 40; comp. 1 Kings iii. 4), a sacred service is established by David at the ark also; ibid. ver. 37 sq.—But in spite of this still continuing external dualism, there was after the institution of the sacred service on Zion an internal unity (through the establishment of regular divine service) such as did not exist before. The tent which is pitched on Zion, is provisional, and points like the old tent, which in the march through the wilderness and in the time of the Judges was the symbol of a provisional arrangement, to a central sanctuary to be erected, the founding of which David has in mind, but cannot yet execute (ch. vii.). But in this provisional, personal state of the religious life which in its two principal seats is unified, purified and arranged, the sanctuary in Jerusalem steps into the central point of the religious consciousness both for David and for the whole people, while the sanctuary in Gibeon retires into the background, as is especially evident from the fact that the tabernacle is never mentioned in the Psalms. Comp. Hengst. Gesch. d. R. Gottes [Hist. of the kingdom of God] II., p. 122 sq.

2. The significance of this narrative (of the transference of the ark to Jerusalem and David's conduct therein) for the apprehension and representation of the theocratic royal office in his person, is first to be considered on the one side in relation to God, and on the other side in relation to the people. The content of his consciousness as king is simply this one thought of the dependence of his kingdom for its dominion on the royal rule and might of the covenant-God, whose choice and command has appointed him king over Israel (ver. 21), that he is the instrument by which God carries on His government of His people. From this point of view the bringing back of the ark is an act of reverence and gratitude to the Lord, whose name, symbolically set forth in this sanctuary, is honored and praised by David at the head of the whole people as the sum of all his revelations to them. But also by the establishment of this token of the presence of the Lord in the midst of His people and of His royal dwelling and enthronement in His possession on Mount Zion, which David has prepared for his own residence, the idea of the indivisible unity of the human kingship and the kingly rule of God in His people is brought out. There is enthroned the king of glory, Ps. xxiv. 7-10; the king's throne is the throne of God, Ps. xlv. 7 [6]; Jerusalem is the city of the Great King, Ps. xlviii. 3 [2]; Zion is Jehovah's dwelling, Ps. ix. 12 [11]; lxxiv. 2; lxxvi. 3 [2]; thence proceed all manifestations of God's royal might and glory, Ps. xx. 3 [2]; cx. 2.—But also in relation to the people David represents the theocratic kingship in the light of its ideal significance. He assembles the whole people about the sanctuary as the throne of Jehovah; he will make them a people truly united under the dominion of God, moving with their whole life around Jehovah as centre, showing their king-God the highest honor and serving Him alone (Pa. xxiv. 1-10). In contrast with every other oriental kingly office David shows in his conduct the popular character of the theocratic kingship. He does not soar at an unattainable and unapproachable distance and height above the people, but "makes himself one" with them, mingles immediately with them, is accessible to all, and does not scorn fellowship with the lowest and meanest, because he knows that in the presence of the Lord he is not connected but religious-morally on the same level with the whole people and every individual one of these (vera. 21, 22). David, as theocratic king, whose government is to be the organ and representative of Jehovah's rule over His people, is conscious that he is mediator between the Lord and His covenant-people, and acts accordingly: on the one hand he "represents the whole people" before the Lord and leads them to Him, at their head and in their stead brings burnt-offerings and thank-offerings, and appears with them "before the presence of the Lord" (ver. 21) to restore at the ark the legally ordained divine service—on the other hand he represents the Lord before His people, declaring His "name" to them, and praying and obtaining His "blessing" for them.—Herein, as appears most clearly in this history, David not only stands in closest connection with the bearers of the prophetic office, but we see in him also the kingly office in closest association with the priestly, while Saul, in opposition to both these offices, allowed his kingly rule to assume more and more an antitheocratic character. But still farther: as David, as representative and instrument of God's royal rule over the people of His possession [peculiar people = his private property.—Tr.], possesses the prophetic spirit, whereby Jehovah's word designed for the people is on his tongue (xxiii. 2), so also, like Samuel representing the people before God, he combines in his person the priestly character with the kingly and the prophetic, and in this festival in his priestly dress and procedure brings out and represents the idea, that the theocratic kingship, as a representation of the people before the Lord is to be a priest-kingship. [As David is never said to have performed the distinctively priestly work of sacrifice (committing this, as Erdmann himself says in the Exposition, to the priests), and as the representation of the people before God, and mediation between them and Him is a general pious work, performed often by prophets and others (Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Josiah, Nehemiah), it is not easy to see why on this ground alone a priestly character should be assigned to him. In one sense the whole people were priests (Ex. xix. 6), a great spiritual idea being thus guarded against the perverting tendencies of outward ritual, and so David was in the high spiritual sense a priest, as every Christian now is; but in the narrower sense an Israelitish priest made atonement for sin by blood, and none but sons of Aaron could perform this service, as now human priesthood is abolished, and the priestly work is done by Christ alone.—Tr.].—But also the religious-moral character and the disposition of the theocratic king is here set forth typically in the presence of the whole people; he precedes them in showing the Lord His due honor in word and deed; he shows himself to be the faithful and conscientious overseer, leader and arranger of the divine service; he shows himself to be deeply penetrated with the feeling that he owes his royal office solely to the free undeserved grace of the Lord, and exhibits a deep humility, wishing to be nothing but the servant of the Lord in fellowship with his servants and maids. [See Translator's note to Erdmann's exposition of ver. 22.—Tr.].—This humble disposition of David in the presence of his God forms the sharpest contrast to the haughtiness and pride of his wife Michal, "who knew nothing of the impulse of divine love" (Theodoret).

3. God's blessing is an outflow of His name; it can only be mediately obtained by man for man, when it is drawn from this eternal, inexhaustible source. The Lord dispenses His blessing to house and family, people and State, only on the condition that His gracious presence is desired and preserved (ver. 11), and honor given to His name in mind, word and deed, as here by David and all the people. When men devote their heart and all their life as a sacrifice to the Lord, and consecrate themselves to Him, in reward therefor He sends on them streams of blessing.

4. The following are the references in the Psalms to the important event of the transference of the Ark. Pa. xxiv. was no doubt composed by David to celebrate Jehovah's entrance into the sanctuary on Mount Zion, with direct reference to the incidents narrated in 2 Sam. vi. Jehovah, the king of glory, comes to make His dwelling on Mount Zion amid His people.

He is celebrated as the king of the whole world (vera. 1, 10); on this foundation of the majesty of the Creator and Lord of all things rests the view of His royal glory, the revelation of which is unfolded in and for Israel. The praise of Jehovah as the strong hero in war, the Lord of Sabaoth, points to David's Philistine wars (2 Sam. vi. 1, 15). The primeval doors, which are to lift themselves up that the king may hold his entry, are the gates of the old fortress of Zion. The exhortation to the doors to raise and widen themselves assumes that this is the first entrance of the ark, and excludes the view that the Psalm was composed on its return from war. While vera. 7-10 describe the arrival and solemn entry of "the King of glory" with the outward preparation for His worthy reception and for His entrance into the place prepared for him, vera. 1-6 refer to the ascension of the people to Mount Zion and to the moral requirements made of those who will be in truth the people of God, who desire and seek after Him. Only the pure in thought, word and deed are His people and may approach Him. With unholy mind and unclean hand Uzza seized the sacred vessel; to this (2 Sam. vi. 6 sq.) refer the words of the Pa. v. 3-6. The blessing of "Jehovah the God of salvation" (ver. 5) recalls 2 Sam. vi. 11, 18. The words: "the generation of them that inquire after Him and seek His face," form a contrast to 1 Chron. xiii. 3: "Let us bring up the ark of God; for in Saul's time we sought it not."—The history of the entry is here regarded according to its higher moral-religious significance for the people of the Lord. "It was needful at the very beginning of the new relation to establish its essential character and fix it in the people's consciousness, to furnish a counter-weight or equipoise to the external pomp with which the ark was brought in; to point out that true (not simply external) fellowship with a God like this one, the lord of the whole earth, and a share in His blessings, is to be obtained only in the one way of true righteousness; to point to the serious nature of the demands made on the subjects, that results from the glory of the entering king" (Hengstenb. on Ps. xxiv.).

With reference to the establishment of the sanctuary on Mount Zion, and in essential harmony with the first didactic-ethical part of Ps. xxiv., David sang Ps. xv. also, as is clear from the question to the Lord in ver. 1: "Who may be guest in thy tent, who may dwell on thy holy mountain?" and from the portraiture of the moral character of God's house-companions, though we cannot establish with certainty particular references which Hitzig here finds to the history in 2 Sam. vi. 12 sq. (see Moll [Lange's Bible-Work] on Ps. xv.).

Whether Ps. lxxviii. (as most ancient expositors, Stier and v. Hoffm. hold), especially vers. 16, 17 (Ew.), is to be referred to 2 Sam. vi., is doubtful; more probably it is connected with the return of the ark from the wars and victories whose termination is given in 2 Sam. xii. 31.

Ps. lxxviii. in vers. 56-72 presents the historical pre-suppositions of this fixing of the seat of the royal glory, which lie far back in the history of Israel's sin and defection from the Lord to strange gods. The Lord punished Israel for their apostasy by forsaking His dwelling in Shiloh, giving the sanctuary into the hands of enemies, etc. But the Lord again had mercy, and arose in His might to cast down the enemy; He chose Judah that He might in it on Zion establish His dominion and build high His sanctuary. From hence He ruled as the king of His people through His servant David whom he had chosen to feed His people, as once he fed the flock, whence He called him.

Ps. ci., "the Prince's psalm" or ruler's mirror (Luth.), was not indeed composed by David on the occasion of Uzza's misfortune and the deposition of the ark in the house of Obed-edom (Hammond, Ven., Dathe, Muntinghe, De W., Del.); for, from the connection of thought, the question: "When comest thou to me" (ver. 2)? cannot be referred to the words of 2 Sam. vi. 8: "how shall the ark of Jehovah come to me?" and the designation of Jerusalem (ver. 8) as "the city of the Lord" does not suit, since Jerusalem was so called in consequence of the establishment of the ark on Zion, and an anticipation of this designation (Del.) is not supposable. But this appellation, the "city of the Lord," taken together with the repeated expression "within the house" and with the prominent mention of personal, domestic, social and national duties and virtues, favors the view that some time after this event, which was an epoch-making one for his and the nation's religious-moral life, David wrote this Psalm with reference to the blessings that he therein received from God and the obligations therein imposed on him. The "city of Jehovah," which has received this name and the honor involved in it through the Lord's choice of it as a dwelling-place, "is to set forth not only in its divine service [ritually], but also ethically the character of holiness" (Moll, Isa. xxxv. 8; lli. 1; Nah. ii. 1, as the king "within his house," which is founded and built on Mount Zion as the seat of the theocratic kingly dominion, himself walks in uprightness of heart, suffers no other house-companions but those who with him serve the Lord in righteousness (ver. 3), truth (ver. 4) and humility (ver. 5), and so conducts his government, that in the nation and land he looks on those only as his true servants and his companions in the kingdom of God who walk in the ways of faithfulness and honesty. Ewald: "We are introduced into the very core of all the great king's thought and effort at this time by Ps. ci., which cannot have been composed till at least after this removal of the sanctuary, when Jerusalem had already for some time been the 'city of Jehovah,' and according to its whole content probably falls in these first years. Here is freely poured forth a heavenly-clear stream of the purest kingly thoughts and purposes. . . . How David, having before wished to become a righteous king, faithful to the true God, was now in the 'city of Jehovah' much more joyfully and decidedly resolved to become one, comes out most beautifully from the words of this Song."

5. The establishment of the ark on Zion was the beginning of the reformation and reorganization of the divine service, which was raised by David from the disintegration and lawlessness into which it had fallen under Saul, to an artistically beautiful form. He organized the priests and Levites, dividing them into twenty-four classes for weekly service. With his own musical endowments was intimately connected his zealous care for the organization of the sacred music, to which, with the aid of the three great masters, Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun, he gave a new impulse, and for the culture and further development of which, along with the four thousand Levites who were charged with the execution of the sacred music, there was formed a select chorus out of the families of the three masters. And with this was connected the development of sacred poetry in psalm-composition, of which David himself was the creator.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 2. [HALL: The tumults of war afforded no opportunity of this service; only peace is a friend to religion; neither is peace ever our friend, but when it is a servant of piety.*—Tr.] FR. ARNDT: Truly to be praised and felicitated is every land that is ruled by a pious king; there mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace kiss each other: and the proverb is proven true: As the king, so the people! But also to be felicitated is every king himself, who does not forget that over him there reigns a yet greater king, the King of all kings, to whose grace he owes his royal power, who alone secures him his throne, and who will one day bring him to account for what he does and what he leaves undone.

Vers. 3-7. STARKE: He who wishes to rejoice let him rejoice in the Lord.—[HALL: O happy Israel, that had a God to rejoice in, that had this occasion of rejoicing in their God, and an heart that embraced this occasion!—TR.]—As a burning coal kindles the next, so may the good example of pious rulers attract the subjects to follow them, 2 Cor. ix. 2.—Even that which is done with a good intention does not always please God, vii. 5; Lev. x. 1; Prov. xiv. 12.—OSLANDER: Even pious people err when they depart, though it be but a little, from the express word of God.—[HALL: God's businesses must be done after His own forms, which if we do with the best intentions alter, we presume.—WORDSWORTH: All religious reformations which are wrought by men are blemished with human infirmities.—TR.]—SCHLIER: How could such a festal joy, which knew nothing of holy fear, however well-meant, prove acceptable to God? It is not enough that we mean well, and have pious thoughts; we must also, in what we do, hold fast to God's word and commandment, and in all our joy in the Lord must not allow ourselves to forget that we have to do with a holy God.—DISSELHOFF: Where God sees one that wishes to flee to the shelter of His word, He so trains him up that he learns to bow unconditionally to the authority of that word, and no longer mingles God's word and man's word.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: This interruption of the bright jubilee-festival was for every one a new warning that God's kindness never goes alone, but always under the guidance of His holiness, . . . that we dangerously overstep the limits of becoming modesty whenever we mount up to the delusion that it depends on us to rescue the ark as soon as ever the car of the Church whereby it is borne appears, through the negligence and unfaithfulness of those who are appointed for its direction, to be rolling into the abyss.—O. v. GERLACH: Uzzah is a type of all those who with humanly good intentions, but in an unsanctified spirit, take it upon themselves to rescue the cause of God, which they think is in peril.

Ver. 9. OSLANDER: When many have sinned, God commonly punishes one or two of the leaders, in order that the others may remember their sin and beg forgiveness.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: Though the Lord may for a time change His countenance, yet with His own people He always means faithfulness, and after the storm always makes the sun come up again in his time. However painfully He may chastise, His word of promise always stands: Can a woman forget her child?" etc.

Ver. 11. FR. ARNDT: Where the sign of the Lord's presence, the means of grace, is, there the Lord's presence and gracious working is not wanting, and where this enters there is indeed blessing upon blessing, as in Obed-edom's house.—SCHLIER: What blessed people we then first become when we receive God's word into our houses, and let this word of God be our heart's joy and delight. The blessing of the Lord dwells where God's word dwells.

[Ver. 12. SCOTT: When pious men who have been betrayed into unwarrantable conduct have had time for self-examination, searching the Scriptures and prayer, they will discover and confess their mistakes, and be reduced to a better temper; they will justify God in His corrections; they will be convinced that safety and comfort consist, not in absenting themselves from His ordinances, or in declining dangerous services, but in attending to their duty in a proper spirit and manner; they will profit by their own errors.—TR.]

Ver. 14. DISSELHOFF: David was full of joy because he perceived that entire submission of heart to God's revealed will makes one truly free and blessed.—BERL. B.: The joy of a soul is unspeakably great, which finds again in itself the pure and holy God, whom before it feared to receive.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: David gave expression to that which swelled in his bosom, even in corresponding gestures and a rhythmical movement.—The idea of that which the world of to-day is wont to associate with the word dance, is here to be kept quite at a distance. Dancing was in Israel a form of divine service, in which often—as in the case of Miriam and her companions after the passage of the Red Sea—the highest and holiest inspiration found expression.—STARKE: It is accordingly a shameful misuse to justify voluptuous dancing by David's example.—S. SCHMID: What is undertaken in God's service must be done with all the heart and with all the powers, in order that everybody may see that one is in real earnest.—Ver. 15. SCHLIER: So we have here a popular festival, and indeed a right joyous popular festival full of festal jubilation, and the occasion of the festive joy is nothing else than the ark, the sanctuary of the Lord. The law of the Lord makes a whole people, with their king in the lead, joyous and jubilant.—How much do worldly festivals amount to, and how little do Christian festivals! what a jubilee in the one case, and how little true festal joy in the other!—Our fairest and most delightful popular festivals ought to be our Christian festivals.

Ver. 16. STARKE: Divine and heavenly things are to worldly hearts only folly; they cannot know them, for they are spiritually discerned, 1 Cor. ii. 14.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: Even at the present day, alas! there is still no lack of people like Michal. In the pure fire of the Spirit from on high these persons also see only a morbid fanaticism; in the most animated and vigorous expression of hallowed exaltation of soul, a hypocritical display. . . . The life from and in God remains a mystery to every one until through the Spirit of God Himself it is unsealed to his experience.

Ver. 20. [HENRY: We have no reason to think that this of which Michal accused him was true in fact; David no doubt observed decorum, and governed his zeal with discretion; but it is common for those that reproach religion thus to put false colors upon it, and lay it under the most odious characters.—TR.]—There is never wanting to pious enthusiasm the moment when it again gives place to the accustomed quieter and more equable state of mind. David did not always come home in so exalted a frame as on that festal day. But lamentable is the case of him who does not at all understand the eagle-flight by which souls devoted to God, in times of especial visitations of grace, are carried up above all the enclosures of their wonted everyday life, and transported into a condition in which in feeling and word they "soar above the heights of earth."—BERL. BR.: After the soul has lost all its own greatness and all the joy drawn from itself, it has no other joy or greatness than the joy and greatness of God. Men filled with mere carnal prudence cannot bear such a condition. They condemn it and depise those who are so happy in possessing it, yea they chide it still, as here Michal reproaches David and passes carnal sentence on that which is spiritual.

Ver. 21 sqq. DISSELHOFF: A heart that with all the forces of its being clings so closely, so joyously, to God's revelation, or rather grows into it, draws from it all nourishment and receives from it all light, such a heart bears as a precious fruit that unfeigned, immovable humility, whose heart-refreshing image this history sets before our eyes.—He who walks in such humility before God and men, his eye is not blinded by the sunlight of good days, his heart and head do not become dizzy on the heights of prosperity. He stands firm, whether God leads him into the gloomy valley, or a step higher, or upon the summit. But such humility is born only of absolute submission under God's law and testimony.—[SCOTT: We should esteem such reproaches honorable, and determine to become still more vile in the eyes of ungodly revilers, by abounding in those services which they despise.—ROBINSON: We are warned from the examples of ancient saints to expect opposition and contempt, as far as we discover any real fervor in the service of God. Nor should we wonder if on such an occasion "a man's foes be they of his own household."—TR.]—S. SCHMID: It is better to be exalted by God with the lowly than to be humbled by God with the proud. Matt. xxiii. 12. CRAMER: Honor with God should be more highly esteemed than honor with men. John xii. 43.

Ver. 23. FR. ARNDT: If we look back once more, we see: All are blessed of God, David, Obed-edom, the rejoicing people; Michal alone has remained unblest. Her lack of blessing was the penalty and the curse of her pride.—[HALL: David came to bless his house (ver. 20); Michal brings a curse upon herself.—TR.]

II. The divine consecration of the Davidic kingdom by the promise of the imperishable kingly dominion of the Davidic house.

CHAP. VII. 1-29.

1. David's purpose to build the Lord a house, and the divine promise that the Lord will build him a house. Vers. 1-16.

1 AND it came to pass, when the king sat in his house, and the Lord [Jehovah]
2 had given him rest¹ round about from all his enemies, That the king said unto Nathan the prophet, See now, I dwell in an house of cedar, but [and] the ark of God
3 dwelleth within curtains [the curtain].² And Nathan said to the king, Go,³ do all 4 that is in thine heart [All, etc., go do], for the Lord [Jehovah] is with thee. And it came to pass that night, that the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came unto Nathan,⁴ 5 saying, Go and tell [say to] my servant, [ins. to] David, Thus saith the Lord [Je-6 hovah], Shalt⁵ thou build me a house for me to dwell in? Whereas [For] I have not dwelt in any [a] house since the time that I brought up⁶ the children of Israel 7 out of Egypt even to this day, but have walked⁷ in a tent and in a tabernacle. In all *the places*⁸ wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel, spake I a word with any of the tribes⁹ of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel, say-8 ing, Why build ye not me an house of cedar? Now, therefore, so [And now, thus] shalt thou say unto my servant, [ins. to] David, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts, I took¹⁰ thee from the sheeppcote [pasture], from following the sheep, to be 9 ruler over my people, over Israel; And I was with thee whithersoever thou went-est, and have cut off all thine enemies out of thy sight [from before thee], and have

¹ [Ver. 1. Sept. κατακληρονόμησε "caused to possess," reading לָקַח for נָתַן].—Ta.]

² [Ver. 2. Sept. "tent" (טֶנֶת), others διπλώμας "curtain of skins." Vulg. has the plural here, as in 1 Chron. xvii. 1. The difference is not important.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 4. "Nathan the prophet" in Syr., Ar., and in 5 MSS., a natural scriptio plena.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 5. Philippson: wilt thou [wishes thou to] build?; Cahen: is it thou that wishest? Sept. and Syr.: thou shalt not build. Chald. has: a house for my presence [Shekinah] to dwell in. We may render either "shall" or "will."—In the first clause some MSS. and EDD. and all the ancient VSS. except Chald. omit the second "to," probably to ease the construction (as in Eng. A. V.); so also in ver. 8.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 6. Thenius, citing the ancient VSS. (especially Sept., Syr., Chald.), would read the Perf. הָלַכְתִּי instead of the Inf. הֹלֵכְתִּי, and would then supply אָשָׁר; but the masoretic pointing is at least as suitable as that of the VSS., and these last may easily be a free translation of our text.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 6. Lit.: "have been walking," "have been a perambulator."—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. So Sept., Vulg., Chald., Ew., Then., Philippson, Cahen. De Wette and Erdmann have less well "in the whole time."—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 7. This reading is discussed in the exposition.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 8. In this address to David (vers. 8-16) the sequence of verb-forms (in respect to time) presents some difficulty. The passage begins with a Perf. (past time), which is followed in regular sequence by Waw with Impf. till we reach the last verb in ver. 9, where the form changes to Waw with Perf., followed by similar forms in apparently future sequence up to the Athnach in ver. 11; in the last clause of this verse we find Waw with Perf., where the time is present. The remaining portion (vers. 12-16) is clearly future. The difficulty concerns the rendering of the verbs in vers. 8-11. Here it is to be observed that the change of form in ver. 9 after the Athnach is somewhat strange if the past time is to be maintained, and on the other hand, for future time we should expect the Impf.; it seems better, therefore, to take it as present (as in ver. 11). But in ver. 10, 11 a time is more naturally fixed as future by the Impfs. that there occur, and the introductory Waw with Perf. (וַיֵּשֶׁב) may be explained by supposing that the preceding וַיֵּשֶׁב "I make," extends into the future, so that according to the law of sequence it would be followed by Perfs. Thus, then, we should render in the past from 8b to 9a, make 9b a transitional present, 10 and 11 a future, and 11b present.—This is nearly the order of the Sept.; it varies only in 9b where the Greek has the Aorist (so Vulg.). Philippson and Bib.-Com. render throughout in the past, except in 11b where the former has, and the latter permits the present. So Böttcher, Then., Cahen. The rendering here given is nearly that of Eng. A. V. and Wellhausen.—According to the one view God has given His people rest, and will now make David a house; according to the other He has cut off David's enemies, and will give him rest and make him a house.—The past form in ver. 1 "had given him rest" is the strongest argument for a past rendering in ver. 11, and therefore throughout; but this is not conclusive, since the "rest" in the latter case may be completer than in the former.—Ta.]

made thee a great¹¹ name like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth.
 10 Moreover [And] I will appoint a place for my people Israel and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own [and they shall dwell in their own place], and move no more [and no more be disturbed], neither shall the children
 11 of wickedness afflict them any more, as beforetime, And as since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel,¹² [...] and have caused [And I will cause] thee to rest from all thine enemies, also [and] the Lord [Jehovah] telleth thee that he [Jehovah]¹³ will make thee an house.
 12 And¹⁴ [om. and] when [When] thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels,¹⁵
 13 and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his father, and he shall be 14 my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men and with the stripes of the children of men. But my mercy shall not depart¹⁶ away from 15 him, as I took it from Saul whom I put away [ins. from] before thee. And thy house and thy kingdom shall be established [stable] forever before thee;¹⁷ thy throne shall be established forever.

2. David's prayer as answer to this divine promise. Vers. 17-29.

17 According to all these words and according to all this vision, so did Nathan 18 speak unto David. Then went king David in [And king David went in] and sat before the Lord [Jehovah], and he said, Who am I, O Lord God [O lord Jehovah]¹⁸, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God [O lord Jehovah], but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come. And is this the manner of 20 man, O Lord God? [And this is the law of man,¹⁹ O lord Jehovah]. And what can [shall] David say more unto thee? for thou, Lord God [om. Lord God], knowest thy servant [ins. lord Jehovah]. For thy word's²⁰ sake, and according to thine own heart hast thou done all these great things, to make thy servant know them.
 22 Wherefore thou art great, O Lord God [Jehovah God]; for there is none like thee, neither is there any [and there is no] God beside thee, according to²¹ all that we have heard with our ears. And²² what one nation in the earth is like thy people, even [om. even] like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to himself, and to make him a name, and to do for you [them] great things and terrible, for thy land [om. for thy land, ins. to drive out] before thy people, which thou redeemedst them [Israel] to rest," on the ground that here (from ver. 10) it is Israel that is spoken of. This reading would remove the above-mentioned objection to the future rendering, but cannot be regarded as more than a conjecture, since in such a discourse the change of reference (as in the last clause of ver. 11) would not be strange.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 15. Instead of the Qal we find Hiph. "I will not remove" in 1 Chr. xvii. 18, Sept., Vulg., Syr., Ar., which form De Rossi thinks is supported by some MSS., which have 1 sing. Qal Impf. (לֹא-אֶרְדֹּם); it is scarcely possible to decide between the two readings.—So in the latter clause of this verse Sept. has $\text{καὶ ὡς ἀνέστης ἐπ' ἐν ἀνέστης ἐκ σπλάχνων μου}$ "as I removed it from those whom I removed from before me," and Chron.: "as I took it from him that was before thee." Here from the connection the "thee" of the Heb. seems preferable to the "me" of Sept.; as between "Samuel" and "Chron." the general presumption is that the latter condenses and abbreviates an originally longer text. The "Saul" may be insertion for clearness of reference, and the difference in the two texts may be connected with the repetition of the verb וְנָתַתִּי (which in Eng. A. V. is here given by the two words

"took" and "put away"). It is perhaps better to suppose that the two editors (of "Samuel" and "Chron.") have wrought the original material each in his own way.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 16. Some MSS. and Sept. and Syr. read "before me," which is preferred by De Rossi.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 18. In Heb.: Adonai Jahveh. Where this combination occurs, the Masorites call the second name Elohim (instead of the ordinary Adonai); the Chald. has Jahveh Elohim, Syr. Lord God, Sept. κύριος μου κύριος and Vulg. Dominus Deus, whence Eng. A. V. Lord God.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 19. For discussion of the text of this clause see Exposition and Notes.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 21. It is to be noted that whereas Sept. here has "for thy servant's sake" (as 1 Chr. xvii. 19), it omits this clause in the parallel passage in Chron.; this may point to a correction of the text by the Greek translators (Wellh. takes a similar view, holding the Sept. "according to thy heart thou hast done" to be taken from Chr.). The context seems to favor the reading in Chron.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 22. In some good MSS. and EDD. "in all," which is preferred by De Rossi.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 23. The text of this verse can hardly be satisfactorily restored, even after introducing the changes

- 24 to thee from Egypt, from the [om. from the] nations and their gods? For [And] thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel to be a people unto thee forever, and thou, Lord [Jehovah], art become their God.
- 25 And now, O Lord [Jehovah] God, the word that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant and concerning his house, establish it [om. it] forever, and do as thou
- 26 hast said. And let thy name be magnified forever, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] of hosts is the [om. the] God over Israel; and let the house of thy servant David
- 27 be established before thee. For thou, O Lord [Jehovah] of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house; therefore hath thy
- 28 servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee. And now, O Lord God, [lord Jehovah], thou art that [om. that] God, and thy words be true [*are*³ truth],
- 29 and thou hast promised [spoken] this goodness unto thy servant; Therefore [And] now, let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant that it may continue forever before thee; for thou, O Lord God [lord Jehovah], hast spoken it, and with thy blessing let [shall] the house of thy servant be blessed forever.

suggested by the Chronicles-text (as given in the brackets). There seems to be a mingling of two forms of assertion, in one of which Israel is compared with a heathen nation and Jehovah with a false god, while in the other the comparison expresses only what Jehovah had done for Israel. To the first form, perhaps, belongs the Sept. phrase "what other nation," and the Plu. verb "went" in "Samuel," and to the second belong the phrases "for you," "for thy land," "redeemedst from Egypt." As regards the testimony of the ancient versions, the Vulg. renders our Heb. text (as Eng. A. V.), except that it has at the end "nation" instead of "nations" (because elohim has the Sing. suffix); the Chald. gives the Heb. paraphrastically: "and who is as thy people, as Israel, a people one, chosen . . . whom men sent from Jehovah went to redeem . . . till they came to the land of thy presence which thou gavest to them," etc.; Syr. "on the earth aforesaid" (לְעֵלְמָא דְּפָנֵי); Sept. has "other nation" (instead of "one nation"), "as God led them" (הָלַכְנוּ instead of הָלַכְתָּ), "to drive out (as in Chron.) . . . nations and tents" (מִלְּאֵלִים אֲחֵרִים for מִלְּאֵלִים). Instead of "for you," Vulg. and Chald. have "for them;" our text here is defended by Böttcher and Erdmann, but even if such change of conception is possible for David, it is harsh and is perhaps better omitted in a translation.—See further in the Exposition.—Ta.]

* [Ver. 28. The fut. rendering is given by Sept., Syr., Vulg., but the Pres. is better (with Then. and Erdmann), because the whole clause is a declaration of what God is essentially. Philippeon has less well: "and thy words will be (worden, 'become,') truth, since thou hast spoken."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. David's purpose to build the Lord a house, and the divine prohibition with the promise that the Lord will build him a house. Vers. 1-16 (1 Chron. xvii.).

Vers. 1-3. David's resolution to build the Lord a house is approved by the prophet Nathan. Comp. 1 Chron. xvii. 1, 2.

Ver. 1. And when the king dwelt in his house (comp. ver. 11). What follows occurred not only after David had built his royal palace, but also after he, having secured external quiet, had taken up his permanent abode therein. The starting-point of David's words in ver. 2 (like that of the narrative) is the "house" in which he dwelt. [Philippeon: Abarbanel refers to Deut. xii. 9, 10 sq.,* supposing that David thought the condition there laid down to have now reached a fulfilment.—Ta.]—And the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies.—According to these words the following narrative cannot be put chronologically immediately after the Philistine war related in ch. v., which view the position of this section after ch. vi. might seem to favor. Decisive against this is the phrase: "round about from all his enemies," and ver. 9: "I have cut off all thy enemies before thee." The temporary quiet that David gained by that double victory over the Philistines he used to bring the ark to Zion; but he soon found himself involved in new wars begun by Israel's enemies round about, first by the Philistines, according to the narration in ch. viii. Not till he had crushed all Israel's pressing enemies could he wish to carry out his determination to build a house for the Lord. On account of its factual connection with the account of the ark the history of this determination is attached to ch. vi., the narrative throughout, indeed, not appearing to be strictly chronological, but bearing the impress of a grouping of the several sections according to certain principal points of view. (In chs. viii.—xii. the external wars, in xiii.—xx. the internal difficulties, and in xxi. sq. detached occurrences in David's life are brought together without chronological sequence.) But it is not to be assumed that "our narrative is to be put in the last part of David's life" (Then.), since, according to ver. 11, he had still other wars to carry on against the enemies of Israel, for which reason precisely, and because he had to be on his guard without, the peaceful work of temple-building could not be executed (as Solomon also expressly affirms, 1 Kings v. 17); and since the promise in ver. 12 refers to the seed, that will yet proceed from his body. The time of the words: "when the Lord had given him rest" (wanting in Chron.), is to be put after that of the wars in ch. viii., whereby David secured his throne against "enemies round about," without being able thus to exclude further wars; his resolution to build a temple can be referred only to a temporary rest after his first victorious contests against all his enemies.—[Comp. the language in xxii. 1 and Josh. xxiii. 1.—Ta.]—Ver. 2. David communicated this resolution to the prophet Nathan, who, according to this, stood in a confidential relation to him as counsellor, and this is confirmed not only by Nathan's reproof after the sin with Bathsheba, but also by the fact (xii. 25) that Solomon's education was committed to him, and he with David's approval anointed Solomon as successor to his father while the latter was still living (1 Kings i. 34). [On Nathan see Erdmann's Introduction and the Bible-Dictionaries.—Tr.]—David states to Nathan as the ground of his resolution the contrast that he dwelt in a palace of cedar, while the ark of God stood within the curtains, that is, simply in a tent (vi. 15). The word here used (תֹּכַחֲתֵי) means in Ex. xxvi. 2 sq. the inner cover composed of several curtains, that was spread over the board-structure of the tabernacle. The Plu. is used in Isa. liv. 2 as = "tent," and in Song of Songs i. 5; Jer. iv. 20 as = "tents." The "within" refers to the drapery formed by the curtains; Chron. has "under curtains." David's words express the pious, humble disposition in which his purpose was founded. The utterance of the purpose itself is not added to this statement of its ground, but is presupposed in Nathan's approval [ver. 3]. All that is in thy heart, that is, in this connection, what thou hast resolved on, comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 7; 2 Kings x. 30. For the Lord is with thee, where the preceding "do" is based on the Lord's leading, under which David, as theocratic king, stands. Nathan characterizes David's purpose as one well-pleasing to the Lord. J. H. Michaelis: "out of his own mind, not by divine revelation."

a. Vers. 4-7. Not David is to build the Lord a house.—Ver. 4. In that night, following the day on which David held the above conversation with Nathan, came the word of the Lord to Nathan. Nothing is said here of a divine revelation through a dream (comp. Num. xii. 6; 1 Kings iii. 5), or through a vision and the hearing of a voice (comp. 1 Sam. iii. 5, 10, 15), but the word of the Lord is described as having come to Nathan by night; that is, it is related that he received a divine revelation in the form and through the medium of the word, he receiving its content with the inner ear of the Spirit as a divine decision respecting that which was stirring his heart. Comp. Isa. xxi. 10. By the conversation held with David during the day Nathan's soul with all its thoughts and feelings was concentrated on David's great and holy purpose; this was the psychological basis for the divine inspiration that forms the content of the following revelation, and not in inner contradiction with, but in distinction from his answer to David, informs him that the purposed temple-building is to be executed according to the Lord's will not by David, but by his seed.—Ver. 5. Nathan receives the divine revelation that he may officially impart it to David.—Shouldst [or, shalt] thou build me a house to dwell in?—The question has a negative significance = thou shouldst [shalt] not. Chron., interpreting the meaning, has: "not thou." Certainly Nathan's assent to David's thought that a house ought to be built for the Lord is not thereby set aside;

but it is true that the opinion that David himself is to be the builder is corrected into this other, that this resolution is to be first carried out by his seed. Hengstenberg's interpretation, therefore, that David is to build the house not personally, but in his seed (Christol., Eng. tr. i. 126), is forced and in contradiction both with his word and with Solomon's interpretation (1 Kings viii. 15-21).—Ver. 6. The reason for the no. It is logically obvious that this reason must stand in some relation to the sense in which the "shalt thou?" is spoken. Not thou shalt build me a house, for: 1) "I have not dwelt in a house from the day when I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt to this day." During this whole period, while the people had yet no secure, firm, unendangered dwelling-place, the symbol of the Lord's presence and dwelling amid His people could also have no permanent abode. But I was a wanderer in tent and dwelling-place, that is, as the people was in constant movement and unquiet, so my abode was of necessity a movable tent, wandering from place to place; the allusion is to the necessary frequent change of place of the sanctuary, first in the wilderness, and then during the unquiet movements hither and thither in the land itself (Gilgal, Shiloh, Nob, Gibeon). Comp. 1 Chron. xvii. 5: "and I was from tent to tent and from dwelling to dwelling." There is no sufficient ground for distinguishing "tent" and "dwelling" as tent-frame and tent-cover (Then.); rather the "dwelling" is to be taken with Keil as explicative: in a tent, which was my dwelling.—[The word mishkan, rendered in Eng. A. V. "tabernacle," sometimes means the whole structure built by Moses, as in Ex. xxxv. 11, where it includes the boards, the tent (ohel, the goatskin-curtain) and the covering (mishkah, the curtains of ram-skins and seal-skins). Elsewhere (as in Ex. xl. 18) it denotes the board-structure with the inner curtains of blue, purple and scarlet; and again it is used (Ex. xxvi. 6) apparently for the inner curtains alone. It seems clear that technically the ohel or tent signified the outer cloth of goat-skin, and the mishkah or covering the two protecting heavy cloths of ram-skin and seal skin, the mishkan proper denoting the rest of the structure; but it is not so probable that the technical distinction is introduced here; the interpretation of Keil seems better. Still, taking the somewhat different reading in Chron., we may suppose that each of the terms ohel and mishkan is put for the whole structure of which they formed a part, a variation of terms for the sake of filling out the conception, the former rather suggesting the wilderness, the latter the land of Canaan.—Tr.]—Ver. 7. 2. To the statement that the Lord had hitherto had no fixed dwelling, but had dwelt only in a movable tent, is appended a second, that in all this time He had never given command to build Him a fixed abode.—In all wherein I walked, that is, in my whole walk, during the whole time that I walked among all the children of Israel. These words are to be taken not with the preceding (ver. 6), which form the adversative definition of the immediately preceding declaration, but with the following, and correspond in context with the statement of time in ver. 6: "from the day . . . to this day." The "walking" denotes the self-witness of the divine presence, might and help in the whole historical development of Israel up to this time. Spake I a word with any one of the tribes of Israel?—Instead of “tribes” (טִבְעִים) Chron. has “judges” (שֹׁפְטִים), which is adopted by Ewald, Bertheau, Thenius, Bunsen, after ver. 11. But the “judges” are there mentioned in a totally different connection of thought; and if this were the original word, it would be impossible to explain the origination and general unquestioned acceptance of the difficult “tribes.” The reading of the text “tribes” is to be retained with Maurer, Böttcher, Keil, Hengstenberg. Maurer correctly remarks: “those tribes are to be understood that before the time of David attained the supremacy, as Ephraim, Dan, Benjamin. Böttcher gives a complete list of the tribes that successively attained the headship through the Judges chosen from them. [Abarbanel (quoted by Philipps.) renders “sceptres” = “judges,” but this is not admissible. On the text see “Text. and Gramm.”—Tr.] The “feeding” (a figure derived from the shepherd, who goes before the flock, leads it to pasture and protects it) denotes the guidance and defence of the whole people, to which one tribe was called, and which it accomplished through the judge that represented it. The Chronicler had only the line of judges in mind; his alteration is a collateral text that serves very well to explain the main text. Why build ye not me a house of cedar? *—That is, a permanent and costly sanctuary, worthy of my glory. Comp. 1 Kings viii. 16, where Solomon, with reference to these words, cites as the Lord’s word: “I chose no city among all the tribes of Israel to build me a house.” Pa. lxxviii. 67 is in like manner elucidatory of this passage; for there the choice of David as prince, and of Zion as the place of the sanctuary, is represented as if it were the choice of the tribe of Judah after the rejection of Ephraim. [Synopsis Criticorum: In this discourse of God some things are omitted that are afterwards represented as having been said here, as in 1 Kings viii. 16, 18, 26; 1 Chron. xxii. 8, 9; xxviii. 6; it is Scriptural usage not always to report the whole of a discourse, but sometimes to give a brief summary.—Tr.] Thus in vers. 6, 7, looking at the whole past of the people, one side of the reason for the “shalt thou?” in ver. 5 is given: From the beginning of the history till now a permanent dwelling for the Lord, instead of the moving tent, had neither actually existed (because not possible under the circumstances), nor been divinely commanded. [There is no reproof to David in this.—Tr.]

b. Vers. 8–11. The other side of the reason lies in the history of the Lord’s dealings with David, which point to the fact that the Lord will build David a house before a house can be built to the Lord.—Ver. 8. The Lord’s first manifestation of favor to him was his elevation from the lowliness of the shepherd-life to the office and dignity of prince over Israel. “From the sheepfold” (רֶחֱלִי) see Pa. lxxviii. 70. [Better: “from the pasture.” The word means “habitation,” which in reference to flock means, not where they spend the night (which is, as Thenius says, נִדְרָה), but where they feed (see Isa. lxx. 10, where Eng. A. V. has improperly “fold”), and this suits the context of our passage.—Tr.] To this was added the continuous revelation of His gracious presence: Ver. 9.—I was with thee in all thy going.—These two facts, the elevation of David to be king and his constant attendance [by God] in all his walk, answer to the elevation of Israel to be his people, and the Lord’s walking with them (vers. 6, 7). The wars hitherto waged form the third stadium: I have out off all thy enemies before thee.

—These wars, however, were the wars of the Lord, waged by Him as king of his people (1 Sam. xxv. 28). On this plane of the Lord’s exhibition of power in wars and victories over enemies rises the glory of the great name that the Lord has made for him in the sight of the nations round about (comp. Psalm cxxxii. 17, 18; 1 Chr. xiv. 17).—Ver. 10. These gradually advancing manifestations of the Lord’s favor to David look to the well-being of the people of Israel: 1) He thereby prepared a place for them [Erdmann renders: “I prepared a place,” etc.; see “Text. and Gram.”—Tr.]; that is, by subduing their enemies made room for a safe, unendangered expansion in the promised land; 2) Planted them—that is, on the soil thus cleansed and made safe He established a firm, deep-rooted national life; 3) They dwell in their [own] place, their life-power unfolds itself within the limits secured them by the Lord; 4) They shall no longer be affrighted by restless enemies. In these words the discourse turns to the future of the people. The sense is: after all these manifestations of favor in the past up to this time, the Lord will for the future assure His people a position and an existence, wherein they shall no more experience the affliction and oppression that they suffered from godless nations. The “as beforetime” refers to the beginning of the people’s history in Egypt. The words in ver. 11 from “and as since” to “Israel” belong with the “beforetime” as chronological datum, and depend on the “as” in ver. 10. And from the time when I ordained Judges over my people Israel.—That is, not merely during the period of the Judges, but on from the time when the judges began to lead the people, since the Prep. “from” [Eng. A. V.: “since”] gives only the terminus a quo, and consequently the period of the continuous oppression of the people by surrounding nations in the time after the judges till now is not excluded. This glance at the history of Israel’s affliction and oppression from the beginning on answers to the glance at the Lord’s presence and walk with them during their long period of wandering. All this the Lord has done to the people through His servant David (comp. Psalm lxxxix. 22–24). The usual connection of these words with the following: “and from the time that . . . have I caused thee to rest” (so still Hengst. ubi sup. [p. 130]) is untenable—because: 1) we thus have the impossible statement that God gave David rest from the beginning of the period of the Judges on, and 2) the period of the Judges was any thing but a time of quiet. And

* [Bib. Comm.: The cedar of Lebanon is a totally different tree from what we improperly call Virginia cedar (Juniperus Virginiana). It is a close-grained, light-colored, yellowish wood, with darker knots and veins.—Tr.]

* [The general sense is not changed by this slight difference of translation.—Tr.]

I give thee rest from all thy enemies.—The verb (Perf. with Waw consec.) is to be understood of the future, as is usual with this form when, as here, a future precedes. "In the quiet progress of the discourse the Future here passes over into quiet description" (Ges. §126, 6). It is also here to be considered that the Perf. refers to Future in asseverations and assurances. To take the verb in a Perfect sense [= I have given rest], the narrative concerning the past in ver. 9 being thereby resumed (De Wette, Thenius [Bible Commentary, Philippon]), is inadmissible, because the discourse has already in the preceding words turned to the future, and such a retrogressive repetition, considering the rapid advance elsewhere in all these words, would be intolerable. David's present rest (ver. 1) was only a temporary one—for the hostile nations were ever seeking opportunity to assault Israel. Although David's wars and victories hitherto had so far firmly established Israel that the former times of "terror and distress" could not return, yet his reign was a constant war with the hostile nations around, in order to maintain the security that had been won, and to ward off the freshly impressing enemies. To this continuing unquiet refers the first promise of the Lord to David: "I will give thee rest from all thy enemies." The Chron. has (ver. 10): "and I subdue all thy enemies, and tell it thee, and a house will the Lord build thee."* The second declaration is introduced by the words: "the Lord announces to thee" (not, has announced), "causes to be announced." Thereby the promise itself: The Lord will build thee a house is raised to its supereminent importance above all the preceding words. In it culminates the gradually rising line of the Lord's exhibitions of favor to David, and through him to the people. The "house" is the royal authority in Israel, which is assured and established for his family. According to these words (vers. 5-7 and 8-11) there are two principal grounds for the Lord's negative answer to David's determination to build him a house: 1) as the Lord could have no fixed dwelling-place amid His people, so long as they were wandering out of Canaan, and in Canaan were constantly disquieted by enemies and driven hither and thither, so also David's rule, in spite of victories over enemies, was still too much disquieted by external enemies that had to be fought, he being especially called thereby to secure to the people a settled permanent existence for the future. Hence now also the dwelling-place of the Lord amid His people can have no other form than that of the tent, the symbol of Israel's wandering, which was to be ended and quieted first by David's battles and victories. 2) David had indeed declared that he wished to perform something for the Lord in the building of a house, but this human plan should and could not reach fulfilment except and before the Lord had completed His manifestations of favor to David and carried out His plan, which looked to confirming the royal authority for his house and family forever, and thereby assuring the well-being of the people. What the Lord had hitherto done for David, and through him for Israel, was only the beginning of this confirmation of his kingdom; it was by its assured connection for all the future with David's posterity that the firm foundation was first laid, on which could be carried out the work of temple-building as the sign of the immovably founded kingdom of peace and of the theocracy that was to exhibit itself in undisturbed quiet in Israel. The meaning of the divine prohibition, therefore, is this: Thou canst not build me a house, for I must first build thee a house, before the building of a house for me is possible. This second principal ground is connected immediately with the first; for the promise could not be fulfilled, unless by the establishment of external peace the condition for the confirmation of David's house was given. The first ground is more precisely defined in 1 Chron. xxii. 7-13; xxviii. 3 sq. by the statement that David was not permitted to build the temple on account of his wars: "because thou art a man of war and hast shed blood." With this agrees Solomon's word to Hiram, 1 Kings v. 3: "My father could not build a house to the name of the Lord for the wars that were about him."*

c. Vers. 12-16. The wider expansion and exacter definition of the promise: "I will build thee a house." Ver. 12 starts from the end of David's life; after his death the promise will be fulfilled. I will set up thy seed after thee.—The "set up" (סָקַף) denotes not the "awakening" or bringing into existence, but the elevating the seed to royal rule and power. The "seed" is not the whole posterity, as is clear from the explanatory words in 1 Chron. xvii. 11: "thy seed that shall be of thy sons," nor merely a single individual, but a selection from the posterity, which will be appointed by God's favor to succeed David on the throne. Which shall proceed (come) out of thy body.—The seed here spoken of was still in the future when this promise was made to David. We are not, with Thenius, to change "will proceed" (יָצָא) to "has proceeded" (יָצָא), as if Solomon were then already born. And I will establish his kingdom.—On the setting up and elevation to the royal dignity follows its confirmation to David's posterity, which has been called to be bearer of the theocratical royal office. This promise was fulfilled in the first place in Solomon, who also expresses his consciousness of this fact in 1 Kings viii. 20; comp. 1 Kings ii. 12.—Ver. 13. He, this thy seed, will build a house for my name.—The name stands for God Himself, so far as He reveals Himself to His people as covenant-God and makes Himself known in His loftiness and holiness. "To build a house for His name" signifies therefore not simply "in His honor, or as a place to call on Him," but "to establish a fixed place, which should be the sign and pledge of His abode in Israel." To the shorter formula: "To the (or, for the) name of the Lord" (comp. 1 Kings viii. 17-20, 48; iii. 2; v. 17, 19; 1 Chron. xxii. 7, 19; xxviii. 3) answers the longer: "that my name may be there, my name shall be there" (1 Kings viii. 16, 29; comp. 2 Chron. vi. 5; 2 Kings xxiii. 27), or, "that my name may dwell there" (Deut. xii. 11; xiv. 23; xvi. 11; xxvi. 2; Neh. i. 9), or, "that

* [The sense is the same as in Samuel.—Ta.]

* [See the thought here well brought out in Kell on "Samuel," Eng. tr. p. 344 sq.—Ta.]

I may put my name there" (1 Ki. ix. 3; 2 Ki. xxi. 7). And I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever.—The royal dominion will not only be one established in David's house, but also one enduring forever, never to be severed from this house. It is not here the everlasting dominion of one king that is spoken of, but it is said: with the seed of David the kingdom shall remain forever (= everlastingly). The everlasting stay of the kingdom in the house of David is promised. Comp. ver. 25, where David so understands this divine promise. Comp. Ps. lxxxix. 30; lxxii. 5, 7, 17.—Ver. 14. I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son.—The relation of fatherhood and sonship will exist between the covenant-God of Israel and the seed of David. This denotes in the first place the relation of the most cordial mutual love, which attests its enduring character by fidelity, and demonstrates its existence towards the Lord by active obedience. But besides this ethical significance of the relation of David's seed as "son" to God as "its father" (indicated by the Prep. "to"), we must, from the connection, note 1) the origin or descent of the son from the father; the seed of David, entrusted with everlasting kingly dignity, has as such his origin in the will of God, owes his kingdom to the divine choice and call, comp. Ps. ii. 7; lxxxix. 27, 28. 2) In the designations "father and son" is indicated community of possession; the seed, as son, receives the dominion from the father as heir, and, as this dominion is an everlasting one, he will, as son and heir, reign forever in possession of the kingdom. The father's kingdom is an unlimited one, embracing the whole world; so in the idea of sonship there lies, along with everlastingness, the idea of all-embracing world-dominion, on which the son lawfully enters. Comp. Psalm lxxxix. 26-30; ii. 7-9. Whom, if he commits iniquity—that is, not hypothetically, "in case he sin," but actually, when he sins (as cannot fail to happen); the seed, David's posterity here spoken of is not exempted from the sin that clings to all men—I will chasten with the rod of men and with the stripes of the children of men.*—That is, with such punishments as men suffer for their sins. David's seed will be free neither from sin nor from its human punishment. "Grace is not to release David and the Davidic line from this universal human lot, is not to be for them a charter to sin" (Hengst.). Comp. Baur: Gesch. d. alt. Weissag. [Hist. of O. T. Prophecy] I. 392 sq. Such chastisement will not be set aside by the cordial relation of David's seed as son to the Lord as father, but will rather follow David: The father will punish the son for his sins. The elevation of the latter to such glory above all the children of men is not to be a reason for making him an exception in respect to punishableness, but in this regard he will be equalled with all men before God's righteousness. Clericus, against the connection, explains the "rod of men" to mean: "moderate punishments, such as parents usually inflict." Wholly wrong is the rendering: "whom if any one offend, or, against whom if any one sin," comp. Pfeiffer, Dubia Vezata, V. 2, l. 84, p. 390; Russ, De promissione Davidica soli Messie vindicata, Jen., 1713. In Ps. lxxxix. 31-33 we have the further elucidation: "If his sons forsake my law and walk not in my judgments . . . I will visit them with the rod of their sin and with the stripes of their iniquity." Chron. omits this declaration in order to bring out the more strongly the following thought that the divine favor will, in spite of sin, remain with David's seed (Hengst. ubi sup. [p. 135]).—Ver. 15. But my favor shall not depart from him.—It is presupposed that in his sinning he remains faithful to the Lord, not departing from Him, and that the chastisement leads him to repentance (comp. 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; Psalm cxxxii. 12). This is clear from the following words: as I took it from Saul whom I put away before thee.—Comp. 1 Sam. xv. 23, 26, 28. "Before thee," before thy face; Saul and his kingdom had to disappear before David, who, with his kingdom took their place, and with whose seed the kingdom will remain forever in spite of the sins that shall be found in the individuals of his posterity, "his sons" (Ps. lxxxix. 31). The contrast is that between the punishment of sin in individuals and the favor that remains permanently with the family, whereby the divine promise becomes an unconditioned one" (Hengst.).—Ver. 16. And thy house and thy kingdom shall be permanent, as the result of the permanent favor and grace assured to David's seed (comp. Ps. lxxxix. 29, 38; Isa. lv. 3 ["sure mercies of David," same word as is here rendered "established" in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]), and as the lasting fulfilment of the promise in verse 12: "I will raise up, lift up thy seed." The word "before thee" is arbitrarily changed by Sept. and Syr. into "before me." Böttcher explains: "in thy conception" (comparing vii. 26, 29; 1 Kings viii. 50), and adds: "the reference is to the outlook of the living, not to a conscious participation still granted to the dead." O. v. Gerlach: "David, as ancestor and beginner of the line of kings, is conceived of as he who passes all his successors before him in vision." Thy throne will be firm forever.—This answers to the words in ver. 12: "and I will confirm his kingdom," as the continuous effect of this promise. In the "forever" (here twice given and resumed from ver. 13) in the promise of the everlasting kingdom connected with the house of David, the prophecy culminates. On the "firm" [כָּבֵד, Eng. A. V.: "established," different from the word so rendered in the former part of this verse, which = "sure," "faithful."—Tr.], comp. Mic. iv. 1, and on the "forever" comp. Ps. lxxii. 17; lxxxix. 37; xlv. 7; cx. 4; cxxxii. 11, 12. Comp. Jno. xii. 34.

2. David's prayer.—Vers. 17-29.

Ver. 17. Conclusion of the preceding section and introduction to the following. According to all these words and according to all this vision.—The words, as the content of God's revelation to Nathan, are distinguished from the vision as indication of its form and mode. To suppose a dream here (Thenius) because the revelation occurred at night (ver. 4) is inadmissible—since nothing is said of a dream; for the vision (חֲזִיוֹן = רְאוּיָה) is every where distinguished from the revelation by dream (Keil); and in Isa. xxix. 7 the word “dream” is expressly added in order to indicate a “vision” that occurred in a dream. Our word signifies the view, vision, as the result of the looking or gazing of the prophets (who are called חֲזִינִים, gazers, seers) with the inner sense, whether in a waking state or in a dream. In the former case the “vision” may denote either collectively a number of divine revelations, taken as a whole (so Isa. i. 1; Obad. 1; Nah. i. 1), or, a single revelation, as here (so Ezek. vii. 26; Dan. viii. 1, 2, 15, 17). But it is not the vision or view in itself that forms the essence and substance of the prophetic revelation, but rather the “word” or the “words” of the Lord, which as medium of the Spirit of God come to the prophetic spirit; the vision is the psychical form under which the revelation takes place. David’s answer to the Lord falls into three parts: Thanks for the exceeding abundant favor shown him and his house now in this revelation (vers. 18-21), Praise to the Lord for the great things He has done for His people in the past (vers. 22-24), and Prayer for the fulfillment of the promise in the future (vers. 25-29).

* The Rel. sentence begun with וְאִם is broken off, the Inf. (וְאִם) as indication of cause, acting as protasis and the Perf. with Waw cons. as apodosis in a future sense, giving the result of the sinning. Gen. §128, 6 d, Rem. 1. Then. strikes out the second ו (as a mis-copy of the first), and connects the Rel. with the suffix in הַכֹּתֶנֶת.

a. Vers. 18-21. David’s thanksgiving for the Lord’s gracious manifestation in the great promise now received.—The words “David went in . . . before Jehovah” indicate the powerful impression that Nathan’s communication made on David’s soul; the divine revelation received compels him to betake himself to the sanctuary “into the presence” of the Lord, where he “remained” (רָשָׁע) tarried [Eng. A. V. sat] sunk in contemplation and prayer. It cannot be inferred from Ex. xvii. 12 that David is to be thought of here as sitting; for Moses there sat from weariness after long prayer. The verb (רָשָׁע usually “sit”) is often used in the general sense: “remain, tarry.” [Bib. Comm. correctly points out that, even if the verb be rendered “sat,” it is not necessary to suppose that David prayed sitting. He may have risen to pray after meditation. Yet sitting under such circumstances would be a respectful attitude, and elsewhere we have no proof in the Scriptures of a customary attitude in prayer; that Solomon (1 Kings viii. 22) and Ezra and the Levites (Neh. viii. 4; ix. 4) stood was due to the peculiar circumstances. It is not stated in what place David offered his prayer; it may have been in his own house or in some part of the tabernacle.*—Tr.]—The content of this thanksgiving-prayer is like a clear glass, wherein we see into the innermost depths of David’s heart. His soul, wholly taken up with the divine revelation and promise, expresses itself in the following utterances, which follow one another quickly in accordance with the internal excitement of feeling: 1) The humble confession of unworthiness in respect to all manifestations of favor hitherto made to him and his house. Who am I, Lord Jehovah, and what is my house?—The words answer exactly to Jacob’s words in Gen. xxxii. 10 as the expression of the deepest humility and feeling of nothingness over against the greatness and glory of God. So in Pa. viii. 5; cxliv. 3 there is the contrast between the divine loftiness and human lowliness and nothingness. That thou hast brought me hitherto.—David reviews all the past leadings of God’s grace, in respect to which, as manifestations of the divine favor and love, he so feels his unworthiness and nothingness, and at the same time indirectly declares that he has hitherto submitted himself to the Lord’s guidance. 2) David, with like humility, thanks the Lord for this present supereminent manifestation of His favor in the promise relating to the future of his house.—Ver. 19. He gives the liveliest expression to his humble and joyfully excited feeling of the greatness and glory of God in the repetition of the preceding address, “Lord Jehovah” (ver. 18), and (comparing the abundant fullness of grace in this present revelation with the former exhibitions of grace, which culminate in it) in the first sentence of this verse (from the beginning to “great while to come”). From the far future [Eng. A. V.: “for a great while to come”], that is, of my house; the promise refers to favors in the far future for his house. The sense is: if, looking at former undeserved favors, I must bow low with the feeling of unworthiness, much more in view of the promises made out of free grace to my house for the far future.

The last sentence of this verse (וְהָאֵלֹהִים תִּירָתָהּ) is as enigmatic as the parallel passage, 1 Chron.

xvii. 17 (וְרָאִיתִי כְתוּר הָאָדָם הַמַּעֲלֶה). At the outset it must be assumed as certain that this word torah [Eng. A. V.: manner] never=“manner, custom, mode of acting” (מִשְׁפָּט, חֻק). Therefore the explanation (in itself very agreeable and easy): “and this (hast thou spoken) after the manner of men, thou acetest with me, that stand so infinitely below thee, in human manner,—that is, in such friendly manner as men use with one another” (Grotius, Gesenius, Winer, Maurer, Thénius, and De Wette: “such is the manner of men”) is as untenable as Luther’s translation: “this is the manner of a man who is God the Lord,” which besides rests on the conception of this passage as directly Messianic (pointing to the incarnation of God in Christ), and incorrectly takes “Lord Jehovah,” which here as before and after is an address, as explanatory apposition to “man.” For the same reason the explanation of Clericus and others is to be rejected: “in human fashion—that is, thou hast cared for me and my family as men do for their children and grandchildren, looking out for their future,” especially as it assigns to David’s words the very trivial thought of caring for a family for the future. Ebrard (Herz. VI. 609) characterizes this expression, “the law of man, of the Lord Jehovah,” as a word of “presageful bewilderment,” and finds the explanation in 1 Chron. xvii. 17, where he renders: “Thou hast looked on me like the form of man, who is God, Jehovah above,” David, says Ebrard, saw that he himself was contemplated, but at the same time so that Jehovah appeared to him here as a man, who was also God and enthroned on high, recognizing the fact that the final point of the promised posterity was Jehovah Himself, but Jehovah as man and God.

* [On David’s posture see notes of Patrick and Gill in loco.—Tr.]

So already S. Schmidt, who (after Chron.) inserts "as" before torah, taking this last—"condition, state" (תִּיבָה): "O Jehovah God, Thou hast looked on me . . . Thou who, in the humble condition and infirm state of wretched, afflicted man, art in all things made like man." Apart from the incorrect, direct Messianic interpretation, all these and similar expositions take torah in a sense that it never has. It means regularly law. Hence Dathe and Schultz render: "such is a law for men"—that is, so should my enemies act when they think to hurl my descendants from the throne. So Bunsen: "This (Thy promise) is an indication (law) for men—that is, Thou wilt make Thy will authoritative even among men." But this explanation requires too much to be supplied in order that the words may be understood. The same thing is true of the rendering of Hengstenberg—which Keil adopts: "The law of man, the law that is to regulate the conduct of men (comp. the expression Lev. vi. 2 (9), the law of the burnt-offering; xiv. 2, the law of the leper; xii. 7, the law of the woman that has borne a child), is the law of love to one's neighbor, Levit. xix. 18; Mic. vi. 8; 'this,' namely, the Lord's conduct to him in his love and faithfulness, answers to the law by which men are to be governed in their conduct to one another; when God the Lord so graciously and lovingly condescends to act towards poor mortals according to this law that holds among men, it must fill us with adoring wonder. To this answers the parallel passage in Chron.: and thou sawest me (visitedst me, dealedest with me) after the law of man (תֹּרָה = תִּיבָה), that is, the law of love to one's neighbor, thou height (!) Jehovah God." Against this view is to be remarked 1) that it requires too much to be understood in connection with "this" and "law," 2) that God's acting according to the law of love (given by Himself) cannot be thus represented as in contrast with His greatness and glory, as if He stood above the conduct that men (according to this law) are to follow, and should therefore be worthy of the greater admiration if He condescended to such conduct.—As torah originally signifies teaching, instruction, both divine (Job xxii. 22; Ps. xix. 8) and human (Prov. i. 8; iii. 1; iv. 2; vii. 2; xxviii. 7, 9), it is possible to render: "and this is a (divine) instruction for (poor, abject) man, to whom Thou so condescendest, O Lord God," or, to paraphrase with Bunsen: "Thou instructest me (makest disclosures to me) as one man another; so great is thy condescension." But this rendering, contrary to David's tone of feeling throughout this whole section, lays all the stress on a formal thing, namely, the fact that God condescends to speak to him, to make disclosures to him, while it must be the content of the Lord's words about the future of his house that moves him to humble thanksgiving and praise. Not the fact that the Lord condescends to him with His word of revelation (which He has often done before), but what He has now spoken to him is the cause of his humble thanksgiving.—For the explanation of this obscure passage it is further to be considered that these words, uttered abruptly and in lapidary style, are from the connection evidently to be taken 1) as the expression of a joyfully excited heart, and 2) as the exclamation of humble astonishment at the greatness and glory of the grace of God in the promise given to his house, in contrast with human lowliness, as is indicated by the word "man" over against the address "Lord Jehovah." The content of the promise to David's house for the future, to which David has just referred as the highest evidence of the divine favor, and to which the "this" must beyond doubt be referred, is the divine determination that the kingdom is to be one proper to his house and forever connected with it, and is thus to have an everlasting duration. This is the divine torah or prescription, which is to hold for a weak, insignificant man and his seed, for poor human creatures. In the exclamation "this," David looks in astonishment and adoration at the glory and the everlastingness (imperishableness) that is promised his house. This kingdom is indeed the kingdom of God Himself, and since it is promised his house forever, divine dignity and divine possession is thus for the farthest future ascribed to this house by that "word of the Lord," the "Lord Jehovah," towards whom David already feels so humbled and lowly by reason of His former manifestations of love and favor, now condescends to attach His kingdom in Israel, His everlasting divine dominion forever to his house, to his posterity, that is, to insignificant children of men, by such a law, which is contained in that word of promise. Similarly O. v. Gerlach: "This is an expression of wondering admiration of the gracious condescension of God. Such a law Thou establishest for a man and his house, namely, that Thou promisest it everlasting duration." Comp. Bunsen: "Of so grand a promise hast Thou, O Eternal One, thought a mortal man worthy." [Eng. A. V., adopting the interrogative form with negative force, apparently takes the meaning of this sentence to be: "it is not thus that men act towards one another, but Thy ways, O Lord, are above men's ways." Against this is that the word torah does not mean "manner" (so Erdmann above), and that the sentence thus stands in no relation as to sense with the parallel passage, 1 Chr. xvii. 17.—Other interpretations (see Poole's Synopsis) take אָדָם as the proper name Adam, and explain: "as Adam's posterity rule the world, so shall mine rule Israel," or: "as Thou madest a covenant with Adam and his posterity, so with me and mine;" but the proper name Adam occurs nowhere else in the Davidic period, and this interpretation does not suit the context, especially the sense of unworthiness expressed by David.—This word again is taken as = "a great man" (so Bib. Com. and Abarbanel), or as = "a mean man," neither of which senses it can have by itself. We cannot therefore explain: "Thou dealest with me as is becoming (to deal with) a great man," or: "this is the law (or prerogative) of a great man, to found dynasties that are to last into the far future" (Bib. Comm.), which interpretations (though agreeing somewhat with 1 Chr. xvii. 17) do not accord with the humility that characterizes the whole passage. Chandler's rendering: "this is according to the constitution of men," namely, that the crown should be hereditary (God graciously making it hereditary in David's family), is somewhat far-fetched and unsuitable to David's line of thought. The early English com-

Ver. 20. David here affirms 3) the inexpressibleness and exceeding abundance of the divine favor bestowed on him, and the consequent impossibility of setting forth in words the thankfulness that he feels in his heart. And what shall David say more to thee?—Language fails; silence is here the most eloquent thanks. And thou knowest thy servant, Lord Jehovah.—As in ver. 19 the exclamation “Lord Jehovah!” formed a sharp contrast to the “man,” so it does here to “thy servant,” answering to the humble consciousness of the endless distance between him and his God, with which, however, is connected the childlike consciousness of immediate cordial community with God: for, as he often elsewhere appeals to God, who knows the heart, for consolation and justification against man, so he does here in respect to his thankful heart, since he is sure of having the testimony of the Omniscient for him (see Ps. xl. 6, 10 [5, 9]).—Ver. 21. For thy word's sake and after thy heart hast thou done all these great things to make them known to thy servant; the concrete “great deeds”* is here meant, not the abstract

"greatness," see Ps. lxxi. 21; cxlv. 3. The word "this" [Eng. A. V. "these"] shows that the great things here referred to are the splendid promises that the Lord announced through Nathan to Him, his servant. Looking, now, at all the great things that the Lord has done for him in this revelation, David declares 4) the supernatural, superhuman eternal ground and origin of these new great manifestations of favor (which exceed all preceding ones) in "the word" and in "the heart" of God, that is, in His free gracious will, which is independent of all human merit. For Thy word's sake. Chron. v. 19: "for thy servant's sake," that is, because Thou hast chosen and called me to be king of Israel. "For David does not boast before God that his own merit had gained him these things" (Cler.). According to this point of view "the word" is perhaps that word of choice and destination given in 1 Sam. xvi. 12 ("the Lord said, Arise, anoint him, for this is he"), as Hengst. supposes. It is possibly, however, the old prophecy concerning the Tribe of Judah in Gen. xlix. 10; "for that David recognized the connection between the promise given him through Nathan and the prophecy of Gen. xlix. 10, is shown by 1 Chr. xxviii. 4, where he represents his choice to be king as the result of the choice of Judah to be prince" (Keil). [It does not appear from this passage in Chron. that David means more than that the tribe of Judah had been now selected in his person as the royal tribe.—Tr.] "And according to thy heart," that is, according to the love and grace by which thy heart is filled, from thy loving will.* Clericus: "From the spontaneous motion of thy mind, without external incitement." Comp. Ex. xxxiv. 6; Ps. ciii. 8. Over against "God's heart" as the source of the great favor received David sets his heart as filled with humble thanks therefor; but his word of thanks must stand dumb before the clear Yea and Amen and the earlier words of promise of God, the Yea and Amen of which is this exhibition of favor. In thus deriving it from God's faithfulness to His promise, and from His heart-love, he adds the positive thought to the negative "who am I?" of ver. 18, and so leads the conclusion of this thanksgiving back to its beginning. ["To make thy servant know," or, as in Chron. (v. 19) "to make known all (these) great things."] God not only in His sovereign mercy determined great things for David, but further for his consolation and strengthening made them known to him through His prophet.—Tr.]

b. Vers. 22-24. Praise of the Lord's greatness and incomparable glory as manifested by this highest exhibition of favor, in accord with the great deeds whereby in times of old He made Himself known to His people as their God.—Ver. 22. Therefore, because Thou hast done so great things for me, on the ground of this experience of Thine abounding favor, thou art great, Lord God; comp. ver. 26: "and Thy name will be great," not: "considered great" (Luth.), nor: "be Thy name praised by me" (v. Gerl., Then.), but it is an assertion of greatness manifested objectively in facts. The factual confession "great is the Lord" (comp. Ps. xxxv. 27; xl. 17 (16) is precisely praise to God.

* [Note that the word "heart" in the usage of the O. T. means the whole inner nature, including intellect, affections and will.—TR.]

—Now follows the ground for this praise of the Lord's greatness: For there is none like thee—this declares God's incomparableness. Comp. Ex. xv. 11 "who is like thee, etc." Deut. iii. 24. And there is not a God beside thee, declaration of God's aloneness and exclusiveness, comp. Deut. iv. 35; 1 Sam. ii. 2. According to all that we have heard with our ears;* David here passes from the contemplation of the greatness, incomparableness and soleness, wherein the Lord has declared Himself to him in the present, to the praise of God in the review of the great deeds whereby in the past He has revealed Himself to His people as such a God. "In Ps. xl. 6 David rises, just as here, from his personal experience to the whole line of God's glorious manifestations in the history of His people" (Hengst.).—Ver. 23. And what nation is as thy people, as Israel any [nation] on earth? The initial "and," according to the sense, gives the factual ground of what precedes. We cannot render: "where is, as Israel, a nation, etc." (De W. [and Luther])†, nor "for whose sake God went, etc." (Hengst.), but must translate: "what nation . . . whom God, etc." Elohim‡ here stands with a plural verb—as often elsewhere where heathen idol worship is referred to, as in Ex. xxxii. 4, 8, where Elohim is used of the golden calf ("these are thy gods, that brought thee out of Egypt"), comp. Deut. iv. 7; 1 Kings xii. 29, while, as name of the God of Israel, it has a singular verb or other complement—because the thought is here intended to be expressed that there is no nation but Israel that had been redeemed by its deity or its idols by such a deed as that by which the true God had redeemed Israel to be His people. It is therefore unnecessary to change the verb into the singular, reading "brought" (הוֹלִיכוֹ) [הוֹלִיכוֹ] instead of "went" (הָיָה). In consequence of God's great deeds Israel is a people sole of its kind, to be compared with no other, comp. Deut. iv. 7; xxxiii. 29. By His great deed, the deliverance out of Egypt, He has proved Himself to His people to be the only God, besides whom there is no God, and with whom no other is to be compared (Ex. xv. 11-13; Deut. iv. 34). Whom God went (put Himself in motion) to purchase to himself (redeem) for a people; the deliverance from Egypt was the suigeneric, incomparable deed of the incomparable, sole God, whereby He made Israel an independent nation and gained them out of all nations as His own possession. And to make himself a name; that deed of redemption is the factual historical proof that He is the true God, who has not His equal, and the God of Israel in the fulness of His might and of the revelation of His grace, and this fulness it is

* [This phrase probably refers to the oral tradition by which Israel's history was handed down from father to son.—Ta.]

† קִי is not—"where" (De W.), but is to be connected with הָיָה (comp. Judg. xxi. 8; Deut. iii. 24). See Ew. § 325 a: "what one people, what people ever [what-ever people] . . ."—אֲשֶׁר is to be connected with הָיָה as accus. of the object. [On the text see "Text and Grammar"—Ta.]

that makes His name. In this His name (whereby Israel only knows and names Him as the God that led them out of Egypt) He is contrasted with the vain idols of the heathen nations as the one true God (Josh. xxiv. 17; Judg. ii. 1, 12; vi. 13).—And to do for you great things and terrible. The "for you" refers not to "gods" (Elohim), but to "people;" but it is not necessary to change the text to "for them" (after the Vulgate), because, David's soul being filled and excited with the thought of his people, in the course of his prayer his words turn suddenly in increasing vividness from reference to the people naturally and immediately to the people itself, and "since also 1 Chr. xvii. has in its 'for thee' this easily explicable leap to an address to the thing spoken of" (Böttch.). [But the address to the people is much harder than the address to God, and it seems better to read "for them."—Ta.]—On the other hand, the "for thy land" gives no good sense without forcing, and Chron. has instead of this "to drive out" (ver. 21). It is therefore better (with the Sept. τοῦ ἐκβαλεῖν σε) to suppose a clerical error, and (taking לְיָרֵךְ as the true text) to render: (namely) that thou drovest out before thy people.—The frightful, terrible things are the great deeds of the Lord in connection with the destruction of the heathen nations. On this idea comp. Ex. xv. 11; Deut. x. 21. The fundamental passage respecting the expulsion of foreign nations is Ex. xxiii. 27-33, where this verb "drive out" (שָׁרַף) is repeatedly used. Which thou redeemedst to thee from Egypt.—This fundamental deed of the God of Israel is expressly mentioned in this parenthetical sentence, because the right of property that He thereby had in His people chosen out of the nations, necessarily led to His maintaining and defending them against the heathen nations, and the destruction of the Egyptians in this deed was the prelude to God's for Israel "great" but for the hostile Canaanites "terrible deeds," whereby He placed Israel in position to drive their enemies out of the land. The heathen and their gods; these words depend on the verb "drovest out." Keil (who retains the "for thy land," rejecting the alteration according to Chron.) takes these words as apposition to "from Egypt" and supplies the prep. "from" before them [so Eng. A. V. and Philippon.—Ta.].—But this construction is inadmissible, because the Plur. "nations" does not accord with the Sing. "Egypt." After the deliverance from Egypt David will celebrate the expulsion of the heathen from Canaan as a great deed of God. The Sing. suffix [Heb. "nations and its gods"] gives no sense after the Plu. noun; to take it distributively, as Keil does ("the gods of each of these heathen nations"), is too hard; we must therefore read the Plu. suffix "their gods."—Ver. 24. The result of God's mighty deeds stated in ver. 23. And thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel, comp. ver. 10; it is God's act whereby in the conquered land the people were led to the firm establishment of their dwellings, their possessions, and their whole life. The thought does not go back to the time of Moses, but advances from the foregoing fact of the subjection and expulsion of "the heathen nations and their gods" to the establishment of the people in Canaan. To be a people to thee forever. The design of God's gracious benefits was: 1) Israel was to belong to Him alone as His property;* through God's mighty deeds the long-since executed choice of the people as His property is ever anew confirmed, and their obligation, to belong to and serve Him alone as people, ever repeated. 2) "For ever" they were to belong to Him as His people. This appointment of the people to be everlasting is remarkable; there shall never cease to be such a people of possession on the ground of such gracious manifestations and saving acts of the Lord. To this idea of the everlasting continuance of a people of God, ("all nations are finally merged in this people, the divine Israel, the congregation of Jesus Christ," O. v. Gerlach), answers the promise of the everlasting continuance of the throne of David, which gave him occasion thus to praise God for His deeds, whereby He has established and prepared Israel for Himself as His people forever. And thou, Lord, art become their God, as Israel has become Thy people. This His relation to His people as their God has been established by all His revelations and deeds; for He has thereby testified that He is their God and given Himself to them as their own. The people on their part have contributed nothing thereto. The Lord's free grace in its great and glorious manifestation is the source and origin of this covenant-association, wherein God is His people's God and the people their God's people. [Bib. Com. here refers well to Gen. xvii. 7, 8; Ex. vi. 7.—Tr.]

c. Vers. 25-29. David's prayer for the fulfilment of the promise, attached to his thanksgiving for the past, his glance passing from the splendor of the present (to which the promise has led him) to the future.—Ver. 25. David here distinguishes between the two applications of the promise, to him personally and to his house: that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant and concerning his house; "establish it forever," as indeed it has promised the everlasting continuance of the house and of the kingdom. Let thy word become deed.—Ver. 26. Design or consequence of the fulfilment: that thy name may become great forever.—David has in eye, as the highest end of the fulfilment, not the honor of his house, not the glory of the people, but solely the honor of the Lord. Saying, the Lord of Sabaoth is God over Israel, that is, "the almighty God, who rules heaven and earth, is the defender and protector of Israel, His people; He attests Himself as their God by protecting the royal house on which depends Israel's welfare" (Hengst.). And the house of thy servant David will be established before thee.—The petition here assumes the form of confident hope. This expression of definite expectation by reason of its boldness needs basing on a sure foundation, as is done in ver. 27, where it returns to the form of confident petition. For this reason the initial particle in ver. 27 ("3) is to be rendered "for" (with Luth., Buns., De W., Hengst.) as giving the ground of what precedes, and not to be connected with the following "therefore": "because thou . . . therefore has" (Böttch., Then.). The former rendering accords with the liveliness of feeling with which David prays; the latter gives a construction too sluggish for his feeling. For thou, Lord of Sabaoth, hast uncovered the ear of thy servant, that is, hast revealed to him through thy word (comp. 1 Sam. ix. 15), saying, a house will I build thee.—David goes back to this fundamental promise, because in it are contained all the manifestations of favor that are promised to his family for the future. It is on the firm basis of this word, wherein the Lord acknowledged him and condescended to him, that David founded that confident petition: Therefore has thy servant found his heart, that is, found courage [Eng. A. V. "found in his heart"]. Heart = courage, Gen. xlii. 28; 1 Sam. xvii. 32; Ps. xl. 13 [12] and often elsewhere.—In ver. 28 and ver. 29 follows the conclusion and the completion of the petition; its ground on the subjective side of confidence and courage (which is exhibited in vers. 25, 26) having been given by appeal to the divine promise (ver. 27), the content (not yet expressed) of that which completes the petition, is based on the truth of the Lord's word [that is, he first (ver. 28) appeals to God's truth and then (ver. 29) sets forth his petition in final form.—Tr.]. And now, Lord Jehovah, thou art God,* and thy words are truth, not: "may thy words be truth," [nor, "will be truth."—Tr.]. The following words of the verse are to be taken as protasis (Thenius): And thou spakest this goodness to thy servant, wherein the content of the promises is briefly condensed and recapitulated.—Ver. 29. The "and now" resumes the "and now" of ver. 28: And now begin (not: let it please thee) to bless (Sept., Vulg.) the house of thy servant that it may continue forever before thee; the everlasting continuance of the house depends on the blessing of the Lord; the beginning in the blessing that secures the everlasting continuance is related to the "forever." [Erdmann here follows Thenius in rendering "begin" instead of "let it please thee" as Eng. A. V.; the Hebrew word properly means "to set one's self to do a thing with free determination of will," and the rendering of the Septuagint and Vulgate "begin" is only a very general one and not very correct. We cannot easily find a better rendering than that of Eng. A. V., which is the usual one; other possible translations are: "make up thy mind, set thyself to, take in hand."—Tr.] For thou, Lord Jehovah, hast spoken; these words represent the content of ver. 28 as the divine ground of the desired fulfil-

* [This is the phrase found in Ex. xix. 5 "ye shall be to me a possession or property" (Eng. A. V. "peculiar treasure"), in Dt. vii. 6 "a people of possession" (Eng. A. V. "special people"), and in Mal. iii. 17 they shall be to me, in the day that I make, "a possession." The Hebrew word (אֶלֶּל) is rendered by the Sept. προσέσται and προσέσται, which have thus passed into the N. T. in this sense of "property, possession," as Tit. ii. 14 "a peculiar people" — "a people that is God's property," and 1 Pet. ii. 9.—Tr.]

* [37] here stands for the 2d person (as the 3d pers. pron. is often used for the verb "to be"): "Thou art God," comp. Ps. xlii. 5[4]; Zeph. ii. 12; Ew. § 297 b. (The "that God" of Eng. A. V. is incorrect, and Dr. Erdmann's rendering is right; but it is not true that the 3d pers. pron. is ever used for the 2d pers. or for the substantive verb; the literal translation here is "thou art He (namely) God," the copula being omitted as often in Heb.—Tr.]

ment of the promise, since in them is given the security for the confident hope that is expressed in the concluding word: And from [or, with] thy blessing will the house of thy servant be blessed forever. Instead of "thou wilt bless," it reads: "from thy blessing" as the source of all blessings "will the house of thy servant" to which thou hast promised everlasting existence "be blessed forever," which is the condition of everlasting continuance. David's prayer is completed by the expression of confident hope, and goes over into prophecy. [This future rendering of the last clause gives a richer sense and one more appropriate in the connection (God has spoken and it will be so) than the optative form of Eng. A. V. So substantially 1 Chr. xvii. 27.—TR.].

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Historically the divine revelation and promise that came to David through Nathan, concerning the theocratic-messianic kingdom that was forever connected with his seed, presupposes the previous development of the idea of the theocratic kingdom. Comp. pp. 68 sqq., 136 sqq. [Hist. and Theol. to 1 Sam. viii.]. In this development (which advances from the general to the particular, from the promise of salvation for all nations to be realized through the whole nation descended from Abraham) the promise that assigns to the house and family of David the position of bearer and mediator of the Messianic blessing is based on the prophecy which, out of the seed of Abraham as represented by the twelve sons of Jacob and the corresponding tribes, designates the tribe of Judah as the bearer of a royal dominion that embraces and brings peace to all the nations of the earth (Gen. xlix. 10). "While up to this time the tribe only had been designated in which an imperishable dominion was to be established, and out of which at last the Saviour was to come, under David the designation of the family also was added" (Hengst. Christol. [Eng. tr., p. 123]). The really existing theocratic kingdom, as exhibited in David's government, approximated very nearly to the ideal significance of the kingdom over Israel; that is, to being God's dominion over His people through the human organ chosen by Him, who was in humility and obedience unconditionally to subject his own will to the divine will. On the basis of this fact the prophecy of a future seed of David, that should, in the possession of an everlasting royal dominion, stand in closest community with God as His son, could take shape, as here in Nathan's word. In contrast with the kingdom of Saul, which came into sharp opposition to the idea of the absolute divine dominion in Israel, and consequently into permanent conflict with the other theocratic institutions (the Prophetic office and the Priesthood), there appeared, through the rule of David, the man after God's own heart (1 Sam. xiii. 14), on the one hand, the idea of the theocracy, in such manner that David regarded himself only as the "servant of the Lord," and wished to be nothing but the humble, obedient instrument of the divine government over the people, and on the other hand, the royal office was elevated to the position of being the controlling and centralizing point of all the theocratic main elements of the national life. This, then, was the basis of the further development of the Messianic idea, the way for which was paved by Nathan's word to David, wherein the idea of the theocratic kingdom, which reached its highest point in David, was most intimately connected with David's royal house.

2. The historical character of Nathan's prophecy shows itself in the first place in its factual occasion. This lies in the relative contrast in the plans of human and divine wisdom. David's plan, after subduing his enemies, to build a temple to the Lord's honor in the midst of His people, together with Nathan's agreement thereto, corresponds thoroughly with the theocratic disposition of the two men, and with their recognition of the Lord's relation to His people as the people of His possession, and of the people's character as a priestly kingdom. But according to God's thought, the right time for this was not yet come; for the execution of this plan (which is not in itself rejected) the divine wisdom demands 1) that the present condition of the people should cease, for (despite David's victories) they were still surrounded by threatening heathen nations, had not found sure and permanent rest, and so God's sanctuary must still be a wandering tent; 2) that David's house and the kingdom therewith connected should be completely, forever and finally established as basis for the unfolding of the divine dominion [theocracy] over the people of Israel and the other nations, as this dominion was to be exhibited in God's enthroned dwelling in the permanent house [temple]. Nathan is made acquainted with these thoughts and ways of God's wisdom through a divine revelation, in consequence of which he now in his divine-prophetic word does not indeed principally [fundamentally or essentially] reject the plan to build a temple to the Lord, but still announces the Lord's will that the execution of this plan is to be reserved for the seed of David. The view that the prophet's restraining word declares that Jehovah needs in general no stately house (Diestel, Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., 1863, p. 559) finds no support in the text, which says nothing more in ver. 5 than that David should not build; and the assertion (ubi sup.) that the prohibition is in no way based on grounds derived from the special situation is obviously opposed to the statement of reasons in vers. 6-11, wherein Israel's wanderings are connected with the still continuing unrest and insecurity of David's time (the enemies being yet not definitively subdued), and the thought is clearly enough expressed that the temple cannot yet be built because quiet is still to be secured against enemies. There is, therefore, no ground for referring (Diestel) the prohibition of the temple-building to an ancient strict opinion [against such building]; nothing of this sort can be meant here, since the symbolical conception of God's dwelling in space amid His people in a permanent temple is no more opposed to the strict conception of the being [essence] of God than that of His dwelling in a movable tent. And so also there is no sufficient ground for assigning this prohibition to some one else than Nathan, to Gad, for example. Rather the section vers. 4-16 is in accord both with the historical situation that it presupposes and to which it refers, and with itself.—From another side the concrete* reference to Solomon's birth and the temple-building to be completed by him has been adduced against the purely historical character of the words of Nathan and David; it is affirmed to be clear—from this reference, and from a comparison between it and the ideal picture of the kingdom contained in the words, and by comparing the brief and very peculiar “last words of David,” especially 2 Sam. xxiii. 5—that we have here a later post-Solomonic remodelling of the original promise, and that this original promise, which was of a more general form, was at a later time more distinctly stated according to events that had meantime occurred (G. Baur, ubi sup., p. 394, 405). Against which, however, is to be remarked 1) that those special designations are by no means so concretely set forth; there is nothing but a general statement of the raising up of the seed after David and of a building of the temple by this seed; 2) Solomon’s discourse in 1 Kings v. 5 presupposes that Nathan’s words contained precisely this statement. Thenius also opposes this supposition of an ex post facto remodelling of these prophetic words, remarking (p. 176, 2d ed.): “For the rest there is no ground to suppose with De Wette that Nathan’s prophecy was not composed till after Solomon; Ps. lxxxix. (vers. 4, 5, 20-38 [3, 4, 19-37]), especially ver. 20 [19]), Ps. cxxxii. 11, 12, and Isa. lv. 3 attest its historical truth, and rightly understood it as Messianic also.”—To this must be added that David’s prayer (vers. 18-29) which in its peculiar individuality bears the marks of genuineness or originality, presupposes the whole content of Nathan’s words as here reported, especially the reference to the future and to the everlasting continuance of David’s house (comp. vers. 19, 25, 26, 27, 29); and so also his Ps. xviii. (ch. xxii.), especially the close, and his last word (xxiii. 1-7).

3. The chief points in the content of this prophecy, which is introduced by the word: “Not thou shalt build for the Lord a house, but the Lord will build thee a house,” are the following (in order of mention): 1) God promises David a seed destined and called to be the bearer of the theocratic kingdom. It is true, the promise relates to David’s house in general (vers. 11, 16, 19, 25, 26, 27, 29). But the house is not identical with the seed, to whom refer the declarations that form the gist of the prophecy. This seed is not the whole posterity, but a selection from it; comp. ver. 12: “I will raise up thy seed after thee” with 1 Chr. xvii. 11, according to which the seed is to be of the sons of David; nor is it restricted to a single person, but signifies the posterity selected and appointed by God, which is to be bearer for all future time of the theocratic kingdom. 2) For this seed chosen by God’s free grace, wherein is represented the house that the Lord builds for David, the kingdom is firmly established; the securely established royal authority will be attached to the house of David (ver. 12). 3) To the Davidic kingdom, the bearer of which is David’s seed, an everlasting duration is promised; the reference is not to the everlasting rule of a single king, but to the endless continuance of the kingdom of David’s seed. Like the promised kingdom, the house of David also has a perpetual duration (vers. 13, 16). 4) God promises to be the Father of David’s seed, and pledges it such an intimate relation to Himself that it shall be His son. As God is the Father of the people of Israel by the fact that He has chosen them as His people by free grace, made them His people by redemption, led them by His paternal love, obligated them to obedience, and sanctified them to be the people of His possession, so He is the Father of the everlasting royal seed of David by the fact that He has chosen it for His kingly house in Israel, and made and formed it to be bearer of His everlasting dominion over His people, and it is His son by love of most intimate fellowship with God, and by the humble obedience wherein it thoroughly subjects its will to the divine will. “As all Israelites are sons of Jehovah (Deut. xiv. 1), so must the king be in special measure, but only as the head of the chosen people of God” (Diestel, ubi sup. 559). 5) On the ground of this relation of father and son the favor of God will abide unchanged with the seed of David, that is, the theocratic king. He will, indeed, be punished for the sins into which he falls; but these chastisements will never reach the point of rejection, as happened in Saul’s case; the sins of David’s seed will, for the sake of the promise given to David, never set aside the divine counsel.—“The word of the prophet Nathan and the thanksgiving of David mark the culmination of the Davidic history” (Baumgarten).

4. The significance of the prophecy for the Messianic expectation of salvation. The direct Messianic reference to Christ (Tertull. ad Marc. iii. 20; Lactant. divin. instit. 4, 13; August. de civ. Dei, 17, 8; Rupert von Deutz, Beza, S. Schmid, Calov, Pfeiffer, Buddeus, and other old theologians [Patrick (in part), A. Clarke]) stands (apart from the unhistorical view of the nature of Messianic prophecy that lies at its foundation) in contradiction with the sinning of David’s seed (vers. 14, 15), whereby a purely human and sinful posterity is designated, and with the temple-building (ver. 13), which can only be understood of earthly work. [Some attempt to set aside these objections to a direct Messianic interpretation by suggesting that the sin in the case of Christ is the sin He bore for men, as in Isa. liii. (Gill), or by rendering ver. 14 “even in his suffering for iniquity I shall chasten him,” etc. (A. Clarke), and by regarding the house built by Christ as a spiritual one; but this translation of the Heb. is not admissible, and the spiritualizing in the other case is harsh and contrary to the plain meaning of the text. Such a prophecy must be treated as that of the “Servant of Jehovah” in Isaiah and as the Parable of the Prodigal Son; the main spiritual idea must be determined, and its fulfilment looked for in the Messiah, without attempting to transfer all the details into the sphere of permanent spiritual history.—Tr.]—The limitation of the prophecy to Solomon and his immediate posterity (Rabbinical writers, Grotius) is opposed to the “everlasting” duration that is promised the Davidic kingdom, and that cannot be weakened into a designation of a long period of time (comp. Ps. lxxxix. 30 [29]). [The phrase “forever” (the Eng. rendering of several different but substantially equivalent phrases in Heb.) sometimes indicates a limited period of time (as in 1 Sam. i. 22), where the limitation is determined by the nature of the case or by statements in the context; here the absence of any special limiting statements, taken in connection with the general tone of the promises to Israel in the Old Test., leads us to the conclusion that an unlimited duration is intended to be expressed.—Tr.]—The interpretation that refers the words in part immediately and directly to Christ, in part to Solomon and his nearest posterity is found already in Theodoret (2 Reg. quest. 21), who explains vers. 12, 13 a, 14 b, 15 of David's immediate bodily descendants, but vers. 13 b, 14 a, 16 of Christ. So also Brenz: "he does not wholly exclude Solomon, yet refers principally to Christ." Similarly Sack (Apologet. 243 sq.) says that the seed of vers. 12 and 13 is to be understood of the Messiah, but the content of vers. 14, 15 of the earlier scions of the Davidic house, from whom, notwithstanding their sins, the kingdom is never or at least not soon to be withdrawn. But this supposition of a double reference is as much opposed by the unity and continuity of the prophet's thoughts and views (as traced in the Exposition) as the related supposition (based on the presupposition of a double sense in the Scripture) according to which Nathan's word refers in the literal sense to Solomon, in the mystical sense to Christ (Glass, philol. sacra, p. 272). [We must distinguish between this mechanical view of a double sense in Scripture and the view that assigns to certain persons and things a typical-prophetic position in the development of the plan of salvation.—Tr.]

In the first place it must be determined in what respect we are to suppose a factual fulfilment of this promise in David's own lifetime, and then in his posterity. David himself, in 1 Chr. xxii. 9 sq., refers them first to Solomon, applying to him the words: "he will be to me a son and I will be to him a father, and I will establish the law of his kingdom over Israel for ever." David does the same in 1 Chr. xxviii. 2 sq., both times with the exhortation faithfully to observe the commandments and judgments of God, and by obedience to the Lord's will to live worthy of his high calling in order that the promise might be fulfilled. So also Solomon applies the promise to himself, 1 Kings v. 5; 2 Chr. vi. 7 sq.; 1 Kings viii. 17–20. In 1 Kings ix. 4, 5 God confirms to him the power given to David, assuring him that if he would walk before His face as David did, and faithfully keep His commandments, He would establish the throne of his dominion forever, in accordance with His promise to David: "there shalt not fail thee a man from the throne of Israel."—Punishment for his defection from the living God was visited on Solomon by the separation of the Ten Tribes under Jeroboam; but the promise that His favor should yet not be withdrawn from David's house is also fulfilled, the kingdom "for David's sake" and "that David, the servant of the Lord, might always have a light before him in Jerusalem, which He had chosen to put His name there," remaining to the seed of David, which for this sin "is to be afflicted, but not forever." The humbling of David's seed was to be only temporary, and the promise of the everlasting kingdom was to be fulfilled not in Jeroboam's house, but in David's, 1 Kings xi. 31–39. Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, walked in the sins of his father, and his heart was not wholly with the Lord; but for David's sake the Lord his God gave Rehoboam a light in Jerusalem, in that he raised up his son after him and let Jerusalem stand, because David had done what was right in the sight of the Lord (1 Kings xv. 4, 5). Jehoram did that which was evil in the eyes of the Lord; but the Lord would not destroy Judah for David his servant's sake, as He had promised to give him a light in his sons alway (2 Kings viii. 18, 19). "While prophecy announces the downfall of one dynasty after another of the Ten Tribes, it also indeed threatens individual apostate kings in Judah with the divine judgment, but never questions the continuance of the right of David's family to the throne. David's crown may be taken away; but there will come one to whom it belongs, Ezek. xxi. 32 [27]" (Ehler, Herz. IX. 412). The promise is thus referred to all David's descendants that were called to the throne from Solomon on (comp. Pa. lxxxix. 20–50; cxxxii. 10, 11) in accordance with the word of David in 2 Sam. vii. 25, wherein he speaks of the promise of an everlasting kingdom as one that is given forever to his house.—Nathan's prophecy has thus in the first place a fundamental significance for the development of the kingdom of God and the salvation therein unfolded, in so far as from now on for all time the kingdom of Israel with its theocratic calling to realize God's dominion in the life of His people, and to fulfil the ends of His kingdom, towers far above the Prophetic Office (as the organ of the revelation and announcement of God's will to His people), and above the High-priesthood (as expiatory mediation between the sinful people and the holy God). All hopes and expectations of the future salvation under the theocracy that is realizing itself in the people attach themselves to the idea of the theocratic kingdom, which is the representative and manifestation of the kingdom of God itself and therefore everlasting, as also the people of God themselves have received the promise of everlasting duration (Deut. xi. 21). But this kingdom is exclusively the Davidic; with the seed of David (so far as this seed is chosen and appointed for it) it goes forth as everlasting bearer of the favors and blessings of God, of which the people partake on the ground of the covenant that God has concluded with David (Isa. lv. 3). "Things may indeed be affirmed of every king that sits on David's throne that are true in the first instance not of him personally, but of the kingdom that he represents (comp. passages like Pa. xxi. 5, 7; lxi. 7). But, impelled by the Spirit, the sacred poetry produces a kingly form that far transcends what the present shows, and exhibits the Davidic and Solomonian kingdom in its archetypal completeness" (Oehler, Herz. IX. 412). The idea of the theocratic Davidic kingdom of everlasting duration, and with the stamp of sonship assumes from this prophecy a concrete form in the ideal of a theocratic king who proceeds from the seed of David. This latter is called in Pa. ii. 7, 12, "the son of God" absolutely; in Pa. cx. 1 declared to be the ruler that shares with God His unlimited might and power over heaven and earth, and even David's lord; in Pa. lxxii. everlasting dominion to the ends of the earth is ascribed to him, and in Pa. xlv. 2 the name "Elohim, God," itself is given him. In David's prophetic word in 2 Sam. xxiii. this ideal takes the form of a righteous ruler, who introduces a glorious future, in Pa. ii, cx., that of a victorious prince who as son and heir of God in unconquerable power extends his dominion by vigorous battles over the whole earth, and brings His foes to his feet, and in Ps. lxxii. that of a powerful prince, who conducts His government in divine righteousness, dispenses weal and blessing to the wretched, stretches out His kingdom of peace and its blessings over all princes and nations of the earth and receives their homage.—[More correctly, these passages refer first to a present earthly monarch looked on as representing the ideal king, and their assertions, partially true of the finite earthly king, are to be realized in one that shall be identical with the ideal.—Tr.] Further the promise given to David is the foundation of all Messianic prophecies and hopes in the prophets concerning the completion of the kingdom of God, its revelations of grace and its blessings of salvation, comp. Oehler ubi sup. 413. The idea of the everlasting victorious and peaceful theocracy that embraces not only Israel, but all the nations of the earth, and the ideal of the theocratic king, proceeding from David's house and seed, and standing in the exclusive relation to God of son, who introduces and exercises this dominion [the theocracy], finds its full reality in the Messiah, Jesus Christ, the Son of God and Son of David, who is anointed without measure with the Holy Ghost and by the complete indwelling of God in His person exhibits Himself as the personal principle of the kingdom of God. The view that the descent of Christ from the Davidic race does not belong to the essential content of the fulfilment of the idea of the Old Testament-kingdom (G. Baur, 407) is refuted by the constant declarations of the prophets concerning the Davidic descent of the great king, as well as by the universal Jewish conception of the Messiah as the son of David (Matt. xxii. 42 sq.), both of which rest on this fundamental prophecy. Jesus Himself accepts the name of "Son of David" without protest; Paul (Rom. i. 3), the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii. 14), and the Apocalypse (v. 5; xxii. 16) declare Him to be a descendant of David. "How deep this promise penetrated David's soul is shown by his thanksgiving prayer in 2 Sam. vii. 18 sq. The Messiah is not therein spoken of in the first instance; it relates to the ideal person of the Davidic race; but its final fulfilment in the Messiah is already contained indirectly in its own content, since the everlastingness of a merely human kingdom is inconceivable; this became clearer to David the more he compared this promise with the Messianic idea that had come down from the fathers; it finally reached full certainty in his mind through the further inward disclosures that attached themselves to this fundamental promise which occupied David day and night" (Hengst., Gesch. d. Reich. Gott. unter d. Alt. Bundes, 1871, II. 2, 124 [Hengstenberg's Hist. of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant]).

5. The prayer of David after the reception of the Lord's promise of favor (vers. 18-29) bears testimony to the unexpected, joyfully surprising revelation that was made to him, and mirrors his childlike humility, fervid devotion and unshakable confidence towards his God. To this prayer which proceeds from a joyfully shocked and deeply moved heart, applies (so far as is possible from the Old Testament stand-point) what Bernard of Clairvaux says of true prayer: "If the way to God's throne is to stand free and open to our prayer, and it is there to find ready acceptance and hearing, it must proceed from an humble, fervid and trusting heart. Humility teaches us the necessity of prayer, fervor gives it flight and endurance, trust provides it with an unmovable foundation." The humility of the praying servant of God expresses itself in the declaration of its own littleness and unworthiness: 1) in view of the many manifestations of favor, through which the Lord has brought him in the past up to this point (ver. 18); 2) In view of the great promises for the future that He has given him out of free grace (ver. 19); and 3) In view of the paternal kindness, wherein He has condescended to him in this present revelation of love (vers. 20, 21). "All without merit or worthiness of mine" (Luther).—A further special exhibition of humility is the occurrence of the word "servant" three times in vers. 18-21 and seven times in vers. 25-29. "This thanksgiving confirms anew the fact that the only foundation on which the true godliness and everlastingness of the kingdom can rest is the purity and holiness of an humble heart, and therefore the hearty and living humility of David's thanksgiving may give us the strongest assurance that here is really enthroned the culmination of all royal rule" (Baumgarten).—In the prayer humility is combined with childlike fervor and sincerity, wherewith: 1) God's power and glory, as revealed in His previous gracious deeds for His people, is praised and celebrated (vers. 22, 23); 2) God's love, wherein He acknowledges Himself to be His people's God and Lord, is declared (ver. 24); and 3) God's name is invoked from the depths of a heart full of the consciousness of His gracious presence. ("The name Jehovah occurs twelve times, and is ten times addressed. In the address the simple Jehovah occurs once, Adonai Jehovah six times, Jehovah Elohim twice, and Jehovah Sabaoth once. The address Adonai Jehovah is found at the beginning and at the end. The third division first takes up the divine names of the second, and then returns at the close to that of the first." Hengst., ubi sup., 158.)—[Compare the use of divine names in the parallel passage in 1 Chron. xvii.—Tr.]. With humility and fervor is combined hearty trust 1) in the prayer for the fulfilment of the gracious promise; 2) in the appeal to the truthfulness of God's word; and 3) in the confident hope of God's blessing (vers. 25-29).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-11. "The Lord is with thee" (ver. 3). I. How the Lord owns Himself as thine: 1) In battle and victory over all thy enemies; 2) In the quietness and peace of thy heart; 3) In the blessing of thy house; 4) In the instructions of His word. II. How thou shouldst consequently place thyself with respect to the Lord: 1) In joyful willingness to prove thy gratitude to Him; 2) In humble obedience of faith to His will when it rejects thy thoughts; 3) In humbly letting thy house be built for thee by Him, and letting Him give to thee before thou wilt give to Him; and 4) In awaiting with childlike confidence His blessing for the future.

Giving and Taking in the relation of man to God: 1) "A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven;" but 2) A man can also give nothing to God the Lord, except it be first given him by the Lord.

"I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest" (ver. 9): 1) How far this divine testimony has been confirmed in the guidance of thy whole course of life; 2) How its truth should qualify thee to know His ways in the guidance of His people, and in the history of His kingdom; 3) What obligation is thereby laid on thee in relation to thy God.

Vers. 12-16. The fulfilment of the great and gracious promise of God to David, in Christ the Son of David: 1) In His person, He is not merely David's seed = seed of the woman = Abraham's seed, but also God's Son; 2) In His office, He is King over the kingdom of God, King of all kings; 3) In His possession of power, He has an everlasting kingdom, to Him is given all power in heaven and on earth; 4) In His work, He builds for the name of God the Father a house, a spiritual temple in humanity, out of living stones (comp. John ii. 19).

[Vers. 16, 17. ROBERT HALL: The advantages of Civil Government contrasted with the blessings of the Spiritual Kingdom of Jesus Christ (Works, Am. Ed., III., 444): 1) As to security, and the sense of security. 2) Liberty. 3) Plenty. 4) A tendency to improvement in social institutions. 5) Stability. —Tr.]

Vers. 18-24. The greatness of the manifestations of God's grace: 1) They infinitely surpass the desert and worthiness of sinful men (Who am I? etc.), ver. 18; 2) They fill all times, from the remotest past into the farthest future (vers. 18, 19); 3) They are high-exalted above all human thoughts and words, which cannot comprehend and express them (ver. 20); 4) They are deep-grounded in God's word and heart (ver. 21).

Vers. 22-24. The right praise of God on the part of His people: 1) Looking to that which He is to them, as their incomparably gracious God, and exclusively their own; 2) Looking to that which He as their God has done in them in the wonders of His redeeming might and love; and 3) Looking to that for which He has made them His people, and prepared them for Himself.

Vers. 25-29. The right prayer and supplication of living faith: 1) It grounds itself firmly in the word of God's promise (ver. 25); 2) It aims at nothing but the honor of God's name (ver. 26); 3) It springs from a heart which is moved by God's promise (ver. 27); 4) It appeals to God's faithfulness and truth; 5) It receives the fulness of God's promised blessing.

[Vers. 18-29. HENRY: David's Prayer: 1) He speaks very humbly of himself, and his own merits (ver. 18). 2) He speaks very highly and honorably of God's favors to him (vers. 18-20). 3) He ascribes all to the free grace of God (ver. 21). 4) He adores the greatness and glory of God (ver. 22). 5) He expresses a great esteem for the Israel of God (vers. 23, 24). 5) He concludes with humble petitions to God (vers. 27-29). —Tr.]

worldly business, we must do so much the more for God and our souls. How different were the thoughts of David, when he sat in his palace, from Nebuchadnezzar's, when he walked in his, Dan. iv. 29, 30. —Tr.] —J. LANGE: It is not enough to have a good design in a matter, but one must also have a particular assurance as to whether this or that is according to God's gracious will. —SCHLIER: Alas for us, if the Scriptures were nothing more than human, well-meant thoughts of holy men of God; who could then rely on them? who could live and die on them? But well for us that we have a word of God, a word out of God's own mouth, which God's Spirit has given us. —Vers. 4, 5. WUERT. BIBLE: God is much more desirous of giving to us than of receiving from us. —S. SCHMID: God demands not so much splendid outward service, but rather an inner and honest service of the heart, Isa. iv. 24. —SCHLIER: The true house of God is His people; there would He make His abode in the hearts of His own. A human heart that opens itself to God is a temple more pleasing to Him than the stateliest structure of gold and marble, and a church that really has the Lord dwelling in its midst is in the sight of God more precious than the noblest showy building which sets all the world a wondering.

Vers. 8-11. We always indeed imagine that we must first give something to the Lord, and that if we have not been beforehand with Him, the Lord will not bless us; and yet what is all that we do, if the Lord has not first taken hold of us? —We must first experience the Lord's blessings in ourselves, and then first can we do any thing for Him in return. —Vers. 12-16. STARKE: Christ's kingdom is a firmly established kingdom; even the gates of hell cannot prevail against it (Matt. xvi. 18). —Christ is the right architect of the spiritual house of God; and through Him alone can we become temples and abodes of the living God (1 Cor. vi. 16; 1 Pet. ii. 5). —SCHLIER: The true and living house of God, which He has built, is the church of the Lord which He has bought with His blood and gathered by His Spirit.

Ver. 17. S. SCHMID: A faithful servant of God speaks according to the direction of God's word — takes nothing therefrom, and adds nothing thereto (Deut. xii. 32). —Ver. 18. CRAMER: That is the true complexion of the saints: the more they are exalted by God and favored with gifts and goods, the more they humble themselves and count themselves unworthy thereof (Gen. xviii. 27; xxxii. 10; Luke i. 48). —Vers. 20, 21. OERANDER: When a devout man's heart is stirred up by the Holy Spirit to gratitude towards God, it can often not find words enough to utter its hearty love, and to exalt God high enough over all (Luke i. 46 sq.). —STARKE: In praying we must not merely recognize and acknowledge our unworthiness, but also praise God's grace and compassion (Luke i. 48-50). —Vers. 17-21. SCHLIER: God's goodness should awaken us to a recognition of our sins, it should bring us down on our knees, it should make us little and worthless. The more God the Lord does us good, so much the more should we humble ourselves; and the higher He places us, so much the more should we recognize our unworthiness; and when He lifts us up from the dust to the height and blesses us with the fullness of His blessing, then first should we become thoroughly little and worthless, in our own eyes.

Ver. 22. CRAMER: God demands of us not only the faith of the heart, but also the confession of our lips (Rom. x. 10).—Ver. 23. S. SCHMID: Not their own deeds make a people great, but the works of God which He does among such a people. Blessed is that people whose God is the Lord; but this blessedness comes from the mere compassion of God.—Vers. 22-24. SCHLIER: It is a great gain when, through God's benefits, we learn to recognize the benefactor, and let ourselves be drawn by God's goodness to the Lord Himself. God's goodness should make us little and worthless, and bow us down on our knees, but God's goodness should also make the Lord in our estimation ever greater, worthier and nobler.—Vers. 25, 26. CRAMER: Although we have God's fair and rich promises before us, and have once found grace, yet we should always continue to seek confirmation and increase thereof (1 Kings viii. 25, 26).

Ver. 28 sqq. BERL. BIBLE: The greatest act in praying is the persevering supplication of faith for the performance of God's blessed purpose; to hold fast the everlasting truth made known to us, and as if seeking payment of a debt to remind, urge, press, knock, beat the door.—STARKE: Every blessing in heavenly good things is derived from the gracious pleasure of God (Eph. i. 3).

[Ver. 2. It seems natural and appropriate that our houses of worship should be not less substantial and elegant than our dwelling-houses.—Ver. 3. The Lord's having evidently "been with us" does not prove that He approves all we have done; still less that He will approve all we feel inclined to do.—It may be perfectly proper that a thing should be done, and yet not proper that we should undertake to do it.—Our wisest friends may give us wrong counsel, in hastily taking for granted that what seems to them good will seem good to the Lord.—In denying us the gratification of some pious wish, God may design accomplishing it in a way that He sees to be better; and He may commend and reward the wish He does not gratify. CHAPTERS VIII.—X.

1. Without by wars and victories over Israel's external enemies. Chap. VIII. 1-14.

- 1 AND after this it came to pass that David smote the Philistines and subdued [humbled] them; and David took Metheg-Ammah¹ out of the hand of the Philistines.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

are discordant and unsatisfactory: Chald. has "the fastening of the Ammah," Vulg. "the bridle of tribute," Syr. and Arab. render a proper name Ramath-Gamah (which some translate "the height of the rush"), Aquila gives "the bridle of the aqueduct" or (according to another edition) "the bridle of the ell," Symmachus "the authority of tribute," while the Sept. reading τὴν ἀποσκευαστήν suggests that their text contained the stem מִתְּגָאֵם or מִתְּגָאֵם. These renderings show the perplexity of the translators; the Rabbinical translation "stream or aqueduct" (so perhaps Chald.) is improbable, and the rendering "tribute" equally without authority (— מִתְּגָאֵם), while the reading in Chron. "Gath and her daughters" is an explanation, not a translation, if it be not a different form of the same original text. In this uncertainty it seems better to leave the words untranslated, as in Eng. A. V. Perhaps we have here a proper name, possibly a corruption of the text of Chronicles.—Tr.]

- 2 And he smote Moab and measured them with a line, casting them down to [making them lie down on] the ground; even with two lines measured he [and he measured two lines] to put to death and with [om. with] one^a full line to keep alive. And so [om. so] the Moabites became David's servants and brought [bringing] gifts.
- 3 David smote also [And David smote] Hadadezer^b the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at [to make an attack at] the river Euphrates.^c And David took from him a thousand chariots^d and seven hundred horsemen and twenty thousand footmen; and David houghed all the chariot horses, but reserved of them for an hundred chariots.
- 5 And when the Syrians^e of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer king of Zobah, 6 David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men. Then [And] David put garrisons in Syria of Damascus, and the Syrians became servants to David and brought [bringing] gifts. And the Lord [Jehovah] preserved David whithersoever he went. And David took the shields^f of gold that were on the servants of 8 Hadadezer, and brought them to Jerusalem. And from Bethah^g and from Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, king David took exceeding much brass [copper].
- 9 When [And] Toi king of Hamath heard that David had smitten all the host of 10 Hadadezer, Then [And] Toi sent Joram^h his son unto king David, to salute him and to bless [congratulate] him, because he had fought against Hadadezer and smitten him; for Hadadezer had wars with Toi; and Joram brought with him [and in his hand were] vessels of silver and vessels of gold and vessels of brass [copper]. 11 Which [These] also king David did dedicate unto the Lord [Jehovah] with the silver and gold that he had dedicated of all [ins. the] nations which he subdued, 12 Of Syriaⁱ and of Moab and of the children of Ammon and of the Philistines and of Amalek and of the spoil of Hadadezer son of Rehob, king of Zobah.
- 13 And David gath him a name when he returned from smiting of [om. of] the Syrians^j in the valley of salt, being [om. being] eighteen thousand men. And he put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom put he garrisons, and all they of [om. they of] Edom became David's servants. And the Lord [Jehovah] preserved David whithersoever he went.

^a [Ver. 2. Sept. has "two lines to kill and two to save," and Vulg. gives one line to each division (and so the Syr. in Walton's Polyglot, followed by Arab., but Lee's Syr. text agrees with the Heb.); these are changes from desire for symmetry.—Ta.]

^b [Ver. 3. Erdmann and many others prefer this form Hadadezer to the form in Chron., Hadaracer (which is found in all the ancient VSS. except Chald., and in many good Heb. MSS. and EDD.) on the ground that Hadad is the name of a Syrian sun-god and occurs in many other proper names; but Schrader (Die Keilinschriften und das A. T., p. 101) says that the name of the Syrian king in 1 Kings xx. 1 is not Benhadad, but Ben-hadar, which the Assyrian writes Binhidri; Schrader translates the name ("the god) Bin is exalted." If this be correct, the reading here is probably Hadaracer, as in Chron.—Ta.]

^c [Ver. 3. Our text is here to be preferred to that of Chron. (xviii. 3). Erdmann renders "to re-establish his power," nearly as Eng. A. V. But the phrase here used always means "to turn one's hand" either literally (as 1 Sam. xiv. 27) or figuratively, and either from (פך) a thing (Ex. xviii. 17) or to or against a thing (פך in Ex. iv. 7) in Am. i. 8); here, as not the enemy against whom, but the place in which the effort is made is meant the prep. "in" (ב) is used; he went to "put his hand, direct his attack" in or at the river.—Ta.]

^d [Ver. 3. The word "Euphrates," not in the text, is supplied by the Masorites in the margin, and is found in many MSS. and EDD.; its insertion in the Heb. is unnecessary, since "the river" means the Euphrates.—Ta.]

^e [Ver. 4. The Heb. here reads: "1700 horsemen and 20,000 footmen;" Eng. A. V. divides the first number and introduces "chariots" in order to account for their mention at the end of the verse (after 1 Chr. xviii. 4); Erdmann adopts the whole of the reading of Chron. "1000 chariots, 7000 horsemen, and 20,000 footmen" (so also Sept. and Then.). But Wellhausen objects to this that the רכב at the end is used in a general sense, including the horses of the "horsemen,"—inasmuch as after all the רכב only are houghed, there remain only 100 רכב "chariot-horses" and not also the "riding-horses." Still, as the author may here have chosen to leave out the riding-horses altogether, this objection would not be decisive; but it is in favor of our text that, while not impossible, it is not so easy as that of Chron.—Ta.]

^f [Ver. 5. Syr. and Arab. read badly "Edom and Damascus."—Ta.]

^g [Ver. 7. The versions render this word (חלש) variously, apparently guessing at its meaning from the connection. As Thienius points out, the etymology (from a verb meaning "to be hard or strong") and some of the passages where it occurs (as Jer. ii. 11) favor the meaning "armour;" the rendering "shield" is now more commonly adopted.—Ta.]

^h [Ver. 8. The probability seems to be in favor of the reading "Tebah."—Ta.]

ⁱ [Ver. 10. The better reading is probably Hadoram (as in Chron.), with which compare the Hadaracer above.—Ta.]

^j [Ver. 12. Some MSS. and Sept., Syr., Arab. read "Edom," a change of one letter only in the Hebrew, and this better suits the connection, where this name is followed by Moab, etc., Zobah appearing at the end.—Ta.]

^k [Ver. 13. As Syria was not near the valley of salt, this text is manifestly corrupt. We may either read "Edom" for "Syria" (so Sept. and Chron.) or insert the clause "and smote Edom" after "Syrians" (so Erdmann). The former course is the simpler, and avoids the difficulty of accounting for the omission of any reference to Syria in Chronicles. The Heb. words for Syria (סור) and Edom (עדם) differ very slightly.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A general survey is here given of David's wars and victories with the aid of the Lord (vers. 6, 14), without its being indicated, however (as is above observed), by the word "after this" that the wars here detailed were chronologically attached to the events of chap. vii., or that these wars were chronologically related to one another as the sequence of mention might seem to show. The phrase "after this" is the general formula of transition and connection, which introduces David's wars grouped according to the factual point of view, and works them into the broad frame of the theocratic history. See a similar loose, not strictly chronological connection by this formula in x. 1; xiii. 1. The parallel section in 1 Chron. is chap. xviii.

Ver. 1. The subjection of the Philistines. David not only defeated them in a battle, but also subjected them to his authority. He took out of their hand "the bridle of the mother" (מִתְּהַג הָאֲמָה metheg ha ammah). The Chronicler has for this "Gath and her daughters," which words are to be accepted in explanation of our expression instead of giving place to vague conjectures. Ammah (אֲמָה, feminine formation from אָמָה = "mother-city," so the capital city of a country is often called in Arabic and Phœnician, comp. Gesen. Thesaurus, p. 112, and our word "metropolis;" and the cities dependent on the capital city are called "daughters," comp. Josh. xv. 45, 47. Among the five chief cities of the Philistines (1 Sam. vi. 16, 17), Gath in Saul's time already, as seat of a king who appears at the head of the Philistine princes (1 Sam. xxvii. 2; xxix. 2 sq.), had attained the rank of a capital of Philistia, whence the bridle of dominion was extended over the other cities and the whole people. [These notices do not seem sufficient in themselves to show a hegemony for Gath.—Tr.] The "bridle of the mother"—that is, according to Chron., the power and authority over Philistia concentrated in the metropolis, Gath, the mother with the "daughters," or Philistine cities over which Gath exercised authority—David took possession of, he subjugated Philistia, and made it tributary, as the nations afterwards mentioned. The king of Gath mentioned in 1 Kings ii. 39 belonged also to the tributary kings, subject to Solomon, this side of the Euphrates, as far as Gaza (1 Kings v. 1, 4). So Gesenius, De Wette, Keil. Of other explanations of our phrase some do not accord with the meaning of the words, e. g., Schultens, Mich., Ewald render "arm-bridle," but ammah does not mean "arm," and Grotius gives claustra montis Ammah—"the fortress of Mount Ammah,"—but metheg cannot mean "fortress." Some do not agree with the actual condition of things, e. g., Bertheau explains, "he wrested from the Philistines the dominion that they had hitherto exercised over Israel," but this does not agree with David's dominion over Israel; and Böttcher takes ammah (אָמָה)—as meaning one that goes before and leads, and then in the abstract sense of leading, guidance, "the bridle of guidance,"—but "this would suit only if the setting aside of a hegemony were here spoken of" (Then.). Looking at the words of Chron., the Sept. (τὴν ἀφωρισμένην = "the separated, marked off") and 1 Sam. vii. 13, 14, The-nius conjectures that the text has arisen by error of copyists from an original text, which contained a description (that cannot now be made out) of the boundary-district, which David then forever wrested from the Philistines. In the essence of the thing, this explanation agrees with that above given.

Ver. 2. The subjugation of the Moabites.—On the former friendly relation between the king of Moab and David, see 1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4. The cause of Moab's enmity against him is unknown. Perhaps meantime another king had come to the throne than he with whom David sought refuge and with his parents found hospitality. Probably in this war occurred what is mentioned in 1 Chron. xi. 22 of Benaiah, one of David's heroes, that he slew two of the king of Moab's sons. The severe punishment inflicted on the arms-bearing Moabites (they were compelled to lie in a row on the ground, two thirds were measured with a line for death, and one-third for life) points to some very grave offence on their part. They thenceforward became David's servants, that is, were subject to him and paid him tribute. [Patrick: Now was fulfilled the prophecy of Balaam, Numb. xxiv. 17.—Tr.]

Vers. 3, 4. Subjugation of Hadadezer, king of Zobah.—And David smote Hadadezer.—Instead of this name we have "Hadarezer" in x. 16, 19, and in Chron.; so also Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab., Josephus. But as Hadad was the name of the sun-god of the Syrians, and frequently occurs in Syrian proper names (see Movers, Phæn. I. 196 sq.), Hadadezer, = "whose help God is," must be taken as the original reading. [For a different view see "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.] The district of Zobah was a part of Syria (x. 6, 16 and Psalm lx. 2, where it is called Aram-Zobah), bordering on Syria, beyond the Euphrates in Mesopotamia, whence Hadadezer brought Arameans to his help across the Euphrates. Its position is more exactly described in ver. 5 (it was near the territory of the Damascus Syrians) and ver. 9 and 2 Chron. viii. 3 (it touched Hamath on the north, at the Orontes). It must therefore be put north-east of Damascus and south of Hamath, between the Orontes and the Euphrates. Comp. Winer, R.-B. II. 738. It seems to have reached so far south that the Ammonites could get help from it against Israel, x. 6; 1 Chron. xix. 6. As Zobah was doubtless the capital city of the country, it is probably (Grot., Ew.) to be identified with the city Sabe (Ptol. v. 19) which lay on the same parallel with Damascus and eastward towards the Euphrates.* "We must therefore look for Zobah to the east of the transjordanic Israelitish territory and beyond its northern border, and its king must have ruled over a great part of the desert between Palestine and the Euphrates, and consequently over the southern part of Syria" (Stähelin, Leben Davids, p. 51). But on what occasion and under what circumstances was David involved in a war with this distant kingdom? The answer to this question will appear in the course of the following exposition. As he went to re-establish his power at the river (Euphrates). [Lit. "as he went to put forth his hand" = to make an effort or attack. See "Text. and Gramm." against Erdmann's rendering.—Tr.] The question is whether Hadadezer or David is subject here. The Heb. וְ [hand] = power, dominion. The Infin. (וַיִּשְׁתַּח) means not to stretch out, extend (De Wette), but to draw back, re-establish a dominion, which consequently existed before. Taking Hadadezer as subject, and looking to 1 Sam. xiv. 47, where it is said that Saul fought successfully against Zobah, it has been explained to mean that Hadadezer now attempted to regain the territory then lost (Maurer, Bunsen, Ewald, Keil). But can we suppose that Hadadezer waited so long after Saul's death? Rather it is to be presumed that he had long ago re-established his power. In favor of taking David as subject, it may be said that the whole sentence would then have the same subject, which is most natural according to the tenor of the narrative, and that David must have felt called on to restore Israel's power up to the Euphrates which had been lost since Saul's time. But against this undoubtedly is the word "his power" (וְ); for David had not yet occupied the land on the Euphrates. We are therefore obliged to take Hadadezer as subject, who had attempted to restore his shattered power on the Euphrates when David conquered him in this war and made him his vassal. How his power was shattered will appear hereafter. Chron. has "to establish" (וַיִּשְׁתַּח), which agrees with the above explanation—and so the Sept. ἐπιστήραι [=establish]. Which was the original reading cannot be determined. [The phrase in Sam. is a common one; that in Chron. (in the Heb.) is difficult and improbable.—Tr.] Against the rendering of Grot. and Cler.: "as he (David) went to force back his (Hadadezer's) power towards the Euphrates" is the prep. "in, at" (בְּ) before "river," and the change of persons in this subordinate sentence (Thenius). [Adopting the rendering suggested above, the reference may very well be to David as the subject: David going to make an attack at the Euphrates, was naturally opposed by the powerful Hadadezer; otherwise it is difficult to see how Hadadezer's attack in this region could have brought him in contact with David.—Tr.] The Masora adds "Euphrates" after "river" [so Eng. A. V.],—which, however, is not necessary, since the word "the river" (הַנָּהָר) of itself means the Euphrates.* How important it must have been for David to rest his power on this side on the Euphrates is obvious. Ver. 4. And David took (prisoners) from him 1700 horsemen and 20,000 footmen.—Chron. has 7000 horsemen and 1000 chariots. Here, therefore, the word "chariot" has fallen out, and the sign for seven thousand (ז') been changed to that for seven hundred (ז). The text of Chron. is the correct one; "for to 20,000 footmen in the plains of Syria 7000 horsemen are evidently better proportioned than 1700" (Thenius). The 1000 chariots also accords with the connection, "because afterward David is said to have houghed the chariot-horses" (Cler.). And David lamed all the riding-animals.—The word (וַיִּשְׁתַּח) means riding-animals in general, not merely chariot-horses (so Isa. xxi. 7). These David made useless and harmless by cutting the sinews of their hind feet (וַיִּשְׁתַּח)—comp. Judg. xi. 6, 9). It was a matter of importance to David to render useless not the chariots, but the horses. [He reserved a hundred horses not for war, but for a triumph or a guard; whether or not this reservation was illegal and ungodly is not said.—Tr.]

Vers. 5-8. The conquest of Aram-Damascus (the Syrians of Damascus). Ver. 5. Aram-Damascus—that is, the Arameans whose capital was Damascus (Chron. Darmesek, Sam. Dammesek)—east of the Antilibanon range, on the Chrysorrhoeas (Pharpar) river, and on the great caravan-route from Central Asia to Western Asia. These Syrians of Damascus came as allies to the help of Hadadezer, attacking David from the north, but suffered a severe defeat, as appears from the fact that they lost 22,000 men. [See Josephus' reference here to the account of Nicolaus of Damascus (Ant. 7, 5, 2), who mentions a Syrian king Hadad beaten at the Euphrates by David (Then.).—Tr.]—Ver. 6. To hold them in subjection he placed posts, garrisons in their territory, comp. 1 Sam. x. 5; xiii. 3. "He made them subject and tributary to him." [Some render "officers" instead of "garrisons," but hardly so well.—Tr.]—Ver. 7.

"Shields" (וַיִּשְׁתַּח), not "armour," comp. 2 Kings xi. 10, Gesen., Thes. and Lex. by Dietrich. The golden shields of Hadadezer's servants (that is, his immediate guard) David sent as booty to Jerusalem. The Sept. here has the additional statement: "And Susakim [Shishak] king of Egypt took them away when he went up against Jerusalem in the days of Roboam, son of Solomon," of which there is no trace in any other version or in Chron., and which there is no good reason for introducing into our text (against Thenius), since, by comparing 1 Chron. xviii. 8 (where the use made of the copper is mentioned), and 1 Kings xiv. 25-27, it is clear how a translator or copyist from inexact observation of these passages might have been led to make such an addition to the text as marginal note or explanation. [Keil also points out that the shields carried off by Shishak were not these captured by David, but those made by Solomon.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. And from Hadadezer's cities Bethah and Berothai took king David very much copper.—It is not possible to determine certainly the position of these cities. But it may be conjectured that Berothai (comp. Ezek. xlvii. 16), for which Chron. has Kus, is identical either with Barathena, near Sabe (Ptol. Geog. 5, 19, 5; so Ewald), or with the present Berah south-east of Damascus (Thenius), or with Birtha on the eastern bank of the Euphrates (= Birtha, Ptol. Geog. 5, 19, 3), not to be confounded with Birtha, on the Tigris (Ptol. Geog. 5, 18, 9). The old Phœnician Berytus on the Mediterranean Sea (= Beirut) is out of the question, since the territory of the king of Zobah could certainly not have reached so far. "The name may be derived as well from berosh [cypress], in Syrian beroth, as

from beer [a well]" (Thenius). See Winer s. v. (Bib. Comm.: Can the Wady Barada be the modern representative of the name?—Tr.) Instead of Betah Chron. has Tibhath, to which answer the Metebak of the Sept. and the Tebah of the Syriac—so that we may suppose "from Tebah" (תֵּבָח) to be the original reading (Then., Keil). This is favored by the Tebah of Gen. xxii. 24 (which points to this region), the name of a son of Nahor, and also of a place that now stands north of Damascus and Tadmor, between Tadmor and Aleppo (Büsching, Erdbeschreib. XI., I., 544). The booty of these cities consisted of a large quantity of copper. Chronicles (either, as Movers supposes, taking it from another source, or using more completely the same source as the author of Samuel) adds in respect to the use of the booty: "Therefrom Solomon made the copper sea and the pillars and the copper vessels." The Sept. adds these words here after "very much brass" with the insertion "and the wash-basins." But there is no reason with Thenius to alter our text accordingly, since the effort of the Sept. to explain and fill out from other material is evident here, as in ver. 7. [On copper in Canaan see Deut. viii. 9. Some centuries before this copper was carried in quantities from Syria to Egypt (Bib. Com.).—Tr.]—The loss of the Syrians in these battles was forty-two thousand men (comp. vers. 4 and 5). This number agrees with the statement of the loss in x. 18 = forty thousand men. From this alone it is clear that the Aramean war that is minutely related in ch. x. is the same as that here spoken of. It is to be further noted that the war against the Arameans here related ends with their complete subjection (vers. 6 and 9). Against the view that ch. x. narrates a second Aramean war, wherein the subjugated Arameans revolt when David becomes involved in war with the Ammonites, and help them against him, is the fact that in ch. x. nothing is said of such a revolt, the Syrians appearing as wholly independent of David and hiring their aid to the Ammonites (x. 6). Before the Arameans could unite with these latter, Joab defeated them under Hadadezer; the latter called the Arameans from beyond the Euphrates to his help in order to regain his power on the Euphrates, which was lost by that defeat, and they were now also defeated by David (x. 13-18). This explains our ver. 3: "as he (Hadadezer) went to re-establish his power at the river Phrath" (Luther). In the general view of David's wars in ch. viii. this Aramean war is briefly related according to its issue under David's lead. In ch. x. the Ammonitish war (here merely alluded to, ver. 12) is minutely related on account of the history of Uriah therewith connected; and as this war led to that with the Arameans, the latter also, after the summary statement of it in ch. viii., is fully narrated in ch. x. "The war with Ammon, whose development could not be understood without the Syrian, is more elaborately narrated (in ch. x.) for a special reason only, namely, for the sake of Uriah's history, and is for this reason no doubt merely mentioned in the general view of all the great wars (viii. 12), since otherwise its issue at least would necessarily have been described as fully as that of the Moabite war" (Ewald, Gesch. [Hist. of Israel] III. 205).

Comp. Keil's Comm., [Eng. Tr., p. 358 sq.].—According to 1 Chron. xviii. 3 David's decisive victory over the Arameans was gained at Hamath, that is, Epiphania on the Orontes, a colony of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 18), at the foot of Hermon, therefore on the western boundary of the district of Zobah, and on the northernmost border of Palestine, still one of the greatest cities of Turkish Asia, retaining its old name; according to 2 Sam. x. 17 the victory was gained at Helam, an unknown place; but this difference is insignificant, and may be removed by supposing either that Helam was near Hamath (Keil), or that the decisive combats occurred at both places at the same time.*

Vers. 9, 10. King Toi of Hamath seeks a friendly alliance with David in consequence of the latter's victory over the king of Zobah and his allies.—For Toi Chron. has Toi. When Toi heard that David had smitten all the host of Hadadezer (David's victory was therefore a decisive one), he sent his son Joram (better Hadoram) to David. Chron., instead of Joram, has Hadoram, Joseph. Adoram, and Sept. Jedouram; Hadoram (according to Mich., from Hador, the name of a Syrian deity, but see also Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21, where it is the name of an Arabian tribe) is to be regarded as the original reading, instead of the Heb. name Joram, which doubtless got into the text from similarity of sound by error of copying or of hearing [or, it is a Hebraization of a foreign name, as often happens.—Tr.]. The embassy was 1) to greet David in Toi's name, properly, to ask after his welfare, comp. Gen. xliii. 27, and 2) to bless him, that is, to congratulate him on his victory over Hadadezer. The reason for this congratulation is given in the words: "for a man of wars of Toi was Hadadezer," that is, Hadadezer carried on constant wars with Toi; Aq. and Sym. have "waging war" (πολεμῶν). On the phrase: "man of wars" = one whose call and business is warring, comp. 1 Chron. xxviii. 3; Isa. xlii. 13. Since Hamath and Zobah bordered on one another, Toi was in constant danger of being entirely despoiled of his authority by Hadadezer, on whom he was perhaps in some degree dependent. Hence his congratulation of David as the expression of joy over the victory that freed him from a dangerous enemy, and of the wish to enter into a relation of friendship and alliance with the powerful victor, to which end he sent rich presents consisting of vessels of silver, of gold, and of copper. [For the forms of ancient Chaldean and Assyrian vessels see Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies I. 91, 386.—Tr.]

Vers. 11, 12. David consecrates to the Lord all the booty of gold and silver taken from the conquered nations. David's wars were wars of the Lord, in whose name he fought against the enemies of the chosen people, and led the people to victory. Therefore the booty belonged actually to the Lord. David affirmed this by separating it from profane use (this is the primary meaning of "dedicated," דָּקֵדֵק), and setting it apart for the Lord, that is, either in general he put it into the treasury of the sanctuary, or he determined that it should be used in making sacred vessels for the temple that was to be built. Instead of the second "dedicated" (שִׁמְשָׁן) Chron. has "took" (לָקַח), which gives the same sense.—Ver. 12. From Aram [-Syria] and from Moab and from the children of Ammon and from the Philistines and from Amalek and from the spoil of Hadadzezer. Instead of Aram Chron. has Edom, and omits the words referring to Hadadzezer, that is, makes no mention at all of the wars against Aram. But as in this enumeration of all David's wars (as it obviously is) Aram could not, as it seems, be properly omitted, it might appear probable that we should read Aram in Chron. instead of Edom, especially as the victory over Edom is not mentioned till afterwards. It might, however, be also supposed that "Aram" was omitted [in Chron.] because the booty taken from the Arameans has just been spoken of, and the further mention of booty from other nations was attached immediately to that statement. On the other hand it is not necessary (with Keil) to suppose a gap in our text after "Aram," that is to be filled with "from Edom." It may be supposed that, as the Chronicler did not mention Aram because he had spoken of it just before, so our narrator did not include Edom because he intended to speak of the victory over the Edomites immediately afterwards. [On this reading see "Text. and Gram."] As Edom is geographically connected with Moab and Ammon, and as the spoil of the Syrian Hadadzezer is mentioned at the end of the verse, it seems better (with Bib. Com.) to read Edom for Aram; though the Aram of our text might refer to the Syrians of Damascus (so Gill).—Tr.]

Vers. 13, 14. Conquest of Edom. Comp. 1 Chr. xviii. 12, 13, where it is said that Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, smote the Edomites in the valley of salt, eighteen thousand men, and the statements in Ps. lx. 2 [superscription] and 1 Kings xi. 15, which vary from this in minor points.—Ver. 13. And David made himself a name. Against the rendering "he set up a monument" is the fact that such a statement could not have been made here without reference to the Lord and indication of the place, and that it is wholly irreconcilable with David's disposition that he should here set up a monument to himself. The proper translation is: "made himself a name" (comp. Gen. xi. 4, xxi. 1) gained renown (so the Vulg.), Chap. vii. 9, "I have made thee a great name," etc., is not in contradiction with this, for it points out the divine causality in David's glorious military career as contrasted with its human side.—The glory of his name was exalted still more by another splendid achievement. As he returned from the battle against Aram, literally, from smiting Aram. The connection alone naturally suggests that the Aramean wars related above are here meant. But our text affirms David made himself a name by a new victory over Aram in the valley of salt. The text is here obviously incomplete. The words "in the valley of salt" cannot be connected with what here precedes, since a battle with the Arameans in this valley, which lay on the ancient border of Judah and Edom in the Edomite territory south of the Dead Sea, is out of the question. Before these words we must insert "and he smote Edom," which may easily have fallen out in copying through the similarity of Edom and Aram (דָּמוֹם and אָרָם). Sept.: "he smote Idumea." [Or, we may read Edom instead of Aram (Syria), comp. 1 Chr. xviii. 12, and see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.] David's wars in the north against the Arameans and Ammonites had led the Edomites to fancy that they might easily get possession of the southern part of the Israelitish territory. When David had ended those wars, he returned (the word "returned" does not refer to Joab (Ew.)—see below). Whether he returned on the east or west of the Jordan and the Dead Sea is uncertain. The battle with the Edomites was then fought in the salt valley, the same place where Amaziah afterwards conquered the Edomites (2 Kings xiv. 7). The Edomites lost eighteen thousand men; so also Chron. But in Chron. the battle is fought not by David himself, but by Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, and in 1 Kings xi. 15 and in Ps. lx. 2 [superscription] by Joab. There are here no real contradictions, since in different reports (for ex., in the last German-French war) the same battles are referred to different leaders, in one to the Fieldmarshal, in another to his subordinate Generals, in still another to the Generalissimo himself. Abishai, who in the Syrian-Ammonitish war commanded a division of David's army under Joab, was the conqueror of the Edomites, while Joab was General-in-chief, and David had control of the whole military operation. Michaelis: "David as king, Joab as chief commander, and Abishai, who was sent forward by his brother, and overthrew the enemy." Only incapacity to conceive such affairs in their reality and manifoldness can find a discrepancy here. For the rest it is to be noted that the Chronicler, though he names Abishai as leader in this victory, was at the same time thinking of David as the conqueror (in accord with our passage), since he adds: "And the Lord helped David in all his undertakings." The difference in numbers also (here and in Chron. eighteen thousand, in Ps. lx. twelve thousand) is unimportant; there is no need to suppose an error of copyist in the last passage (Ew.) to explain it. It receives a simple explanation from the various statements about the battle in different authorities. In the last German-French war the reports of the numbers of killed or prisoners often differed by thousands. How much more might such differences arise at a time when no exact countings were not provided for. [Bp. Patrick suggests that Abishai began the fight and slew six thousand, and then Joab, advancing with his reserve, slew twelve thousand more (so Ps. lx). It is impossible to give a certain explanation of the difference.—Tr.] David put garrisons in all Edom (not in Chron). Thenius supposes the reason of the special emphatic statement here (comp. ver. 6), that no part of Edom was left without a garrison, to be that this was not the case in former campaigns against Edom (see for ex. 1 Sam. xiv. 47). But the explanation lies rather in the numerous mountains, caves and gorges of the country, which made a complete garrisoning necessary.—Thus had David overthrown the huge column of nations that were dangerous to Israel from north to south, and on its ruins founded his dominion.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. In all his wars and victories over Israel's enemies David, as theocratic king, was only the instrument of the Lord, who Himself waged these wars for His people. Therefore in his royal military calling David knows himself also only as servant of the Lord, to whom, as the true Commander, he consecrates and dedicates the booty gained. And the prophetic narrative can say nothing higher of David than that he performed these splendid deeds of arms through the help of the Lord (vers. 6, 14). But in these victories over the enemies of God's people was fulfilled the Lord's promise (vii. 10, 11), trusting in which David could advance to battle prepared for war and certain of victory.

2. David's royal calling was to be fulfilled chiefly in wars and victories over Israel's enemies, in order that the kingdom of God in Israel might attain its unhindered, theocratic-national full development of form. But from this historical basis is subsequently developed the idea of the theocratic kingdom as a mighty and powerful one that victoriously combats the enemies of the theocracy, and makes them subservient to the divine might and power. On this is then built up the Messianic prophecy of the future king, who in divine might and glory will complete the kingdom of God by the thorough conquest of all its enemies, establish God's universal dominion in the people of God redeemed from the world-powers, and dispense God's blessing under His protection and pastoral fidelity. Compare especially Ps. ii., lxxii., cx., which in their historical foundation and fundamental ideas are unintelligible without the history of David's wars and victories (ch. viii.) that lays the foundation both for the Messianic prophecy and for the promise in ch. vii.

3. Under the guidance of Ps. lx.—which refers to the impending new war with the Edomite (after the glorious conclusion of the Syrian-Ammomite war) and to Israel's new danger from their inroad (Delitzsch, Moll), not to the situation after the victory over Edom in the Salt-valley (Hengst.)—it is possible to follow the ups and downs of David's thoughts under the experiences of this time and afterwards in his recollection of its trials and God's gracious manifestations, and to exhibit the truths therein contained that hold good for God's kingdom in all times. After the days of mighty manifestations of divine help there have come for God's people times of great distress within and without, not, however, by chance, by a necessary natural process or by unavertable fate, but immediately from the Lord. The deep powerful feeling of the absolute dependence of all human life on the Lord permits no lament over calamity, without accompanying declaration that the Lord has sent it according to His unsearchable counsel, and without giving Him the glory by the confession: "This hath the Lord done!" So David's lament in vers. 3-5 [1-3] is such a declaration and confession of the Lord's omnipotent power in the infliction of severe sufferings and great dangers on His people. "O God, thou hast cast us off, thou hast scattered us, made the land tremble and broken it, hast made thy people see hard things, etc."—But with such lament and confession is connected in the pious heart the living remembrance of God's former manifestations of favor in His promises, as the banner that is raised by the Lord for them that fear Him. Thereby has the Lord Himself given His assailed ones the right to remind Him of His promises, and so the lament changes into the prayer: Help, answer us! (vers. 6, 7 [4, 5]). Praying faith hears the divine answer in the might-displaying word of the living God ("God hath spoken in His holiness") wherein He announces Himself as the unlimited Owner and Lord of His land and people, and as the victorious opponent and sovereign of their enemies. These are the two fundamental truths that the history of God's kingdom everywhere affirms and confirms: the Lord acknowledges His people (as His possession) with His promises and their fulfilment; and the enemies of God's kingdom and people will not be able to elude His power, but must submit to it (vers. 8-10 [6-8]). But in how sharp contradiction of such divine promises is the actual condition of God's people in the world? "Hast thou not cast us off?" Doest thou not go forth with our hosts? (vers. 11, 12 [9, 10]). [The translation of the Eng. A. V. is also possible, and gives the same general sense.—Tr.]. The above lament is repeated in such a question, which arises from the involuntary comparison of the present straitened condition of God's kingdom and people with the majestic declaration of God that promises victory and dominion over all enemies. This sharp dissonance must penetrate deep into the heart of God's servant when he sees with equal vividness and clearness both the rich promises of God and the needs and straits of God's kingdom. But it is resolved into all the more pressing entreaty and prayer for the divine help and into the twofold confident avowal and confession: 1) In God we shall show our power, that is, carry off the victory, and 2) God the Lord, who is in His people, will through them destroy the power of the enemy (vers. 13, 14 [11, 12]). The Psalm ceases with the same twofold ground-tone that sounds through 2 Sam. viii. David made himself a name by his victories over his enemies, and the Lord helped him whithersoever he went.

Nearly related to Ps. lx. is Ps. xlv.* which similarly presupposes the affliction of God's people and the danger of their conquest and dispersion by the hostile neighboring nations. Through the Lord's help to the fathers when the land was taken possession of (vers. 2-4 [1-3]) is awakened and sustained faith that the same God, as king of His people, will now also grant His people victory over their enemies (vers. 5-8 [4-7]), so that they shall forever thank Him as they have hitherto boasted of Him (ver. 9 [8]). But in contradiction of this tradition of divine help in the olden time and of this confidence is the present overthrow and distress of the people (vers. 10-17 [9-16]) which is felt all the more deeply in view of the people's faithfulness to the covenant, as the omniscient God knows (vers. 18-22 [17-21]). But the consciousness of undeserved sufferings and afflictions leads to the profounder conviction that such sufferings, inflicted by the Lord, must be endured for the Lord's sake, since the enmity towards the Lord's people is directed against the Lord Himself (ver. 23 [22]). Therewith, however, is connected also the hope of God's people, as expressed in their prayer that the Lord would arise from His inactivity and espouse His people's cause. The ground of this hope and prayer lies in their need of help and in the free grace of God. Ps. xlv., being thus similar to Ps. lx. in its course of thought and its historical presuppositions, most probably belongs to the time of affliction expressly designated in Ps. lx., when the Edomites sorely pressed Israel; comp. Am. i. 6. The frightful castigation that Joab inflicted on them (1 Kings xi. 15) intimates the greatness of the suffering that they had prepared for Israel, and thus serves indirectly to confirm the historical circumstances presupposed in these two Psalms.—In Ps. cviii. we find a repetition of Ps. lx. 7-14 [5-12]) loosely combined with another Psalm-fragment lviii. 8-12 [7-11]).

* [The permanent and deep calamity portrayed in this Psalm makes it extremely difficult, if not quite impossible to refer it to the time of David. There is great room for doubt also as to the Davidic origin of Ps. lx. See the Comms. of Delitzsch and Perowne on Psalms for discussions of this point.—Ta.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

War is right and a duty before God, when the object is 1) To guard God's law and order against hostile power; 2) To preserve gifts and goods granted by God; 3) To fulfil tasks assigned by God; 4) To carry out the clearly recognized plans of God's wisdom.

Ver. 1. SCHLIER: We see here . . . how it still is at the present day with wars in the world, what righteous and unrighteous wars properly are, but also what wars always ought to be.—Ver. 2. TUEB. BIBLE: To pious kings God gives victory and glory. Prov. xx. 28.—OSIANDER: That is the most glorious victory and the most fortunate government, when the conquered enemies do not hate the conqueror, but hold him in honor and render him willing obedience.—Vers. 3, 4. OSIANDER: If the mightiest foes could not subdue David, so too no human power will extirpate the kingdom of Christ.—S. SCHMID: Against God and those who trust in God no human might avails (Prov. xxix. 25). When the kingdom of God is the object of attack, the ungodly are somewhat united and help each other, while at other times they are against each other (Luke xxiii. 12; Acts iv. 27).—Ver. 6. CRAMER: The heathen also must bring gold and gifts (Isa. lx. 6), and willingly offer to him in holy attire.

Vers. 9-14. A beautiful emblem of the fact that many among the heathen also shall willingly turn to Christ.—STARKE: God's promises, though it be late, are yet truly and surely fulfilled (Gen. xxv. 23).* If God gives to us, we should also give to Him again. But we give to Him again when we do good to His children and servants.—SCHLIER: How well it would be if all rulers and warlike heroes never had their eye on themselves, but always and only on the honor of the Lord, if all happened to the Lord's honor alone, if all honor were given only to the Lord, if all booty were spent only for the service of the Lord and never for display and pride.

[Ver. 2. David is at the present day often charged with great cruelty for slaying so many of the Moabites; but to most of his contemporaries, friend and foe, it probably seemed a hazardous leniency to spare a full third. The Asiatic rulers have always inclined to what we should regard as extreme severity in punishment; but no man has ever been able to rule long in Asia without such punishments, at least to the extent of making examples, as David did here and in xii. 31. Is there not danger in the Christendom of to-day that we shall go to the opposite extreme, that mercy to criminals will be carried so far as to become cruelty to society?—Ver. 3. Only once, and for a brief season, did the children of Abraham possess the whole region promised to him, Gen. xv. 18. During all the centuries it was theirs by right through God's gift; but it was not theirs by possession through their own fault. In like manner, how seldom does national or individual life and character reach up to the height of its heaven-permitted possibilities.—TR.]

It is the lot of many who wish to be greatly useful that they can but gather materials and devise plans, leaving it for others to build and rejoice. Men forget the former class, but God does not. We speak only of Solomon's Temple; but in the eye of God it was David's Temple too. Does one long for a different task, and feel tempted to repine? That which God assigns will be best for us, if we waste not life in dreaming of some other lot, but faithfully stand where He puts us.—TR.]

2. David's Internal Government: Organization of the Administration of the Kingdom (VIII. 15-18) and Magnanimous Exhibition of Royal Favor to the Sunken House of Saul.—Mephibosheth. Chapter IX. 1-13.

a. The Administration of the Kingdom and David's Officers. Chap. VIII. 15-18.

- 15 And David reigned over all Israel, and David executed judgment and justice 16 unto all his people. And Joab the son of Zeruiah was over the host; and Jeho-
17 shaphat the son of Ahilub was recorder; And Zadok the son of Ahitub and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar [Abiathar the son of Ahimelech]¹ were the priests;
18 and Seraiah² was the [om. the] scribe; And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over³ both [om. both] the Cherethites and the Pelethites; and David's sons were chief rulers.⁴

b. David's Magnanimity toward Mephibosheth, Jonathan's Son. Chap. IX. 1-13.

- 1 And David said, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may 2 show him kindness for Jonathan's sake? And there was of the house of Saul a servant whose name was Ziba. And when they had called [And they called] him unto David [ins. and] the king said unto him, Art thou Ziba? And he said, Thy

4 [in] his feet. And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold he is in the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel in Lodebar.
5 Then [And] king David sent and fetched him out of the house of Machir, the 6 son of Ammiel, from Lodebar. Now when [And] Mephibosheth⁵ the son of Jonathan the son of Saul was come [came] unto David he fell [and fell] on his face and did reverence. And David said, Mephibosheth. And he answered [said], 7 Behold thy servant! And David said unto him, Fear not, for I will surely shew [show] thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the 8 land of Saul thy father, and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually. And he bowed himself and said, What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 17. The supposition that our text has here inverted the names seems to be justified by the whole history, which shows no other priest in David's time by the side of Zadok but Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech. Some, however (Bp. Patrick, Wordsworth), suppose that the chief-priest Abiathar is not here named, but the two subordinate priests are given. This is possible, but not probable, because we have here a list of the chief officers of David. With our Heb. text are 1 Chron. xviii. 16; 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6. Sept., Vulg., Chald., while Syr. and Arab. have the inversion here proposed. Erdmann unnecessarily supposes a historical error in the text.—Lit.: "were priests," the Art. being omitted because they were the only priests (high-priests), as above "recorder" and below "scribe."—Ta.]

² [Ver. 17. It seems impossible to decide certainly between this form of the name and those of Chron. (Shavsha), 2 Sam. xx. 25 (Sheya and Sheva) and 1 Kings iv. 3 (Shisha).—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 6. On the form of this name, in which the last element was originally Baal, and the reason for the change see on 2 Sam. iv. 4.—Ta.]

- 10 given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul and to all his house. Thou therefore [And thou] and thy sons and thy servants shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruits that thy master's son may have food [bring thy master's son food]* to eat; but [and] Mephibosheth thy master's son shall eat bread alway at my table. Now [And] Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants.
- 11 Then said Ziba [And Ziba said] unto the king, According to all that my lord the king hath commanded his servant so shall thy servant do. As for Mephibosheth,
- 12 said the king,[†] he shall eat at my table as one of the king's sons. And Mephibosheth had a young son whose name was Micha. And all that dwelt in the house
- 13 of Ziba were servants unto Mephibosheth. So [And] Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem; for he did eat continually at the king's table; and [in] he] was lame on [in] both his feet.

* [Ver. 10. So all the ancient VSS. except Chald.; the וְהָיָה of the Heb. is therefore to be omitted as destroying the syntax, since there is now no object for the verb "bring" (Eng. A. V. inserts "the fruits"). Further, some Greek VSS. cited in Montfaucon's ed. of Origen's Hexapla read: "and thou shalt bring bread to the house (בֵּית instead of לֵב) of thy lord," and this reading has also been proposed by Böttcher (independently, it would seem, as he does not mention the Greek) and approved by Thenius. The external evidence is distinctly against this reading (it is found only in some anonymous Greek versions), but the internal evidence strongly favors it; for, as Böttcher remarks, the following clause, affirming that Mephibosheth will eat at the royal table, would naturally contrast him with some other person or persons in this clause. The passage would then read thus: "thou and thy sons and thy servants shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring food to the household of thy master, and they shall eat; and Mephibosheth [himself] shall eat at my table." We might then put אָכַל for לָבַד, but it is not necessary, since בֵּית (house) may take a verb in the Sing. The change of בֵּית to לֵב in copying would be easy, especially as the phrase: "son of thy master," is found near, and the error, if it be an error, must have come in very early.—On the other hand our present Heb. text (לֵב) is favored by the similar phrase elsewhere used in this narrative, and the contrast above referred to, while natural, cannot be said to be absolutely necessary. Böttcher's emendation may therefore be said to be highly probable, but not absolutely certain.—Tr.]

† [Ver. 11. This phrase is supplied by Eng. A. V. on the supposition that these are the words of David, and so Bp. Patrick. Erdmann and others refer the words to Ziba. But it is not probable that David would here repeat his former declaration after Ziba had assented to everything; and in Ziba's mouth the words are inappropriate, whether he means his own table (Philippon), or quotes the king's phrase: "my table" (Erdmann). It is better to regard the phrase as the statement of the narrator. Bib. Com., taking it so, retains the present text and renders: "so Mephibosheth ate at my table," etc., regarding David himself as the narrator, which, however, is hard and unexampled. Following Sept. and Syr. we might read: "and Mephibosheth ate (= was eating) at the king's table," etc. The word king (הַמֶּלֶךְ) may have fallen out through error of eye on account of its occurrence at the end of the verse, or the "my table" may have been repeated from ver. 11. To this emendation it is not a sufficient objection that the same phrase would thus be employed by the narrator in ver. 13; for in ver. 11 it describes the conclusion of the immediate arrangement made by the king, while in ver. 13 it concludes the whole account of Mephibosheth's position and circumstances, as for a similar reason the statement about his lameness is repeated in ver. 13.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

a. Chap. viii. 15-18. The internal administration of the kingdom. Alongside of David's military activity without is here placed the new summary view of the offices and their incumbents, whereby a unitary administration, embracing all the internal affairs of the kingdom was carried on.

Ver. 15. To David's wars, which gained him safety from enemies and dominion over Israel is here attached a general characterization of his government in its inward nature. He was executing, that is, striving in all things thoroughly to establish judgment and justice in the whole nation.—According to this point of view he ordered and administered the affairs of the kingdom through the following offices, the names of the incumbents of which are given.—Ver. 16. 1) Joab was over the host, had the supreme command of the army, was Minister of war and Chief Marshal in one. See ii. 18. 2) Jehoshaphat son of Ahilud (Ahilud was a well-known man) was Mazkir (מַזְכִּיר), that is, not the recorder and preserver of the most important events of the kingdom, as Vulg. (a commentarius) and Sept. (ἐν τῶν ὑπομνημάτων [keeper of the records]) understand it, but the referee in all internal affairs and highest representative counselor, the Chancellor, who at the same time suggested and drew up the royal decrees and saw to their proper publication and registration in the State-archives. Comp. Ehler in Herzog. VIII. 15. [For further mention of this office see 1 Ki. iv. 3; 2 Ki. xviii. 18, 37; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8. It is evident that the office was a very important one; and from the etymology (the word = one who calls to remembrance) it seems not unlikely that it included the recording of important events. It would thus sufficiently differ from that of Sopher (Scribe or Secretary), which would be more personal and political. Gesenius and others refer to the Roman Magister memoriae and the Persian Waka Nuvis (imperial historiographer). In the absence of any English term exactly representing the Hebrew, the "recorder" of Eng. A. V. may be retained.—Tr.].—Ver. 17. Zadok the son of Ahitub and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar were priests (= high-priests). Zadok here appears for the first time; he therefore did not become high-priest till after David's accession to the throne. Through his father, Ahitub, he was a descendant of Aaron's son Eleazar (1 Chr. v. 29 compared with 34 and 1 Chr. vi. 35-37); Ahimelech on the contrary descended through Abiathar from Ithamar, Aaron's younger son, 1 Chr. xxiv. 3, 6. The "Ahimelech" in 1 Chron. xviii. 16 is an error of copyist, since we have "Ahimelech" also in 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6. Elsewhere, however, the two high-priests in David's time are given as Zadok and Abiathar (xv. 24, 35; xvii. 15; xix. 12; xx. 25), and according to 1 Sam. xxii. 20, Abiathar was a son of Ahimelech. Movers, Thénius, Ewald, hence suppose an inversion of names here, so that we should read: Abiathar, son of Ahimelech. But in that case we should have to suppose a similar inversion, so far as regards the change of Ahimelech to Abiathar in 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6, 31, passages quite independent of ours, where Ahimelech, as son of Abiathar appears as high-priest of Ithamar's line alongside of Zadok, who is of Eleazar's line. Instead of this violent procedure Bertheau (on 1 Chron. xviii. 16), CEhler, Keil, and others, suggest that Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, had a son of the same name as his grandfather, and that he, for some reason unknown to us, acted as high-priest along with his father who was still living at the beginning of Solomon's reign (1 Kings ii. 27). That he might have had such a son of proper age is to be presumed from 1 Sam. xiv. 3. According to xv. 27; xvii. 17, 20, Abiathar had a younger son Jonathan, who afterwards joined Adonijah against Solomon [1 Kings i. 42], while Ahimelech is mentioned neither there nor here, perhaps because he was no longer alive. But this suggestion is open to grave doubts, not merely because an Ahimelech son of Abiathar appears nowhere but here and in the passages cited from Chron., but especially because elsewhere Zadok and Abiathar appear as the acting priests [=high-priests] under David. There remains the supposition of a historical error (instead of an error of copyist) in the authority used here and in 1 Chr. xxiv. 3, 6, 31, the author of the original account having reversed the order of the names. [This supposition of Erdmann's seems the most improbable of all here cited; error in such a point can hardly be supposed in the author of "Samuel," with 1 Sam. xxii. and the rest of the history before him. An error in copying easily perpetuates itself, though we cannot always explain how it arose, and how it comes to reappear in certain places and not in others.—Still less probable is the opinion of Geiger (Urchrift, p. 21) and Wellhausen that there are here traces of a systematic attempt to exalt the line of Eleazar (Zadokites) at the expense of the house of Ithamar; that an "Ahitub" should occur several times is not strange or suspicious, and the whole tone of the history is quiet and natural, showing no signs of distortion and tendentious manipulation. There seems to be no sound objection to supposing an inversion of these names here by a scribe's error. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—Zadok acted as high-priest in Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 39; comp. 1 Kings iii. 4) at the Sanctuary, the other in Jerusalem.—4) Seraiah was scribe (Sopher), State Secretary, not a military muster-officer, for this is designated by another word (פָּקֵד), see xxiv. 2, 4, 9. Comp. CEhler (Hers. VIII. 15) and

Keil. [So in 2 Kings xxv. 19 a certain military officer is termed "the scribe (sopher), the captain of the army, who levied the people," or, perhaps (as in margin of Eng. A. V.) "the scribe of the captain of the army." It is possible that the Sopher combined civil and military duties; it has also been supposed (though there is no proof of it) that there were two officers called Sopher, one civil and military (as here), the other ecclesiastical.—Tr.]—The name of this man in 1 Chron. xviii. 16 is Shareha, in 2 Sam. xx. 25 Sheya [Eng. A. V. has the marginal (Qeri) Sheva] and in 1 Kings iv. 3 (where the same person is meant) Shisha. According to this, *Sheya seems to be a shortened form of Shisha = Shavsha, and the latter, along with Seraiah, a second name of the same person. Possibly, however, the difference came from scribal error or indistinctness of letters, whichever was the original form.—Ver. 18. 5) Benaiah the son of Jehoiada (a mighty warrior of Kabzeel, xxiii. 20-23) was over the Cherethites and the Pelethites (we are to read "over" instead of the unintelligible masoretic "and," as in the parallel passage in Chron.). These two names designate the royal body-guard attached to the king's court and person (Jos. Ant. 7, 5, 4 σωματοφύλακες). The name Cherethite is to be derived from a verb (כָּרַת) meaning "to cut down, destroy," it having been the duty of royal guards in the East to execute the death-sentence; so did Benaiah in 1 Kings ii. 25. Pelethites, from a verb (פָּלַת), "to hasten, flee," means "runners," the men of the body-guard having had to carry the royal orders swiftly to distant places. Comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 6. In the parallel passage 2 Sam. xx. 23 instead of Kerethi [Cherethi] stands Kari (from כָּרַת, "to dig"), and in 2 Kings xi. 4, 19, for the whole phrase stands: "the Kari and the runners," that is, Pelethites = runners. So Gesen. (Thes. s. v.), Then. (here and on 1 Kings i. 38; 2 Kings xi. 12) and Keil (here and on Chron.). The words are adjectives (formed by ' with substantival meaning, designating officers, properly "executioners and runners" (as the שָׁלִיחַ in xxiii. 8 [Eng. A. V. "captains"])). Comp. Ew., § 177, 164.—Opposed to this explanation is another, first advanced by Lakenmacher (observ. philolog. II. 11 seq.), and then defended by Ew., Berth., Mov., Hitzig, Starke, Rütchi and others, namely, that the Kerethi = Cretes or Carians (כֵּרִי), and the Pelethi = Philistines, since the latter are called Kerethi in 1 Sam. xxx. 14; Zeph. ii. 5; Ezek. xxv. 16. But in the first passage the name designates not the Philistines in general, but a branch of the Philistine people settled in the southwest of Philistia, and in the two prophetic passages the name "Philistines" stands along with this name (Kerethi), which characterizes them as murderers, exterminators. Further, the view that Pelethi is corrupted from Philistines (פְּלִשְׁתִּים from פְּלִשְׁתִּים) is to be rejected as "wholly without foundation" (so Keil after

* שֵׁיָא shortened from שֵׁשָׁא — שֵׁשָׁא, the latter, along with שָׁרְיָא, a second name of the same person.

Gesen.: "who can endure such a contraction in a Shemitic language?"). If Kerethi and Pelethi both mean Philistines, the application of two synonymous words to the royal body-guard is as strange as if one should combine "Englishmen and Britons, Italians and Welshmen" (Gesen.). Against this view, moreover, is the later designation "Kari and runners," whence Pelethi = runners. Besides, the conjecture that the Philistines immigrated from Crete rests on the indefinite statements of Tacitus (Hist. 5, 1, 2): "they say that the Jews fled from the island of Crete, and settled in the extreme parts of Libya," and of Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Παῖς) that this city [Gaza] was once called Minoa after Minos king of Crete, to which are opposed Deut. ii. 23; Am. ix. 7, which state that the Philistines came from Caphtor. See Keil, Comm. 266 A. 1 [Eng. transl., p. 368 Note]. Further, as Thenius remarks, "it is altogether improbable that the patriotic David, so faithful to the service of the one true God, should have surrounded himself with a foreign and heathen body guard," to which Keil (ubi supra) admirably adds against Hitzig: "Least of all would David have chosen his body-guard out of the Philistines, the hereditary enemies of Israel."—[The ancient versions throw little light on these words. Sept. and Vulg. transfer them; Syriac has "nobles and rustics (Lond. Polyg. soldiers)," Chald. "archers and slingers."—There are strong reasons for holding them to be not appellatives (as Ges. and Erdm.) but gentle nouns: 1) the grammatical form of the words (Krethi, Plethi) points to this; the termination i is used in Heb. to form patronymics and gentiles, and besides to form nouns only from other nouns (sub. or adj.) or adverbs, that is, in general it forms denominative nouns; it cannot, then, be here well referred to verbal roots, as Gesenius and others wish, but must form a denominative, which here cannot well be anything but a gentile noun; the shelishi of 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, cited by Erdmann, being a denominative, does not favor his view; 2) in 1 Sam. xxx. 14 one of these words, Krethi, actually denotes a Philistine tribe, or a tribe dwelling near Philistia; this establishes the fact that it was the name of a tribe, while of any other use there is no established trace in the Bible; for so also it is used in Ezek. xxv. 16 and Zeph. ii. 5, where there is no reason to hold that anything else than the gentile sense is meant, Ezekiel simply making a play on the name, as is very common in the prophetic writings; 3) add to this that if these words were appellatives signifying "executioners and runners," it is not easy to see why the common Heb. words for these offices were not employed, and why our words appear only in David's time (Rüetschi).—These reasons seem almost decisive for regarding these as proper names (without saying anything of their origin and signification).—The objections urged against this view by Keil and Erdmann seem insufficient to set it aside: a) the objection from synonymous names rests on the assumption that both words must be taken as = Philistines; but, as Erdmann himself remarks, the Krethi are only a tribe living in or near the Philistine territory, and the Plethi may be another different tribe or family possibly not Philistines at all; b) it is thought that the later phrase "the kari and the runners" (2 Kings xi. 4, 19) establishes the fact that plethi = "runners," and that one of our words being an appellative, the other also must be appellative; but that the common Heb. word for "runners or footmen" should be used in Athaliah's time (as in Saul's, 1 Sam. xxii. 17, and of Absalom and Adonijah) cannot prove that David did not have a special body of guards with a special gentile name, even supposing the phrase in 1 Kings xi. to be parallel with ours, which is by no means certain; if the Plethi were runners, it does not follow that the word itself means "runners," nor is it clear whether the Kari (Eng. A. V. incorrectly "captains") are the same with the Krethi (in 2 Sam. xx. 23 the text has Kari, the margin Krethi), rather the word is another proper name (Carians or some other); c) David's patriotism and piety would be no bar to his taking a body-guard from neighboring tribes, among whom he had probably passed a part of his time of exile, and had many friends (compare Uriah, Ittai, and other foreigners), nor were such men necessarily heathen because they were foreigners, many foreigners having attached themselves to the religion of Israel.—As to the origin of the names Krethi and Plethi there is much uncertainty. The first is identified with Cretas by those that think Caphtor (Gen. x. 14, Deut. ii. 23) to be Crete, but against this Ebers has brought strong reasons (Ægypt. I. 130 sq.); however, independently of any reference to Caphtor, a tribe may have come from Crete and settled on the Mediterranean shore. The connection of Kari with Carian, while not improbable in itself, is yet unproved. The identification of the second name Plethi with Pliathi or Philistine (by the falling out of the s letter) is hard and improbable; Bp. Patrick thinks it likely that the name designated an Israelitish family, and refers to the Reubenite Peleth, Num. xvi. 1, and the Judahite of the same name, 1 Chr. ii. 33; Abarbanel (cited and approved by Philippson) regards both words as names of Israelitish families. At present we must be content to remain in ignorance of the origin of the names.—Ta.* 6) And David's sons were confidential counsellors. As Movers (Bibl. Chron. 302 sq.) has shown, the word cohen [usually = priest] does not here mean "domestic chaplains, palace-priests, unlevitical spiritual advisers" (Gesen., De Wette, Winer, Maurer, and others), but "confidential counsellor," according to 1 Kings iv. 5, where the same term applied to Sabud, son of Nathan [Eng. A. V. "principal officer"] is explained by the phrase "the king's friend." [This phrase is not necessarily an explanation of the term cohen, but may be simply another descriptive epithet.—Ta.]. The periphrastic expression in 1 Chr. xviii. 17 "the first [chief] at the hand. (side) of the king" points to the same signification. According to Kimchi the verb (כָּרַח) means "to serve in an office of dignity," according to Grotius, "to do

* [The word welsh means "foreign," and the Germans applied the name to Italians, as the Saxons did to the Cymry.—Ta.]

* [Böttcher omits these two words, and (after the Sept.), renders "Benaiah was counsellor," introducing כָּרַח instead of "Krethi and Pelethi," but this view has little in its favor.—Ta.]

service, whence the participle in reference to God means a priest, in reference to the king a minister." [This seems to be the most probable statement from the examples in the Old Test., the rendering of Sept., Syr. and Chald. here, and the opinion of the Talmud (Bab. Nedarim 62 a) and the rabbinical writers. The fullest discussions are by J. D. Michaelis, Supplem. in Lex. Heb., and Gesenius, Thes. s. v. Our data are hardly sufficient to enable us to speak with certainty of the original meaning of the word.—Tr.]

The list of officers (vers. 16-18) is here appended to the statistical-historical account of David's wars in order to conclude the history of David's royal rule at its culmination with a glance at the internal administration of the kingdom. It can no more be conclusively decided from this that the Editor here incorporates into his account a [different] history of David (Thenius) than in the similar passage, 1 Sam. xiv. It is a list of the high officers of state that stood by him in the internal administration of the kingdom at the moment when he had secured it against "the enemies roundabout," and extended it by victories over them, and could now undisturbed give attention to its internal strengthening and organization. The list in xx. 23-26, on the contrary, gives the list of officers as it stood in his last days after the internal shocks that his government had sustained.

b. Ch. ix. David's magnanimous conduct towards Mephibosheth. As Mephibosheth was five years old at Saul's death (iv. 4), and now had a young son (v. 12), what is here related cannot be put immediately after David's removal to Jerusalem or Ishbosheth's murder (ch. iv.) (as Then. would do on account of David's words, "is there left any of Saul's house?" which might indeed have been spoken with reference to that murder), but belongs to a later period, when David had secured his kingdom within and raised it to its zenith by external wars. These words indicate that David after long wars was had now found a time of quiet to attend to internal affairs, among the most important of which must have been the fulfilment of his covenant of friendship with Jonathan. The narrative shows how he fulfilled Jonathan's request (1 Sam. xx. 15), and his own answering promise with royal grace and magnanimity.

Ver. 1. David's question: Is it so that there is yet any one left to* Saul's house? presupposes that he had made inquiry and gotten information thereof, and now wished to assure himself of what he had heard. He had perhaps some time before accidentally heard of the concealed abode of the unfortunate last scion of Saul's house in a remote place (ver. 5). The words: That I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake refer to Jonathan's words, 1 Sam. xx. 14, 15 ("show me the mercy of the Lord," etc.).†—Ver. 2. A former servant of Saul, Ziba, gives exacter information of the person and the place. [Kitto in Daily Bib. Ill. thinks it improbable that David knew any thing of the existence of a son of Jonathan, or that he would recognize him under his altered name (Mephibosheth instead of Meribbaal); Ziba was probably known to some of David's officers and hunted up by them.—Tr.] In David's question to him (ver. 3): Is there no one, etc., that I may show him the mercy of God? the term mercy or kindness (ver. 1) is more exactly defined as a kindness such as God Himself shows; and this agrees again with Jonathan's mention (1 Sam. xx. 14) of the "kindness of God," which he begs David to show to him and his house. [Others understand it of kindness in God, out of reverence for God, for God's sake (Keil), or take the expression as merely a superlative one=very great kindness (Patrick), others combine these three views, and this is better; kindness shown from an indwelling in God will be pure and great kindness such as God shows.—Tr.] According to Ziba's information [vers. 3, 4] Jonathan's lame son is in Lodebar in the house of Machir the son of Ammiel.—Lodebar (לֹדְבָר, in xvii. 27 לֹא דְבָר) was therefore across the Jordan near Mahanaim and Rabbath-Ammon, perhaps Liddir,* Josh. xiii. 26. According to this account Machir was a respected and propertied man, who had taken charge of Mephibosheth after Jonathan's death. [See chap. xvii. 27-29.—Tr.]

Vers. 6-8. Meeting of David and Mephibosheth.—Mephibosheth does reverence to David as his king with such tokens of fear that David is obliged to encourage him: Fear not.—It was oriental custom that rulers, and especially those of a new dynasty, should slay all the relations of a predecessor. David relieves him of this fear by declaring: 1) that he would show him kindness for his father Jonathan's sake; 2) would restore to him all Saul's land—that is, his private estate at Gibeah (comp. 1 Sam. ix.), which had passed into the possession either of David or of remote kinsmen of Saul (Mephibosheth had therefore hitherto been a poor man, dependent on others), and 3) would take him during his life into his house and to his table. Thou shalt eat bread at my table continually.—Mephibosheth, overwhelmed by this exhibition of royal grace, testifies his gratitude by gestures ("bowed himself") and by words wherein he confesses himself unworthy of such great goodness. The comparison of the dead dog indicates what is lowest and most despicable, comp. 1 Sam. xxiv. 15. [Grove (Art. "Mephibosheth" in Smith's Bible Dictionary): These early misfortunes [loss of parents, lameness, poverty] threw a shade over his whole life, and his personal deformity seems to have exercised a depressing and depreciatory influence on his character.—Tr.]

Vers. 9-13. Mephibosheth put in possession of Saul's estate and admitted to David's house and table.—David's transaction with Ziba suggests that the latter resided at Gibeah, on the land of Saul's family, and stood in some relation to the family, perhaps that of steward. David 1) informs him that he has restored to Mephibosheth all the property of Saul and of his house. I have given them to thy master's son—son here=grandson, as above (ver. 7) father=grandfather; 2) commissions him (ver. 10) to cultivate the land for him, entrusts him with the management and control of the property. The "bring" is to be understood of "storing into the barns or also of delivery at Jerusalem" (Thenius), the latter according to Josephus and Ewald, §303 c. That the son of thy master may have bread and eat it refers not to Mephibosheth's son (Micha ver. 12), as has been supposed in order to avoid the apparent contradiction of David's statement that Mephibosheth is to eat at his table; there is really no contradiction, since this last statement merely means that Mephibosheth himself is to have the honor of daily eating at David's table, while these words relate to the general support of the house and family of the so highly honored son of David's friend. [On the text see "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.] The statement: Ziba had 15 sons and 20 servants serves to explain the commission: Cultivate the land thou and thy sons and thy servants and to show that Ziba was in condition with his family and servants to manage so large an estate. "Something considerable could therefore be made for Mephibosheth" (Thenius). Ver. 11 in its two parts—Ziba's declaration that he would perform David's command, and the statement of Mephibosheth eating at David's table—corresponds to the two parts of ver. 10. The words: And Mephibosheth eats at my table as one of the king's sons cannot be taken as David's (Clericus, De Wette [Eng. A. V.]), since David would then have said the same thing three times, and there would in general be no reason for such a reply to Ziba's words. They are rather to be regarded as spoken by Ziba—not, however, as a rejoinder in the sense: "If he will live with me, he will be treated as a king's son" (Grotius), but as a repetition of David's word, attached to the "as my lord has commanded" (ver. 10) with the expression of joyful astonishment and the consequent addition: "as one of the king's sons!" Ziba, in affirming that all that the king has ordered shall be done, repeats in reference to Mephibosheth his verba ipsissima. This explanation may be preferred to the assumption of a wrong reading here, namely, "my table," for "David's table," Sept. (Thenius, Keil), or "thy tables" (= thy table, Bötcher), partly because the text is not to be altered without pressing necessity, partly because in that case the statement that Mephibosheth ate at David's table would be repeated immediately afterwards (in ver. 13). [For another view of the text see "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.]

* The Dat. is not periphrasis of the Gen. (Keil), nor to be changed into "from (מִן), the house" (Then.), but indicates "appartenance to."

† [On this speech of Jonathan see the corrected Eng. translation and translator's notes.—Tr.]

Ver. 12. [Mephibosheth was about 13 years old when David fixed his abode in Jerusalem; how old he was now would depend on the chronological position of chap. ix., which cannot be fixed with certainty. The Heb. word (נָעִם) here rendered "young" is indefinite as to age; for Micha's descendants see 1 Chron. viii. 34 sq.; ix. 40 sq.—Tr.] "The house of Ziba were servants; Vulg. "served." Thenius, in view of ver. 10, would read the Particp. serving (עֹבְדִים). In any case, the constant servitude of Ziba's whole household to Mephibosheth is indicated, while the latter as lord of the land dwelt at Jerusalem as companion of David's family in the house and at the table.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The picture of David's royal power and glory in contrast with the poor, crippled son of Jonathan, the last scion of Saul's fallen house, comes out in greater splendor, the deeper the latter humbles himself before him and trusts himself to his favor. In his noble conduct to Mephibosheth David demonstrates the friendship that he had sworn to Jonathan.

2. The truly pious and God-fearing man not only shows "kindness of God" in so far as God's kindness impels him to show such merciful love as God does, whereby he proves himself in truth a child of God, but it is the merciful love of God Himself that dwells in his heart and works therefrom; for he that lives in fellowship with God receives into his heart through the Holy Ghost the love that is in God, and lives and moves in this love.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Chap. viii. 15–18. TAYLOR: In the minds of most readers of the Bible the name of David, king of Israel, is associated mainly with military prowess, poetic genius, and personal piety; and only on the rarest occasions do we hear any reference made to his administrative ability. Yet in this last quality he was at least as remarkable as in any one of the others; and great injustice is done to him if we leave out of view the eminent services which he rendered to his country by the exercise of his governmental and organizing faculties. . . . More than Charlemagne did for Europe, or Alfred for England, David accomplished for the tribes of Israel.—Tr.]

Chap. ix. How true, compassionate love of one's neighbor should be exhibited, is shown by David's conduct towards Mephibosheth. 1) This love does not suffer the neighbor's need to come to it, but searches out and goes after the need; 2) It does not suffer itself to be determined by selfish aims, but does its duty in faithfulness and impelled by God's mercy for God's sake; 3) It brings to the neighbor's heart, when filled with trembling anxiety and fear, consolation and peace by the words, "Fear not;" 4) It lifts up the neighbor from his wretchedness and want, by restoring to him what he had lost without fault, and by making him share in the enjoyment of its own blessings, assigned it by God.

How a man after God's heart, amid experiences of divine goodness and faithfulness, should show the mercy of God towards his fellow-man: 1) By faithfully discharging the duties of friendship; 2) In case there has been enmity, by requiring evil with good; 3) By rendering to one on whom God's counsel has inflicted misfortune, the words and deeds of humble and helpful love.

The exercise of merciful love is an evidence that one has himself experienced the divine mercy; for this mercy is, 1) Its source, 2) Its motive, 3) Its example.—"The mercy of God is that which is shown in God and for God's sake, Luke vi. 30." (BERL. BIBLE.)

It is good sometimes to bethink ourselves whether there be any promises or engagements that we have neglected to make good; better do it late than never. BIBLE: Believers should earnestly take care to show all possible loving service to the children of those whom they have loved in the Lord, since we can then do nothing better than to remind such children of their parents' grace, that they may follow them in faith and piety.—SCHLIER: Still is it a good thing for children if they have God-fearing parents, and still for long years may children enjoy the good their parents have done. The piety of parents is worth more than much money and goods.—[COWPER:

My boast is not that I deduce my birth
From Iohns enthroned, and rulers of the earth;

IV. The Ammonite-Syrian War.

CHAPTER X. 1-19.

- 1 AND it came to pass after this that the king¹ of the children of Ammon died,
- 2 and Hanun his son reigned in his stead. Then said David [And David said], I will show kindness unto Hanun the son of Nahash, as his father showed kindness unto me. And David sent to comfort him by the hand of his servants for his father. And David's servants came into the land of the children of Ammon.
- 3 And the princes of the children of Ammon said unto Hanun their lord, Thinkest² thou that David doth honour thy father that he hath sent comforters unto thee? hath not David rather [om. rather] sent his servants unto thee to search the city³
- 4 and to spy it out and to overthrow it? Wherefore [And] Hanun took David's servants, and shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in

- 6 And when [om. when] the children of Ammon saw that they stank [that they had made themselves loathsome⁵] before David [ins. and], the children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob and the Syrians of Zobah, twenty thou-

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. The reason for the omission of the king's name here (in the Heb. and all the VSS.) is not obvious; yet there is no good ground for supplying it. The Arab. vers. omits the name of the son also in this verse.

² [Ver. 3. Lit. "is David an honorer of thy father in thy eyes, that?" etc.

³ Ver. 3. Some MSS. and edd. of the Heb., and the Arab. have "land" instead of "city," which, as being the easier rendering, is here less probable.

 8 And the children of Ammon came out and put the battle in array at the entering in [the doorway] of the gate; and the Syrians of Zoba and of Rehob and Ish-tob
 9 [the men of Tob] and Maacah were by themselves in the field. When [And] Joab saw that the front of the battle was against him before and behind [ins. and], he chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put *them*⁶ in array against the Syrians;
 10 And the rest of the people he delivered into the hand of Abishai his brother that 11 he might put [and put] them in array against the children of Ammon. And he said, If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me, but [and] if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will come and [to] help thee.
 12 Be of good courage, and let us play the men [Be strong, and let us show ourselves strong] for our people and for the cities of our God; and the Lord [Jehovah will]
 13 do⁷ that which seemeth him good. And Joab drew nigh, and the people that were 14 with him, unto the battle against the Syrians, and they fled before him. And when [om. when] the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, then fled they also [and they fled] before Abishai, and entered into the city. So [And] Joab returned from the children of Ammon and came to Jerusalem.
 15 And when [om. when] the Syrians saw that they were smitten before Israel [ins. and], they gathered themselves together. And Hadarezer⁸ sent and brought out the Syrians that were beyond the river; and they came to Helam,⁹ and Shobach
 17 the captain of the host of Hadarezer went before them [was at their head]. And when [om. when] it was told David [ins. and], he gathered all Israel together and passed over [ins. the] Jordan and came to Helam. And the Syrians set them-
 18 selves in array against David and fought with him. And the Syrians fled before Israel, and David slew the men of seven hundred chariots of the Syrians and forty thousand horsemen [of the S. seven hundred chariot-men and four thousand horsemen], and smote Shobach the captain of their host who [so that he] died there.
 19 And when [om. when] all the kings that were servants to Hadarezer saw that they were smitten before Israel [ins. and], they made peace¹¹ with Israel and served them. So [And] the Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon any more.

¹¹ [Ver. 19. Sept. renders "fled to" (προσέφυγον), a free translation; so probably Vulg. As to the addition in the Vulg. (see Exposition) Böttcher would put it at the beginning of ver. 16. It is perhaps better to regard it as a marginal remark made on some copy of the Vulg., though it is not easy to account for the number given, fifty-eight thousand. Its absence from the other versions justifies us in excluding it from the text.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Compare the parallel narrative in 1 Chron. xix. —Vers. 1-5. The cause of the war with the Ammonites. This war, having been only mentioned in viii. 12, is here, together with the Syrian wars occasioned by it (given fully in ch. viii.), described in its whole course, because of its close connection with the history of Uriah and his wife, which became for David the fatal point at which his kingdom turned from glory to downfall.—Ver. 1. And it came to pass after this. On this loose, general formula of connection see viii. 1. The king of the children of Ammon died.—His name (which is inserted in Chron.* by way of explanation) is not mentioned till ver. 2; this Nahash is the same as he of 1 Sam. xi. 1. [As this was probably about forty years after the events narrated in 1 Sam. xi., it is possible, certainly, that the two kings Nahash may be the same; but it is neither certain nor very probable, considering the usual length of royal reigns.—Tr.]—Ver. 2. What kindness Nahash had shown David is unknown. Perhaps he had sent congratulations on his accession to the throne. At all events his relations with David were friendly, while with Saul his relations were hostile.* For his defeat at Jabesh see 1 Sam. xi.—[Some refer to 2 Sam. xvii. 25 as possibly indicating a family-alliance between David and Nahash.—Tr.] David accordingly sent an embassy of condolence to Haman the son of Nahash.—Ver. 3. After the death of Nahash,

* [The German here has incorrectly "the Septuagint," instead of "Chronicles."—Tr.]

who was in friendly connection with David, the Ammonite princes, jealous no doubt of the mighty growth of the kingdom of Israel, introduce a new era by counselling his successor to adopt a hostile policy that would be a challenge to war.—Is David in thine eyes an honor of thy father (which question involves a negation)? The question itself contains a slight reproach against the king, that he allowed himself to be deceived by David's conduct. They express to him the suspicion that David sent this ostensibly consulatory embassy merely for the purpose of spying out and then destroying the "city," that is, Rabbah (1 Sam. xi. 1), the capital-city of the country. Rabbah was a strongly fortified place (comp. ver. 14), the internal examination of which was certainly important for an enemy purposing to besiege it.—Ver. 4. The king, treating the ambassadors as spies, subjected them to the indignity of shaving off the half (that is, one side) of their beards. This is the grossest insult that can be offered an Oriental; for the beard is the sign of the free man's dignity and his finest adornment. Isa. vii. 20; 1. 6.* See Lakemacher, Observe. X. 145 sq., Arvieux, Nachricht. III. 173, Niebuhr, Beschreib. v. Arab., 317, and farther in Winer, s. v. Bart.—[Keil, Philippon and others quote modern instances. Many Orientals would rather die than lose their beards, and the Turks used to regard beardless Europeans as runaway slaves. A war like this occurred in Persia in 1764.—Tr.] Hanun besides cut off the long outer garments of the ambassadors to the buttocks.† The Israelites, except the priests, wore no breeches. So much the grosser, therefore, was the insult.—Ver. 5. After hearing of the double insult offered his ambassadors, David directs them not to return, but to stay at Jericho and wait for their beards to grow.

Vers. 6-14. Israel's successful war against the Syrians, whom the Ammonites had hired (vers. 6-13), and against the Ammonites, who after the flight of their allies, likewise took to flight (ver. 14).—Ver. 6. The Ammonites desired war with Israel. They knew that by their treatment of the ambassadors of David they had made themselves stinking, that is, hateful to him (1 Sam. xiii. 4), and hired as allies: 1) the Syrians of Beth-Rehob; comp. ver. 8,‡ where we have simply the name Rehob. This Rehob is the name of the Syrian district, whose capital-city was Beth-Rehob. This is hardly to be sought where Robinson (Neue bibl. Forsch., p. 488 [Am. ed. III. 371, 372]) conjecturally locates it, namely, in the ruins of the fortress Hunin, southwest of the Tell el Kadi (the old Laish-Dan), the northern boundary of Palestine, since in that case the capital-city of this Aramean region would have lain within the land of Israel (Keil); it is better located [twenty-five Eng. miles] north-east of Damascus, on the site of the present Ruhaibeh (Kremer, Dam., p. 192, Ritter XVII. 1472, Stähelin, 56), unless, following the reading in Chron. (Naharaim for Beth-Rehob), we prefer the Rehoboth of the river, that is, of the Euphrates (Gen. xxxvi. 37), where there is now (near the junction of the Chaboras and the Euphrates) a place called Er-rahabe or Rahabeh (Rosenm., Alterth. II. 2, 270 sq.; Ritter XV. 128), where this city may have been situated. Keil's argument against this view, namely, that the sway of the king of Zobah (ver. 16) extended beyond the Euphrates into Mesopotamia, and hence this "Rehoboth on the river" cannot well have been the capital-city of a particular Aramean kingdom, is not of force, partly because this sway is by no means certainly proved, partly because it is not made out that it embraced the whole territory between the two rivers. [See Arts. Rehob and Rehoboth in Smith's Bib. Dict.—Tr.]—2) The Syrians of Zobah, see viii. 3. 3) The king of Maachah (in Chron. Aram-Maachah), bordering on Geshur, according to Josh. xii. 5 on the northern border of Bashan, on the south-western declivity of Hermon (comp. Onom. Μαχαθ), on the border of the Israelitish trans-jordanic territory (Deut. iii. 14), especially of Reuben and Gad (Josh. xiii. 11). 4) Not Istob (as in the VSS., Joseph., Ew., § 273 b), but the men of Tob, since there was a region of this name near the Ammonite territory, to which Jephthah fled (Judg. xi. 5). Its location cannot be fixed with certainty. Ewald: the Thauba (Θαύβα) of Ptol. 5, 19, which, however, must be sought for in desert Arabia. Knobel: the present Tubneh, about twenty-four Eng. miles south of Damascus, comp. Tubion (Τοῦβιον,* Τούβιν), 1 Macc. v. 13; 2 Macc. xii. 17. Stähelin: the present village Taibeh, mentioned by Ritter XV. 891, 922, and placed north of Tibneh in Wetzstein's map of Hauran. Chron. gives exacter information: Hanun sent one thousand talents of silver to hire from Aram-Naharaim, Aram-Maachah and Zobah chariots and horsemen. For this large sum (over two million dollars) the Ammonites, according to Chron., hired him thirty-two thousand chariots and horsemen (22, comp. viii. 4) and the king of Maachah with his people. Chron. states that the hired auxiliaries encamped at Medeba (comp. Josh. xiii. 9, 16, with Num. xxi. 30), the present Medaba, four Eng. miles south-east of Heshbon, between the Arnon and the Jabbok opposite Jericho, in the territory of Reuben; it afterwards came into the possession of Moab, Isa. xv. 2.—[It is mentioned in the inscription of the Moabite king Mesha as having been captured by Omri, and recaptured by Mesha.—Tr.] The ruins, situated on a hill, are a mile in circuit. See Raumer, 264. As it was in a plain (Josh. xiii. 16), not more than eight miles southwest of Rabbah, the strong Ammonitish capital-city, it was a suitable rendezvous for the hired auxiliaries and a good position for the defence of Rabbah against a siege. The auxiliaries of Tob are not mentioned in Chron. The two accounts [Sam. and Chron.] agree in the number of the auxiliaries.

† For רַחֲוֹ = rahu Chron. has the euphemistic רַחֲוֹתָא = step, that is, the part of the body where stepping is made possible, since the legs there begin.

‡ [The Germ. has ch. viii., where the name Rehob is used of a king (vers. 3, 13), but not of a district.—Tr.]

* [In 1 Macc. v. 13 Tischendorf writes Τούβιον, Toblion.—Tr.]

† [The word in Chron. means "chariots" only, and does not include horsemen.—Tr.]

According to Chron. the Ammonites hired thirty-two thousand men [Chron. says "chariots."—Tr.] and the troops of Maachah; Sam. gives one thousand from Maachah, two thousand from Zobah, and twelve thousand from Tob. But as to the composition of the auxiliary troops, the two accounts differ; according to the Chronicler there were "chariots and horsemen," according to our passage "footmen," while yet according to viii. 4 and 1 Chron. xviii. 4 the king of Zobah fought against David with "chariots and horsemen." Keil: "Here, then, there are copyists' errors in both texts. For the Syrian troops consisted neither of infantry alone, nor of chariots and horsemen alone, but of infantry, cavalry and war-chariots, as is evident not only from viii. 4; 1 Chron. xviii. 4, but also from the close of our narrative.—The Syrians fought in both battles with all three arms, so that David twice defeated chariots, cavalry and infantry."

Ver. 7. Against these hostile troops David sends his general Joab and the "whole host, the mighty men." Not "the whole host of the warriors" (De Wette), but "Gibborim" [mighty men] is in apposition with "the whole host." The mention of the whole army excludes the supposition of a select body, "a foundation of the Israelitish army" (Bunsen), especially as the Gibborim are never distinguished from the whole army (Bertheau on 1 Chron. xix. 8). There is therefore no ground for supplying "and" before "the mighty men" (Thenius). [Eng. A. V. incorrectly inserts "of."—Tr.]

Ver. 8. And the Ammonites came out, that is, from their capital city, where they had gathered within the protecting fortifications. This appears from the following words: and put themselves in battle-array before the gate of the city, that is, Rabbah (so in Chron. "before the city"). The position of the Syrian auxiliaries "in the field," that is, on the broad plain of Medeba, is clearly distinguished from that of the Ammonites before the city (for defence or attack), so that the statement of the position of Joab's army (ver. 9) is clear. It is not said: "And when Joab saw that the battle was against him" (De Wette), but: "that the face (front) of the battle was against him, in front and in rear." He could be attacked on both sides, by the Ammonites in rear, by the Syrians in front. He therefore so makes his dispositions as to select some from all the chosen* men in Israel. This chosen body Joab sets against the Syrians, their position in the open field making their attack sharper (perhaps, also, they were the more numerous), while the Ammonites stood in reserve to cover their stronghold Rabbah.—The rest of the army (ver. 10) he placed under the command of his brother Abishai against the Ammonites, in order that he might be covered in rear in his attack on the Syrians, and might have support, if he needed it.—To this refers his agreement with Abishai in ver. 11. Either was to come to the help of the other, if there was danger of being overpowered by the enemy. It hence appears that the Israelites were not to make an assault on both sides at the same time, but Joab intended first to attack and defeat the Syrians, while Abishai was to cover his rear. A simultaneous attack might, however, be made by the two armies between which Joab and Abishai stood. The point here, therefore, was quickly and stoutly to carry through a bold stroke.—This is the reference in Joab's words to Abishai in ver. 12, of which Thenius finely remarks: "This is a warlike exhortation, the briefest indeed, but the fullest of meaning." Be stout, strong—this applies to Abishai personally and indicates stout temper of mind—and let us show ourselves stout—this refers to warlike action; for our people and the cities of our God—with these words he points out the prize for which they were contending. The weal and freedom of the whole Israelitish people was at stake. "The cities of our God," these words mean either the cities of Israel in general, which as representatives of the whole land are called the cities of God, because they are with the whole land God's property and possession (Keil), or those cities in which the worship of the living God was established for the whole people, whose conquest by the enemy would have resulted in the overthrow of the worship of Jehovah and the establishment of the heathen worship of idols. [Others suppose, not so well, that the reference here is to Medeba and other cities now threatened by the enemy, though still in the hands of the Israelites.—Tr.] The Lord will do what is good in his eyes; these words express trust in God combined with unconditional submission. Alongside of the faithfulness (to be shown by bravery and firmness), that was to do its duty in this situation so dangerous for the people and for Jehovah, is put the hidden will of God in respect to what will happen, and unconditional submission to His counsel and deed. The sense is well expressed by Clericus: "If it should seem good to God to give our enemies the victory, we must acquiesce in His will; meantime let us go bravely into battle."—Ver. 13. Quickly and vigorously the attack is made on the Syrians—they flee. Grotius: "as often happens with those that fight for pay alone without respect to the cause." [So Bp. Patrick.—Tr.]. "Inasmuch as for them, casually assembled, there would be neither glory in victory nor shame in flight," Tacit. Hist. II. 12. [Perhaps Joab first attacked the Syrians not solely because they were mercenaries and in the open field, but also because they were better disciplined and therefore more to be feared than the Ammonites.—Tr.].—Ver. 14. This rout of the allied force occasioned the flight of the Ammonites also, who threw themselves into their capital city. After this brilliant exploit Joab brought the campaign to an end and returned to Jerusalem, probably because (see xi. 1) the advanced season was unfavorable for carrying through the siege of Rabbah [or also, because the Syrians were not sufficiently broken, or because he had not the materials for a siege (Bib. Com.)—Tr.].

Vers. 15–19. Second battle with the Syrians and their complete defeat under Hadarezer.—Ver. 15. The ground of the Syrians for again collecting their forces was shame at having been defeated by the Israelites, and care for their safety against a presumable campaign of David. Among the Syrians king Hadarezer of Zobah (viii. 3) appears as the most powerful prince and David's most hostile opponent. Here and in Chron. he is always called Hadarezer, in chap. viii. Hadarezer. The Syrians (reassembled after their rout) are reinforced by the Syrian troops that Hadarezer (ver. 16) called to his help "from beyond the river," that is, from Mesopotamia. These Mesopotamians levied by him were, therefore, under his jurisdiction (comp. ver. 19). Shobach, Hadarezer's field-marshal, led these troops, but was also general-in-chief of the whole Syrian army (ver. 18). And came to Helam.—The Hebrew might also be translated: "and their army came" (Then., Böttcher). But the remark would be somewhat superfluous and excessively dragging in this militarily lively and curt account. As there is no such remark in Chron., and as in ver. 17 the phrase "he came to Helamah," designates the place where David met the Syrians, the word is to be taken (with the ancient VSS.) as the name of a place, our word here being merely a shorter form of that in ver. 17 (הֶלָם = הֶלָמָה). The place has not yet been identified. [Instead of the second Helam Chron. has "to them." If we adopt this text and render "their army" in ver. 16, the account will read: Hadarezer brought the Syrians, and their army came and Shobach before them . . . and David passed over Jordan and came to them, and the Syrians, etc. It is not easy to decide between the texts of Sam. and Chron.; the difficulty of identifying Helam may be an argument for both.—Tr.].—Ver. 17. Helam is designated as the place across the Jordan whither David brought his army and fought the Syrians. Chron. has "he came on them" (the Aramaeans)—either a scribal error, or an intentional omission of the name of the place because it was too little known. The name *Helam is thought by Ew., Bött. and Then. to point to the Alamata on the Euphrates (Ptol. 5, 15, 25). But the Syrians would hardly have fallen back before David as far as the Euphrates to receive his attack there with the river in their rear. As this is the same battle that (according to 1 Chron. xviii. 3) was fought at Hamath (comp. viii. 4), and the statement "came to Helam" here follows immediately after the remark that David crossed the Jordan, Helam must be located across the Jordan, not on the Euphrates, but farther west near Hamath. Here the whole Israelitish and Syrian armies stood opposed to one another in battle. [Why David took command in person is not stated; probably on account of the importance of the campaign, hardly from any dissatisfaction with Joab. Some account must be taken of David's military spirit.—Tr.].—Ver. 18. David's splendid victory. The Syrians partly took to flight, partly were cut to pieces by the Israelites. The completeness of the victory is farther especially brought out by mentioning first (ver. 18) the large number of the slain: seven hundred chariot-soldiers and forty thousand horsemen (Chron. gives seven thousand† chariot-men and forty thousand footmen). With this the statements in viii. 4 and 1 Chron. xviii. 4, 5 (one thousand seven hundred horsemen, or one thousand chariot-men and seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen of Aram-Zobah, and twenty-two thousand men of Aram-Damascus) agree "as well as can be expected in the well-known corruption of numbers, so that there is scarcely a doubt that the number of fallen Aramaeans is the same in both accounts (chaps. viii. and x.), and that our chapter relates circumstantially the same war, the result only of which is given in ch. viii. and 1 Chr. xviii." (Keil). It is then further stated that David so smote the general that he died; that is, he died on the field of wounds received in battle.—Ver. 19. The result of this defeat: 1) "all the vassal-princes" that had followed Hadarezer's summons to war against David, made peace with Israel when they saw that they were beaten. The addition (after the first "Israel") in the Vulg.: "they feared, and there fled fifty-eight thousand in the presence of Israel," does not warrant us in introducing it into the text (with Thenius), and finding therein the statement of the number of those that were "slain in flight;" for such a numerical statement does not suit the tenor of the narrative, which here intends only a general remark on the recognition of their complete defeat by the Syrians, so that we should least expect such a statement here about merely a part of the defeated army—apart from the fact that the word "smitten" (ver. 19) includes all the slain, not merely those that fell in flight; 2) the Syrian princes and peoples became tributary to Israel, and rendered the Ammonites no more aid against the Israelites.—Nothing is here said of the wars with Damascus and Edom, to which Joab turned in the south (ch. viii.), while David was gaining his victories in the north, because the narrative is here occupied with the fortunes of Rabbah only because of their connection with those of Uriah (Ewald).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. One injustice produces another, and drags men on irretardably to destruction by the resulting chain of sins and injustices. The king of Ammon with sinful levity lends his ear to the liars and calumniators that surround him; thence comes the most outrageous insolence towards David's ambassadors, and the most abusive insult to the whole people of Israel; on this follows the hasty preparation and provocation of a wholly unjust, wicked war; therein the princes are forced to take part, and so to stake their land and people. The end is complete destruction.

2. This great danger, prepared for David by his enemies, was made through the divine control to conduce to the magnifying of his name, and to his ascent to the highest point of royal glory. The bold insolence of the enemies of God's people and kingdom must serve not only to bring about more wonderfully the revelation of the Lord's power in subduing enemies and helping friends, but also to manifest more splendidly the glory and might of His kingdom in the battles into which it is forced by enemies.

3. Joab's word to Abishai is a prelude to the Lord's word to Peter: "Strengthen thy brethren."

* הֶלָמָה, "Heb. name of a Syrian city, dual-form from הֶלָם (two armies), with the ה- local" (Böttcher).

† This number is almost incredibly large, and the text of Sam. is to be preferred.—Tr.]

Heroic bravery in the war (it exhorts) is to be combined 1) with the recognition of those most sacred possessions and ends for which the struggle is to be made,—thereby it is consecrated,—and 2) with humble, trustful submission to the will of the Lord—thereby it is preserved from temerity and presumptuousness. The war is a just and holy one, undertaken for the defence of the possessions received from God, to guard the honor of God, and in the name of God.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 12. Bravery in battling for the highest objects: 1) It is rooted in fidelity to God and to our brethren the people of God; 2) It is proven by devotion of body and soul and the whole life to the aims of the kingdom of God; 3) It is sanctified by unconditional submission to the purposes and doings of the will of God.

"The Lord do that which seemeth him good." 1) A confession of humble submission to God's will, in presence of the greatest perils referring everything to Him; 2) A testimony borne by childlike and strong reliance on the Lord's help, which is confidently expected in the cause of His people and His kingdom; 3) The expression of a devout frame of mind, which is the basis of all genuine fidelity in fulfilling the duties of one's calling, and especially of all true bravery in fighting against the enemies of God's kingdom.

Ver. 6. CRAMER: That is the way with an evil conscience; it flees before it is hunted (Job xv. 20).—J. LANGE: When a man knows that he has deserved punishment, and yet is unwilling to acknowledge his guilt, he is sure to heap upon himself more and more guilt.—[HALL: It is one of the mad principles of wickedness, that it is a weakness to relent, and rather to die than yield. Even ill causes, once undertaken, must be upheld, although with blood; whereas the gracious heart, finding his own mistaking, doth not only remit of an ungrounded displeasure, but studies to be revenged of itself, and to give satisfaction to the offended.—Tr.]

Ver. 12. STARKE: A Christian must indeed show all diligence in his calling and station, but must look to God for whatever progress he wishes to make (1 Cor. iii. 6).—[HALL: The tongue of a commander fights more than his hand. A good leader must, out of his own abundance, put life and spirits into all others: if a lion lead sheep into the field, there is hope of victory. . . . All valor is cowardice to that which is built upon religion.—HENRY: "God and our country" was the word. . . . When we make conscience of doing our duty, we may with the greatest satisfaction leave the event with God; not thinking that our valor bids Him to prosper us, but that still He may do as He pleases, yet hoping for His salvation in His own way and time.—Tr.] Vers. 18 sq. OSIANDER: Those who rely on man and do not trust God, come to shame (Psa. xiv. 3).—[HENRY: Joab provided for the worst, and put the case that the Syrians or Ammonites might prove too strong for him (ver. 11); but he proved too strong for them both. We do not hinder our successes by preparing for disappointment.—Tr.]

Vers. 15–19. SCHLIER: He who does evil will also reap a harvest of evil; and he who helps in evil will certainly also get a poor reward from it. As the seed, so the harvest.—The Lord has everything in His hand, then He has the insolence of enemies in His hand and makes all work well. He can check and subdue even the greatest insolence, and convert it into a blessing for His people.

[Vers. 3, 4. They who are tempted to offer gross insults had always better look before they leap.—Ver. 5. "Tarry at Jericho," etc. 1) We must beware of casting pearls before swine (ver. 2). The Ammonites must have been known to David as a cruel and barbarous people). 2) Nothing is so offensive as a wanton insult, in return for respect and kindness. 3) The gravest men are sensitive to ridicule of their personal appearance. 4) All persons of noble nature are considerate of the feelings of others. 5) Time heals many ills.—Ver. 12. Joab was a selfish, unscrupulous, unprincipled man; yet in entering upon a perilous battle he talks piously. So do almost all generals and civil rulers in any great emergency; not only because they know that the people feel their dependence on God, but because in the hour of trial they feel it themselves. Such language under such circumstances does not clearly prove one to be devout, or to be hypocritical; it expresses a feeling which may be genuine, though transient and superficial.—Tr.]

SECOND SECTION.

The begloming of David's royal rule by the sins of himself and his house, and the thence resulting misfortunes.

CHAPS. XI.—XVIII.

I. Internal shattering of David's rule by the grievous sins of himself and his house.

CHAPS. XI.—XIV.

1. David's deep fall during the war against Rabbath-Ammon. Chap. xi. 1-27.

- 1 AND it came to pass, after the year was expired, at the time when kings¹ go forth to battle, that David sent Joab and his servants with him, and all Israel; and they destroyed the children of Ammon, and besieged Rabbah. But [And] David tarried still at [abode in] Jerusalem. And it came to pass in an eveningtide, that David arose from off his bed and walked upon the roof of the king's house; and from the roof he saw a woman washing herself, and the woman was very beautiful to look upon. And David sent and enquired after the woman. And one said, Is not this Bath-sheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite? And David sent messengers and took her, and she came in unto him, and he lay with her;² for [and] she was purified from her uncleanness, and she returned unto her house. And the woman conceived, and sent and told David, and said, I am with child.
- 6 And David sent to Joab, saying, Send me Uriah the Hittite. And Joab sent Uriah³ to David. And when Uriah was come [And Uriah came] unto him,⁴ [ins. and] David demanded [asked] of him [om. of him] how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered. And David said to Uriah, Go down to thy house, and wash thy feet. And Uriah departed [went] out of the king's house, and there followed him a mess⁵ of meat [food] from the king. But [And] Uriah

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. So the Qerl (margin). Böttcher and Hitzig retain the Kethib "messengers," the former understanding it of ambassadors, the latter of watchers to observe the new moon (comp. Jer. xxxi. 6); but these views are not probable; it is not likely that a time of the year would be defined by an act that was performed twelve times a year, and it is unlikely that ambassadors were sent out at a special time of the year. Though the Kethibh (מַלְאָכִים) may be the harder, and so far the preferable form, general considerations strongly favor the Qerl.—Böttcher's theory is that there existed two recensions of the history, one made by priests (which he marks PR.), the other by laymen (LR), of which the former is here followed by "Chronicles" (making Joab act independently, and softening the "Ammonites" into the "land of Ammon"), and the latter by "Samuel" (emphasizing the king's activity, etc.). Rather we should say that the author of "Samuel" selected his material from a prophetic point of view, the author of "Chronicles" from a Levitical point of view.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 8. "Or, a portion, gift." Literally "something lifted up" (Sept. ἀρῶν). Vulg. and Chald. render food and meal, Syr. and Arab. gift. Some anonymous Greek VSS. (in Montfaucon's Hex.) have a strange rendering: οὐσίαν ἀντὶ τοῦ βασιλέως τοῦ βασιλέως "after those that stood by the king" (reading τῶν for ἀντὶ), as if Uriah were preceded by royal officers, from whom David may have learned (ver. 10) that Uriah did not go home. Schleusner suggests that they read מִשְׁמַרְתִּי (minister) instead of מִשְׁמַח.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The siege of Rabbah. Comp. 1 Chron. xx. 1. And it came to pass at the return of the year—that is, at the setting in of spring* in the month of Abib (Nisan), with which the new year began. Josephus: “as the Spring set in.” [Comp. our March from the god of war, Mars, the beginning of the old Roman year.—Tr.] The term, a quo referred to in this chronological statement is the time (x. 13, 14) when Joab, having driven the Arameans off, and the Ammonites having retired before Abishai into their capital city, had returned to Jerusalem on account of the rain in winter, which made it unwise to begin a siege. At the time when kings go forth.—Instead of the “messengers” of the Heb. text, read “kings” (Qeri), as in all the versions and in Chronicles. A reference to the embassy of chap. x. 2, after all the intervening events, would here be completely out of place. The “kings” here, however, are not the hostile kings (chap. x.) that came out against David (Maurer)—against which is the preceding chronological statement, and the absence of any reference to the past events recorded in chap. x.—but the Israelitish kings. On the return of the season favorable to military operations, when the kings of Israel were accustomed to go forth to their wars, David advanced to the siege of Rabbah, which he had deferred the year before on account of the unfavorable season. [Joab had no doubt taken precautions to guard against hostile movements of the enemy.—Tr.] And David sent Joab and his servants with him and all Israel—that is, the military chieftains from about his person and his court (comp. ver. 9) and the whole army, including soldiers and officers. The “servants” are not the war-servants proper in distinction from a militia serving only in time of war (Mich.)—an entirely arbitrary distinction—nor the “officers” in distinction from “all Israel” as the army (Thenius). And they destroyed the children of Ammon.—Chron.: “the land of the children of Ammon.” But the verb is elsewhere used (as in 1 Sam. xxvi. 15) of persons in reference to the land inhabited by them. It is unnecessary to regard “land” as more correctly used here in contrast with the capital city (Thenius), because it was usual, while some strong point was attacked to ravage the land far and near by incursion-parties; so 1 Sam. xiii. 16, 17. [Our text, as the harder, is to be preferred; Chron. has introduced a natural explanation.—Tr.] And they besieged Rabbah=“Rabbath of the children of Ammon,”—that is, the great city of the Ammonites. See Josh. xiii. 25; Deut. iii. 11; the present ruins of Rabbat-Amman on the Nahr-Amman (the upper Jabbok), perfectly desert and uninhabited. Polybius: Rabbathamana. But David remained in Jerusalem [the impending war with the Ammonites alone not being of sufficient importance to require his presence.—Tr.]—explanatory transition to the episode of David's adultery.

Vers. 2-5. David's adultery with Bathsheba.—This section and the following one are wanting in Chronicles. Towards the evening [Heb.: in the evening—Tr.]—when the noon-rest was over, and the cooler part of the day had come. [In later times the evening (ערב) began at three o'clock in the afternoon; it was the time when it was getting darker, when the sun was declining, and after sunset till dark.—Tr.] David was walking (for pleasure) on the roof of the king's house, which was built on the edge of Mount Zion, so that one could thence look immediately down into the courts of the Lower City, where Uriah's house was,* comp. ver. 8. The woman that David saw was in the act of bathing (the Heb. uses the participle) in the uncovered court of her house, where, in accordance with general Eastern custom, there was a well. [Or, in her chamber, the casements being open (Patrick). In either case, the place was private, visible only from a neighboring roof; and in the East people refrain from looking down from a roof into neighbors' courts (Philipson); so that it is on this ground an unfounded suggestion that Bathsheba was purposely bathing in an exposed place in order to attract the king's gaze.—Tr.]—Ver. 3. Inflamed with sensual desire, David makes inquiry about the woman whose beauty had attracted him. “And one said (Vulg.: nuntiatum ei est), Is it not, etc.?” That is, “It is, etc.” (the negative question is often used in lively discourse). This form of expression supposes that the object or person mentioned was somehow already otherwise known.—Instead of “Bathsheba, daughter of Ellam,” 1 Chron. iii. 5 has “Bathsheba, daughter of Ammiel.” The form Bathsheba (= “daughter of the oath," not "daughter of Sheba") is, according to 1 Ki. i. 11, 15 and other places, to be regarded as the usual, and so as the original and correct, one. The difficulty of explaining it makes it impossible to adduce the meaning in favor of the originality and correctness of the form Bathsheba (Thenius), which may easily have come from the other by a copyist's change of a single letter (2 into 1). According to Ewald (§ 273 d), Eliam and Ammiel are different forms of the same name by an arbitrary inversion of the component parts.* [From 2 Sam. xxiii. 34, where Eliam is called the son of Ahithophel, it is supposed by some that Bathsheba was the grand-daughter of Ahithophel, and that this explains the latter's adherence to Absalom. So Jerome, Chandler, p. 407, Note, and Blunt, Undesigned Coincidences, p. 143 sq. (Am. ed.). The supposition seems not improbable.—Tr.] Uriah was a Hittite. He belonged (xxiii. 39) to David's Gibeonim (Heroes). The Hittites already in Palestine in Abraham's time (Gen. xv. 20) dwelt near Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 7 sq.), afterwards near Bethel (Judg. i. 24 sq.); Solomon reduced the remnant of them to servitude (1 Ki. ix. 20).—Ver. 4. Short but very vivid narrative of the sinful deed committed by David in spite of his learning that Bathsheba was a married woman. That David used force or artifice to get possession of the "innocent" woman (Mich.) is not indicated in the expression: "and he took her." The narrative leads us to infer that Bathsheba came and submitted herself to David without opposition. This undoubtedly proves her participation in the guilt, though we are not to assume that her bathing there was "purposed," in order to be seen (Thenius). She was moved doubtless by vanity and ambition in not venturing to refuse the demand of David the king. Her purification (which was according to the Law, Lev. xv. 18) was performed while she was yet in the king's palace. [Eng. A. V., Philippon and others not so well make the purification precede her coming to the palace, putting a full stop after the word "uncleanness."—Tr.]—Ver. 5. Adultery was, according to Lev. xx. 10, punishable with death. Her message to David had in view the avoidance of the consequences of this sin (Keil).

Vers. 6-13. David's efforts to conceal the adultery frustrated by Uriah.—Ver. 6. There is no evidence that Uriah was the armor-bearer of Joab (Josephus). He had a command in the army, as is clear from what follows, especially from the questions in ver. 7, which could be answered only by one whose position gave him a wide and exact knowledge of the condition of the war. David brought him to Jerusalem in order that, as Bathsheba's husband, he might hereafter pass for the father of the child begotten in adultery. The questions addressed to him were intended to conceal from him as far as possible the purpose for which he was called, and to make the impression that he was summoned to render a military report. Washing the feet is the symbol at the same time of rest and refreshment. After David has dismissed him to his home, he sends him literally "something taken up," what the man of rank sets before his guest from his own table (Gen. xliii. 34), and then any present (Am. v. 11; Esth. ii. 18). Here it was probably a dish of honor, which Uriah was to enjoy at home.—Ver. 9. Uriah, however, did not act according to David's will and expectation, but remained in the king's palace "at or in the door," and spent the night there, in the guard-room (1 Kings xiv. 27, 28), with the royal court-officials or the body-guard. It is possible that he did this merely out of zeal of service (comp. ver. 11); but also his suspicions may have been already aroused, and he may have heard something of the affair with Bathsheba.—Ver. 10 sq. [Perhaps David had sent to find out whether Uriah went home, or the servants that carried the present may have informed him.—Tr.] There is a certain tone of displeasure in David's words already, though his question was a natural one, since Uriah's conduct (as indicated in the question) must have been strange. Uriah's answer [ver. 11] is an explanation and justification of his not going home, together with a solemn asseveration; whereby he conceals his real ground of action, his unwillingness to meet the king's wish. According to his statement, the Ark had been carried along into the field,*—for the war was a war of the Lord. When it, the sign of God's presence, and all Israel, God's host, were in tents, and Joab and the king's officers were lying on the bare ground, how could he take his pleasure in his house? By thy life and by the life of thy soul is not a tautology, but a strengthening of the oath by repetition of the thought, the expression combining the general and the special. [See the text examined in "Text. and Gram."] The phrase "Israel and Judah" probably indicates an authorship for our Book after the division of the kingdom; yet not certainly, since there was foundation for the distinction of the two parts in the fact that Judah alone at first adhered to David. See Erdmann's Introduction, § 6.—Tr.]—Ver. 12 sq. This attempt failing, David tries to gain his end by keeping Uriah a day longer. He invited him to his table, and made him drunk, in order thus more certainly to secure his passing the following night with his wife. That night, however, Uriah again slept at the palace-door. A factual irony! David sees his plan wholly frustrated, and is now driven by his sin-entangled, sin-darkened heart to add murder to adultery. [A chronological difficulty is made here unnecessarily by some critics: it is said that the invitation of ver. 13 was given on the "morrow," and this last word is joined to ver. 13 so as to read: "Uriah abode in Jerusalem that day. And on the morrow David called him," etc. In that case Uriah did not depart on the morrow, as David promised (ver. 12), since he slept in Jerusalem that night (ver. 13), but the day after the morrow (ver. 14). The difficulty is removed by supposing (as is quite possible) the invitation of ver. 13 to have been given on the

"that day" of ver. 12; then the "morrow" of ver. 12 will be identical with the "morning" of ver. 14. The "calling" in ver. 13 does not necessarily require a more definite statement of time than is suggested in ver. 12.—Tr.]

Vers. 14-27. The letter concerning Uriah. Uriah's death. Bathsheba David's wife.—Ver. 14sq. Uriah himself must bear the letter that decrees his death. A new artifice of David's that makes murder its minister. Uriah was to be placed in the hottest, most dangerous part of the battle, where a retreat would not be strange, and he, David well knew, as a brave soldier (one of the Gihborim or Heroes) would not so easily retreat. No reason is assigned [in the letter] for this command, which Joab could not misunderstand. He had simply to carry out the royal instructions, and so he did (ver. 16sq.). And it came to pass when Joab watched the city (such is the literal rendering of the Heb. שָׁמַר).

"We must understand by this a procedure different from the usual siege, a nearer approach, which challenged the warriors in the city to a sally" (Bunsen) [comp. Judg. i. 24, where the participle of the same Hebrew verb is rendered "spies" in Eng. A. V., properly "the observing (i. e., besieging) force."—Tr.]. Joab knew the place where the enemy's best warriors would fight in the sally. There he put Uriah, whose bravery he knew, without needing to say to the soldiers: "leave him in the lurch" (Michaelis, Bunsen), since he could foresee that this would happen from the dangerousness of the post. In becoming the instrument of David's murderous artifice, Joab needed not to know the ground of the order. As obedient servant of the king he carried it out the more unhesitatingly, inasmuch as it was an order of the commander of the army in relation to a soldier, who might have committed some grave offence against him, and whose seemingly accidental death might be desired by him for special reasons.

—Ver. 18sq. Joab's message.—From the account of the message it is obvious that the messenger knew nothing of the crafty plot against Uriah's life. It is an elaborate report by Joab of the near approach of a part of the besieging force to the wall of the city, leading to a sally by the enemy, wherein a number of the Israelites fell. To this circumstantial account the report of Uriah's fall (the only part of it now interesting to David) was to be added in a supplementary way at the end. Joab takes it for granted that the king will exhibit anger (pretended or real) at this useless spilling of blood. Abimelech the son of Jerubesheth—i. e., Gideon, Judg. vi. 32.* His death by a mill-stone is related Judg. ix. 53. [Bible Commentary here remarks that "this reference to Judg. ix. 53 indicates the existence in David's time of the national annals of that period in an accessible form, and the king's habit of reading or having read to him the history of his country." But Joab's reference to Abimelech shows merely that the facts were known (possibly by tradition), not certainly that national annals existed (though it is not improbable that there were written accounts of such events). It is hardly probable that our Book of Judges existed at this time.—Tr.]—Say, Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also.—This the messenger was in any case to say last, as an appendix to his report, "as if Uriah, of his own accord, or even against Joab's will, had pressed forward with his men, and so was chargeable with his own death and that of the others that had fallen" (Keil). Joab is evidently concerned to conceal the wicked deed from the messenger, and at the same time to let David know that it is accomplished.

Ver. 22sq. David's reception of the messenger.—The message is delivered exactly in accordance with Joab's instructions.* Between vers. 22 and 23 the Sept. has an insertion [Sept. reads: and David's anger was kindled against Joab, and he said to the messenger, Why did ye approach to the city, etc., inserting nearly through ver. 21.—Tr.] This Thenius adopts on the ground that neither David's presumed displeasure, nor any expression of it on the report of the messenger is mentioned. But this is unnecessary. Either the "kindling" of David's anger, supposed possible by Joab, did not take place—or, if it did, there was no need to relate it at length; it was taken for granted, and the narration gives only the words of the messenger in reply to David's comment on the rash affair, in order to explain and justify it. [The text here is discussed in "Text. and Gramm." and the present Heb. reading defended.—Tr.]

Ver. 23.† The enemy supposed that with their superiority of numbers here they could make a successful sally. This sally led to a hot fight, wherein the Israelites pressed near to the wall within shot of the archers, and thus many were killed. The messenger therefore reports a sally of the besieged, which occasioned this dangerous approach to the wall.—Ver. 25. David's answer is, as it were, an extenuation of the matter, and of such nature that the messenger cannot suppose a reference to any thing more than this bloody military affair. Let not this thing be evil in thy eyes; so and so devours the sword.‡ —David's words seemingly express the quiet and equanimity of a commander who does not permit himself to be disturbed by such bad news. Thus he conceals his excitement over the success of his plot. He orders the siege of Rabbah to be pressed and the city to be destroyed. The messenger is dismissed with this answer to Joab, with the further instruction: strengthen him, encourage him. Neither the isolated position of these words, nor David's encouraging the field-commander by a messenger, makes this expression a strange one (Thenius); for we need not suppose the "messenger" so far below "his general" in rank as to make such an exhortation in the king's message necessarily unbecoming. The "messenger" was certainly not a common soldier, but doubtless a high officer who, as his words show, had knowledge of the whole conduct of the war before Rabbah. The Sept., Syriac and Arabic translate: get possession of it, namely, the city, comp. 1 Kings xvi. 22. These words would then form the conclusion of the message. [Comp. also Jer. xx. 7. But this sense of the verb cannot be established from the biblical usage. It means to press on one (Jerem. xx. 7), to prevail against (of persons, 1 Kings xvi. 22), but apparently not to conquer a city. Another objection to this rendering is that it would introduce an anti-climax: "destroy it and prevail against it." On the other hand, the signification encourage is well established, Deut. i. 38; Isa. xli. 7.—Tr.]

Vers. 26, 27. Bathsheba David's wife. The usual mourning lasted seven days (comp. 1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Bathsheba was probably taken to wife by David immediately after the expiration of this time of mourning. If the mourning-time of widows was no longer than the ordinary mourning, then the interval between the adultery and the marriage was doubtless short enough to allow Bathsheba's child (begotten in that adultery) to appear to be begotten in wedlock. The concluding words of the narration: But the thing that David had done displeased the Lord contain the moral decision from the theocratical point of view, and are, as it were, the superscription to the following history of the divine judgments that fell on David and his house on account of this sin.

[For mention of other times of mourning, see Gen. i. 10; Deut. xxxiv. 8; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13; 2 Sam. xiv. 2. In particular cases special feeling would lead to an extension of the ordinary mourning-period.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The history of David's fall from the height of his communion with God as "a man after God's own heart" into the deepest depth of sin and crime contains a serious and warning lesson concerning the power of sin even over those who are under the guidance of God's will and word, when they give place in a single point of their inner life to the yet unoccupied sinful lust therein hidden, and fail in faithfulness in the struggle against their own evil hearts, and in self-denial.

* [A. Clarke refers to the similar incident in Bellerophon's life:

πῶρον δ' ὅγε σήματα λυγρὰ,
Γράψας ἐν πίνακι πικρῇ θυμοφθόρα πολλὰ.

(Zl. VI. 166, 169).—Tr.]

[It is obvious, and yet often overlooked by assailants of the morality of the Old Testament, that the history, in chronicling this sin of the "man after God's own heart," does not endorse, but distinctly condemns it. It admits that such a man could commit such a sin, and afterwards enjoy the favor of God; but only on the condition that the real bent of his soul, turned aside for a while under temptation, was towards God and holiness.—Tr.]

2. The inscrutable development of many individual sins from one hidden root proceeds according to an inner natural law: the human will, by detaching the heart from the living God, surrenders itself to the power of sinful lust, and the latter through the removal of the moral forces that had hitherto held it down and controlled the outer and inner life, gets unrestrained dominion. When the life is at the highest point of communion with the living God, pride slips in and leads to an all the deeper fall. The enjoyment of experiences of divine favor and of the fruits of struggle for the kingdom of God, leaves the door of the heart open to fleshly security. Temporary rest from work and fight, though not in itself insidious, leads to moral indolence, to spiritual sloth, to carelessness and unfaithfulness in office and calling. Wicked lust, excited from without at a hidden point of the inner life, no longer finds limitations in thoughts on the solemn divine command and prohibition: Thou shalt and thou shalt not, in the warning and exhorting voice of conscience, in the restraints and hindrances of divine providence, in faithful performance of duty and labor in one's calling, whereby the kindled fire might again be smothered. The "evil conscience" that follows the satisfaction of evil lust leads on the beaten, slippery and precipitous path to lying and deception, in order to conceal the sin from men. From the soil of the heart poisoned by one sin, from perversion from God of feeling and will in one hidden point of the heart, comes one sin after another; and not only does the fruitfulness and frightfulness of sinful lust show itself in its production of an unbroken series of wicked thoughts and desires, but "the curse of the evil deed" is made complete in that "it must continue to produce evil."

3. It is a sign of the irresistible power of conscience, and an involuntary self-condemnation, when a man seeks in every way to conceal his sin from men, but to extenuate and justify it before God; and on the other hand unwillingness to make confession has its deepest ground in the pride of the human heart, which increases in proportion as the man becomes involved in sin, and the evil in him develops itself from the slightest beginnings into a power that exercises dominion over the whole inner life. "Whosoever commits sin, he is the servant of sin" [John viii. 14, comp. Rom. vi.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[HALL: With what unwillingness, with what fear, do I still look upon the miscarriage of the man after God's own heart! O holy prophet, who can promise himself always to stand, when he sees thee fallen, and maimed with the fall! Let profane eyes behold thee contentedly, as a pattern, as an excuse for sinning; I shall never look upon thee but through tears, as a woful spectacle of human infirmity.—TR.]

VER. 1. SCHLIER: If God has granted us some special good fortune we will never be puffed up, but will rather become little and lowly, and the higher we rise the more will we humble ourselves. An humble man always finds grace and blessing, but pride always goes before a fall.

VER. 2. DISSELHOFF: Idle hours bring forth idle thoughts, and idle thoughts are nothing but drykindling-wood, that waits only for a spark to be suddenly ablaze.—All have had the painful experience that our sins often have their roots in idolence and unfaithfulness in our calling. As long as we walk and work in our office, we are encompassed with a wall. As soon as we fall out of our office, we fall away from our fortunes and become a prey to the enemy.—[HALL: There can be no safety to that soul, where the senses are let loose. He can never keep his covenant with God, that makes not a covenant with his eyes. It is an idle presumption to think the outward man may be free, while the inward is safe.—TAYLOR: Here, then, in the moral weakness which constant prosperity had created, in the opportunity which idleness afforded to temptation, and in the blunted sensibility which polygamy had superinduced, we see how David was so easily overcome.—CHRYSOEOM: Youth is sometimes wiser and better than age. David the youth smote down the barbarian, and showed all philosophy (wisdom and piety), and when he grew older, then he sinned.—TR.]

VERS. 2-4. SCHLIER: Let us watch and pray; we may well need it. What shall become of us if a feeling of security arises in us? How shall we get through with a pure body and heart if we are filled with self-conceit? Let us also carefully avoid idleness; labor is a medicine against sin.—J. LANGE: One sin brings forth another, and one act of unfaithfulness to conscience draws another after it. JAMES i. 15.—STARKE: Loneliness affords the most convenient time for the temptations of Satan (Matt. iv. 1 sq.).—S. SCHMID: The quieter and securer men are in things bodily, the more perilous is it for them in things spiritual.—DISSELHOFF: If the not fully slain ungodly impulses in the man after God's own heart grew up so quickly and to such strength when he deviated a finger's breadth from the way of the Lord—and the Lord allowed him to go—how will it be with the untamed lusts in our hearts? If such a story does not give one a view of the unfathomable depths of sin and of its power, he will never learn what sin is.—STARKE: Rulers sin in leading their subjects into sin, for they are not lords over God's command (Acts v. 29; Matt. xxii. 21.)—[HALL: Had Bathsheba been mindful of her matrimonial fidelity, perhaps David had been soon checked in his inordinate desire; her facility furthers the sin. It is no excuse to say, I was tempted, though by the great, though by the holy and learned. Let the mover be never so glorious, if he stir us to evil, he must be entertained with defiance.—TR.]

SCHLIER: Human customs are carefully observed, and God's command is trodden under foot. People attend to outward forms and usages, and live on consoled thereby in their sins.—[HENRY: The aggravations of David's sin. (1) His age, at least fifty years. (2) He had many wives and concubines—this is insisted on, chap. xii. 8. (3) Uriah was one of his "worthies," a man of honor and virtue, now jeoparding life in his service. (4) David was a king, whom God had intrusted with the sword of justice, and he made himself a pattern, when he should have been a terror, to evil-doers.—TR.]

VERS. 6-9. CRAMER: When sin has once lodged itself it becomes fruitful, and bears other sins (James ii. 10.)—[HALL: It is rare and hard to commit a single sin.—TR.]

SEB. SCHMID: The most cunning devices are often, through the special Providence of God, made a laughing-stock by the simplest simplicity.—OSIANDER: Although the ungodly seek out all manner of cunning inventions to cloak their sins, yet it does not succeed; for God knows how, in a wonderful manner, to bring even secret sins to light (Matt. x. 26.)—SCHLIER: When we have sinned, how often we trouble ourselves to hide our sins from the world, but how little do we think of God's eye and God's judgment! How contented we are if only we stand free from censure before men, and can throw the blame upon others!

VERS. 14 sqq. OSIANDER: So great is the devil's cunning and wickedness that when once he has brought a man to fall, he drives him on to more and greater sins.—DISSELHOFF: As the poisonous seed, laid in the bosom of the earth, comes up and brings fruit a hundredfold, as one root branches into a hundred new ones, spreads with rapid growth through the whole field and sends up everywhere the wild shoots, not otherwise is it with the sin which a man hides in his heart. Inwardly it strikes its roots deeper, broader, mightier; outwardly it brings superabundant fruit. It blinds the eyes, stops the ears, petrifies the feeling, deadens the conscience. It bursts all tender bonds, it dulls and benumbs to all else that one held dear and holy on earth. Holy fear vanishes, the reins are cast off from the heart, and mean, hateful, foul traits of character, which one had reckoned impossible, reveal themselves in mournful nakedness.—SCHLIER: Sin takes a man captive, so that from one he hurls himself into another, so that sin becomes wantonness and crime, yea, even abomination. He who consents to sin, knows where the corruption begins, but who will undertake to say where it ends? And what is most fearful is the blindness into which sin casts the man, so that his eyes are holden, that he no longer knows what he is doing, no longer sees through the simplest things that were once known and familiar to him, but with eyes open rushes into ruin.

[TAYLOR: It may be asked, how can you account for such enormous iniquity in such a man as we have seen that David was? . . . There are some men in whom everything is on a large scale. When their good nature is uppermost, they overtop all others in holiness; but if, unhappily, they should be thrown off their guard, and the old man should gain the mastery, some dreadful wickedness may be expected. This is all the more likely to be the case if the quality of intensity be added to their greatness; for a man with such a temperament is never anything by half. . . . A man of David's nature ought to be more peculiarly on his guard than other men: The express train, dashing along at furious speed, will do more mischief if it runs off than the slow-going horse-car in the city streets. Every one understands that; but every one demands, in consequence, that the driver of the one shall be proportionately more watchful than that of the other. With such a nature as David had, and knew that he had, he ought to have been supremely on his guard, while again the privileges which he had received from God rendered it both easy and practicable for him to be vigilant.—KINGSLEY: Such terrible crimes are not committed by men in a right state of mind. Nemo repente fuit turpissimus. He who commits adultery, treachery and murder, must have been long tampering, at least in heart, with all these. Had not David been playing upon the edge of sin, into sin he would not have fallen. He may have been quite unconscious of bad habits of mind; but they must have been there, growing in secret. The tyrannous self-will, which is too often developed by long success and command; the unscrupulous craft, which is too often developed by long adversity, and the necessity of sustaining one's self in a difficult position, . . . and that fearful moral weakness which comes from long indulgence of the passions. . . . On David's own theory, that he was an utterly weak person without the help of God, the act is perfectly like David. It is what David would naturally do, when he had left hold of God. Had he left hold of God in the wilderness, he would have become a mere robber-chief. He does leave hold of God in his palace on Zion, and he becomes a mere Eastern despot.—Tr.]

J. DISSELHOFF: The fall of the man after God's own heart: 1) What brought the beloved of God to so deep a fall? 2) He who once gives himself up to sin becomes its slave, and is driven ever deeper and deeper by its might.

[HALL: O God, Thou hadst never suffered so dear a favorite of Thine to fall so fearfully, if Thou hadst not meant to make him a universal example to mankind, of not presuming, of not despairing. How can we presume of not sinning, or despair for sinning, when we find so great a saint thus fallen, thus risen!—Tr.]

cies or faults of one great and good man, when permanently recorded and widely read, become more important to the welfare of the human race than the overthrow of cities or kingdoms.—Ver. 2 sqq. What a series! A lascivious look (Matt. v. 28), actual adultery, pitiful and then base attempts at concealment, and finally a treacherous murder. How little David imagined, in the moment of lustful looking, that he was taking the first step in such a course of frightful wickedness!—Vers. 14, 15. Here is the darkest moment of this terrible story. Few scenes in all the sad history of our race are so disgraceful to human nature and so utterly disheartening to the beholder, as when David, the Psalmist and King, with such a history, such experiences, such promises, sat writing this letter.—Ver. 16. It is often hard to find helpers to virtue, but always easy to find helpers in vice and crime.—Ver. 17. Uriah the Hittite—immortal by his wrongs!—Ver. 25. Alas! often do men hide wicked designs, and satisfaction at successful plotting, under the common-places of resignation to the inevitable, of submission to the conditions of existence.—Ver. 27. So he seemed to have compassed his ends and effectually concealed his crime by a still baser crime. But his conscience slept uneasily its poisoned sleep, and Jehovah was displeased!—Tr.]

[Vers. 2-27. David's frightful fall. 1) The inspired writings (unlike most biographies) narrate without reserve the faults of good men. 2) This story serves as an encouragement to sin, or as a solemn warning against sin, according to the spirit of him that reads it. We should discipline ourselves to take a right and wholesome view of other men's faults. 3) One sin leads to another; and attempts at concealment often involve one in greater difficulty, and tempt him to additional wrong. When a good man has been betrayed into crime, let him humbly confess it, and cut short the series. 4) If David fell, let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall (1 Cor. x. 12). CHERYSTOM: The narrow way has precipices on both sides. Let us walk it awake and watchful. For we are not more exact than David, who by a moment's neglect was precipitated into the very gulf of sin.—Tr.]

Some MSS. here write ראש, see above.—Instead of פָּבֶשֶׁת we find in the Pentateuch פָּבֶשֶׁת and (by transposition) פָּבֶשֶׁת (as כָּשַׁב for כָּשַׁב); Böttcher suggests that the slenderer vowel (i) gives here a diminutive sense, but this is doubtful.—The Imperfects תִּשְׁכַּח, תִּשְׁכַּח, and תִּשְׁכַּח here express customary action. Instead of פָּבֶשֶׁת some MSS. have לָבַת.—Ta.]

‡ [Ver. 9. Some MSS. and the Vulg. read: "in my eyes," which is approved by Norzius and De Rossi. Another reading is: in the eyes of Jehovah (some MSS., Syr., Arab.).—In the latter part of the verse the repetition of the statement that David slew Uriah has given offence to some critics, who take it to be meaningless; and Syr. omits the clause: "Uriah the Hittite thou hast slain with the sword," and transposes the two following. Böttcher therefore conjectures for the first phrase הָרָצִיחַ בְּאֵיֶךְ, "thou didst ambush Uriah," to which Thenius objects that the חָרַב of the following verse requires the same word here in the text, and that the two clauses are not identical in statement, but the second is descriptive and explanatory. The Bib. Com. suggests that the last clause of this verse should be appended to ver. 10, where it seems required, whereby the repetition in ver. 9 would be avoided. On the other hand the absence of logical symmetry favors the present Heb. reading (as making it harder), while there is yet in it a certain rhetorical force; the speaker presses home in ver. 9 the charge of murder, and in ver. 10 thinks it sufficient to state the one fact (the marrying Bathsheba) that represents the whole crime.—Ta.]

§ [Ver. 10. Wellhausen regards vers. 10-12 as an interpolation, because no reference is made to the punishments announced in them, either in the "thou shalt not die" of ver. 13 or in ver. 14; and it is true ver. 13 attaches itself easily to ver. 9. Gramberg also (in Thenius) says that no pardon would really have been granted David, if Nathan had spoken vers. 11, 12. To this latter Thenius properly replies, that pardon (being conditioned on a state of soul) does not necessarily involve a setting aside of the natural effects of sin. So also as to Wellhausen's criticism, Nathan's course of thought may be thus represented: he sets forth David's sin (ver. 9), denounces against his house the everlasting vengeance of the sword (ver. 10), and an open requital of his crime on him personally (vers. 11, 12); thereupon David confesses his sin, anticipating the worst consequences for himself, and Nathan replies that (notwithstanding what had just been said) death should not now be visited on him; yet that he might not be without immediate punishment, his child should die. Thus the contrast between the punishment of vers. 10-12 and that of vers. 13, 14, will lie in the immediateness or remoteness. For the rest, it is not necessary to suppose that this scene occurred in a minute, even though we should not (with Ewald) assume a considerable interval of time in the middle of ver. 13 (at the Pisqa).—Ta.]

§ [Ver. 13. The masoretic note here is: "Pisqa (division) in the middle of the verse." This doubtless indicates that a pause was felt to be desirable between David's solemn confession of sin and Nathan's announcement of pardon; but whether it is also intended to indicate an interval of time must remain undetermined.—Ta.]

Nathan said unto David, The Lord [Jehovah] also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die. Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies^a of the Lord [Jehovah] to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die. And Nathan departed [went] unto his house.

And the Lord [Jehovah] struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick. David therefore [And David] besought God for the child; and David fasted, and went in and lay all night upon the earth [ground]. And the elders of his house arose and went to him, to raise him up from the earth [ground]; but he would not, neither did he eat bread with them. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that the child died. And the servants of David feared to tell him that the child was dead; for they said, Behold, while the child was yet alive, we spake unto him, and he would not hearken unto our voice; how will he then vex himself, if we tell him that the child is dead? [and how shall we say to him, The child is dead? he will then act badly.] But when David [And David] saw that his servants whispered, [ins. and] David perceived that the child was dead; therefore [and] David said unto his servants, Is the child dead? And they said, He is dead. Then [And] David arose from the earth [ground], and washed and anointed himself, and changed his apparel, and came into the house of the Lord [Jehovah] and worshipped; then he [and] came to his own house, and when he required [and asked], [ins. and] they set bread before him, and he did eat. Then said his servants [And his servants said] unto him, What thing is this that thou hast done? thou didst fast and weep for the child while it was alive; but [and] when the child was dead, thou didst rise and eat bread. And he said, While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept; for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me, that the child may [shall] live? But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me. And David comforted Bathsheba his wife, and went in unto her, and lay with her; and she bare a son, and he called his name Solomon; and the Lord [Jehovah] loved him. And he sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet; and he called his name Jedidiah, because of the Lord [Jehovah].

And Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city. And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters. Now, therefore [And now] gather the rest of the people together, and encamp against the city and take it, lest I take the city, and it be called after my name. And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it and took it. And he took their king's crown from off his head, the weight whereof [and its weight] was a talent of gold with the [and] precious stones; and it was set on David's head. And he brought forth the spoil of the city in great abundance. And he brought forth the people that were therein, and put^b them under saws and under harrows [threshing-sledges] of iron and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln;^c and thus he did unto all the cities of the children of Ammon. So [And] David and all the people returned unto Jerusalem.

^a [Ver. 14. So all versions and MSS. Geiger thinks that this is a case similar to 1 Sam. xxv. 22, where the "enemies" is inserted to avoid an irreverent or injurious expression. But in that passage (see the discussion there in "Text. and Gram.") the word "enemies" is obviously out of place, while here it suits very well; and the possibility of the causative sense of the Piel must be omitted. Yet if the Heb. text be retained, we must suppose some publicity given to David's crime; and the reading: "thou hast despised Jehovah," would agree well with the context.—Tr.]

^b [Ver. 31. Chron. (xx. 3) has סָדַק, "he sawed," which is adopted by Erdmann, Bib. Com., and most critics. The Heb. phrase here is unusual and hard, and the reading of Chron. has against it only that the verb sawed does not agree well with the instruments of threshing and cutting. Therefore a general sense, cut, has been assigned to the verb, which, however, is doubtful. It is held by some that our Heb. text means only that David put his prisoners to work with saws, etc.; but the words will hardly bear this interpretation. Chald. has "sawed" (סָדַק), and so the Vulg. (probably a paraphrase).—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-12. Nathan's exhortation to repentance.
—Ver. 1. And the Lord sent.—Nathan received his commission to David as prophet; as the Septuagint, Syr., Arab. and some MSS., rightly indicate by the addition of the explanatory phrase "the prophet" [after "Nathan"]. After the words "said unto him" the Vulgate adds "give me your opinion" (responde mihi iudicium), a gloss, probably occasioned by the fact that Nathan's discourse begins immediately with a parallel.*—David is caught beforehand in the cleverly spread net of the prophet's parable.—Ver. 3. The poor man had "nothing at all" but one lamb, which he "kept alive," supported, reared. It was not a pet-lamb (Keil), since the man had absolutely no other possession in cattle. As a poor man he had the means of buying only one little lamb, which he was now raising, and which he loved the more as it was his only property. [Bib.-Com.: All these circumstances are exquisitely contrived to heighten the pity and indignation of the hearer.—Ta.].—Ver. 4.† [The three designations "traveller," "wayfarer," "the man that came to him," are rhetorical variations and mean the same thing substantially, though the last is obviously specially appropriate in its place. Some of the rabbis and the fathers (quoted with apparent approval by Wordsworth) make the three names set forth lust in its different stages of growth, as a passer-by, as a guest, as a permanent inmate; of course this allegorizing is out of place here.—Ta.].—Ver. 5 sqq. Nathan so told his story that David must needs believe it referred to a deed of violence to be immediately punished, not supposing at all that it concerned him.‡ Hence his violent indignation. The fourfold compensation for a stolen sheep was a legal provision, Ex. xxi. 37. The sevenfold of the Sept. is to be explained by the fact that the number seven was so common among the Hebrews. Comp. Prov. vi. 31. [The Chald. says fortyfold, either by clerical error, or in a mere spirit of exaggeration. This variation may suggest the uncertainty of Böttcher's view, that the Heb. text here has the priestly recension (according to the law in Exodus) and the Greek the laic recension. Nor is there any ground for the assertion of Thénius (and Wellhausen) that David was certainly here not thinking of the law in Exodus, and that the Greek text is the original. Though the Book of Exodus in its present shape may not have existed in David's time, there is no reason why this law should not have been known.—Ta.].—Ver. 7. Thou art the man.—The farther David was from thinking of a reference to himself, the greater the force with which this word must have struck him. The account here given of the firmness and wisdom with which Nathan approached the king is "inimitably admirable" (Ewald). The Sept. and Vulg. [not the common Vulg. text.—Ta.], have: "thou art the man that has done this," a mere explanatory addition. Thus saith the Lord the God of Israel.—The following words, as far as ver. 9, bring out most clearly the greatness of David's guilt in various points: 1) from the point of view of his royal office; his crime is most sharply opposed to his divine induction thereinto; 2) his deliverance from Saul was a gracious act of God, for which he has here shown himself in the highest degree ungrateful; 3) David might unblamed have taken his predecessor's wives (Thénius); this is the only meaning to be attached to the words: "I gave thee thy master's house, and thy master's wives into thy bosom." [Bp. Patrick and others give the later Jewish understanding of the law or custom: the king and no other person fell heir to the property and harem of his predecessor, but it did not follow that he actually married the inmates of the harem; they might be merely a part of his establishment. If it was a son that succeeded his father, he treated these women with reverence; if no blood-relationship existed between the two kings, the successor might actually take the women as his wives (Philippeon). As to the morality of the act, it was a natural result of a polygamous system, and morally in the same category with it; and polygamy was allowed by the Mosaic Law.—Ta.]. According to 1 Sam. xiv. 50 Saul had only one wife, and according to 2 Sam. iii. 7 only one concubine who fell into Abner's hands. 4) David, as king, had control of all Israel (1 Sam. viii. 16), and might have increased his establishment from their daughters, without committing this crime. And I have given thee the house of Israel; instead of "house" Syr. and Arab. read "daughters," for which change, according to the above explanation, there is no need. 5) David despised, transgressed the "word," that is, the law of God by slaying Uriah. The Heb. text has: "in his eyes," the margin: "in my eyes;" the difference is insignificant.* This crime is heightened, however, by the fact that he committed the murder by "the sword of the children of Ammon." With this added statement and the use of the stronger word "murder" [Eng. A. V. slain] instead of "slay," the fact already mentioned is repeated, in order that the culmination of the iniquity, the using the enemies of God's people as its instrument, may come forth more sharply.

Vers. 10-12. Threat of punishment, David's misdeed being again characterised as a factual contempt of the Lord. Instead of: "Thou hast despised the word of the Lord," it is here said: "Thou hast despised Me." For in His word the Lord Himself reveals Himself. For this reason, because David is guilty of despising the Lord, 1) "the sword shall not depart from his house forever," that is, as long as the house or posterity of David shall last. From the seed of this evil deed of David sprang the poisonous fruit of the evil deeds of his sons and the consequent domestic and fraternal war. The bloody sword appears in the mur-

* [In Hahn's ed. of the Heb. Bib. both text and margin have "his eyes" (with a mere orthographic difference); but in some other edd. (see De Rossi) the Qeri or margin is as Dr. Erdmann states.—Ta.]

* [It is doubtful whether this phrase belongs to the Vulgate text. It is not found in our present printed edition, nor in the Codex Amiatinus; and the expression is not Hebrew but Latin (Wellhausen).—Josephus' language "he asked him to tell him what he thought" (Ant. 7, 7, 3) is a natural introduction in Josephus' expansive manner, and does not necessarily suggest a corresponding phrase in his Greek text.—Ta.]

† עֲוֹנִי, anathrous, defined by the Article with the following adjective. See Ewald, § 293 a.

‡ [Especially as no murder is introduced into the parable. No doubt it was part of Nathan's plan, as Dr. Erdmann suggests, to conceal the immediate reference from David. He therefore does not minutely imitate the circumstances of David's crime, and the interpretation of the parable must simply take the central thought and apply it. Here was a man that wronged his neighbor by depriving him of valuable property; the wrong is heightened by the fact that the aggressor has much and the sufferer little. Such an aggressor was David. Farther than this it is not proper to carry the interpretation of particulars. Abarbanel's explanation (given by Patrick) is too minute.—Ta.] der of the incestuous Amnon by Absalom (xiii. 28, 29), in the death of the rebel Absalom (xiii. xiv.), and in the execution of Adonijah (1 Kings ii. 24, 25). Thereby is Uriah's murder punished; 2) David is threatened with disgrace through the disgrace of his wives. To thy neighbor . . . in the sight of the sun—before all Israel. For the fulfilment by Absalom, see xvi. 22, and comp. 1 Kings ii. 23 sq., where Adonijah asks for Abishag the Shunammite. [On the text in vers. 9, 10 see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

Vers. 13-23. David's penitent confession and punishment by the death of the child of Bathsheba.—Ver. 13. I have sinned against the Lord.—This frank, short, honest confession of sin was made not some time after this discourse of Nathan, but immediately as its direct result. The power of the prophetic word laid hold of the depths of his heart and conscience; the divine truth, which inexorably laid bare his sin, put an end to all self-deception and all anxious effort to cover up and palliate his transgression of the divine word. He confesses his sin as a sin against the Lord, to show that he clearly recognizes it to be, what it essentially is, a contradiction of God's holy will. Nathan's answer is the announcement of the Lord's grace 1) in forgiving the sin: The Lord will cause [or, has caused]—Tr.] thy sin to pass over, that is, it is not to remain before him, but to vanish, be forgiven; 2) in remitting the deserved punishment: Thou shalt not die!—As adulterer and homicide David had deserved death; but this just punishment was not executed, because he honestly repented and did not harden his heart against the Lord. [Probably the civil law in such a case could not have been enforced against an absolute king by human authority; but God could have found means to execute it. Clearly it is physical death that is here meant, not the death of the soul (against Wordsworth and Bib.-Com.).—In the Mosaic code there is no provision against such a marriage as that of David and Bathsheba; on general moral grounds it would have been pronounced wrong. Yet there were also reasons why the marriage should take place, and God Himself solves the ethical question by the mouth of His prophet, not increasing the evil by sundering the marriage tie, but so chastising the sinners that one of them at least must have remembered the lesson to the end of his life.—According to the later Jewish law the marriage was illegal; and some Jewish writers have tried hard to clear David of the charge of adultery. See Patrick's Comm., 2 Sam. xi. 27 and 4.—Tr.]—This is not inconsistent with the threat of punishment in ver. 14, the fulfilment of which is specially founded on the provocation to blasphemy given to the heathen. Only because thou hast made the enemies of the Lord to despise* (him). The enemies of the people of Israel were also enemies of the Lord and of the king of this people. Towards the heathen Israel's duty was, by obedience to God's word and commands, to set forth the theocracy and bring it to honor and recognition. Transgression of God's command by the king himself must lead the heathen to heap shame and reproach on Israel and its God; and there must therefore be expiation by punishment. David and Bathsheba must lose their adulterously begotten child, and this should be a sign to the Lord's enemies of the severe justice of the God of Israel. "The child also, etc.," the statement is introduced by the word also as in keeping with what precedes (וְ, not howbeit, but also).—Ver.

15. The Lord smote the child.—The fulfilment followed immediately on the prediction. The sickness is represented as a punishment inflicted by God; therefore is added: which the wife of Uriah had borne to David.—[It was, then, apparently not till after the birth of the child that Nathan came to David; the latter had remained many months seemingly unconscious of his sin.—Tr.]—Ver. 16. David acknowledges the punishing hand of the Lord. He goes away to a retired spot, to collect himself and pour out his heart before God. The phrase "went in" refers to his going not to the Sanctuary (to which he does not go till ver. 20), but to a quiet room in his house, where he could be alone; Vulg.: ingressus seorsum ["he went in apart"].—Ver. 17. The elders of his house are its oldest and most trusted servants. Comp. Gen. xxiv. 2; 1. 7. So Clericus. Whether David's uncles and oldest brothers are thereby meant (Ewald) must remain undecided.—Ver. 18. The elders hesitate to tell David of the death of the child, lest he be plunged into deeper grief, or do himself a harm. Vulg.: "how much more will he afflict himself?" [David's affection for this child is remarkable. He was a "great lover of his children" (Patrick) and perhaps specially attached to this one by reason of his love for its mother.—Tr.]—Ver. 19 sqq. David's conduct is the opposite of what the servants expected. The solution of their perplexity lay in the fact that David had hitherto prayed for the child's life, but now bowed humbly beneath God's hand, and thus gains strength joyfully to bear the burden laid on him. David's two courses of conduct in immediate juxtaposition have one common source within him; namely, humble, unconditional devotion of heart to the will of the Lord. After "and he asked" [ver. 20] "bread" is omitted, because it is mentioned immediately afterwards. The shorter phrase is obviously original; the addition of the Sept.: "bread to eat" is an interpretation.—Ver. 21. Render: "thou didst fast and weep for (וַעֲבַדְתָּ) the child, while it yet lived" [= for the child living—Tr.]; so Vulg., Cler., Ew. § 341 b [Sept., Eng. A. V.]; not "while the child lived" (Ges., De Wette, Maur., Keil [Chald., Syr., Luther]), since as conjunction the word denotes only either the ground or the end.—Ver. 22. See on vers. 19 sqq. David had continued to hope that the Lord would hear his prayer and spare the child.—Ver. 23. The continued existence of the child's soul in Sheol is here assumed, and the hope of reunion with it expressed. "Nothing is said, indeed, of conscious existence, but this must have been supposed, in order to find consolation and repose in going to the dead" (Böttch., de inferis, § 109 sq.).

* [Sept., changing the accents, has: "what is this that thou hast done for the child? while it yet lived thou didst fast, etc.," and this is adopted by Thénius (after Hitzig), and declared by Wellhausen to be the only possible construction of the words. The latter, however, points out the two difficulties in this construction, that we do not expect any qualifying phrase after "thou hast done," and that the curtness and isolation of the וַיֵּשֶׁה is hard. He therefore reads וַיֵּשֶׁה (as in ver. 22) "while the child was yet alive" instead of וַעֲבַדְתָּ, for which, says Böttcher, there is no need. The construction of Eng. A. V., though not without its difficulties, may be retained, though Wellhausen's suggestion commends itself as more natural and grammatical.—Tr.]

Vers. 24, 25. Birth of Solomon. David comforted Bathsheba, because he himself had received comfort. The Sept. prefixes "she conceived" to our appropriately curt text "she bare a son." And he called his name Solomon.† Solomon's birth is mentioned here because of its factual connection with what precedes. The name Solomon, like the similar names in Lev. xxiv. 11; Num. xxxiv. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 25 sq., was "an old and common one . . . it is therefore wholly without foundation to say that Solomon first received this name from the 'peace' of his time" (Ew., Gesch. [Hist. of Israel] III. p. 228, Rem. 1). It is probable, indeed, that Solomon's birth occurred just after the conquest of Rabbah related below; for, as Bathsheba's first son was conceived during the siege, this siege, if Solomon was born before its termination, would have lasted about two years [Cler., Thenius]. Nevertheless the name Solomon is to be explained not from the peace gained by the Ammonite war, but (after 1 Chr. xxii. 9) from the wish that peace might be allotted him as a gift of God, in contrast with the continual wars of his father's life. And the Lord loved him.—Here instead of David, the Lord appears as subject; and so in the verb "sent" [ver. 25] the Lord is subject, not David, since the latter had already given the name Solomon. Ewald renders: "he (David) asked through Nathan from the oracle a loftier name for his new-born son;" but this rests on the inappropriate conception of the words "Jehovah loved him" as referring to the maintenance of this child's life [in contrast with the dead child—Tr.], apart from the fact that the subject "Jehovah" is again arbitrarily changed. This last consideration is also against the rendering: "and he (David) gave him into the hand of Nathan the prophet (to bring up)," where the Piel of the verb would be required. The expression in the text (Qal with לְ [to send by the hand of]) means to give a commission (comp. Ex. iv. 13). Jehovah sent Nathan to David with the commission to give the child the name Jedidiah. Nathan is expressly called prophet, because he appeared in divine commission as such. This was the factual opposite of the former message [ver. 1], God's declaration that He had bestowed His grace and mercy on David and his child. The subject of the verb "called" is Nathan. "On account of Jehovah," that is, because Jehovah loved him, as the name signified (= "beloved of Jehovah," Germ. Gottlieb.)* While Solomon was the name given him by his parents, by which he was to be called, Jedidiah, as the high name given him by the prophet, denoted the Lord's love and faithfulness bestowed on him whose light was to illumine his whole life. [Böttcher, Thenius and Wellhausen insist on rendering ver. 25: "and he committed him to the care of Nathan," etc., which agrees, says Thenius, with the general opinion (of which, however, there is not a word in the Bible) that Nathan was Solomon's tutor. This is also the view of Victorinus Strigelius quoted by Patrick, and is certainly more in keeping with the context than the other. If the view of Eng. A. V. and Erdmann be correct we should expect some additional explanatory phrase; unless the next sentence is such a complementary phrase, in which case the subject of "called" must be the same as that of "sent," namely Jehovah. But, as Erdmann himself points out, the subject of "called" is not Jehovah, but either Nathan or David. For this reason it seems better to take David also as subject of "sent" or delivered." David committed him (reading the Piel) to Nathan, and Nathan gave him his higher name. Vers. 26-31. Conquest of Rabbah and cruel punishment of the Ammonites. Comp. 1 Chr. xx. 1-3.—Ver. 26 sqq. The narrative returns to xi. 1. From the connection the "city of the kingdom,"† the capital of the kingdom, is the whole city, not merely the water-town (ver. 27) "excluding the acropolis" (Keil). Joab, as commanding general, conducting the siege, conquered the whole city; and this result is here summarily stated in advance. [But this statement does not read like an anticipative summary; the capture of ver. 29 seems to be different from that of ver. 26.—Tr.].—Ver. 27 sq. Detailed account of the affair, especially how Joab, after taking the water-city, summoned the king, who had remained in Jerusalem (xi. 1), in order that the remaining higher part of the city might be taken under his direction to the honor of the royal name. And so it happened, though it was none the less true (ver. 26) that Joab was the real conqueror. Vulg.: "lest, the city being taken by me, the victory should be ascribed to my name." Luther: "that I may not have the name of it."—To judge from the ruins of Ammon (comp. Ritter XV., p. 1145 sq.) the capital-city of the Ammonites lay on both banks of the Upper Jabbok, in a narrow valley, on the north side of which on an eminence was the citadel ("the city" ver. 28) towering above

Sept. and Vulg. write Salomon, and New Test. (Greek) Solomon, which our translators have adopted (Bib. Com.). The Arabic form is Suleiman, Syr. Sheleimun. MSS. read as in ver. 26, and Wellhausen proposes to read ver. 26 as ver. 27. Certainly if Joab had already captured the whole city, there would be no room for David's capture (ver. 29), and so Keil's explanation must be adopted if we retain the Heb. text.—Tr.]

the whole lower city ("the water-city"). This citadel was not taken by Joab till David came, in order that the completion of the conquest might appear as the deed of the king himself. See Curt. 6, 6 (quoted by Grotius): "he (Craterus), after everything was prepared, awaited the coming of the king (Alexander), yielding to him, as was proper, the honor of the capture of the city."—[Eng. A. V. has: "and it be called after my name." As there seems to be no example of a conquered city's being called after the name of the conqueror, it may be better to render (with Erdmann and others): "and my name be called (or honored) upon (in respect to) it." However, the ordinary meaning of the phrase is as in Eng. A. V.—Joab's conduct here is either that of a devoted servant, wishing to give his master honor or shield him from popular disfavor (on account of the affair of Bathsheba), or that of an adroit courtier, who will not run the risk of exciting his king's envy by too much success (see 1 Sam. xviii. 6-8).—Tr.].—Ver. 29. All the people, the soldiers that had remained at home; the besieging force had to be strengthened in order to conquer the strong Upper City.—Ver. 30. When the citadel was taken, the king of the Ammonites was either killed or captured. David took the crown from his head, and set it on his own, in order to represent himself as lord of the Ammonite kingdom. The kikkar [talent] was 3000 shekels (comp. Winer, s. v. Gewichte); the weight of the crown was 83½ [Dresden] pounds [= about 100 English pounds, for the silver talent, which was probably the current unit of weight; the gold-talent weighed twice as much.—Tr.]. This heavy crown of gold and precious stones might have been worn during the short time of coronation by a strong man like David. In many places now weights scarcely less heavy are borne on the head even by women. We need not, therefore, suppose that the weight is here accidentally exaggerated (Keil), nor that the crown was supported on the throne above the head (Clericus). [Some would understand that the value, and not the weight of the crown is here given; but the text-word can mean nothing but "weight." The Sept. has: "he took the crown of Molchom their king from his head." This reading Molkom or Milkom instead of "their king" is adopted by Geiger (p. 306), who sees in our Hebrew text an illustration of the tendency to get rid of the names of idol deities. As our text stands the suffix "their" is strange, since the Ammonites are not mentioned immediately before (Wellh.), and we might also expect here the mention of the Ammonite king by name (Bib.-Comm.). We may therefore render: "he took Malcom's (Moloch's) crown from his head."—Tr.].—Ver. 31. The cruel punishments inflicted by David on the Ammonites were probably the same that they were accustomed to inflict on the Israelites or other nations in war. For their cruelties see 1 Sam. xi. 2 and Am. i. 8. As they did, so it was done to them. Instead of "he put them under saws, etc." we must read: "he cut them with saws, etc.," as in Chron. and the Targum (לִצְרֹק instead of לִצְלוֹק); our present text can only be rendered: "he put them into saws," etc., a phrase that cannot be applied to the saw. Comp. Heb. xi. 37, and Sueton. Caligula 27: "he cut them in two with the saw." And with cutting instruments [Eng. A. V. axes] of iron. Instead of this 1 Chr. xx. 3 has "saws" a second time, a clerical error* for "axes" [Eng. A. V. corrects the error, and renders "axes."—Tr.].—In the next clause the Qeri, Sept. and Vulg. [and Eng. A. V.] read: "made them pass through the brick-kiln,"† that is, burned them in brick-kilns (Keil). But the text is to be retained with Kimchi, whose explanation is essentially correct: "he passed them through Malchan, i. e., the place where the Ammonites burned their sons to their idol." Instead of mal-kan (from מֹלֶךְ = Moloch) we may with Bött. pronounce the word milkon = milkom.‡ Both denote the image of Moloch (comp. 1 Kings xi. 5, 33). In the burning image human sacrifices were offered to Moloch, and "to cause to pass through (or, through the fire) to Moloch" is the usual phrase for this idol-service§ (see Lev. xviii. 21; 2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. xxxii. 35; Ezek. xx. 31). "The design was to inflict a striking punishment on idolatry, and in so far the war was a holy one" (Then.). The milder explanation of the punishment as consisting in the imposition of severe labors, cutting wood, burning bricks, etc. (Danz and others) is inconsistent with the words of the text. However, the text does not require us to suppose that all the inhabitants of Rabbah were thus treated; it was probably only the soldiers that were in the Upper City ["and so he did to all the cities of the Ammonites."—Tr.].

By this Ammonite war (probably the last that he waged) David had extended and strengthened his kingdom toward the whole east. By all his wars (Chron. viii. sqq.) the boundaries of his kingdom were so far extended that it was secure against heathen nations. But this splendor of outward power and dominion stood in sharp contrast with the inward disintegration of the royal house and of the whole people through David's sin.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David's condition of soul in the time from his fall to his repentance may be understood from the fact that it needed such a strong impulse as Nathan's discourse to bring him to repentance, while on the other hand the word of confession followed immediately on the discourse. This latter indicates that his conscience had accused him of sin; but frank confession had been somehow hindered, till the hindrance was set aside by Nathan's word. The confession was preceded

* מְנִירוֹת for מְנִירוֹת.

† מִלְכִּין instead of Kethib מִלְכִּין.

‡ Böttcher: The Kethib needs no change, for מִלְכִּין is a Hebraized form of מֹלֶכֶם, the ending om being augmentative.

§ [As Dr. Erdmann remarks, the standing formula is "to pass through to Moloch," and the Heb. text cannot be so rendered; it is "in" malkon. It is a further objection to this view that the phrase was used distinctly of the worship of Moloch, and would hardly be used of an act of punishment. But if the Qeri be adopted, the phrase is still hard, because of the preposition: "he made them pass through in the kiln," the usual phrase omitting the preposition. No satisfactory translation of the words has yet been offered.—Tr.]

by a silence, which did not proceed from a contrite heart, but concealed an unquiet conscience and distracted heart. Thenius rightly says: "Psalm xxxii. describes what David felt before he was led to confession of sin by Nathan's address." The expression (vers. 3, 4): "for I kept silence; my bones wasted away in my crying all the day; for day and night thy hand was heavy upon me," sets forth how his silence was accompanied by consuming anguish of body and soul, wherein he felt in his conscience the oppressive burden of God's punitive righteousness, without being thereby moved to confession of sin. "We see plainly from Psalm xxxii. what bitter inward struggles he endured before he yielded to the divine chastisement and grew strong enough to confess his sins openly before God" (Ewald). These inward conflicts were produced by two factors: (1) the constant "weight of God's hand on him"—the accusing, condemning voice of conscience, the inward completion of the divine judgment; (2) his impenitent, uncontrite heart (which was the cause of his silence), which wished to "maintain its rights" by self-excuse and self-justification against the inevitable divine judgment (comp. Ps. li. 6). This was "the guile in his spirit" (ver. 2), which was the ground of his silence ("for," ver. 3). He was not upright in heart (ver. 11), so that he did not honestly confess his sins, but concealed them (comp. ver. 5). Thus Psalm xxxii. fills out our picture of David's condition and conduct after his sin and after Nathan's piercing punitive discourse. Against the reference of this Psalm to the crime of David against Bathsheba it has been alleged (De Wette, Stier, Clausen, Hitzig) that in it the confession comes from inward pain of conscience, while in 2 Sam. xii. it is occasioned by Nathan's discourse. The two facts, however, are not mutually exclusive, but mutually complementary. Nathan's discourse is not the ground, but the occasion of David's confession. See Hengstenberg on Ps. xxxii. for the particular points in which the Psalm and the history correspond to one another.

2. The deceit of the impenitent heart consists in its seeking to excuse and justify itself despite the condemnation of conscience, while it yet obtains no relief from the feeling of guilt, rather brings about a sharper reaction of conscience, and increases the pains that come from the conflict of mutually accusing and excusing thoughts. Sin is not gotten rid of by failure to acknowledge it; it rests all the more heavily on the conscience, and the closer the mouth that ought to confess is shut, the clearer sounds out the accusing, judging voice of conscience. "The roots of this deceit (which appears immediately after the Fall of man) are pride, lack of trust in God, and love of sin. Many are thereby kept altogether from confession of sin, in Pelagian self-blinding take delight in their wretchedness, and think themselves most excellent. In others are seen the beginnings of true confession; but they do not obtain the goal, because guile prevents them from acknowledging the whole extent of their harm. And even they that have really come into a gracious state, greatly embitter by guile the blessing of the forgiveness, that they have attained through sincerity. What especially exposes them to this temptation is their strict view of sin and of its condemnableness before God and the consciousness of the grace received from God and of their situation. Nature struggles vigorously against the deep humiliation which (especially for them) recognition and confession of sin carries with it. It is therefore necessary that they lay deeply to heart David's word (vers. 1, 2), spoken out of painful experience of the misery of guile: happy is he whose transgression is removed, etc." (Hengst.). But it is a quality of the deceit of the impenitent heart to apply God's word, the mirror of sin, to others rather than to itself, and thus to put away self-examination and self-knowledge in its light.

3. The grace of God does not suffer man to go on unwarned in the path of sin, but leads him to recognition and confession of sin, and to an humble bowing under the mighty hand that must smite him for his sin. The divine grace herein employs human instruments like Nathan; and the only effective means in this case of bringing men to confession is the word of God, which 1) shows them sin in its true form, in unadorned full reality, in all its baseness and shockingness (comp. vers. 1-6); 2) points out the fullness of the divine benefits that should have kept them from sin, in the presence of which sin appears as sheer ingratitude (vers. 7, 8); 3) presses home the demands of God's holy will in His word and law (ver. 9); and 4) exhibits the inevitable results of sin as the sign of the divine retributive righteousness, under which man must bow.—When a man quietly opens his heart, as David did, to this ministry of grace (that leads to penitence), then appears its purposed working: 1) deep, penitent recognition of sin, not merely as an offence against man, but as enmity "against the Lord Himself," so that there is an end to the blindness about the nature of sin, founded on self-love; 2) sincere, frank confession of sin as an offence against the holy God, so that now ceases the inward conflict of opposing accusations and excuses, of a condemning conscience and a pride founded on self-justifying self-love. Open confession of sin was a legal part of the sin-offering, Lev. v. 5; xvi. 21; Num. v. 7.—"I have sinned against the Lord. The words are very few, as with the publican in Luke xviii. 13. But just that is a good sign of a truly broken heart; here is no excusing, no shrouding, no belittling of sin; no hiding-place is sought; no pretext used, no human weakness pleaded" (Berl. Bib.); 3) personal experience of the comfort of the forgiveness of sin, granted to the sinner of God's free grace, he having done nothing to deserve it. "The Lord also hath taken away thy sin" (ver. 13). From this experience comes confidence and certainty of the grace received; 4) humble, quiet submission to the suffering inflicted by the Lord as the consequence of sin, which is to be for the chastisement, purification and trying of the penitent and believing heart (vers. 14-23), and 5) renewed enjoyment of the friendliness and goodness of the divine love (vers. 24, 25).

4. As Ps. xxxii. exhibits the frame of mind out of which David came to sincere penitence, so Ps. li. (as the title indicates) is the echo of the personal experience of God's grace, which alone is the source of the forgiveness of sin and blotting out of guilt (vers. 3, 4 [Eng. 1, 2]), under the condition of penitent confession of personal transgression against the Lord deeply founded in inborn sinfulness (vers. 5-8 [3-6]), and of humble supplication for grace (vers. 9-11 [7-9]) and renewal (vers. 12-14 [10-12]) out of a broken and contrite heart (vers. 15-21 [13-19]). On the correspondence of the chief features of this Psalm with the history see Hengstenberg's and Hupfeld's commentaries thereon.—[If Ps. li. was written or composed on this occasion, then the two last verses must probably be regarded as a later addition (the sentiment is similar to that of liii. 7 (6); lxxix. 9, and other passages). For the rest, the spiritual teaching of this Psalm and Ps. xxxii. is entirely independent of their historical origin.—TR.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

God does not leave men in their sins to go their own way unwarned and unchastised, but sends His messengers after them to call them to repentance.—The word of God that would call the sinner to repentance reminds him on the one hand of the fulness of the divine manifestations of grace and the manifold gifts of God's goodness, in order to shame the sinner for his ingratitude and disobedience; on the other hand it points him to the earnestness of God's holiness and righteousness in His commands. To this end it often clothes itself in image and similitude, in order either to work in the man receptivity for the indwelling power that awakens to repentance, if the man will give heed, or so far as this is not the case, so much the more to harden the inner man, comp. Matt. xiii. 10-16.

The right sort of awakening preaching consists in immediate direct application of the word of God to individual hearts, so that after holding up the mirror of God's law, it is always said: Thou art the man! Men are always, according to their natural disposition, inclined to look not at their own sins, but at the sins of others, to judge and pass sentence on them. Such looking away from one's self to the sins in the world around often finds its occasion and temptation in preaching upon the universal sinfulness of mankind and in testimonies against the sins of the times or of a whole people; if these testimonies are to be effectual for awakening in the hearers a true repentance, they must have their point in the word: Thou art the man!—As clearly as the sins of others, should we see and recognize our own sins; as inexorably and strictly as we judge and pass sentence upon others, should we enter into judgment with ourselves. But this is done only when we let the word: "Thou art the man," press into our hearts.

The humble confession: "I have sinned against the Lord," roots itself in the penitent recognition of guilt, and has as a consequence the assurance of forgiveness of all sins, not as something thereby deserved and won but as a gift of the free grace of God, which grace immediately answers the honest and penitent confession of guilt by acquitting of guilt; the sinner's unreserved confession is followed by unconditional divine absolution.

Rescue of the man fallen into sin. 1) The compassionate God stretches out to him the receiving hand (Nathan's mission and reproof). 2) The fallen one seizes this hand, and by its help lifts himself up in humility of heart and honest confession of guilt.—Repentance and grace: 1) How repentance is a work of grace, or how grace leads to repentance, and 2) How the experience of grace in the consolation of forgiveness is conditioned on repentance, or how repentance leads to grace.—The right sort of awakening preaching is that which 1) In view of the fulness of God's goodness reveals the sinner's ingratitude, 2) In view of the earnestness of God's commands reveals the sinner's disobedience, and 3) Puts an end to all self-justification and excuses by the earnestness of the word: Thou art the man!

True Repentance: 1) Wherein it consists. In penitent recognition and confession of sin as of enmity against the holy God ("I have sinned against the Lord"). 2) How it is attained. In the ways along which the sinner is led by seeking, pursuing and preventing grace. 3) Whither it leads. To the consolation of the forgiveness of all sins, to an humble yielding to the chastening hand of God under the sufferings which necessarily follow from sin, and to new experiences of God's love in the joy which, after sufferings patiently borne, is granted by Him.—The painful consequences of sin are for the penitent man a means of grace. 1) In order to prove and try his faith and confidence in God's fatherly love. 2) To chasten and instruct in righteousness, according to the holy will of God. 3) To purge from still clinging sinfulness. 4) To establish in a state of grace.

VERS. 1-4. STARKE: God does not always keep silent to the sins of the ungodly, but at the proper time sets them before their eyes, Ps. l. 21.—DISSELHOFF: That is always God's way, first to speak to the sinner in similitudes, in dark sayings, in works and deeds. Dumb preachers, and yet calling so loud! For those similitudes in which the Lord speaks to us contain no unintelligible speech, these trumpets give no uncertain sound.—CRAMER: In the office of reproof one must not be too mild, nor yet too sharp, but must so manage that what is said shall be penetrating, shall smite the heart, shall stir and shame the conscience.—[HALL: He that hates sin so much the more as the offender is more dear to him, will let David feel the bruise of his fall. If God's best children have been sometimes suffered to sleep in a sin, at last He hath awakened them in a fright.—Nathan the prophet is sent to the prophet David. Let no man think himself too good to learn; teachers themselves may be taught that, in their own particular, which, in a generality, they have often taught others: it is not only ignorance that is to be removed, but misaffection.—There is no one thing wherein is more use of wisdom, than the due contriving of a reprehension.—TR.]

VERS. 5, sq. SCHLIER: We see well the wrong that others do, even if it is only a trifling mote, and how little we care for our own failings, how little we mark our lapses even when it is great beams that we bear in ourselves.—[HALL: How severe justicers we can be to our very own crimes in others.—TR.]—Wilt thou judge, then judge thyself, and wilt thou be strict, then before all be strict against thyself, and wilt thou be indulgent,

Vers. 7 sqq. [HALL: The life of doctrine (teaching) is in the application. We may take pleasure to hear men speak in the clouds—we never take profit till we find a propriety in the exhortation or reproof. There was not more cunning in the parable than cunning in the application: "Thou art the man."—TR.]—DISSELHOFF: He who is used by God to call out to another, "Thou art the man," often does not himself know that he has performed Nathan's service. The Lord sends His word like arrows; so many are struck, in the preaching of the divine word, exactly as if the word had been aimed at their heart alone. It is aimed at them too, only not by men, but by God Himself.—S. SCHMID: Every sin is despising God.—CRAMER: Despising the divine word is the evil fountain of all sins (Proverbs xxix. 18).—STARKE: With whatever one sins, with that he is also commonly punished.—SCHLIER: He who insults the word of the Lord, even this word will crush him to atoms, and he who sins against the commandment of God, even this commandment which he has despised will become to him a consuming fire. He who practises injustice and violence shall in his time himself also experience injustice and violence, and he who commits adultery will in his own honor become conscious of God's judgment.—CRAMER: God punishes sin with sin, not that He has pleasure in sin, or that He works it or works with it, but that as a strict Judge, He pronounces sentence and inflicts and permits the evil.

Ver. 13 sq. SCHLIER: He who openly and unreservedly acknowledges himself guilty has thereby inwardly cut himself loose from sin, and broken with it in his heart.—DISSELHOFF: "I have sinned against the Lord." There is in the Bible no confession so unconditional, no expression of repentance so short, but also none so thoroughly true. So long as sin reigns upon the earth, all penitent sinners will with this confession cast themselves down before God, into this confession will they pour out their hearts, this confession will become ever more openly, deeply, truly and movingly their prayer, and they will know how to say nothing else. [HALL: It was but a short word, but passionate; and such as came from the bottom of a contrite heart. The greatest griefs are not most verbal. Saul confessed his sin more largely, less effectually. God cares not for phrases, but for affections. David had sworn, in a zeal of justice, that the rich oppressor, for but taking his poor neighbor's lamb, shall die the death; God, by Nathan, is more favorable to David than to take him at his word, "Thou shalt not die." Comp. Prov. xxviii. 13.—TR.]—CRAMER: God forgives the sin out of grace, and remits also the eternal punishment; but He reserves the cross and the chastisement, not for satisfaction, but in order to continual remembrance of sin and exercise in piety, and as a terror to others.—STARKE [from HALL]: So long as He smites us not as an angry Judge, we may endure to smart from Him as a loving Father (Heb. xii. 6-9).

Ver. 15 sq. J. LANGE: God visits the parents in the children, whether graciously or in wrath.—SCHLIER: There is a distinction between punishment of sin and the outward consequences of sin, which may follow even for him who has forgiveness, only that all this is no longer a punishment of sin, but a gracious, fatherly visitation of the faithful God, who chastens His people even when He loves them, yea, even because of His love and compassion chastens them, that they may not anew fall into sin.—DISSELHOFF: Grace is free, wholly unconditional. But yet he to whom grace is shown must remain under the chastening rod of the almighty and holy God.—SCHLIER: How should severe sickness in the house be a proof of divine favor? If God the Lord had let every thing at once go on for David according to his desire and will, who knows how soon he would perhaps again have felt secure and have forgotten the Lord who had forgiven his sins? but now that the Lord chastens him, how he learns to pray and weep, how he humbles himself, how he holds all the more faithfully to the Lord and to His word!

Ver. 17 sqq. OSIANDER: Even dear children of God are not always heard, when they pray for temporal gifts and obtain, not what they desire, but what is profitable for them (1 John v. 14).—[HALL: Till we know the determinations of the Almighty, it is free for us to strive in our prayers, to strive with Him, not against Him; when once we know them, it is our duty to sit down in a silent contentation.—TR.]—DISSELHOFF: This is the triumph of grace! It transforms the inevitable consequences of sin and horrors of damnation into a purifying fire, hot indeed, but rich in blessing, in which the objects of grace receive the image and stamp of their Redeemer. [SCOTT: Those who are ignorant of the divine life cannot comprehend the reasons of a believer's conduct in his varied experiences; they mistake deep humility and fervent prayer for an impatience and an inordinate love to created objects; acquiescence in the Lord's will, and cheerful gratitude under sharp trials, will be deemed indifference and apathy, etc.—Ver. 23. WESLEY (Sermon CXXXII.): Profuse sorrowing for the dead is unprofitable and sinful; and the text affords a consideration which ought to prevent this sorrow.—TR.]

Ver. 24 sqq. CRAMER: God's promise is the cause of His love towards us, not our merit and worthiness (1 John iv. 10).—SCHLIER: When we have allowed the Lord's chastening to promote our welfare and peace, and are holding still before the Lord, even if we see around us nothing but suffering and trouble, then the Lord takes us up again and blesses us and gives us twofold for all the hardness we have had to endure. The Lord blesses much more willingly than He chastens, His fatherly hands had much rather open in beneficence than in affliction.

DISSELHOFF: The triumph of grace in all its glory. It unfolds itself in three steps: 1) Not the fallen one looks up to God, but God's preventing grace in every way lets itself down to him, in order to awaken his conscience. 2) He who lets himself be awakened and openly and unconditionally confesses, receives full and unconditional pardon. 3) The pardoned man must remain under the sharp chastening rod of the Compassionate One, in order that he may learn more and more to know the depths of sin as well as of grace.

[CARLYLE:* David, the Hebrew king, had fallen into sins enough; blackest crimes; there was no want of sins. And thereupon unbelievers sneer and ask, "Is this your man according to God's heart?" The sneer, I must say, seems to me but a shallow one. What are faults? what are the outward details of a life, if the inner secret of it—the remorse, temptations, true, often-baffled, never-ending struggle of it—be forgotten? The deadliest sin were the supercilious consciousness of no sin. David's life and history, as written for us in those Psalms of his, I consider to be the truest emblem ever given of a man's moral progress and warfare here below. All earnest souls will ever discern in it the faithful struggle of an earnest human soul toward what is good and best. Struggle often baffled—sore baffled—driven as into entire wreck, yet a struggle never ended; ever with tears, repentance, true, unconquerable purpose begun anew.—TR.]

CHRYSOSTOM:† David the prophet, whose kingdom was in Palestine and temporary, but whose words as a prophet are for the ends of the earth and immortal, fell into adultery and murder—the prophet in adultery, the pearl in the mire. But he did not yet know that he had sinned; so stupefied was he. God sends to him Nathan; the prophet comes to the prophet—just as in the case of physicians, when a physician is sick he needs another physician. Nathan does not at the very door begin to rebuke and upbraid him—that would have made him hardened and shameless. . . . And the king said, "I have sinned against the Lord." He did not say, Why, who art thou that reprovest me? and who sent thee to speak boldly? and how hast thou dared to do this? . . . But precisely in this is that noble man most admirable, that having fallen into the very depths of wickedness, he did not despair nor fling himself prostrate so as to receive from the devil a mortal blow, but quickly and with great vehemence gave a more mortal blow than he received. . . . This history was written not that thou mightest gaze at one who fell, but that thou mightest admire one who rose again; that thou mightest learn, whenever thou hast fallen, how to rise again. For just as physicians select the most grievous diseases and record them in the books, explaining the method of healing them, in order that by exercise in the greater they may easily overcome the lesser diseases, so also God has brought forward the greatest sins in order that they also who commit little offences may through those great examples find the task of correction to be easy.—TR.]

[Ver. 1. David keeping silence. Comp. Psalm xxxii. 3, 4. See above, "Hist. and Theol.," No. 1.—Vers. 5, 6. Not only may a guilty man judge severely the crimes of others, but his easy consciousness of guilt may even create an ill-humor that will dispose him to all the greater severity.—Ver. 7. "Thou art the man." One might picture an ungrateful son, a spendthrift, a suicide, etc., and charge each, as to spiritual relations and life, upon the hearer.—TR.]

[Vers. 1-14. A pattern in reproving. It is always difficult to reprove with good results, and here the difficulties were peculiarly great. An Oriental king—who has committed a series of enormous crimes, has tried to cover them up, is now moody and irritable. See now the course pursued by the prophet. 1) He approaches the offender in private. 2) He uses an affecting parallel case to awaken the sense of justice, without arousing suspicion of his design—thus inducing the king to feel, and to express himself very strongly. 3) He suddenly and emphatically applies the story, and pours upon the wrong-doer the recital of his crimes. 4) He gladly welcomes confession and penitence, and at once turns from rebuke to comfort.—Ver. 14. "Great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." 1) Only the enemies of the Lord would blaspheme, upon whatsoever occasion. 2) Though the faults of good men are not the cause of blasphemy, it is a great evil to give occasion for it. (a) The enemies may thus partially delude themselves. (b) They will be sure to mislead others. 3) Though there be occasion, yet the comments of God's enemies are blasphemous. E. g. (a) When they infer that God does not hate sin. (b) That God's service makes men no better than they would otherwise be.—TR.]

[Vers. 15-23. The death of David's child. 1) The mortal illness of a babe, always so distressing to parents, and in this case having peculiarly distressing conditions. 2) David's persevering prayer, notwithstanding the prophet's prediction. 3) His submission, as soon as he knew the child was dead. 4) His confidence of being reunited with the child hereafter.—TR.]

3. Breaking up of David's house and family by the crimes of his sons Amnon and Absalom.

CHAPTER XIII. 1-39.

a. Amnon's incest with Tamar. Vers. 1-21.

1 AND it came to pass after this that Absalom the son of David had a fair sister,
2 whose name was Tamar; and Amnon the son of David loved her. And Amnon was so vexed [troubled]¹ that he fell sick for his sister Tamar; for she was a virgin, 3 and Amnon thought it hard for him, to do anything to her. But [And] Amnon had a friend whose name was Jonadab², the son of Shimeah David's brother; and 4 Jonadab was a very subtil man. And he said unto him, Why art thou, being the king's son, lean from day to day [Why art thou so lean, O son of the king, morning by morning]? wilt thou not tell me? And Amnon said unto him, I love Ta-5 mar my brother Absalom's sister. And Jonadab said unto him, Lay thee down on thy bed, and make [feign] thyself sick; and when thy father cometh to see thee, say unto him, I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come, and give me meat [food³ to eat], and dress [prepare] the meat [food³] in my sight, that I may see it and eat it 6 at her hand. So [And] Amnon lay down and made [feigned] himself sick. And when the king was come [And the king came] to see him, [ins. and] Amnon said unto the king, I pray thee, let Tamar my sister come, and make me a couple of 7 cakes in my sight, that I may eat at her hand. Then [And] David sent home to Tamar [sent to Tamar to the house], saying, Go now [I pray thee] to thy brother 8 Amnon's house, and dress [prepare] him meat [the food]. So [And] Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house, and he was laid down; and she took flour [the 9 dough] and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes. And she took a [the] pan,⁴ and poured them out before him; but [and] he refused to eat. And Amnon said, Have out all men from me. And they went out every man 10 from him. And Amnon said unto Tamar, Bring the meat [food] into the chamber, that I may eat of [at] thine hand. And Tamar took the cakes which she had 11 made, and brought them into the chamber to Amnon her brother. And when she had brought [And she handed] them unto him to eat, [ins. and] he took hold of 12 her, and said unto her, Come lie with me my sister. And she answered [said to] him, Nay, my brother, do not force [humble] me, for no such thing ought to be

² [Ver. 3. The name Jonadab (abbreviated from Jehonadab) means "Jahveh has freely given," as Jonathan means "Jahveh has given;" but there is no ground for supposing that the two names (here and xxi. 21) represent the same person (Josephus).—T_a.]

³ [Ver. 5. Two different words are used for "food," the first the ordinary expression (לֶחֶם), the second a rarer word (בִּרְיָה), rendered βρώμα by the Sept. The word לֶחֶם "cake" is discussed by Erdmann in the Exposition.—T_a.]

⁴ [Ver. 9. כִּשְׂרִית, an obscure word. It is nearly identical in form with the Chaldee כִּסְרִית "pan," which is the rendering in the Targum of the Heb. כֶּמֶחַ "pan," and is by some (Oahen) regarded as the Chald. word itself here used instead of the ordinary Heb. word, which is, however, improbable in the Book of Samuel. But while Chald. and Sept. (and Josephus) render it "pan," Syr. and Vulg. regarded it as designating the food that had been prepared: Vulg. quod coxerat, Syr. "cakes," and such a meaning would better suit the connection. But no satisfactory etymology has been proposed for it. Geiger's explanation (Urschrift, p. 382), that it is for כִּשְׂאִית (from שָׂאָר "unbaked leavened dough" is not in keeping with the statement in ver. 8 that the dough had been baked. The meaning of the word must be left undetermined.—T_a.]

- 13 done in Israel; do not thou this folly. And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go [shall I carry my reproach]? and as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel. Now, therefore, I pray thee, speak [And now, speak, I pray thee] unto 14 the king; for he will not withhold me from thee. Howbeit [And] he would not hearken unto her voice, but, being stronger than she, forced her [and he was stronger
 15 than she, and humbled her], and lay with her.⁶ Then [And] Amnon hated her exceedingly [with a very great hate]; so that the hatred wherewith he hated her was greater than the love wherewith he had loved her. And Amnon said unto her,
 16 Arise, be gone. And she said unto him, There⁶ is no cause; this evil in sending me away is greater than the other that thou didst unto me. But [And] he would 17 not hearken unto her. Then [And] he called his servant [young man] that ministered⁷ unto him, and said, Put now [ye] this woman out from me, and bolt the door after her. And she had a garment of divers colours [a long-sleeved garment⁸] upon 18 her; for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled.
 19 Then [And] his servant brought her out, and bolted the door after her. And Tamar put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colours [the long-sleeved garment] that was on her, and laid her hand on her head, and went on crying 20 [ins. as she went]. And Absalom her brother said unto her, Hath Amnon thy brother been with thee? but hold now thy peace, my sister [and now, my sister, hold thy peace]; he is thy brother; regard not this thing. So [And] Tamar remained 21 desolate in her brother Absalom's house. But⁹ when [And] king David heard of all these things, [ins. and] he was very wroth.

b. Amnon murdered by Absalom. Vers. 22-33.

- 22 And Absalom spake unto his brother Amnon neither good nor bad; for Absalom hated Amnon because he had forced [humbled] his sister Tamar. And it came

⁶ [Ver. 14. The מִתָּה, pointed in the text as Accus., may be read מִתָּהּ "with her," for which several MSS. read עִמָּה; but the Accus. is allowable (later usage, according to Wellhausen).—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 16. The translation of Eng. A. V. is impossible in the present form of the Hebrew text; the text, indeed, gives no sense at all, and must be regarded as corrupt. Dr. Erdmann (changing מִל into אֵל and regarding the sentence as interrupted) renders: "on account of this evil, which is greater than the other, etc.," but such a rendering of מִל-אֵל is without authority, and does not fit well with the context. Philippeau also, throwing forward the beginning of Tamar's speech, translates: "and she said to him respecting the evil deed, Greater is this than the other, etc.," which is intolerably flat. We should naturally regard the מִל as introducing a protest, as in ver. 12; and, changing the מִל-אֵל into מִלִּי, we obtain the sense (by transposing the Adjective גְּדוֹלָה): "nay, my brother, this evil is greater than the other, etc.," which is nearly what the Vat. Sept. (in verse 16) and some other Greek versions (in Montfaucon's Hexapla) give: "nay, my brother, for the last evil is greater than the first, etc." These Greek versions apparently had הָרְעָה אֲשֶׁנָּה instead of מִלִּי, so that their text read: מִלִּי אָחִי כִּי גְדוֹלָה הָרְעָה הָאֲחֵרָה מִהָרְעָה אֲשֶׁר. The "this" of our Hebrew text is supported by the Syr. "why doest thou me this grievous evil, etc.?" and by the Sept. in ver. 16, which seems, however, to be altered into conformity with the Heb.—Or, following ver. 12 more exactly, we may write: מִלִּי אָחִי אֵל-הָרְעָה "nay, my brother, do not this evil which is greater, etc.;" the text above-given is simpler and more in accordance with the ancient versions.—Some MSS. and printed editions have עַל instead of מִל (according to the constant usage with אֵל in the O. T.), and this reading is adopted by the Bib.-Com., which renders: "and she spake with him on account of this great wrong in sending me away, greater than the other, etc.," supposing that the writer has here blended Tamar's words with his own narrative (so Cahen). But (not to insist that the rendering "spake with him" is impossible) such a blending is improbable, and the phrase "on account of" in general is not in keeping with the context. Fürst takes the word as a substantive, and renders: "let there be no occasion of this evil, etc.," which is without support in the usage of the O. T., and is besides very tame.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 17. Sept. "the overseer of his house;" the word is omitted in one MS. of Kennicott, and in one of Pinier's (Thenius).—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 18. So Sept. and other Greek versions, Vulg. and Chaldee (Syr. and Arab. omit the verse). The Greek renderings are καρπασίς and ἀστραγαλισμός.—The מְעִילִים (Eng. A. V. "robes") is somewhat difficult, and various unsatisfactory alterations of the word have been proposed (Wellh.: so the king's daughters . . . were apparelled of old, מְעוֹלִים). The sentence sounds strange: "she had on a long-sleeved tunic, for so the unmarried princesses wore over-mantles;" but nothing better has been proposed. Böttcher regards it as a gloss.—Ta.]

⁹ [Vers. 21, 22. The proposed changes of Böttcher and Thenius are criticised by Erdmann.—Ta.]

to pass after two full years [about^o two years], that Absalom had sheepshearers in 24 Baal-hezer, which is beside Ephraim; and Absalom invited all the king's sons. And Absalom came to the king, and said, Behold, now, thy servant hath sheepshearers; 25 let the king, I beseech thee, and his servants go with thy servant. And the king said unto Absalom, Nay, my son, let us not all now [om. now] go, lest we be chargeable unto thee [burdensome to thee]. And he pressed him; howbeit [and] he would 26 not go, but [and he] blessed him. Then said Absalom [And Absalom said], If not,
 I pray thee let my brother Amnon go with us. And the king said unto him, Why 27 should he go with thee? But [And] Absalom pressed him, that [and] he let Am-28 non and all the king's sons go with him. Now Absalom had commanded [And Absalom commanded] his servants, saying, Mark ye now when Amnon's heart is merry with wine, and when I say unto you, Smite Amnon, then kill him, fear not; 29 have not I commanded you? be courageous and be valiant. And the servants of Absalom did unto Amnon as Absalom had [om. had] commanded. Then [And] 30 all the king's sons arose, and every man gat him upon his mule and fled. And it came to pass, while¹¹ they were in the way, that tidings came to David, saying, Ab-31 salom hath slain all the king's sons, and there is not one of them left. Then [And] the king arose, and tare his garments, and lay on the earth; and all his servants stood by with their clothes rent. And Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's bro-32 ther, answered and said, Let not my lord suppose [say] that they have slain all the young men the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead; for by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined from the day that he forced [humbled] his sis-33 ter Tamar. Now therefore [And now] let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart, to think that [saying], All the king's sons are dead; for Amnon only is dead.

c. Absalom's flight. Vers. 34-39.

34 Bnt [And]¹² Absalom fled. And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, there came much people by the way of the hill-35 side behind¹³ him. And Jonadab said unto the king, Behold, the king's sons come; 36 as thy servant said, so it is. And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of speaking, that behold the king's sons came, and lifted up their voice and wept; 37 and the king also and all his servants wept very sore. But [And]¹⁴ Absalom fled and went to Talmi the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur. And David mourned 38 for his son every day. So [And]¹⁵ Absalom fled, and went to Geshur, and was 39 there three years. And the soul of king David longed to go forth unto Absalom; for he was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.

¹² [Ver. 34. Erdmann (after Thenius) renders: "from the West," referring to Ex. III. 1 compared with Isa. ix. 11; Job xxiii. 8, in none of which passages, however, has the word a suffix as here; and the present Heb. form is suspicious because the anarthrous הָרֵךְ (way), as construct, would naturally require a substantive after it. Moreover, the Sept., Syr. and Vulg. here show important deviations from the Heb. The Syr. omits this word (אֲחֵרִי), the Vulg. renders it with devium, and the Sept. (adding to our text) has: "and behold, much people were coming in the way behind him on the side of the mountain on the declivity (ἐν τῇ κατὰβύθῳ), and the watchman came and told the king and said, I have seen men on the way of Oronen on the side (μῆκος) of the mountain." As to this addition it is hard to say whether it belongs to the original text, or is an explanatory insertion; it fills out the narrative very naturally, but this is itself a suspicious fact, and the words spoken by the watchman might certainly be a variant translation of the same Heb. as lies at the basis of the statement in ver. 34 (in the Hebrew). However this may be (Thenius, Böttcher and Wellhausen accept the addition), the Oronen of the Sept. points to Horon or Horonaim, a well-known place on the neighboring mountain, and the phrase "on the declivity" is thus explained as referring to the declivitous side of the hill (and so the Vulg. devium, Heb. מוֹרֵד). We thus reach the rendering "by the way of Horonaim (Beth-horon) on the side of the mountain," which is syntactically and geographically satisfactory; and need suppose only that אֲחֵרִי has been altered in the masoretic text into אֲחֵרִי. The addition in the Sept. may be a marginal explanation (it is not found in the Vulg.), and its first clause may be altered into conformity with the existing Heb. text; the ἐν τῇ κατὰβύθῳ may belong to the original form (Vulg. devium), and the "on the side of the mountain" may be an explanation of this original or marginal. At any rate the change of אֲחֵרִי to אֲחֵרִי is altogether probable.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 38. The repetition of the statement that Absalom fled is striking, and the narrative vers. 36-38 is not clear and natural in arrangement. We should rather expect 37 b (in which no subject is expressed) to follow 36, and 38 makes 37 a unnecessary. So the first clause of 34 seems out of place. But, while it is hard to justify the present arrangement on logical grounds, the unnecessary repetitions may result from the fact that we have the outline of an originally longer narrative wherein these repeated statements would not be out of place. The order of the masoretic text is sustained by the versions. In ver. 37 after Geshur (Γεσούρ) Sept. adds εἰς τὴν χώραν, which Thenius accepts as representing an original Heb. "land of Maacah" (Böttcher: land of his mother Maacah, and Wellh. rejects because of the Art. (הָ = ת) and because of the absence of the word "mother."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-21. *Amnon's crime. Vers. 1 sqq. And it came to pass after this—general chronological statement, referring what follows to the time after the Ammonite war. Tamar and Absalom were the children of Maacah, daughter of Talmai king of Geshur, whom David had married after he ascended the throne at Hebron (iii. 3). Amnon was David's oldest son; his mother was the Jezreelitess Ahinoam (iii. 2). The apodosis begins with the words: "and Amnon was so troubled" (ver. 2), while ver. 1 from and Absalom to the end is explanatory parenthesis.—Ver. 2. Literally: it was strait to Amnon unto becoming sick, that is, he was sore troubled, so that he fell sick. Not: "feigned himself sick" (Luther), for he does not feign till vers. 5, 6 (where the word is properly so rendered). [Ewald (quoted by Thenius) remarks that Amnon's character and conduct were doubtless affected by the fact that he was the first-born son, and of a mother apparently not of the noblest birth.—Tr.] We have a picture here of the consuming fire of passionate love, which could not be satisfied, because Tamar was a virgin and it seemed to him impossible to do anything to her, that is, her maidenly reserve and her inaccessibility [in the harem or women's apartment] or other difficulties thwarted his designs.—Vers. 3 sq. By his wicked, crafty cousin Jonadab, the son of his uncle Shimeah (another son of whom, Jonathan, is mentioned xxi. 21) Amnon is not only strengthened in his sinful desire, but is shown a way whereby he may attain his end by guile and violence. He becomes "lean," an appearance all the more striking in a "king's son," in whose case there was no reason for it. From morning to morning—his aspect was more wretched in the morning after nights made sleepless by torturing passion. [Thenius: a finely chosen point in the description of his malady, from which also it appears that Jonadab was, if not a house-mate, at least his daily companion. Bib. Com.: he mentions the morning because it was his custom to come to Amnon every morning to his levee.—Tr.] This wretched appearance of his favored the advice to feign himself sick (ver. 5). To see thee, "seeing" used for visiting the sick (Ps. xli. 7 (6); 2 Kings viii. 29). Jonadab's counsel takes for granted that the father will not refuse the sick son such a request. From the whole account we see that the king's children dwelt in different households. "Probably each wife with her children dwelt in a separate part of the royal palace" (Keil), and further the grown sons, as appears from vers. 7 and 20, had each his separate house. "A couple of cakes," some solid, distinctly shaped preparation is here meant, since there were "two" of them. Whether it received its name from its heart-like shape, or its heart-strengthening power (Keil), [the word is lebibah, and the Heb. for "heart" is leb], or because it was made from rolled dough,† is left undecided. Tamar was probably famed for her skilful cooking. [In the East such skill is not unusual, even in women of high rank.—Tr.]

Vers. 8 sqq. "She took a pan [ver. 9], so Chald. and Sept. [On the word rendered "pan" see "Text. and Gram.," it seems more probable that it is a name for some preparation of food.—Tr.] "Baked" [ver. 8]; the Heb. word (שָׁבַע) is used for roasting or baking, see Ex. xii. 9 comp. with 2 Chr. xxxv. 13. Amnon's refusal to eat must have conveyed the impression that he was very sick, and the exclusion of all persons from the room might be easily explained by the fact that he was weakened by his illness. He was as clever an actor as Jonadab a crafty counsellor.—Vers. 12 sqq. Tamar's noble conduct in rejecting this wicked proposal is a confirmation of what is said in ver. 2 of the hindrances in Amnon's way. Such things are not done in Israel, it is against the law and custom of the people of God (as contrasted with the heathen). Comp. Lev. xx. 17 with vers. 7 and 26. Tamar repels the wickedness from the highest moral point of view, which is determined by the theocratic-national position and significance of Israel. The word "folly" (נְבוּלָה) is here used of unchastity as in xxxiv. 7. [The same sense is given substantially by the rendering of Eng. A. V.: "not so should it be done in Israel" (as Philippeon).—Keil remarks that the expression recalls Gen. xxxiv. 7 (where it is a commentary on Shechem's conduct to Dinah), the words being the same; and Bib. Com. adds that Tamar probably knew the passage in Genesis, and wished to profit by it. But, as this passage is a remark of the Editor of the Pentateuch (as the phrase "in Israel" shows), and it is doubtful whether the Pentateuch in its present shape existed in David's time, the resemblance between the two passages must be otherwise explained. The phrase in question may have been a common one, or the Editor of Genesis may have taken it from our narrative, as a remark appropriate in his narrative.—Tr.]—Next to the honor of Israel as the people sanctifying itself to the Lord, she adduces her own honor and Amnon's (ver. 13); both, she would say, will suffer irreparable shame. Further, in order more certainly to hold him off, she urges him to ask her in marriage of the king, who would not deny his request. This would be in opposition to the law, Lev. xviii. 9; xx. 17; Deut. xxvii. 22, whereby sexual connections between brothers and sisters (those having only one parent in common are especially mentioned) are strictly forbidden. In order to harmonize this apparent contradiction Thenius thinks it not impossible that the prohibitions in Lev. xviii. 7-18; xx. 19-21; Deut. xxvii. 20, 22 referred first to the maintenance of moral purity in family-life, and that they did not wholly forbid real marriages between brothers and sisters (having only one parent in common), particularly where there was special inclination. But this view cannot be well made to accord with the absoluteness of the prohibition and the sharpness of the threat of punishment. The strict prohibition of sexual connection in general must have applied to marriage also. It must be supposed either that the law was not strictly carried out, or that Tamar, knowing

* [From this point to xxiii. 7 (and ch. xl. except ver. 1) is omitted in Chron., it not entering into the design of that Book to record the merely individual history of David, but only his theocratic and ritual acts.—Tr.]

the law very well, wished to keep back the passionate advances of Amnon. So Josephus [7, 8, 1]: "this she said, wishing to escape his passion for the present," and Clericus: "that she might elude him in every way possible, lest, if all hope of marriage were denied, the man should be the more incited to violence."^{*}

Ver. 15. On the satisfaction of sexual desire follows hate towards its object and instrument; "a psychological trait," remarks Thenius, "that vouches for the truth of the narrative."—Ver. 16. Tamar's reply is not to be rendered (Vulg., Luther): "the evil is greater than the other," for the Heb. requires: "this great (greater) evil." Nor can we (with Thenius) alter the Heb. text after the Sept.: "nay, my brother (אֶל־אָחִי), for the evil is greater,"[†] etc., which is obviously a change to avoid difficulty, and the consequent change of text is too violent. The renderings: "give no occasion of this greater evil" (Cler., Ges.), and: "but not this greater evil than the other!" (De Wette) do not accord with the wording of the Heb. Böttcher, by two changes (לְ for אֶל, and insertion of כִּי), gets the sense: "wherefore this great evil, greater than . . ."; on which Thenius rightly remarks that it is difficult to see why the narrator should have put this unintelligible phrase into the mouth of the unfortunate woman rather than the simple "why" (לָמָּה or כִּי־מָה).—It certainly seems better (if anything is to be added) to insert the word "let there be" or "be thou" (יִהְיֶה), so that it shall read: "become not the cause of this great evil, which is greater than . . ." (Maur., Dietrich in Ges. Lex. s. v. אָחִי); but this expression also: "become not the cause" is not simple and natural enough in the mouth of the excited Tamar. It is better to suppose an unfinished sentence and render (changing אֶל into לְ):

On account of this greater evil . . . she is interrupted by Amnon, and cannot finish her address. This is clear from what immediately follows: But he would not hear her, and said to his servant, Put her out from me; he ordered her to be put out before she could finish. This expulsion was a still "greater evil" than the other violence done her, both for her, because it would create the impression that she had done something shameful, and for him, since he thus added wrong to wrong. [On this reading see "Text. and Gram.," where reasons are given for adopting substantially the text of the Sept.: "nay, my brother, for this evil is greater," etc. The objection to Dr. Erdmann's rendering is the same that he has himself urged against another: it is too formal, too little in keeping with the excited state in which we should suppose Tamar to be. A similar objection applies to the translation given in the Bib. Com.—Tr.] Ver. 17. [Amnon orders Tamar to be expelled.]

This order and conduct must have led the servant to suppose that she had done something shameful.—[Bib. Com.: The brutality of Amnon needs no comment.—Tr.—Ver. 18. [Tamar is expelled.]

She had on a garment with long sleeves (רְפָפִים); the usual undergarment covered only the upper arm, while this covered the whole arm, and took the place of the armless meil [outer garment or robe.] Translate: thus were the king's daughters, the virgins, clothed with robes; such long-sleeved mantles distinguished the princesses.—Ver. 19. Her indication of grief at the shame done her. The hands clasped above the head or laid on the head, are a sign of grief at the shame that has come on the head as the bearer of one's personal honor. Comp. Jer. ii. 37. [Ver. 18 b would seem to connect itself more naturally with ver. 17, and ver. 18 a with ver. 19. It may be, as Keil says, that her royal dress is mentioned to bring out more clearly the harshness of her treatment, since the servant must have recognized the dress. The word "robes" in ver. 18 is discussed in "Text. and Gram.;" the sentence would perhaps be helped by omitting the word.—Bib. Com. suggests that Tamar took the ashes that she put on her head from the very place where she had cooked the food for Amnon.—Tr.—Ver. 20. [Abalom cares for his sister.] Instead of "Amnon" the Heb. has Aminon, a diminutive, expressive of scorn and contempt.* Abalom's question shows that a suspicion of Amnon naturally suggested itself to him: Has Aminon thy brother been with thee? euphemism for Amnon's deed. Abalom, with his careless exhortation: lay not this thing to heart, is a sad comforter. [More probably, under this careless exterior he concealed a deep purpose to avenge the crime, which he at this moment had neither words nor inclination to discuss. He seems not to have failed in his duty to his sister.—Tr.—] And Tamar abode in his house as a desolated woman; literally, "and as desolated," not "as solitary."—Ver. 21. [David's anger.] After the words: "and he was very wroth," the Sept. adds: "and he grieved not the spirit of Amnon his son, because he loved him, because he was his first-born." But this addition gives too circumstantial and full a reason why David contented himself with being angry and did not punish Amnon; we cannot alter the Heb. text to accord with it (as Then. and Ewald do). David's failure to inflict on Amnon the legal penalty of death [Lev. xx. 17] was a sign of weakness, and led to Abalom's revenge and his rebellion against his father.—Ver. 22. [Abalom's hatred of Amnon.]—From bad to good, neither bad nor good (Gen. xxiv. 50), he talked not at all with him because he hated him.—There is no need with Böttcher to transpose vers. 21 and 22. Verse 20 having described

* [Bp. Patrick mentions an (unfounded) Jewish opinion that Tamar was born of Maacah while the latter was a captive (Deut. xxi. 10 seq.), that is, before she became a proselyte and David's wife, and that Tamar was therefore legally not Amnon's sister.—Probably both the explanations suggested above by Erdmann are correct; the Levitical code was hardly observed with strictness at this time.—Tr.]

† [Thenius here writes μᾶλλον ἢ κακία, but Tischendorf has μᾶλλον.—Tr.]

* [So Böttcher and Thenius, after the analogy of the Arabic, in which a diminutive is formed by inserting a letter (Yod) after the second radical; but the diminutive form is doubtful here, partly because the ancient versions (Arabic included) except Chaldees do not here follow the Heb., but give the form Amnon; and the reading here may be a clerical error (so Wellhausen and Bib. Com.).—Tr.]

Absalom's procedure (in connection with Amnon's crime) and ver. 21 the king's, ver. 22 begins a new section, in which is first stated the deepest ground of Absalom's conduct towards Amnon afterwards related, namely, his hate towards him. The present order of verses therefore presents the thoroughly well-arranged progress in the narrative, which Thenius thinks can be attained only by a transposition.

b. Vers. 22-33. Amnon's murder by Absalom.—Ver. 22 is closely connected with ver. 23 sq., giving the ground of Absalom's fratricide, though two years elapse before the act of vengeance is executed. According to verse 23 Absalom had an estate in Baalhazor near Ephraim. Probably also the other sons of the king had such landed possessions. A joyful festival was connected with sheepshearing (comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 2, 8), as is not seldom the case also in Germany. Baal-hazor is more exactly described as being near Ephraim. This cannot mean near the tribe-territory of Ephraim; the Prep. "near" (נֶעַר) shows that a city called Ephraim is meant (2 Chron. xiii. 19 Qeri, comp. Josh. xv. 9; John xi. 54; Joseph., bell. Jud. 4, 9, 9, according to Eusebius eight miles north of Jerusalem). Thenius: "probably Tell Asur south of Shiloh; see Käuffer, Stud. II. 145."*—Ver. 25. He blessed him, i. e. wished him well (בָּרַךְ as in 1 Sam. xxv. 14).—Ver. 26. "If thou goest not," literally: "and not," so Sept. and Vulg. But Thenius renders: "O that Amnon might go with us" (taking אֲלֵי = לִי, Ew., § 358 b). The king, unwilling to go himself,† is also unwilling for Amnon to go, as the question: "why should he go with thee?" shows. For he could not be ignorant of Absalom's hatred to Amnon. [Thenius: "let Amnon, the first-born [and heir-apparent] go along with us (me and the other princes) as thy representative."—Thus David found it hard to deny Absalom's request without giving as a reason what he was unwilling to say.—Tr.]—Ver. 27. [David consents.] David here also shows himself weak in yielding to Absalom's request.—As our narrator is only concerned to tell how the fratricide was accomplished, he omits mention of the meal that Absalom prepared, especially as this was indirectly given in vers. 23, 24. The addition of the Sept.: "and Absalom prepared a repast like the repast of a king," is to be regarded, therefore, as a mere explanatory insertion.†—Ver. 28

sq. [The murder.] As David had weakly left Amnon's crime unpunished, Absalom held it his duty to take vengeance on Amnon and maintain his sister's honor. This feeling does not, however, exclude the motive of selfish ambition in Absalom; by the death of Amnon he would be one step nearer to the succession to the throne; there may, indeed, have been another brother, Chileab, older than he (iii. 3), but probably (to judge from Absalom's conduct, xv. 1-6) he was no longer alive. Absalom's ambition, which afterwards led him into rebellion, probably welcomed this pretext for putting Amnon, the heir to the throne, out of the way. Comp. Winer, R.-W. I. 14.—Ver. 29. [Flight of the princes.] "Every man on his mule." Mule-breeding is forbidden in Lev. xix. 19. [Yet mules were frequently used by persons of distinction, Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 9), David and Solomon (1 Kings i. 33; x. 25), and were probably introduced by commerce or war. Our passage contains the first mention of them; afterwards they seem to have become common (1 Kings xviii. 5; Zech. xiv. 15; Ezra ii. 66). Ewald thinks that the law in Lev. does not forbid breeding them; certainly it does not absolutely forbid owning them. See Art. Maulthier in Herzog.—Tr.]—Ver. 30. Tidings came, namely, by the servants, who had come on in advance of the princes. The exaggeration in their report is psychologically easily explained by the circumstances.—Ver. 31. [The king's grief.] The king's servants stood still, immovable (נִצְּבִים), comp. Num. xxii. 32 sq.; Dent. v. 20. It need not be inferred from the phrase: And all his servants stood before him with garments rent, that the courtiers preceded the king in the rending of the garments (Böttcher), since this rending on their part would naturally follow on the king's, and did not require special mention.—[Sept.: "and all his servants that were standing about him rent their garments," which represents an easy and natural Hebrew; but there is not sufficient ground for altering the Heb. text to accord with it.—Tr.]—Ver. 32 sq. Jonadab, who had counselled Amnon to commit his crime, now corrects the false report [sharp-sightedly seeing how the thing must be.—Tr.], and gives a reason for his assertion that Amnon alone was dead:* for on Absalom's mouth was it laid (it lay) from the day; that is, one could infer from his words that he intended this (De Wette), or, better: "one could see it in him; for the movements of the soul are seen (next to the look) most clearly about the mouth" (Thenius). The subject of the verb "was" [Eng. A. V. this], namely, the murder of Amnon, or hatred to Amnon, naturally suggests itself, and the omission is in accordance with Jonadab's excited, hurried speech. His purpose was set, determined (נִשְׁמַרְטָה), comp.

* Böttcher: "The name אֲמֹנִים is probably from עֲמֹרִים or עֲמֹרָן." Thenius: "If the tribe Ephraim were meant, it would read: 'which pertains to' (אֲשֶׁר לֵ) (comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 1; 1 Chron. xiii. 6), not 'near' (נֶעַר). Vulg. juxta Ephraim, and see Gen. xxxv. 4 and especially Josh. vii. 2."—[Mr. Grove, in Smith's Bib. Dict. thinks that three different places are meant in John xi. 64; 2 Sam. xviii. 6 and 2 Chron. xiii. 19, and does not identify our Ephraim with any of them; there is, he says, no clew to its situation.—Tr.]

† [Klitto (Doi. Bib. III.) remarks that David's reason in ver. 25 is the first intimation in history of the ruinous expense of royal visits, and mentions the case of the Hoghton family in Lancashire, said to have been ruined by a visit from King James I.—Tr.]

‡ [Thenius (followed by Wellh.) accepts this addition as a part of the original text because of its naturalness, holding the reason for its omission from the Heb. to be the similar ending of the two clauses (נִצְּבִים, here and in ver. 27). But Erdmann's argument against this elucidatory statement is just and entitled to consideration.—Tr.]

* [Some VSS. and EDD. have "my lord the king," instead of "my lord;" and some read נָּ, "for," instead of אֲמֹנִים, "but." In such particles the text is uncertain.—Tr.]

Ex. xxi. 13; his determination to do the deed lay on his mouth, was decidedly and clearly stamped in the features about his mouth. Vulg.: "in hatred," instead of "in the mouth;" Aq., Sym.: "in wrath" (they read שׂמ instead of שׂ). * [If our Hebrew text is retained, the rendering of Eng. A. V. is in accordance with the general usage of the words: "according to the commandment of Absalom it was determined from the day," etc., where the difficulty is to say what was determined and to whom the commandment was given. On the other hand, it is not probable (as Erdmann's rendering asserts) that Absalom openly showed his purpose to kill his brother; in that case the latter would have been warned. The general meaning, however, is clear, that Absalom had made up his mind two years before to kill Amnon.—Tr.]

c. Vers. 34-39. Absalom's flight.—Ver. 34. And Absalom fled. There is no ground for attaching these words to Jonadab's speech, ver. 33 (Mich., Dathe), since the latter could not have known of Absalom's flight, and it is not a mere surmise about it that is expressed, but the fact. From ver. 29 on two lines of narration must be distinguished. The one, starting with the flight of David's sons (ver. 29), gives the rumor, the fact affirmed by Jonadab and its impression on David, up to ver. 33; the other, pointing back to ver. 29, begins with Absalom's flight (synchronous with that of the princes), and proceeds to tell of the arrival of the other sons after Absalom's flight. The sentence: "And Absalom fled," certainly breaks the connection, since the next sentence ("the watchman lifted up his eyes") is closely connected with ver. 33. But the words are not taken from ver. 37, as has been assumed; the object of this interruption is to bring forward the important event that preceded the arrival of the sons of David, so that on the one hand Absalom's flight and absence from the royal court, on the other hand the presence of his brothers and their complaint to their father are the subject-matter of the narration, which closes with the goal of Absalom's flight and David's conduct in respect to Absalom and the death of Amnon.—Ver. 34. The young man, the watchman, who was looking out for the persons returning from the festival. Much people, a crowd of people made up of the numerous retinue of the sons of David. "From the way behind him," that is, "according to well-known usus loquendi (see Ex. iii. 1 comp. with Isa. ix. 11; Job xxiii. 8) simply from the west"

(Thenius), since in front means geographically the East. "From the side of the mountain," probably Mount Zion. The princes came not from the north, but from the west, because the return by this route was easier and quicker.—Ver. 35. Jonadab confirms his previous assertion.—Ver. 36. Repetition of the mourning of ver. 31, only deeper.—*Ver. 37. The narrative returns to Absalom, resuming the statement of his flight (from ver. 34); this repetition is occasioned by the preceding remark: "the king's sons came." The sense is: "except Absalom, who had fled." On Talmi see iii. 3. Absalom's stay with him lasted three years. [On the text of vers. 34-38 see "Text. and Gram." The conclusion there reached is that the order in our present text cannot be defended, there being no visible reason for the repetitions, and the omission of the subject (David) in 37 b being impossible if that clause were in its proper position, but that our present text may be the abridgement of a longer narrative, in which the repetitions were not out of place, and the omission of subject not improper.—Tr.]*

Ver. 39. And David the king held back from going forth against Absalom, for he had consoled himself for Amnon, that he was dead.*—The construction being impersonal [it restrained—David was restrained], no subject is to be supplied, as "grief restrained" (Maurer), or: "Absalom's flight to Geshur and his abode there restrained" (Keil); for the reason of his not going out after Absalom lay in his tone of feeling, as indicated in the words: "for he had consoled himself." This was his ground of action, not sorrow for Absalom's flight, and this accords with the capacity for rapid change of his sanguine temperament; his hot anger soon sank into quiet. Comp. ver. 21 and xii. 20-24. The rendering: "And David longed to go forth to Absalom" (Chald., the Rabbis, De W. in the Remarks) supposes the insertion of the word soul (שׂוּל) after the verb (so Eng. A. V.) But (apart from the hardness of this insertion) there are two objections to this rendering, namely, that David could have sent for Absalom, if he wanted him, and that, so far from feeling any love-longing towards Absalom, David was permanently set against him, as appears from the fact that, after

* "David the king," instead of the usual (Sept., Vulg.) "king David" (comp. Ges., § 113, Rem.). Some take the לִּי here, on account of its unusual position (but see 1 Sam. xviii. 6), to be a corruption of some other word meaning grief, soul, or the like.—Tr.—לִּי from כָּלָה—כָּלָה, "to prevent" (Maur., Keil), "these two verbs often interchanging." As the 3 pers. masc. is often impersonal [לִּי—לִּי], so sometimes the 3 pers. fem. (1 Sam. xxx. 6; Ps. l. 3; comp. Ges., § 137, 2). לִּי therefore here—"and it hindered him." [To this impersonal construction there are two syntactical objections: 1) the substantive idea of the verb is active instead of neuter, and in any case we should expect the object (לִּי) to be introduced by a preposition; 2) the Inf. after כָּלָה is properly introduced by כִּן instead of לִּי as here. Maurer renders: "it restrained him," i. e. grief; others: "David restrained [his servants]," which the form of the verb (fem.) does not permit.—Tr.]

Joab had gotten him back, it was two years before the king would see him (xiv. 24, 28). Ewald* renders: "David's anger ceased to express itself about Absalom." But the verb (עָנַן) cannot be so translated, and the insertion [of the word anger] is arbitrary and violent. Böttcher's* translation: "and David left off going" etc., supposes that he had begun to go, and was stopped by obstacles, which is nowhere intimated. The same objection lies to Thenius'* rendering: "he desisted from going out" (after having begun), time having softened his grief; but nothing is said of this in the connection. [The impersonal construction (of Erdmann and others) cannot be maintained here, and the Heb. text in its present shape gives no sense. We must either adopt the rendering of Eng. A. V. supplying the word soul, or (after Ewald) supply some such word as anger. David's feeling towards Absalom here indicated is apparently a kindly one, since it is probably what Joab is said in xiv. 1 to perceive, and in this latter verse it is a kindly feeling (Dr. Erdmann takes a different view). The sense, then, seems to be as follows: David longed to recall Absalom, but political and judicial reasons deterred him; Joab perceives this, and helps the king out of the difficulties that his sense of justice threw in the way of the exhibition of his love for his exiled son.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. "The sins of the fathers are visited on the children." The truth of this moral law is illustrated in the history of David's family. The divine threat uttered by Nathan (xii. 7-12) begins here to be fulfilled in the disintegration of David's family-life. As he destroyed the honor and happiness of Uriah's house, so his first-born son brings shame on him; as he committed murder, so the sword dooms his child. One sin led to another; the bitter spring of sin grew in time to a river of destruction that flowed over the whole land, and even endangered David's throne and life (Baumgarten).

2. The fratricide Absalom is a transgressor of God's command, infringing by his self-avenging the divine arrangement whereby sin and sinner meet with their judgment. On the other hand, God controls Absalom's crime, and by it punishes Amnon's crime. Absalom is God's instrument, though not himself less guilty. The Lord uses men's sins according to His pleasure; human unrighteousness must serve the ends of His righteousness.

3. Right family-discipline consists in enforcing God's holy laws in the control of children, and carelessness in this causes sin to grow quietly, till the evil bursts suddenly forth and destroys the happiness of the household. But when evil makes its appearance God's law requires strict chastisement, wherein David failed towards both Amnon and Absalom. This neglect, usually the result of weak affection (and in David's case induced also by the recollection of his own sin), leads to still greater sins and crimes in the family.

4. These dreadful experiences of David and his sons are intended to lead him to purity, humility and sanctification. "He that thinks all this a sign of God's wrath and disfavor knows little of what it means to have forgiveness of sins. David confessed his sins, and so found favor with the Lord his God. But how wholesome for him was the Lord's chastisement now, how he needed constant self-humbling, and what better for this end than these bitter experiences of his family? Whom the Lord loves He chastens" (Schlier). "Forgiveness of sin usually merely converts punishment into paternal chastisement, the rod of anger into the smiting of love. Externally the consequences of sin remain the same, only their internal character is changed. Otherwise forgiveness of sin might too easily lead to wilfulness" (Hengstenb. Geach. d. Reiches Gottes [Hist. of the Kingdom of God], II. 127).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. OSIANDER: Even though God forgives the sin, nevertheless He lays upon the sinner a cross, that he may be more heedful, and his neighbor may be deterred from sin (Num. xiv. 20-23).

—Ver. 2. STARKE: Where the parents live in sin, the children commonly follow after (1 Kings xv. 1-3).—[HENRY: Godly parents have often been afflicted with wicked children; grace does not run in the blood, but corruption does. We do not find that David's children imitated him in his devotion; but his false steps they trod in, and in those did much worse, and repented not.—WORDSWORTH: He was forgiven by God, but they came to a miserable end.—SCOTT: So depraved is the human heart, that even natural affection may degenerate into licentiousness; and the intercourse even between near relations should be conducted with caution and prudence, that no opportunity may be given to those who are disposed to commit iniquity.—Tr.]—OSIANDER: The more one thinks about an unchaste love, the greater it becomes.

Vers. 3-5. CRAMER: Lust punishes itself, consumes the marrow in the bones, shortens life, and ruins one's good name (Ecclus. xxiii. 22).—J. LANGE: One man is another's angel, a good angel for warning, and so for seduction an evil angel.—[HALL: Had Jonadab been a true friend, he had bent all the forces of his dissuasion against the wicked motions of that sinful lust; had showed the prince of Israel how much those lewd desires provoked God, and blemished himself, and had lent his hand to strangle them in their first conception. There cannot be a more worthy improvement of friendship, than in a fervent opposition to the sins of them whom we profess to love.—Tr.]

Ver. 10. STARKE: The ungodly are ashamed only before men, not before God (Ecclus. xxiii. 25 sq.).—SEB. SCHMID: He who wishes to guard against sinning with others, should not follow them where he may be constrained to sin.—HEDINGER: Unrighteous works always seek to remain concealed (Prov. vii. 18-20).—Vers. 15-17. STARKE [from HALL]: Inordinate lust never ends but in discontent. . . . Brutish Amnon, it was thyself whom thou shouldst have hated for this villainy, not thine innocent sister. O how many brothers of Amnon there are even to-day.—[SCOTT: It cannot reasonably be expected that those who make no scruple of debauching the persons of those for whom they pretend affection, will feel any remorse at deserting them with cruelty and disdain, at exposing them to shame and contempt, or at leaving them to all the horrors of penury and prostitution. Let none ever expect better treatment from those who are capable of attempting to seduce them.—TR.]

Ver. 21. WUERT. B.: While parents should love their children, yet they must not spare them when they have done evil, but bring them to due punishment, that they may not have to be punished by God or by the executioner (1 Sam. ii. 29).—[HALL: The better-natured and more gracious a man is, the more subject he is to the danger of an over-remissness, and the excess of favor and mercy.—WORDSWORTH: David was wroth, but did not punish his son Amnon; being conscious of the sin which he had himself committed, and by which he had tempted his children to sin. And because the king did not execute justice, therefore Absalom, Tamar's brother, takes the law into his own hands, and murders his brother Amnon. Thus one sin leads to another by an almost endless chain of consequences.—TR.]

—J. LANGE: It is very important that persons in authority, teachers and fathers of families should lead such a life that in punishing others they may not have to fear reproach, and thereby be restrained.—SCHLIER: What is to become of a house, in which father and mother, in the consciousness of their own faults, no longer venture to do their duty?

Vers. 28 sq. SCHLIER: The Lord our God has everything in His hand; He uses even the sin of men according to His will, He punishes one transgressor through another, He chastens one wrong-doer through the wrong-doing of another. The Lord's mighty hand comes into the common course of the world, and the execution of His judgments goes on right through the midst of the unrighteousness of men.—Always does that remain true which is written: Be not deceived, God is not mocked; sin remains always and everywhere the ruin of peoples.—Vers. 36 sq. OSIANDER: By new attacks and afflictions God brings to His people's mind their before committed sins, in order that they may the more earnestly go forward in a penitent life.—CRAMER: Next to experience of the wrath of God there is no sorer pain under heaven, than when parents come to have such heart-sorrow in their children as to doubt of their souls' salvation, xviii. 33.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² [Ver. 2. The Hithpael in the so-called hypocritical sense, a derivation from the reflexive or reflexive-declarative sense. See Conant's Gesen., § 54. Ewald, Gr., § 124 a.—TR.]

³ [Ver. 3. The Eng. "now" is sometimes a proper rendering of the Heb. cohortative particle u rendered just before by "I pray thee", but would here have too much the effect of an adverb of time.—TR.]

- 5 And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered [said], I am indeed [In truth, I am] a widow woman. And mine husband is dead [died]';

⁴ [Ver. 4. The reading "came" (וָרָחַץ), or, as in one MS. of Kennicott, וָרָחַץ is now generally adopted, and is required by the sense. Bruns (In De Rossi) thinks that the date of the introduction of the corrupt reading (וָרָחַץ) may be fixed in this way: The correct reading is found in all the ancient versions (not excepting the Chald., the text of which in the London Polyglot is corrupt here, and should be וָרָחַץ); but David Kimchi had the present reading (וָרָחַץ) before him, while Cod. 154 has וָרָחַץ, whence it may be concluded that the corruption in question came between A. D. 1106 (date of Cod. 154) and 1190 (date of Kimchi's commentary). This is a very interesting fact for Old Testament text-criticism, if it be true, for it then shows that our text exhibits very recent changes. It depends on the assumption that all codices in the beginning of the twelfth century had the same reading; but it is possible that Cod. 154 and Kimchi's Cod. had different genealogies.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 5. The rendering: "I am a widow, and my husband is dead," presents a useless tautology; Böttcher therefore suggests a relative force for the 1: "Inasmuch as my husband is dead;" but it may be better (with Thenius) to connect this latter clause with the following verse: "and my husband died and I had two sons," that is, when my husband died, I was left with two sons.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 7. So Syr. and Arab. It is more probable that this is the expression of the woman than that she should put it into the mouth of the kinsfolk (against Erdmann and Wellhausen). A וָרָחַץ may easily have passed into a י. Böttcher proposes to read: "we will kill, etc., and destroy (וָרָחַץ); even (וָרָחַץ) the heir will they destroy," etc., which puts the expression about the heir into the woman's mouth, but seems unnecessarily involved.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 11. The Inf. (וָרָחַץ) has for its subject the God, and not "the king" as in Eng. A. V. The word god also is Sing., while in the succeeding clause the indef. Plu. construction is used, so that it might be rendered: "and that my son be not destroyed."—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 13. Instead of "against," Thenius renders the Prep. (עַל) by "in respect to," on the ground that David had expressed no thought contrary to the well-being of God's people. But the woman covertly refers to his procedure towards Absalom as something against the people of God.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 14. Böttcher: "when we die, it is as (with) water," etc. The "needs" of Eng. A. V. represents the Infinitive Absolute (emphatic).—The difficulty in this verse lies partly in the translation of the second half, partly in the relation of thought between the two halves. The thought of our text is: "The king has declared himself faulty, in that he does not restore his banished. We die and pass away; God does not take life, but devises means not to banish his banished." Here, the expression: "to banish one already banished," is hard, but may be perhaps understood in the pregnant sense of keeping banished the banished. So the representation of God as thinking thoughts or devising means to gain an end is somewhat rudely anthropomorphic, but is not wholly out of keeping with the times and with the terse and obscure address of the wise woman. Then, the reference to human mortality (allusion to Amnon, Absalom or David?) is to quicken the king to haste or to mercy, and the exhortation is enforced by a reference to the divine mercifulness.—Various alterations have been proposed to

- 15 banished be not expelled [banished] from him. Now therefore [And now] that¹⁵ I am come to speak of this thing unto my lord the king, it is because the people have made me afraid; and thy handmaid said, I will now speak unto the king; 16 it may be that the king will perform the request of his handmaid. For the king will hear, to deliver his handmaid out of the hand of the man that would¹⁶ destroy 17 me and my son together out of the inheritance of God. Then [And] thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be comfortable [May the word, etc., be for rest¹⁷]; for as an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern [hear] good and bad; therefore the Lord thy God will be [and may Jehovah thy God be] with thee.
- 18 Then [And] the king answered and said unto the woman, Hide not from me, I pray thee, the thing that I shall ask thee. And the woman said, Let my lord the 19 king now [om. now] speak. And the king said, Is not [om. not] the hand of Joab with thee in all this? And the woman answered and said, As thy soul liveth, my lord the king, none can turn to the right hand or to the left from aught that my lord the king hath spoken; for thy servant Joab, he bade me, and he put all these 20 words in the mouth of thine handmaid; To fetch about this form of speech [To change the face of the thing] hath thy servant Joab done this thing; and my lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth.
- 21 And the king said unto Joab, Behold, now, I¹⁸ have done this thing; go, there- 22 fore [and go], bring the young man Absalom again [back]. And Joab fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself, and thanked [blessed] the king; and Joab said, To-day thy servant knoweth that I have found grace in thy sight, my lord 23 O [the] king, in that the king hath fulfilled the request of his¹⁹ servant. So [And] 24 Joab arose and went to Geshur, and brought Absalom to Jerusalem. And the king said, Let him turn to his own house, and let him not see my face. So [And] Absalom returned [turned] to his own house, and saw not the king's face.
- 25 But [And] in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty; from the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no 26 blemish in him. And when he polled his head (for [and] it was at every year's end [from time to time] that he polled it, because [for] the hair was heavy on him, get rid of supposed difficulties. Ewald (Gesch. Isrl. III. 236) changes וְהַשֵּׁב to וְהַשִּׁיב and renders: "God takes not away the soul of one that thinks not to leave in banishment one banished by Himself." Here the "devising" and the "banishing" are transferred to the man; but the resultant thought (that God will not slay a merciful man) is not specially striking or appropriate. Wellhausen (reading וְהַשֵּׁב for וְהַשִּׁיב) translates: "We must die, etc., and when God takes away a soul, does He give it back?" in which the second clause simply repeats the thought of the first. The attempts at alteration are all unsatisfactory, and the ancient versions help little or nothing. Sept.: and God will take life, even devising to thrust from Him an outcast; Theodotion: as water, etc., and the soul hopes not in it; Syr.: God takes not away the soul, but deviseth means that no one may wander from Him (or, perish through Him). The Vulg. is a tolerably literal rendering of the Heb.—Houbigant (in Chandler) proposed to insert vers. 16-17 in ver. 11 after the word "son;" but there is no ground for this change nor advantage in it. There seems nothing better than to retain the present text.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 15. The word "that" (כִּי) is omitted in several MSS. and printed EDD., and in Syr., Arab., Vulg., perhaps because it seemed superfluous (Sept. δ).—Patrick: though the people make me afraid. Philippon: when I came, etc., the people made me afraid. Better (if the כִּי be retained) as Eng. A. V.—In the last clause one MS. of De Rosa has יִשְׁמַע (hear) instead of יַעֲשֶׂה (do), correction for the sake of propriety of expression.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 21. So the Kethib (text). Qeri (margin) has second person: "thou hast done," on which De Rossi says that many of his MSS. and printed EDD. have not this Qeri; and he quotes R. Jacob Chayyim and Nazzari, the former of whom says that not more than one MS. in a thousand has this Qeri, and the latter that it is not found in the correct Spanish MSS. The ancient VSS. also follow the Kethib, for which, therefore, the external authority is complete. Böttcher, however, defends the Qeri on the ground that it better suits the initial: "behold, now," and that a change from it to the Kethib is more easily explicable than the converse. But, as the text gives a good sense, these considerations (even if they were unquestionable) cannot avail against the external evidence.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-24. Joab by a stratagem procures Absalom's return to Jerusalem without punishment.—Ver. 1. Though David's soul was comforted for Amnon's death, and he had consequently desisted from the pursuit of Absalom, his anger at the latter's fratricide had nevertheless not disappeared. This supposition is psychologically necessary, since otherwise David would appear as an extremely weak man; and it is supported by the fact that he would not see Absalom for two years after his return [ver. 28]. For this reason the latter clause of this verse is to be explained as indicating not David's returning inclination to Absalom (as Vulg., Sept., Syr., Arab. [Eng. A. V.], Joseph., Cleric., and most modern expositors), but his enduring disinclination towards him. [Erdmann renders: "Joab perceived that the king's heart was against Absalom."—Ta.] It might have been supposed from the discontinuance of the pursuit that David's heart had turned to him; but Joab, who had exact knowledge of court-affairs, observed that the king's heart was against him. How the word "perceived" is contrary to this view (Maur., Then.) does not appear, since it contains the simple statement that David was still hostilely disposed towards Absalom. And "in the only other place where this construction (without substantive verb) occurs, Dan. xi. 28, the Prep. means against"

(Keil). [The Prep. (על) is often used, however, in the general sense of "towards," sometimes with favorable meaning, and the absence of the subst. verb is not important. The whole connection (somewhat disguised by the division of chapters) seems to favor the rendering of Eng. A. V. In the last verse of the preceding chapter David's heart goes forth towards Absalom (see annotations on that verse), and here Joab is said to perceive it, so that he devises a scheme to remove the king's judicial objections to recalling Absalom. The understanding of the narrative, however, is not affected by the rendering of the Prep. In either case Joab appears as a shrewd man. Possibly he was influenced by a genuine feeling of kindness towards David and Absalom; it is more likely perhaps that he wished to ingratiate himself with them and the people (Patrick). A. P. Stanley (in Smith's Bib. Dict.): "Joab combines with the ruder qualities of the soldier something of a more statesmanlike character, which brings him more nearly to a level with his youthful uncle, and unquestionably gives him the second place in the whole history of David's reign." Wordsworth: "Joab is the impersonation of worldly policy, and temporal ambition practising on the weakness of princes for its self-interests." Bib. Comm.: "He ever appears wily and politic and unscrupulous."—Ta.]—Ver. 2. Tekoa, now Tekua, about five [Eng.] miles south of Bethlehem, the native place of the prophet Amos. See Robins. II. 406 [Am. ed. I. 486 sq.; and see Dr. Hackett's Art. in Am. ed. of Smith's Bib. Dict.—Ta.]. As Bethlehem was Joab's native place, it is not strange that he was acquainted with Tekoa. He knew this "wise woman" as one fitted by her readiness of speech, boldness, shrewdness, and adroitness, to act the part he wanted.* That it cost Joab so great pains to gain his end is evidence moreover against the supposition that David's heart was already turned to Absalom.—Ver. 4. "And the woman came,"† etc., for so we must read instead of the first "said" [Eng. A. V.: "spake"] of the Hebrew text. Böttcher supposes that here by similar ending (homoteleuton) two lines have fallen out, in which is given the answer of the woman before she goes to the king; but there is no sign in any ancient version of such an omission.—Ver. 5. Here begins the lively, flowing narration of the feigned misfortune. Though Joab had "put the words into the woman's mouth," yet considerable readiness was required in order to bring them out so skillfully in her assumed character, and to make such an impression on the king as to lead him to the desired definite resolution. [Read: I am a widow. And my husband died, and I had two sons, etc.—Tr.]—Ver. 6. The fratricide. "And he smote him, the one the other," a pleonasm arising from the circumstantialness and liveliness of the narration.* [A slight change in the text will give the reading: "one smote the other," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]—Ver. 7. The demand for the survivor. "And we will destroy the heir also." Instead of this, Michaelis, Dathe and Thenius propose to read (after Syr. and Arab.): "and they will destroy," etc.† But these authorities [the versions] are not sufficient to warrant this emendation. Thenius urges that if the woman had put these words also into the mouth of the kinsmen, she would have represented them as diabolically wicked; but it does not follow that it is really so bad, simply because she expresses her opinion of what they wish to do. These words ["we will destroy the heir"] are added to the preceding "we will kill him" (to indicate the purpose of the kinsmen) by reason of the second thought that characterizes the blood-revenge—namely, that, while they kill him for blood-revenge, they wish at the same time to destroy the surviving heir. The woman's purpose is not only to bring out the design of the kinsmen in their blood-avenging as harshly as possible, but also, with reference to David's hostile feeling to Absalom, to emphasize the point that the latter is the heir to David's throne, and to save him as such from his father's anger. [Wellhausen: "The woman does not really intend to represent the unavoidable result [killing the heir] as the purpose [of the kinsmen], but is carried on by the connection of the discourse; not till she has uttered the word does she correct herself." Yet the third person seems more natural here, especially as the whole thing is feigned, and the woman had carefully prepared her words beforehand.—Tr.] So that they quench.—The power of the discourse lies in the fact that they are represented as already doing what their words show to be their purpose. "My coal," the burning coal (ζῆλον) with which fire is kindled. "In order not to set (permit, grant) to my husband name and remainder (posterity)."[†] [The law in the case is given in Numb. xxxv. 18, 19. Blood-revenge was no doubt an ancient pre-Mosaic custom. The whole family was against the fratricide. "This indicates that all the king's sons and the whole court were against Absalom, and that the knowledge of this was what hindered David from yielding to his affection and recalling him" (Bib. Comm.).—Tr.]—Ver. 8. I will give charge concerning thee in thy behalf. David grants her request and protects her son because, as the homicide was committed in the heat of conflict, a purposed murder was out of the question.—Ver. 9. On me be the iniquity.—That is, if it be wrong not to carry out the blood-avenging. The woman is not yet satisfied with the somewhat indefinite statement of the king that he would fulfil her request. She proceeds to work on him still further.—Ver. 10. She gains the end that she had in her remark in ver. 9, namely, to bring the king to say definitely that no one should further molest her or demand her son for blood-vengeance.—Ver. 11. Third stage of the woman's address. She wishes to bring the king to swear before God, and that not in the "character of a talkative woman" (Thenius), but rather to gain her end as surely as possible, and to bind the king by his own words to reconciliation with Absalom. "That the avenger of blood (cause) no more destruction" (De Wette); literally: "let the king remember the Lord thy God from the avenger's increasing* to destroy;" that is, "so that the avenger shall not more destroy"—the phrase "let him interpose" being understood (Thenius). The woman brings the king to the point of assuring her son's safety by an oath. [Patrick: "Others think she only prays him to remember how merciful and gracious God is, and had been to himself, even in pardoning the murder of Uriah"—not so well.—Tr.]

Ver. 12. Transition in the woman's discourse to a reference to David's relation to Absalom by the request to be permitted to say something farther. ["The woman proceeds cautiously and hence obscurely" (Bib. Comm.).—Tr.]—Ver. 13. "Why dost thou contrive (think, proceed) thus against the people of God?" The "thus" refers to the following words: "that the king does not bring back his banished." She goes on as if she now advanced to a second object of her coming; in reality, however, she now comes to the principal matter, though sure of success from what the king (led on by her skilful talk) had granted her. "Now she is to make the application to the king's own case, and this is hard, because she cannot speak openly and boldly like a prophet, but only slightly, and, as it were, in passing, yet must make the allusion to Absalom intelligible" (Ewald). The woman intimates that David's hostility towards Absalom is directed "against the people of God," since the people would suffer in the suffering of the heir, who would some time become their king. Having thus softly represented his conduct as blameworthy from the point of view of the people (among whom there was certainly a party for Absalom, as appears from the following history), she proceeds to entrap him in his own words (spoken in reference to her feigned case) for Absalom's advantage. And by the king's speaking† this word (that is, ver. 11, the oath that her son's blood-guilt should not be avenged) he is as one in fault (against God's people as against Absalom), in that the king brings not back his banished.—He must show his son the mildness he has shown hers. And, as for Absalom there was only the question of punishment for a homicide, not of release from the demand of the avenger, the woman, having gained grace for her son, might the more surely expect it for Absalom. She calls Absalom his banished because the latter, though he had banished himself by flight, had not since received permission to return. Dathe ["why resolvest thou thus in a cause pertaining to God's people?"] and Thenius ["why thinkest thou thus in relation to God's people?" (thy subjects)] refer the question to David's protection of the woman and her son, while, according to his own words, he appears as blameworthy towards Absalom; but the meaning of the Heb. (לַי = against) and the connection do not permit this. [Bishop Patrick remarks that the woman's reasoning here was weak, her son's case being very different from Absalom's, but the king, inferring that the people were well disposed towards Absalom, concluded to overlook the differences, without saying any thing to her of the defects of her argument. Probably the king was glad of an excuse to recall Absalom. Though an absolute monarch, he had to attend to the wishes of the people, who liked the young prince, and would be offended if he were kept in banishment. It seems less likely that there is a reference in the words "people of God" to Absalom's deprivation of religious privileges (Bib. Comm.), though the phrase is intended to include Absalom.—Tr.]—Ver. 14. The reasons that should determine David to forgiveness: 1) for we must die, and are like water poured out on the ground that is not gathered again.—Thenius refers these words to Amnon's death, with the meaning: "he had to die some time, and all you can do against the murderer will not bring him to life;" but the connection shows that the woman is referring not to Amnon, but to Absalom, as the "banished one," her meaning being: "Absalom (like all men) may die in banishment, and, as the dead (like poured out water) do not return, it would then repent thee not to have recalled him; take him back before it is too late." Possibly, however, the reference is to David himself, a warning that he may soon die, and must, therefore, not delay to be reconciled to Absalom. [The sense seems to be: "As life is fleeting and perishable, let not these enmities engage your mind, but put away unkindness and forgive your son." According to any of these explanations, the woman's argument is false, since it leaves the justice of the case out of view; but see the quotation from Philippon below at the end of this verse.—Tr.] 2) And God takes not away a soul, but thinks thoughts not to banish a banished one.—An argument from God's procedure towards the sinner. He does not take away the soul [life] of one that is banished, condemned for sin, so as thus to banish him forever, but "thinks thoughts not to banish him;" such mercy show to thy banished son. These words must have brought to David's recollection God's mercy towards him banished from God's presence as adulterer and murderer. [Philippon: "This is one of the noblest and profoundest declarations of the Scripture: God, who has determined us to death, nevertheless does not deprive us of life, of personality (שֵׁנִי), but has the holy purpose to receive again the banished, the sinful." This explanation makes the first half of the verse merely introductory to the thought in the second, merely a relative sentence containing an affirmation about God; this is not so probable as the view that makes the first half a separate argument. Patrick sees here a reference to the cities of refuge, for which, however, the language is too general. The argument (appeal to the divine mercy) is powerful, though false; the human judge cannot set aside the demands of justice, though God may pardon the sinner. The woman's view of death is a general one, neither denying nor affirming a future state: her statement is simply that the dead do not return to earthly life. It is therefore inadmissible to press her simile, and represent it as meaning that, as the spilt water passes in vapor to the clouds and returns as rain to the earth, so human life is to return in the raised body. This may be an allowable simile now, but it is not the teaching of this passage.—Tr.]—Ver. 15. The wise woman skilfully turns David's thoughts again to her own affair, in order to remove the suspicion that she came merely to plead for Absalom; she is content to have lodged a sharp thorn in David's heart. And now that I am come.—A natural mode of return to her first subject. Her design is to append a further explanation of her boldness in troubling the king with such a personal affair. The occasion of her coming is, she says, that the people [her kinsfolk] frightened her by demanding her son, so that she had to appeal to the king. This, therefore, is not a mere repetition of what she has already said (Thenius).—Ver. 16 expresses 1) joyful assurance that her request will be heard, and 2) the evil from which the king will save her and her son, "destruction from the inheritance of God," the cutting off* of posterity by slaying the heir is so dreadful in her eyes, because it is excision from the people belonging to the Lord. Comp. 1 Sam. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxxii. 9.—Ver. 17. Further, she says, the king's word was to be to her for rest—that is, for herself. "The king hears (judges) as" the angel of God—the angel that God sends to impart His manifestations of grace to His people, the covenant-angel, the mediator of grace for the peculiar people [the people that is God's private property]. [Rather the woman here praises the king's wisdom as being like that of one of the higher intelligences (so Achish speaks of David in 1 Sam. xxix. 9), a proof that the Israelites were then familiar with the idea of angels. Her praise is here skilfully introduced to mollify him; she does not mention Absalom's name, but leaves the king to reflect on what such a high character requires of him.—Tr.] To hear the good and the evil.—This affirms two things: 1) in every case brought before him the king will impartially and justly hear both sides, the good and the bad, Vulg.: "unmoved by benediction or malediction;" 2) He helps the oppressed. And the Lord thy God be with thee! (not "therefore be" (De Wette)); with this blessing she concludes, touching the king's heart in its innermost relation to his God and Lord. [Patrick: "There is a great deal of artifice in all this. For to presume upon the kindness of another, and to expect gracious answers from their noble qualities, is very moving; men being very loath to defeat those who think so highly of them, according to that saying of Aristotle (Rhet. 2, 4, 19): 'We love those that admire us.'"—Tr.]—Vers. 18 sq. From the cleverly put discourse of the woman the king perceives that there is something else in hand than her private affair; and surmising at the same time that she is only the instrument of another, he thinks of Joab from the confidential relation in which the latter stood to Absalom. "Is the hand of Joab with thee in all this?" The woman frankly answers in the affirmative [in the form of a compliment to the king's sagacity]: There is nothing on the right or the left of* what the king says, he always says the right; "you always hit the nail on the head" (Thenius). Joab, she says, arranged this to turn the face (form) of the thing [not "fetch about this form of speech," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.] These words do not refer to the clothing of the request for Absalom in this story about her sons, as if she meant: "that I should turn the thing so" (Luther), or "to disguise the thing in a skillful way" (Keil), or "to set before thee a figurative discourse" (Vatablus), or "that I should transfer to myself and my sons what pertains to the king and his sons" (Clericus), but the thing is Absalom's relation to his father. In order to change this relation in its present unhappy form, that is, to bring about a reconciliation, has Joab done this, sent me to thee with the words I have spoken. The woman concludes (looking back to her comparison of David to the "angel of God" in ver. 17) with the words: My lord (the king) is wise according to the wisdom of the angel of God—anxious by this appeal to the king's wisdom to secure a favorable decision for Absalom. [Here again render: "an angel of God," as in ver. 17. "To know all things that are in the earth," better, perhaps: "in the land," all the affairs of the land of Israel. The mingling of flattery and boldness in the woman's discourse is skillful and striking.—Tr.]

* There is no need to write (with Thenius) אֶת־הַיָּדָאָה before לְהַשְׁמִיד (after Sept. and Vulg.), since הַיָּדָאָה ("the man that was, laid in mind, to destroy") is naturally supplied (Gen. 132, 3, Rem. 1). [On this comp. "Text and Gramm." Eng. A. V. supplies "that would."—Ta.]

Vers. 21-23. Joab's request fulfilled by permitting Absalom to return to Jerusalem. Behold, I have done this thing (according to thy word).—The margin has (through misapprehension): "thou hast done;" but the text is to be retained. The Perfect is used because the thing is an accomplished fact = I have fulfilled thy request. Go and bring Absalom back.—These words refer merely to the execution of what had been already determined and accomplished.—Ver. 22. Joab thanks and blesses David for granting his request. To judge from his words here, he had often before made this request, but hitherto in vain. Read: "his servant," as in the text, against the marginal reading: "thy servant." Joab himself brings Absalom back to Jerusalem.—Ver.

24. Absalom's pardon, however, was not a full one; it consisted only in the permission to return to Jerusalem. He remained banished from the royal court. My face shall he not see, says David. This was no real pardon. David's anger still continued. It is a natural surmise that this was because Absalom showed no repentance and did not ask for forgiveness; there is not the slightest hint of his doing so. Let him turn to his own house.—These words suggest that Absalom was not merely banished from court, but also confined to his own house. Otherwise (as Thenius points out) he would not have been obliged to send for Joab (ver. 28 comp. with ver. 31.) [David's banishing Absalom from court was just and wise, since his crime deserved punishment, and it was right that the people should know the king's abhorrence of the crime (Patrick). Perhaps this half-forgiveness was an impolitic measure (Keil), since it may have merely vexed and embittered Absalom. It is not necessary to suppose that the king was angry with him; his conduct may have been determined by his regard for law and justice while his heart desired complete reconciliation. Bib. Comm. suggests that Bathsheba's influence may have been exerted to keep Absalom in disgrace for the sake of Solomon.—Tr.]

Vers. 25-33. Absalom's person and family.—By defiant obstinacy he secures his recall to court through Joab's mediation.—Vers. 25 sqq. Absalom's beauty.—He was the handsomest man in Israel. Literally: "and as Absalom there was not a handsome man in all Israel to praise much." There was no spot, no bodily blemish in him. From year to year* he polled or cut his hair. The weight of the polled hair here given, 200 shekels, is certainly too great, being about six pounds, if the royal shekel = the sacred shekel; and if it be taken as = one half the sacred shekel, the weight is still too great. There is no doubt an error of text here. Perhaps we should read 20 instead of 200 (2 may have passed into 7); "for 20 shekels (= 9 or 10 ounces) would suppose a very heavy, but not incredibly heavy, head of hair" (Thenius). [Others read four shekels (= 7 instead of 7). But as all the ancient versions (except the anonymous vers. quoted in Montfaucon's Hex. as giving "one hundred") agree with the Hebrew, any such change of letters must have been made early, when probably not the present square characters, but the old Phœnician were in use; so that we must go to them to discover possible changes of this sort.—There is doubt as to what particular weight is meant by the "king's shekel." It cannot be the Babylonian shekel, says Thenius, for this would point to a postexilic origin for this passage, which is impossible. The king, says Wellhausen, is the Persian Great King, and this verse betrays a postexilic origin. Nothing more definite can be said than that the king's shekel is probably a different weight from the sacred shekel, and probably less than that. Kitto mentions reading of a lady's hair that weighed more than four pounds, and, if the two hundred shekels is not more than this, it is a possible weight. It is evidently intended to represent the hair as extraordinarily heavy and strong, in order to explain xviii. 9. The ancients were accustomed to bestow much care on the hair, see Jos. Ant. 8, 7, 3, and Bp. Patrick in loco.—[Tr.].—Ver. 27. Absalom's children. Only one is mentioned by name, a daughter Tamar, probably called after Absalom's unfortunate sister. The sons (contrary to custom) are not named, probably because they died young. This would explain Absalom's erecting a monument (xviii. 18) to perpetuate his name. Concerning Tamar the Sept. adds: "and she becomes the wife of Rehoboam the son of Solomon and bears him Abia." Now 1 Kings xv. 2 certainly describes the wife of Rehoboam and mother of Abijah as a daughter of Absalom, but calls her Maacah. The Sept. has here (as elsewhere) evidently introduced an explanation from that passage, confounding, however, Tamar with another later-born daughter of Absalom, who was Rehoboam's wife. Thenius remarks: "Rehoboam's wife is certainly a grand-daughter of Absalom (daughter of his daughter Tamar) named after her great-grandmother Maacah (iii. 3)," where "perhaps" ought to stand instead of "certainly."—Ver. 28 sqq. As Absalom was not permitted for two years to enter the king's presence, and Joab declined to visit him though twice sent for (evidently because he did not wish to have any thing more to do with the matter since the king's displeasure continued), it is clear that ver. 1 cannot be rendered: "the king's heart was toward him." [David's conduct may be explained by supposing that, while his heart was with Absalom, his regard for justice led him to punish his crime by keeping him at a distance.—Tr.].—Ver. 30. Joab's "piece, parcel," that is, field (as we also use the word). Sept. has: "the portion in the field of Joab," but there is no reason to change the Heb. text accordingly.—The Heb. text reads: "I will set it on fire;" but all the versions adopt the marginal reading: "set it on fire."* The phrase "at my hand" = "alongside of my ground, beside me." This confirms the view that Absalom occupied himself with tilling the soil even in Jerusalem. That Absalom fired Joab's barley because he knew it would bring Joab to him (Keil) is not probable. It was rather an act of angry revenge in keeping with Absalom's haughty and passionate nature. In ver. 30 Sept. and Vulg. add: "and the servants of Joab came to him with garments rent, and said: Absalom's servants have set the field on fire." It is possible that these words belonged to the original text, and fell away by similar ending, two consecutive sentences ending with the word "fire" (Then.). But the narrative is perfectly clear without this addition.—Ver. 31. Joab came to Absalom's house, because the latter was shut up, a prisoner, as it were, in his own house.—Ver. 32. The message sent by Absalom through Joab to his father contains 1) a reproach: why am I come from Geshur? (= why didst thou send for me) if I am not permitted to appear before thee? 2) A repudiation of the indulgence shown him in the permission granted him to return home: it were better for me that I were still there; 3) a self-willed demand: and now I will see the king's face, and 4) a defiant challenge: if there be iniquity in me, let him kill me.—These words mean neither: "if the king can and may not forgive me," (Thenius), nor: "if he remember my iniquity" (Vulg.). Absalom rather defiantly challenges his father to proceed with strict justice, if he has done wrong; this, however, (from the tone of his speech) he does not allow, but relies on the rights he thinks he has against his father, who had been too indulgent to Amnon, having also the support of a considerable party, who would the more approve his act of bloody vengeance, because David had let Amnon go unpunished. Absalom gives no sign of repentance; there is rather a savage defiance in his words, and, instead of confessing his guilt, he challenges his father to kill him, if he is guilty, that is, he denies his guilt. David has already shown weakness in permitting Absalom to return without penitent confession; and by this halfway-procedure (letting him return, yet banishing him from his presence two years) had given occasion to the defiance and bitterness that appears in these words. He is now guilty of a still greater weakness in receiving Absalom into favor when he shows the very opposite of penitence.—Ver. 33. The words: he bowed himself on his face to the ground by no means show penitence with humble request for forgiveness, but merely exhibit the usual homage paid to the king. David was soon to taste the bitter fruits of all this faulty weakness towards Absalom.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. David, weakly yielding to ungodly influence on his mind (the woman of Tekoa), on his will (Joab) and on his feeling (Absalom), sinned against the Lord in failing to punish Absalom (as he had failed to punish Amnon) for his crime, and in receiving him into favor, on his return, without penitence. As God does not forgive sin, without confession and prayer for pardon, so men must observe this law in their relations to one another. This is demanded both by truth and by justice, neither of which may be set aside by ex-piating and pardoning love.

2. He who in unholy, weak love confounds the disposition to forgive one's neighbor with the act of forgiveness itself, and pardons when the condition is not complied with, sins not only against God's holy ordination of love, but also against his neighbor, since the hard, impenitent heart is the more hardened by such weak love, and led into further evil, as Absalom's example shows.

3. Moral weakness makes one unforeseen and unwise, and often leads to the destruction of the moral ordinances of life, on which rests the welfare of private and public life. David, by his weakness towards Absalom, became guilty of the further dissolution of the theocratic rule of life in his house and in his kingdom; the breaking up of the royal family thereby produced was the cause and the starting-point of the breaking up of the theocratic kingdom by Absalom's revolt.

rogues have commonly the best patrons, who take interest in them and try to help them through.—[HALL: Good eyes see light through the smallest chink. The wit of Joab hath soon discerned David's renewed affection, and knows how to serve him in that which he would, and would not, accomplish.—TR.]

Vers. 4-11. STARKE: To represent something wisely is also a gift of God; for thereby much good is accomplished and much evil hindered, Prov. xviii. 15.—[HALL: We love ourselves better than others, but we see others better than ourselves: whose would perfectly know his own case, let him view it in another's person. Parables sped well with David: one drew him to repent of his own sin, another to remit Absalom's punishment.—TR.]—SCHLIER: Foresight is profitable in all things, and doubly so when others wish to accomplish something with us. There are cases where certainly the first impression is the most correct, but as a rule it is better not to yield to the first momentary impression, but to prove everything. Had David first proved and inquired into the matter which with cunning and deceit was brought before him, he would not have given assurance with an oath.

Vers. 13 sqq. SCHLIER: If thou hast something against a person, forget not how soon thy adversary may die, how soon thou thyself also mayst perhaps have to pass away, and besides think of what God does to us, how rich is His mercy towards us.—Vers. 21 sqq. CRAMER: It is easily done, to let loose an outrageous offender and a murderer, but not so easily is it excused before God: for thereby blood-guiltiness is brought on the land, and other great misfortunes caused, Ezek. vii. 23.—J. LANGE: Wilful sinners also are not permitted, so long as they continue impenitent, to come into blessed communion with God, although instead of the well-deserved punishment they enjoy God's long-suffering.—SCHLIER: If thou wilt pardon, do it wholly, take out of thy heart everything thou hast against another person, forget also the injustice done thee, and make it thy concern again to show the other a whole and full heart.

Ver. 25. STARKE: Ungodly men often receive from God the fairest gifts, 1 Sam. ix. 2; xvii. 4.—SCHLIER: A fair body is also a gift of God, but what does all physical beauty help, if there does not also dwell therein a fair soul? A deformed and ugly man who has beauty of soul is worth more in the sight of God. The Lord looks at the heart.—Ver. 30. LANGE: Friendship that has self-interest for its ground, does not commonly last long.—Ver. 33. SCHLIER: David is propitiated, but it does not occur to him to work for a thorough reconciliation in Absalom's heart also; he brings to meet his son the old, full love; but he does not observe whether his son is in condition really to receive such love.—Chastisement without love is an outrage, no father is at liberty to plague or torture his child; but a love that cannot chastise is no love, and reaps a poor reward. A child that does not at the proper time feel the father's rod, becomes at last a rod for his father.

CHAPTERS XV.—XVIII.

1. Absalom's revolt and David's flight. Chap. XV. 1—XVI. 14.

- 1 AND it came to pass after this that Absalom prepared him chariots [a chariot] 2 and horses, and fifty men to run before him. And Absalom rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate; and it was so, that when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment [and it came to pass that, every man that had a cause to come to the king for judgment], then [om. then] Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou? And he said, Thy servant is of one of 3 the tribes of Israel [or, of such and such a tribe of Israel]. And Absalom said unto him, See, thy matters are good and right; but there is no man de- 4 puted of the king to hear thee. Absalom said moreover [And Absalom said]. Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man which [who] hath any suit or cause [cause or controversy] might come unto me, and I would do him justice!
 5 And it was so [And it came to pass] that when any man came nigh to him [om. to him] to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him,¹ and kissed him.
 6 And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment;
 so [and] Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel.
 7 And it came to pass after forty [four]² years, that Absalom said unto the king, I pray thee, let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed unto the Lord [Jeho-8 vah], in Hebron. For thy servant vowed a vow while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the Lord [Jehovah] shall bring me again indeed³ to Jerusalem, then 9 I will serve the Lord [Jehovah]. And the king said unto him, Go in peace. So 10 [And] he arose and went to Hebron. But [And] Absalom sent spies [or, emissar- ies] throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, As soon as ye hear⁴ the sound of 11 the trumpet, then ye shall say, Absalom reigneth in Hebron. And with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerusalem, that were called; and they went in their 12 simplicity, and they knew not anything. And Absalom sent for⁵ Ahithophel the Gilonite, David's counsellor, from his city, even from Giloh, while he offered sacrifices. And the conspiracy was strong; for the people increased continually with Absalom.

¹ [Ver. 5. This is the only place in the O. T. where the verb הוֹדִיעַ is followed by ל with the object taken hold of (though it is sometimes followed by עַל and by the simple noun), and here 29 MSS. and 2 printed EDD. have ל. Perhaps this ל was imitated from, or by error of copyist arose from the following ל.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 7. Though the true reading is here unknown, the reading "four" instead of "forty" has been adopted in the revised translation because it seems at any rate much more nearly correct than the Heb. text. The reading "forty" is found in Sept. and other Greek VSS., Chald., Vulg., Cod. A. (Amlatinus); "four" in Syr., Arab., Vulg., Cod., B. C. D. E. F. K. Veronensis, Josephus.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 8. The Kethib or text is Hiph. Impf. (יִשָּׁבֵן), the Qeri or marginal reading (יִשָּׁבֵן) is Qal Impf. (יִשָּׁבֵן) or Qal Inf. Absolute (יִשָּׁבֵן). The text is maintained by Böttcher and Erdmann as a repetition of the finite verb for emphasis; but this, if possible here, is certainly less probable than the Inf. Absol. construction (favored by Sept., Syr., Chald.); write Hiph. Inf. יִשָּׁבֵן (Thenius, Wellhausen, Bib.-Com.).—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 10. A few MSS. and EDD. have ל as prefix instead of ב; here impossible.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 12. The present Heb. text (וַיִּשְׁלַח), whether it be pointed as Qal or as Piel, cannot be so rendered, but means "and he sent," which gives no sense. Only Chald. renders the Heb. literally; the other versions insert ל or לָהּ ("to") after the verb, Vulg. accersivit (so Eng. A. V.). Others (as Böttcher, Thenius) insert וַיִּבְרַח: "and he sent and brought Ahithophel;" Wellhausen suggests: "and he sent to Ahithophel and he came (וַיָּבֹא). Some

- 13 And there came a messenger to David, saying, The hearts of the men of Israel 14 are after Absalom. And David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise, and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom; make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and bring evil upon us, and smite 15 the city with the edge⁶ of the sword. And the king's servants said unto the king, Behold, thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall appoint 16 [choose]. And the king went forth, and all his household after him. And the king left ten women which were [om. women which were] concubines to keep the 17 house. And⁷ the king went forth, and all the people after him, and tarried [halted] 18 in a place that was far off [in Beth-hammahak, or, at the far house]. And all his servants passed on beside him, and all the Cherethites and all the Pelethites, and all the Gittites, six hundred men, which [who] came after him from Gath passed on before the king.
19 Then said the king [And the king said] to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us? Return to thy place,⁸ and abide with the king; for thou art a 20 stranger, and also an exile. Whereas thou camest but yesterday [Yesterday thou camest], should I this day [and to-day shall I] make thee go up and down with us?
[om. ?], seeing I go whither I may [ins. ?] Return thou, and take back thy bresuch change seems necessary in order to make sense of the passage.—The following phrase also: “as he was sacrificing” is obscure, as it does not appear what his sacrificing has to do with the matter. Cod. Amlatinus of the Vulg. reads: “and when he sacrificed (was sacrificing), the conspiracy became strong,” thus connecting the growth of the conspiracy with the sacrifice, and so Böttcher: “when the man was come to Absalom to Hebron, as he was sacrificing, etc.” while Wellhausen would omit the phrase. But there is no sufficient ground for changing the text here, not even for adopting the slight change of the Vulg., which Thenius prefers, rendering: “and by his sacrificing the confederation (קִשְׁר) was made firm,” that is, under the solemn excitement of the offering the conspirators were brought to swear fidelity to Absalom. But the meaning of the Heb. rather is that the conspiracy grew strong by accession of numbers. If we retain the text, we shall have to understand that Ahithophel was brought away as he was discharging a solemn duty, that is, summoned in haste to join the conspiracy, where success depended on rapid movement, or that he was summoned to join Absalom as the latter was sacrificing (so Chandler, Bib.-Com.). Patrick says: “after he had sacrificed,” but the words do not permit this.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 14. לִפְיִי — “to (according to) the mouth,” or at “the mouth.”—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 17. The Sept. here varies somewhat from the Heb., and various changes of the latter have been suggested. The Sept. translation, however, in its present form contains a duplet; two different renderings of 17 b and 18 are combined, and these two in general confirm the Heb. text. The first Sept. rendering (vers. 17, 18) is: “and the king went forth and all his servants” (Heb. “all the people,” but some MSS. agree with the Greek, and the Chald. has “all his household”) on foot (properly “at his feet, after him”), and stood in the far house. And all his servants passed by at his hand and all the Cherethites and all the Pelethites and all the Gittites the six hundred men that came after him from Gath and going before the face of the king,” which varies from the Heb. in one word only, putting “servants” (i. e., body-guard) instead of “people.” The second Sept. rendering (beginning with 17 b and inserted in the above after the word “Pelethites”) is: “and stood at the olive-tree in the wilderness” (בְּיַד הָעֵץ עַל הַמִּדְבָּר) instead of בֵּית הַמִּדְבָּר “far house”, and all the people (Heb. “servants”) went by at his side (hand) and all those about him (this is possibly a general rendering of “Cherethites and Pelethites,” who formed a body-guard) and all the stout men and all the warriors (perhaps a double rendering of גִּבּוֹרִים “heroes,” which they read instead of גִּבּוֹרִים “Gittites”) six hundred men, and were at his hand,” after which the phrase “Cherethites and Pelethites” is repeated by error of copyist. From a comparison of the Heb. and Greek texts Böttcher proposes to read “at the olive-tree in the wilderness” (ver. 17) instead of “at the far house,” to which Thenius replies that this is impossible, since David had not then passed over the Kidron. Thenius himself would adopt the “mighty men” (גִּבּוֹרִים) suggested by the Sept. instead of the “Gittites” of the Hebrew; this emendation is a very natural one, but the fact of David’s having a band of foreign warriors is not so strange and improbable as to call for correction; the other versions here support the Heb. In ver. 17 Wellhausen prefers the “servants” of the Sept. to the “people” of the Heb., as indicating that David’s body-guard stood with him while the army passed on; and this reading, which is supported by some MSS. and EDD., and by the Chald. (see above) is probable; so in ver. 18 Sept. has “people” instead of “servants.” Wellhausen thinks also that some phrase introducing Ittai is necessary at the end of ver. 18, and that there are traces in the Heb. text of some such original passage; as, the statement that the six hundred men came “after him” from Gath, which was not true of this march. Ver. 18 might then read: “and all the people passed on by him, and all the Cherethites and all the Pelethites and all the heroes (Gibborim), six hundred men, and Ittai also the Gittite, who not long before had come from Gath to Jerusalem, passed on before the king.” While this would ease the text and explain the circumstances, it seems too violent a change to make without more external support, especially as abrupt introduction of personages well-known at the time is not contrary to the usage of our narrative.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 19. Eng. A. V. here gives the only possible translation (which is also that of Pagninus) of the Heb. text in its present form. Pagninus: “Return (and abide with the king, for thou art a stranger and an exile) to thy place.” Bib.-Com.: “Return and abide with the king (for thou art, etc.) at thy place.” But this parenthesis is very hard, and it would seem better either to remove the “to thy place” and put it after “return” (in the Heb.), a change that is without external support, or to read “from” (מִן) instead of “to” (לְ), and render: “and an exile art thou from thy place” (so one MS., several printed EDD., and Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg.). Cahen follows the Chald.: “for thou art a stranger, and also if thou wilt migrate, go to thy place,” which differs from Eng. A. V. only in inserting the word “go” instead of transposing the phrase “to thy place.” Philippon: “thou art an exile for thy place,” which gives no good sense.—Böttcher and Thenius object to the supposed satirical tone of the remark: “abide with the king;” the former would read “in the city (בְּעִיר) of the king,” which is an improbable phrase, the latter simply “in the city.” The Syr. and Arab. also seem to have felt a difficulty here; Syr.: “desist from the king,” Arab.: “go not forth with the king.” The Heb. text is preferable.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 22. Sept.: "Come and pass over with me. And Ittai the Gittite passed over, and the king and all his men, etc.," which Thenius adopts, but Böttcher and Wellhausen remark that it entirely misrepresents the scene, where the troops are passing in review before the king, and it is impossible to suppose that his "little ones" were with him; the king himself does not pass over the brook till ver. 23.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 27. The present Heb., with the masoretic pointing can only be rendered: "art thou a seer?" Erdmann, changing the pointing (יָדָה) into יָדָה: "Thou seer!" To this Thenius objects that "prophet" and "seer" are two different things, and that there is no propriety in here calling Zadok by the latter name; he himself writes: יָדָה "turn back," which, however, does not account for the text-reading. The simplest emendation is that of Wellhausen, who writes: יָדָה לְפָנָיו "to Zadok the high-priest." To this the objection is that the phrase occurs only in late books. Kings, Jer., Ezra, Chron., and this is not satisfactorily removed by Wellhausen's remark that "the expression comes from the redactor," since this would be the only instance in which a late (postexilic) redactor has used the expression. The reading יָדָה or יָדָה would be supported by the same word at the beginning of ver. 28, as well as by Sept. The Syr. omits the word.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 28. So (with Kethib) Erdmann, Böttcher, Thenius, Wellhausen, Keil. Cahen and Wordsworth: "passages of the wilderness" (leading to the river).—Ta.]

Unto whom David said [And David said to him], If thou passest on with me, then shalt thou be a burden unto me; But¹⁶ if thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king; as [om. as] I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also [and now I will] be thy servant; then mayest thou for me defeat the counsel of Ahithophel. And hast thou not there with thee Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore [and] it shall be that [om. it shall be that] what thing soever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, thou shalt tell it [om. it] to Zadok and Abiathar the priests. Behold, they have there with them their two sons, Ahimaaz Zadok's son, and Jonathan Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me everything that ye can [om. can] hear. CHAP. XVI. 1. And when [om. when] David was a little past the top of the hill, [ins. and] behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and an hundred bunches [cakes] of raisins, and an hundred of summer-fruits [cakes of figs], and a bottle 2 [skin] of wine. And the king said unto Ziba, What meanest thou by these? And Ziba said, The asses be [are] for the king's household to ride on, and the bread and summer-fruit [figs] for the young men to eat, and the wine that [for] such as be [are] faint in the wilderness may [to] drink. And the king said, And where is 3 thy master's son? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem; for he said, To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father. 4 Then said the king [And the king said] to Ziba, Behold, thine are all that pertained unto [is all that belonged to] Mephibosheth. And Ziba said, I humbly beseech thee [I bow down] that [om. that]; I may [may I] find grace in thy sight, my lord O king.

And he cast stones at David, and at all the servants of king David; and all the people and all 7 the mighty men were on his right hand and on his left. And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial 8 [wicked man]. The Lord [Jehovah] hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul, in whose stead thou hast reigned, and the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son; and behold, thou art taken 9 in thy mischief [thou art in thy calamity¹⁸], because thou art a bloody man. Then said Abishai the son of Zeruiah [And Abishai, etc., said] unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? let me go over, I pray thee, and take off 10 his head. And the king said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? so¹⁹

¹⁶ [Ver. 34. The present form of the Sept. reads: "and if thou return to the city and say to Absalom, Thy brethren are passed over, and the king behind me has passed over, thy father; and now I am thy servant, O king, suffer me to live; thy father's servant was I then and lately, and now I am thy servant; and thou shalt disconcert for me the counsel of Ahithophel." Ewald would adopt the words "thy brethren, etc.," as a statement that David and his other sons had gone on while Hushai went to Jerusalem. But Thenius and Wellhausen properly remark that the Sept. text here contains a duplet; the sentence "thy brethren, etc." is simply a misreading of the Heb. words "thy servant am I, etc." The phrase "suffer me to live" (which Wellh. calls "too spaniel-like") is the rendering of מִיָּדָי (instead of the text מִיָּדָי); and Böttcher remarks that the "and lately" (et aprieus) is an addition of the Sept. without support in the Heb.—The frequency of the ו ("and") in this verse is remarkable, and is imitated only by the Chald. "I indeed was thy father's servant, and now I indeed am thy servant," a form of address intended to convey the eagerness of the speaker.—Ta.]

And the king and all the people that were with him came weary [or, came to Ajephim] and refreshed themselves there.

Cahen: "if." The apodosis may be begun with וְכִי or with וְאִם; in the first case render: "when he curses, Jahveh has bidden him, etc.," in the second case: "when he curses, and when Jahveh has bidden him, who will say?" Sept. and Vulg. (from ver. 11): "let him alone."—Bötcher renders: "if (עַל), he curses the mouth of Jahveh (וְהָיָה) 'B, that is, Jahveh Himself) has ordered it." EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-12. Absalom's insurrection.—Ver. 1. "After this." The word here used (אַחֲרַיִם) comp. iii. 28) shows that what is here related follows immediately* on the event narrated in xiv. 23-33. Absalom provides himself a state-chariot with its appurtenances [fifty runners or footmen] in order thus to assume a royal appearance and to attract the wondering attention of the people to himself. Comp. the similar procedure of Adonijah, 1 Kings i. 5.—Ver. 2 sq. Vivid description of his condescending behaviour (in contrast with his pompous appearance) to gain the favor of the people in connection with their law-matters. [He "rose up early" in order to show his zeal and get opportunities; and such legal business is usually attended to very early in the East; Malcolm (quoted by Philippeon) says that Oriental ministers hold their levees at an hour when Western people of quality are not yet up.—Tr.]. The "gate" here referred to is the gate of the royal palace, whither those came that sought the decision of the king in law-matters. "For judgment," that is, for legal decision. The "hearer" is the judicial officer whose duty it was first to hear and understand the people's matters, and then lay them before the king, an auscultator. For just decision everything depends on careful hearing and understanding. But there is no hearer for these on the part of the king.—Absalom guards indeed against accusing the king himself of injustice; but he excites in the minds of the people distrust of the king's whole judicial practice by saying that there was no regular judicial process for a good and just cause. Perhaps neglect and partiality had crept in, so that Absalom could find some handle for his charges, and avail himself of an already existing dissatisfaction. In the words: See, thy matters are good and right, he gives (in order to win favor) a judicial decision before thorough investigation has been made. Thy just cause, says he, is not investigated; else thou would'st not lack a favorable decision. [Absalom shows himself master of the art of political intriguing—he flatters the people and brings charges against the rulers. Perhaps his insinuations were directed in part against the princes his brothers, possibly against Solomon (Patrick), whose age, however, at this time we do not know, or whether it had been intimated that he was heir to the throne.—Tr.].—Ver. 4. "O that I were made judge," literally: "who will make me judge" (Gen. § 136, 1). "That to me [lit. "on me"], might come every man." The "to me" is put first for the sake of emphasis; Absalom contrasts himself as just judge with the state of things under his father. עַל ("on me") stands for לִי ("to me"), or, the sentence is to be explained with Thenius from the collective idea "all men"

(שָׁלֵחַ): "In imagination Absalom sees the litigants assembled around him," comp. Ex. xviii. 13; Judg. iii. 19; 1 Sam. xxii. 6. The phrase "on me" is not to be explained from the sitting of the judge and the people standing around above him. [The phrase "come on me" is like English "press on," "lean on," and implies probably that Absalom would bear their burdens, or else, the proposition here = "at, near, with" (apud).—Tr.].—I would do him justice.—Absalom here presumes on the people's litigiousness and their confidence in the justice each man of his own cause, and, having brought his father's judicial procedure into discredit with them, promises to do every man justice. Vulg.: "I should judge justly."—Ver. 5 sq. [Absalom's affability]. He magnanimously puts aside the honor gained by these arts, and attaches the people to him by a pretended fraternization with every man. The result of these preparations for the purposed insurrection: Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel.—The phrase (לִבְּכֹל) may also mean "to decide the heart," as in Gen. xxxi. 20;

* [This remark is made also by Thenius and Kell, but it is doubtful whether the idea of immediateness is contained in the adverb itself, that is, especially in the prefix אַחֲרַיִם. This prefix (= "from") cannot in itself convey the idea, and the meaning of the adverb must be determined by usage; but it occurs too seldom in the O. T. (only three times 2 Sam. iii. 28; xv. 1; 2 Chron. xxxii. 23) to permit us to draw the conclusion stated by Thenius.—Tr.]

but the connection shows that the meaning here is "to steal the heart." [Sept. very well: "made his own the heart," idoneoiteiro; Vulg.: solicitabat corda.—Tr.] He turned the hearts of the people by guile from his father to himself. [Patrick: a most vile piece of flattery (ver. 5), yet acceptable to the people. So Plato (Rep. Lib. viii.), describes those as doing that would get possession of the government; and see Aristotle Pol. V. 4. Absalom's beautiful person no doubt attracted the people, as well as his condescending familiarity of manner.—Tr.]

Vers. 7-12. The conspiracy set on foot.—Ver. 7. The statement of time: At the end of forty years, is certainly wrong according to the connection. An immediate sequence of events being indicated in ver. 1 [see on ver. 1 and translator's note], the phrase "at the end of" can only point to a previous occurrence in Absalom's life—not, however, to his return from Geshur, which is not important enough in the narrative to serve as reckoning-point (terminus a quo) for a new series of events, but rather to his reconciliation with David (xiv. 33). But Absalom's procedure here described (vers. 1-6) up to his insurrection cannot have lasted forty years; and further, such a space of time cannot be fitted into the history of David and Absalom, though this would be allowable only in case there were here indicated some chronological-historical point of support, as it has been attempted to find, for example, in Absalom's age at this time or in the duration of David's reign. According to these conjectures Absalom's conspiracy must have occurred in the last days of David's reign, and this would be wholly unhistorical. The reading of Codd. 70 and 90 (Kennicott) "forty days" is a violent attempt to remove the difficulty, and only introduces another difficulty, since forty days is too short a time after Absalom's reconciliation with his father for all his preparations here described. We must read "four years" with Syr., Arab., Vulg. [but Codex Amiatinus has "forty"—Tr.], Josephus, Theodoret (Capellus, Grotius, Ewald, Thenius, Keil and others [Bib.-Com.]).* [Others, (as Ussher, Patrick, Cahen, Philippon) retain the number "forty," and reckon it in various ways, some from the beginning of David's reign (Abarbanel), some from David's anointment by Samuel (Ussher and others), some from the people's demand for a king (Seder Olam); but the objection to all these is (as Erdmann above suggests) that there is no hint in the text of so remote a terminus a quo as any of them; the time is evidently reckoned from some near event. Though the number four is more probable than forty, it is after all only a conjecture, though a well-supported one; the chronology must here be regarded as uncertain.—Tr.]. —Ver. 8. Absalom's "vow" and "serving the Lord" is to be understood of the offering of a sacrifice. He wished to sacrifice in Hebron, ostensibly, no doubt, because it was his birth-place, but really because (his father having there assumed the crown) he considered it a peculiarly suitable place for his being proclaimed king. He chose this place, not because there was dissatisfaction at the removal of the royal residence to Jerusalem (Thenius and Keil, following the "Exegetical Manual"), but because he could there count on a numerous following from the tribe of Judah.* [We have here an example of sacrificial feasting not in connection with the Tabernacle (as in David's history 1 Sam. xx. 6), an indication that the strict law of Leviticus (Lev. xvii. 3, 4; comp. Deut. xii. 13, 14) was not in practical operation; else David would have objected to sacrificing in Hebron.—Tr.].—Ver. 9. David permits himself to be deceived by the pretence of a thank-offering in Hebron, which Absalom might have offered as well, or better, in Jerusalem. Ewald remarks: "that David observed nothing of all this till the startling news reached him that the heart of Israel was turned to Absalom, cannot be reckoned to his disadvantage, since so ancient and simple a kingdom had nothing like our modern state-police; it is rather a mark of the noble-minded security that we elsewhere see in him, that he gives so free scope to his beloved son, who might be regarded as first-born and heir-apparent, and whose quiet nature certainly even greatly pleased him."—Ver. 10. "Absalom sent." The verb is not Pluperfect but Imperfect, since the sending out of emissaries might be synchronous with the journey to Hebron, where Absalom's accomplices had gotten everything in readiness for proclaiming him king, else he could not have said: As soon as ye hear the sound of the trumpet,† say, Absalom is become king in Hebron. Absalom sent emissaries into all the tribes of Israel, to find out public opinion and prepare for his attempt throughout the whole kingdom at the same time, he having already gotten the favor of the people by the arts above-related, and thrown his net over them. The emissaries had only to spread the net wider and deeper, and then at the signal to draw it in and catch the people.—Ver. 11. The two hundred men that accompanied him were not "poor, dependent people," which would certainly have excited surprise, but courtiers such as usually accompanied kings and kings' sons on their journeys without causing remark. That these men might be perfectly at their ease, under the impression that they were going to a sacrificial feast at Hebron, and that the real purpose might the better be concealed from David, nothing was said to them of Absalom's design; they knew "nothing at all" of the matter. Taken by surprise in Hebron by the sudden proclamation of Absalom as king, they must have appeared to the people at Jerusalem and elsewhere as part of the royal retinue. [Bib.-Com. points out the extreme secrecy of the affair as explaining David's ignorance of it, and also Absalom's taste for large entertainments.—Tr.]. Ver. 12. Ahithophel appears as Absalom's secret

* According to Ewald and Böttcher our text arose from the fact that אַרְבַּעִים שָׁנָה [arba'im shanah, forty years] occurs much more frequently than אַרְבַּע שָׁנִים [arba shanim, four years], and the terminations a and im were confounded by the careless hearing of the scribe. The numbers from 2 to 10 usually take the plural after them; but there are exceptions, as 2 Kl. xii. 1. Comp. Ges. § 120.2.

* יָשִׁיב is not Inf., but Impf. Hiph., used for emphasis instead of the Inf.; "if he really bring me back." Comp. Böttcher. [On this see "Text. and Gram.—Tr.].
† [Cahen: "As it was impossible to hear one trumpet all over the land, we must suppose that there were various stations where the signal was repeated."—Tr.]

counsellor in the contriving of the conspiracy, and so as traitor to David, whose counsellor he was. His native city Giloh was near and south of Hebron (Josh. xv. 51, 54). The text reads literally: "He sent Ahithophel from his city," that is, he caused him to come. Either this expression is to be regarded as a pregnant one—"hesent and brought" (Keil), or we must change the vowel-points.* Why Ahithophel abandoned David is not said; probably from dissatisfaction and ambition. [Patrick: "And it is supposed by the Jews that Ahithophel was incensed against David for abusing Bathsheba, whom they take to have been his grand-daughter, she being the daughter of Eliam (xi. 3), and Eliam being the son of Ahithophel (xxiii. 34)."—So Blunt, Coincidences, Part II. (ix.)—Tr.]—No doubt he had been slyly working at Giloh, and had prepared everything for proclaiming Absalom. The conspiracy grew rapidly, and the people came to Absalom in constantly increasing numbers. It is noticeable that it is in the tribe of Judah that this defection from David is consummated. The elements of this so astonishingly successful insurrection of Absalom were David's grievous sins, his weakness towards Amnon and Joab, the lacks of the royal government and the consequent dissatisfaction among the people. [The expression: "while he offered bloody offerings" is difficult. If the subject be Ahithophel, it does not appear why his offering should be mentioned; or if, as is more probable, the subject is Absalom, the reason for his sending for Ahithophel while he was offering is not clear; we should rather have expected the latter to be present at the beginning of the solemn sacrifice that was to pledge the conspirators. As the text stands, it cannot be rendered: "he sent for Ahithophel to be present when he offered," nor: "and while he sacrificed, the conspiracy grew strong," though something like one of these renderings seems to be the meaning. The text is discussed in "Text and Gram."—Grotius refers to the similar procedure of Civilis (pledging conspirators at a feast), Tacit., Hist. IV. 14.—Tr.]

Ch. xv. 13—xvi. 14. David's flight before Absalom.—Ver. 13. Literally: "the messenger," according to our usage: "a messenger," the Heb. employing the Def. Art. to express the class individualized in the person in question. Comp. Ges. § 109, 3, Rem. 1 b, c.—"The heart of the men of Israel is after Absalom"—"to be after one" means "to attach one's self to him, embrace his cause." Comp. ii. 10; 1 Sam. xii. 14.—Ver. 14. Up! let us flee. David's immediate flight is to be explained (according to the reason that he himself here gives) by the fact that seized not with momentary fear (Thenius), but doubtless with sudden terror at the unexpected revolution, he yet sees that the fulfilment of Nathan's prophecy of approaching "misfortune" (xii. 10, 11) is now beginning, that the punishment cannot be warded off, and that to stay in Jerusalem will only occasion a storming of the city with much bloodshed, which he wishes to avoid. "Against an insurrection so vigorous, and yet so thoroughly groundless and unintelligible, the best defence was to withdraw quietly and try to gain time; the first fright happily gotten over, sober thought would soon return in many places" (Ewald). [How far Jerusalem was now in condition to stand a siege (Zion was probably fortified), or whether David had a well-organized standing army, and how much of the army Absalom carried off, we do not know; David's forces seem not to have received any important addition after he left the city. Two reasons for leaving Jerusalem would be: to spare the city the horrors of a siege, and to gain the advantage of his military skill and of the discipline of his tried warriors in the open country.—Tr.]—[Ver. 15. David's servants (soldiers) declare themselves ready to obey his commands—a comfortable faithfulness in the midst of general defection.—Tr.]—Ver. 16. The king's household went "after him" (לְאַחֲרָיו), comp. Judg. iv. 10, 15, not: "on foot" (Michaelis). The king left ten concubines to keep the house. It appears from xix. 6 [Eng. A. V. 5] that other concubines went along with him.—Ver. 17. "All the people," all persons attached to the court, including the numerous body of servants—"the whole household" (ver. 16). They halted at "the farthest (or far) house" [Eng. A. V.: "a place that was far off"] on the road to Mount Olivet, but this side the Kidron. So the German phrase "the last cent" (der letzte Heller) used as a proper name to designate a farm lying at the extremity of a region. Probably this designation had already become a proper name among the people. [Bib. Com.: "very likely a fort guarding the passage of the Kidron." Others write: Beth-merhak.—Tr.]—Ver. 18. David having halted here with his immediate retinue (of his household), caused first all his servants to pass by at his side (לְפָנָיו), then his body guard and six hundred Gittites (who had followed him from Gath) to pass before him, so that the latter formed the vanguard. On the "Cherethites and Pelethites" comp. viii. 18. As the "six hundred men that followed him from Gath" are called "all the Gittites," they must be those six hundred faithful companions-in-arms that gathered about David during Saul's persecution (1 Sam. xxii. 2; xxiii. 13; xxv. 13), went with him to Gath (1 Sam. xxvii. 2 sq.) and settled with him in Ziklag (1 Sam. xxvii. 8; xxix. 2; xxx. 1, 9). Thence they marched with him to Hebron (ii. 3) and Jerusalem (v. 6). They are the same that are called "Gibborim" [heroes, mighty men] in xvi. 6, and appear as his military escort. Comp. xx. 7; xxiii. 8 sqq., where the Gibborim seem to be identical with these. "They very probably formed, from the time that David went to reside at Jerusalem, a special body, known as 'the Gibborim,' kept always in full number (hence here also, six hundred), living in barracks at Jerusalem (see Appendix to the Books of Kings, § 7), employed only in the most important undertakings (x. 7; xx. 7, 9) the Old Guard, as it were, who here also will protect the retreat of their lord with their stout, faithful bodies" (Thenius). They are here called "the Gittites" because they were so called by the people, as having followed David "from Gath on" (Keil). There is no necessity for reading Gibborim instead of Gittites (Thenius), especially as all the versions have the latter. [This reading is discussed in "Text. and Gram." Some hold these "Gittites" to be foreigners (Philistines) that had entered David's service, as we know many foreigners did; and this is probable, if we retain the present text. But that the Gibborim were called "Gittites" (Keil) is not probable, and as there is no account of such a body of Philistines having followed David from Gath (that is, when he lived there), there is strong reason for reading Gibborim instead of Gittites.—Tr.]—Ver. 19. Ittai was a Philistine of Gath, "who had lately with other bold Philistine warriors come over to David, and, having probably had a good position in his native city, was also assigned a high place by David" (Ewald). According to ver. 22 his wife and children were with him. He was given command of one-third of the army (xviii. 2), and stood along with Joab and Abishai as an able general. It need not surprise us that a foreigner should occupy such a military position; comp. xi. 3, Uriah the Hittite. David advises this faithful follower not to go with him, but to remain "with the king" at Jerusalem. This phrase cannot mean: with him that is or will be king, according to God's will, whether it be David or Absalom (Keil, and so Seb. Schmidt: "it is not your business to decide this contest: wait quietly, see whom God chooses and serve him"), but it must be referred definitely to Absalom, who in David's eyes is now king de facto. Ewald: David gave him the friendly advice to stay in Jerusalem with the new king. David thus neither recognizes Absalom as rightful king (Böttch.), nor ironically so calls him = "with him who is acting as if he were king" (Clericus). In this usurpation of the throne David recognizes and submits to a divine dispensation, and so calls Absalom king.—The reason for his counsel to Ittai: "For thou art a stranger and moreover an emigrant (exile) in thy place. "Stranger" = not an Israelite; "emigrant or exile" (לֵצֵל) = one not in his native land. The last phrase may be rendered: "for* thy place," or "in respect to thy place," or may be taken to express a state of quiet (comp. Gen. § 154, 3 e). The meaning is: "as a foreigner, thou needst not care who is king, or join either side; stay where thou art." The reading of Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab.: "thou hast come from thy place," does not warrant us in changing the preposition "to" of the Heb. into "from;" for, if the latter were the original text, it is hard to see how the present difficult reading came. [The passage reads literally: "Return, and abide with the king, for thou art a stranger and also an exile to thy place." Eng. A. V. transposes the last phrase, or supposes a parenthesis: "return to thy place and abide," etc. (and so Kimchi), and Bib.-Com.: "Return and dwell with the king (for thou art a foreigner and thou art an exile) at thy place" (i. e. Jerusalem). Erdmann in his translation of the chapter (prefixed to the Exposition) gives: "for thou art a stranger and moreover a man that has been carried away from his place," but here renders it quite differently: "for thou art a stranger and an exile in thy place," that is, remaining quietly in thy place (Jerusalem, thy adopted home). Philippson: "thou art a stranger, etc., in respect to thy place" (Gath, thy native place). The parenthesis of Eng. A. V. is improbable, and Erdmann's rendering in the Exposition is impossible; we must adopt Philippson's, or change the Prep. and read "from," as Erdmann in his translation. See the discussion in "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—Whether Ittai came with his family (ver. 22) and his kinsfolk (ver. 20) to Jerusalem as hostage (Thenius), or went over to David with other warriors (Ewald), cannot be determined, as nothing is said thereon. But as he was a man in high position and a distinguished military leader, and as David broke the Philistines' supremacy in the last war with them (viii. 1), it is probable (ver. 20: "thou camest yesterday") that this victory of David's was the occasion of his coming to Jerusalem.—Ver. 20. The sense is: "Shall I drag* thee, a stranger lately come, and an exile, into my unquiet and precarious life?" Since I go whither I go, without certain aim, "whither the way leads me" (Maurer). Comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 13.—David wishes Ittai the favor and the faithfulness of God. From this and from Ittai's saying: "as the Lord lives," it is probable that Ittai with his whole house had already become a believer in the God of Israel. [From this expression we cannot infer anything as to Ittai's religious position, much less as to that of his family. Any foreigner might believe in Jehovah as a deity and swear by His name (so Achish, 1 Sam. xxix. 6) without giving up his own gods. On general grounds it is not improbable that Ittai accepted the God of Israel; but we have no information as to any special religious depth or conversion in his history.—Tr.] It is doubtful whether we should render: "carry thy brethren back with thee in grace and truth" (Maurer), or take the latter part separately: "with thee be grace and truth," that is, God's (Keil); the accents favor the first, the connection of thought the second. Sept. and Vulg. have: "and the Lord will do with thee grace and truth," to which Vulg. adds: "because thou hast shown grace and faithfulness," whence Thenius (with Ew. and Böttch. for the Sept. reading) will correspondingly change the Heb. text.† But the words of Sept. and Vulg. seem to be an interpreting paraphrase, with the similar words in ii. 5, 6, in mind. The text without this addition gives a good sense: "lead thy brethren back; with thee be grace and faithfulness."

* So as to read פִּלְשֵׁתִי [Piel] for פִּלְשֵׁתִי [Qal]. [But this does not help. See "Text and Gram."—Tr.]

Ver. 21. Ittai's answer expresses unconditional devotion and fidelity for life and death.†—Ver.

22. David accepts Ittai's vow of fidelity. The latter with his whole family (wife and children, 19, comp. Ex. xii. 37) remains in the line of march.—Ver. 23. Description of the deep and loud lamentation of all the faithful people over the misfortune of their king. "All the land" = all the inhabitants who poured out with the procession; "all the people" = David's courtiers and servants, were "passing by," namely, in front of these crowds of people standing on the way-side. The procession marched eastward over the brook Kedron, it being David's aim to reach the wilderness of Judah [that is, between Jerusalem and Jericho]. The Kedron, filled with water only in the winter or rainy season, was in the valley of Jehoshaphat, east of Jerusalem, between the city and Mount Olivet. David passed "in the direction of the way" to the wilderness, the northern part of the wilderness of Judah.

Vers. 24-29. The priests sent back with the ark to Jerusalem.—Ver. 24. Zadok (of the branch of Eleazar) with the priests took the ark from its place (ch. vi.), brought it out to David, and set it down where he halted (after passing the Kidron) on the declivity of the mount of Olives, "to give the people that were yet coming on time to join the procession" (Keil). On the other hand Abiathar (of the line of Eli [branch of Ithamar]) had remained in the city "till the people had all passed over from the city." He went up, that is, of course, to the summit of Mount Olivet, where the ark was set down; the rendering: "he sacrificed" (Schultz, Böttcher), is impossible, since the verb (עלה) never has this meaning except in connection with the substantive "burnt-offering" (עולה) [or some other offering, Isa. lvii. 6.—Tr.], or without reference to it in the connection; in the passages cited by Böttcher, 1 Sam. ii. 28; 2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 1 Kings iii. 15, the context points to offering. Thenius proposes to read: "and Abiathar waited,"† for which there is no necessity, as the text in the connection (in respect to the locality) gives a good sense.—[Böttcher: "And Zadok, etc., bearing the ark, etc., of God, and Abiathar the son of Ahimelech at the head of all the Levites, and they set down the ark of God, and Abiathar offered sacrifices until," etc., an improbable reading, in which the inserted clause is suggested by the Sept. ἀνὰ βαυθάρ = Abiathar. Wellhausen acutely suggests that the words: "and Abiathar went up (or, offered sacrifices)," are in the wrong place; the text reads: "they set down the ark till all the people," etc. It is hard to get any good sense from the present text, or to explain what part Abiathar took in the proceedings. Some think he staid in the city till the ark was set down; others (contrary to the text) that he preceded the ark, which was not set down till he stopped.

† וַיֵּלֶךְ [from וָלֵךְ; Böttcher rejects the form as unsupported (in Gen. viii. 10 Qeri he reads Piel).—Tr.]

Probably Abiathar ought to be somehow connected with Zadok in the bearing of the ark (see the plural "your" in ver. 27), and perhaps in sacrificing; but we have not the means of satisfactorily restoring the text.—Tr.]—Ver. 25 sqq. The ark sent back. David declares that he does not need this sign of God's gracious presence and protection. His reason for this is expressed in the words [ver. 26]: "if I find favor," etc., wherein in contrast with the visible sign of God's presence he emphasizes His spiritual nearness, on which everything depends, and gives himself unconditionally up to the will of the Lord, whom he knows to be present, whose hand he sees in these events, according to the announcement made him by Nathan. He resigns himself to God in the proper sense of the word for "favor or disfavor." David speaks only to Zadok, who here (as in ver. 24) appears as the officiating high-priest at the head of the Levites. [But from 1 Kings ii. 35 it seems that Abiathar was the superior (Bib.-Cbm., Bähr on "Kings" (Lange's Bible-work), Patrick). It is not improbable that some mention of Abiathar has here fallen out of the text (see ver. 29); though it may be that in the distribution of duties the care of the ark fell to Zadok. The two priests are throughout this narrative represented as equally faithful to David.—Tr.]—Ver. 27 sqq. [The king says to Zadok: Return to the city, and I will await word from you at the fountains.] The word רֹאֵה [Eng. A. V. seer] presents great difficulties if we adopt the interrogative pointing, and render: "Seest thou not?" (Grot.), where the insertion of the negative is unwarranted, or: "Seest thou?" (De Wette), or: "Understandest thou?" namely, what I have just said (Böttcher), which renderings are partly too heavy, partly superfluous. [These translations take the word as Participle. Eng. A. V. takes it as a substantive, and unwarrantably inserts a negative, leaving out which, the rendering: "art thou a seer?" is grammatically possible, but not suitable to the circumstances.—Tr.] Instead of the Interrogative particle (הֲ) we must read the Article (הַ), and render: "Thou seer," that is, thou prophet, "since a high-priest might certainly bear this higher, yet archaic name" (Ewald). The high-priest might well be called a seer, because he received divine revelations through the Urim and Thummim. David's reason for so naming him here is found in his words in ver. 25 sqq. Zadok is to return to Jerusalem and learn God's will through events, and through him David is to learn whether the Lord will again take him into favor and restore him to Jerusalem; that is, Zadok was to act as seer for him.—[This interpretation is hardly conveyed by the words. Zadok was to act as observer, as reporter or intermediary between Hushai and David, and in fact does so act. But he performs none of the functions of the official Boeh or Seer, and it is not easy to see why he should be so called. Usage forbids us to take the word in its literal sense: "seer" = observer. Wellhausen's reading: "high-priest" (שֹׁרֵט) belongs to a later time, and that of the Sept. "see!" (רֹאֵה) seems to offer fewer difficulties than any other.—Tr.]—Abiathar and Jonathan the sons of the two high-priests are to be the messengers to bring news from Jerusalem; comp. ver. 28 and ver. 36.—In ver. 28 we retain (from xvii. 6 comp. with xix. 19) the Kethib or text: "the fords of the wilderness" (instead of the Qeri "plains"* [so Eng. A. V.], 2 Kings xxv. 5), the point where one passed from the wilderness over the Jordan. Thither (to the west side of the Jordan) David had to repair in order to escape any threatening danger by crossing the river at one of the several fords in the vicinity; and there he would await information from Jerusalem. Comp. the Jordan-fords, Josh. ii. 7; Judg. iii. 28.—Ver. 29. The ark is carried back to Jerusalem, and the two high-priests remain there.

Vers. 30-37. Continuation of the flight on the road to the wilderness of Judah over the Mount of Olives.—Ver. 30. David went up the height of the olive trees, that is, Mount Olivet [Eng. A. V.: the ascent (or acclivity) of Mount Olivet]. Deep and loud mourning of David and all the faithful people that accompanied him. "Covering the head" is the symbol of the mind sorrowfully sunk in itself, wholly withdrawn from the outer world. Comp. Esth. vi. 12; Ezek. xxiv. 17. Of David it is said besides that he went "barefoot," "as a penitent" (Ewald), or: "to manifest his humiliation in the sight of God" (Thenius).—Ver. 31. "It was told David,"† he learned from Jerusalem, that the crafty Ahithophel (see on ver. 12) was "among the conspirators" with Absalom. He replies only by a brief ejaculation, praying the Lord "to make foolish the counsel of Ahithophel," that is, to bring it to naught.—Ver. 32. The fulfilment of this prayer is straightway prepared by the arrival of Hushai, the old, faithful friend of David, see xvii. 1 sq.—David came to the top, that is, of Mount Olivet, its highest point, whither David had come after ascending from the height below on the declivity (comp. ver. 24 with ver. 30); for there only can have been the place where men were wont to worship. By some (Sept., Vulg., Ew.) [Eng. A. V.] "David" is taken as the subject of the verb "worshipped," but then an Infin. with Prep. "to" (ל) must have been employed, or a Pers. Pron. (הוא) inserted before the verb (Böttch.). This place on the top of Mount Olivet, therefore, was one of the Bamoth or high places, which still existed in various places in Palestine.—Hushai was a trusted, proved counsellor of the king, as appears from the duties assigned him (ver. 33 sq.). That he was in close friendship with the king is shown by his repeated designation as "David's friend," ver. 37; xvi. 16; 1 Chr. xxvii. 33.—The Arkite, from the city Erek in Ephraim, on its south border near Atharoth (Josh. xvi. 2). Hushai came to meet David, had consequently preceded him in the flight [or else, had been out of the city]. The "torn garment and the earth on the head" betoken his grief, comp. 1 Sam. iv. 12. [According to Braun this garment was like a surplice, with sleeves, worn commonly by men of rank and position (Patrick).—Tr.]—Ver. 33 sq.—David, however, suggests to Hushai to return to Jerusalem. If thou pass on with me, thou wilt be a burden to me—why, it is not said. Ewald thinks it was because he was not used to war; but the matter in hand now was not war, but flight. Clericus supposes that he was a talented and prudent man, but not a warrior, and so Keil. Thenius: "thou wouldst thus increase my cares." Probably David thinks that Hushai would impede his flight, either because he was old, or because, as the king's intimate friend and confidential counsellor he would require special care. By entering Absalom's service, he thinks, Hushai may foil Ahithophel's plans (ver. 34), and through the priests' sons keep him informed of the state of affairs in Jerusalem. Hushai is to say to Absalom: Thy servant, O king, I will be; thy father's servant was I formerly; but now—well,* I am thy servant. [This was not honest, but it was according to the policy practiced in those days, and indeed in all ages. Which Procopius Gazeus approves so far as to say that "a lie told for a good end is equivalent to truth." But I dare not justify such doctrine (Patrick).—Tr.]—[Vers. 35, 36. Zadok and Abiathar and their sons are to participate in the stratagem of Hushai, and their moral position in the matter is perhaps the same as his and David's. Bp. Patrick's judgment above cited is hardly too severe. This was not an ordinary stratagem; these men, Zadok and the rest, were not simply spies, but we can avoid calling them traitors only by supposing that the priests were not recognized as adherents of Absalom, but as indifferent non-combatants, or as friends of David.—Tr.]—Ver. 37. Hushai returned to Jerusalem at the same time that Absalom entered the city. The addition of the Vulg.: "and Ahithophel with him" was occasioned, no doubt, by xvi. 15 (Thenius).

xvi. 1-14. Two disturbing experiences in David's flight continued from the summit of the Mount of Olives.—1) Vers. 1-4. Meeting with Ziba, and the latter's calumny against Mephibosheth.—Ver. 1. When David was a little past the top [of Olivet], the point where he met Hushai (xv. 32). On Ziba, Mephibosheth's servant, see ix. 2 sq. He came to meet David, had therefore gone on in advance of the army (as Hushai did) in order more easily to secure David's attention after the first disorder was over. On two saddled asses he brings a quantity of food, two hundred loaves of bread, one hundred cakes of raisins or dried grapes, one hundred cakes of fruit [probably fig-cakes] (καλάβαι, comp. the Sept. in Jer. xl. 10, 12) and a skin of wine.—Ver. 2. Ziba states his purpose in bringing this food.* [His gift was particularly thoughtful and seasonable.—Tr.]—His real wish was to gain the king's favor and gratitude, he being shrewd enough to see that David would come out victor over his son.—Ver. 3. David asks: "where is the son (Mephibosheth) of thy lord (Jonathan)?" to which he replies with the calumny, that Mephibosheth had stayed in Jerusalem, hoping to regain the kingdom of his father (Jonathan), who, if he had outlived Saul, would have been king. That the helpless cripple had designs on the throne, was an evident lie. But David might now believe it, partly because the present excitement prevented quiet consideration and opened his mind to such an insinuation, partly because he feared the Sauline party, dissatisfied with his government, might use the confusion produced by Absalom's insurrection to restore Saul's dynasty under the name of the last scion of his house. The aim of Ziba in this calumny (xix. 25 sqq. proves it undoubtedly to have been such) was to get possession of the estate committed to him for Mephibosheth's benefit (ix. 7 sq.), comp. xix. 27-29. The manner of Ziba's trick was this (xix. 26): Mephibosheth, learning of David's flight, had ordered asses saddled for himself and his servants, in order to repair to the king in token of his faithful attachment; Ziba had taken the asses together with the presents intended by Mephibosheth for the king, come to the latter, and left the helpless Mephibosheth in the lurch. He was therefore not only an arrant liar and calumniator, but also an impudent thief and traitor;—Ver. 4. Another example of David's credulity and haste. He believes Ziba without investigation, and bestows on him all his master's property. The impudent swindler replies to this grace with two words: 1) I bow myself, that is, I manifest my most humble and devoted thanks; 2) may I find favor in the eyes of my lord, the king. I commend myself to your further good-will, comp. 1 Sam. i. 18. David, in the excitement of momentary misfortune, is here guilty of a double wrong, first in treating the faithful Mephibosheth as a traitor, and then in royally rewarding the false and slanderous Ziba.

2) Vers. 5-14. Shimei curses David. The flight reaches Bahurim, on the position of which place see on iii. 16. Thenius in loco and Käuffer's bibl. Stud. II. 154.—[It was between Mount Olivet and the Jordan, but the exact site is unknown.—Tr.]—Shimei was of the race of Saul's house.—[See the lists in Gen. xvi. 21; 1 Chr. viii. 1 sqq. Some identify him (but doubtfully) with the Cush of the title of Ps. vii.—Tr.] This explains his rage against David, which he here vents in curses and revilings and in throwing stones at him and his followers. [Such virulence is to this day exhibited in the East towards fallen greatness. Josephus states (Ant. 7, 9, 7) that Bahurim lay off the main road, which agrees very well with the account of Shimei's behaviour (Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Bahurim).—Tr.]—Ver. 7 sqq. Out, out, namely, out of the kingdom and the land. He calls David "thou bloody man" probably because he ascribed to him the murder of Ishbosheth and Abner (iii. 27 sqq.; iv. 6 sqq.), of which he was wholly guiltless. [Others, less probably, think also of Saul and Jonathan, and even of Uriah.—Tr.] The misfortune [Eng. A. V. not so well "mischiefs"] that Absalom's insurrection had brought on him he regards as a punishment from God, because he had become king in Saul's stead. This shows how embittered Saul's kindred were over David's elevation to the throne, and how, therefore, Ziba's slander against Mephibosheth found readier acceptance with David. [Shimei is here so far devout and religious that he ascribes the present state of things wholly to Jehovah, the God of Israel; but he ignores Samuel's sentence of rejection (1 Sam. xv.), and otherwise shows a bad spirit.—Tr.]—Ver. 9. [Abishai wishes to kill Shimei.] On Abishai compare ii. 23 sqq.; iii. 30. The "dead dog" is the expression of the extreme vileness and badness, comp. ix. 8. Abishai appears here as in chaps. ii., iii. [and 1 Sam. xxvi. 8] violent and revengeful. He wishes to make Shimei atone for his reviling with his head.—Ver. 10. [David restrains Abishai].—Ye sons of Zeruiah. Joab is here joined with his brother (as in ii. 23), being probably of the same opinion with him. "What is there to me and to you?" (comp. John ii. 4, τί ἐμοὶ καὶ οὖ; Josh. xxii. 24; 1 Kings xvii. 18; for the thought comp. Luke ix. 52-56), that is, what have I in common with you? [Eng. A. V.: what have I to do with you?]. David decidedly repels Abishai's suggestion, saying: I have here no feeling in common with you; we are different persons; I will have nothing to do with you in such self-help and revenge. He bases his strict prohibition on the admonition that Shimei's cursing is by dispensation of God. The marginal reading: "so let him curse, for the Lord" [so Eng. A. V.], and the insertion of Sept. and Vulg.: "and let him alone" (following the "let him alone" of ver. 11) after "sons of Zeruiah," are explanations owing their origin to the difficulty that the text presented when the first particle (׃) was taken as causal (= "for" or "because"), the second (׃) being then very harsh. Render both particles by "when," and begin the apodosis with "and who" (׃). Maurer: "when he curses and when Jehovah has said to him, Curse David, who then shall say," etc.—Ver. 11 sq. David here combines Shimei's cursing and Absalom's revolt under the point of view of the divine permission and causation; and the fresh reference to this divine cause shows how deeply in his pious heart David feels in this misfortune also the blows of God's chastening hand. "The repetition of the: And he said, is not superfluous, for the discourse is addressed to more persons than before" (Thenius). How much more the Benjamite, that is, the member of Saul's tribe, who hate me. It is not surprising that such a one reviles me; when my own son seeks my life. David thus shows that from a purely human point of view there was no ground for the course proposed by Abishai.—Ver. 12. "Perhaps the Lord will look on my iniquity." Instead of this (יִצְחָק) the Qeri or margin has "my eye" (עֵינִי), that is, the Lord will perhaps look on "my tears," the Masorites [ancient Jewish editors of the Heb. text] not being able to comprehend how David, guiltless in respect to this reviling, could acknowledge himself guilty. We are not, however, to change the text to "my affliction" (צָרָה). Then., Ew. [Eng. A. V.], but to retain the idea of guilt, since David deeply feels that he has offended, not, indeed, in the matter mentioned by Shimei, but against the Lord. God's "looking on His iniquity" can then be only a gracious and merciful looking. "Perhaps the Lord will requite me good for the curse that has come on me this day," since I patiently bear it as a chastisement of His hand. Retain the text "my curse" = the curse that has befallen me, against the Qeri "his curse" [Eng. A. V.], that is, Shimei's. [It seems more in accordance with the thought here to read "my affliction" instead of "my iniquity;" see "Text. and Gram."] David's humility is seen in his "perhaps;" he will not be sure of the divine blessing (Patrick). His feeling towards Shimei here seems to be controlled by an overpowering sense of God's chastising providence. He does not exonerate his reviler, but feels that at this moment it is not his business to assert his right, but only to bow under God's hand. The misfortune that has befallen him is so terrible that he thinks Shimei's addition to it only natural. Afterwards (xix. 23) under the generous impulses of victory, he pardons him, but finally (1 Kings ii. 8, 9) hands him over to Solomon's vengeance. Whatever his feeling in this last act, it is clear that now his humble sense of God's chastisement has driven all self-assertion and revenge from his heart.—Tr.].—Ver. 13. Shimei's rage is increased, it would seem, by David's quiet behaviour; he runs along the side of the acclivity (by which the road passed) opposite him, cursing and throwing stones at David and his followers.—Ver. 14. David's arrival in "Ajeephim" [Eng. A. V.: "weary"]. A place of this name, indeed, is not known; but that is no ground against its existence. If the word be rendered "weary," no place is named to which they came, as the word "there" indicates. This place was certainly not Bahurim [ver. 6], for xvii. 18 shows that David's rest-place was beyond Bahurim towards the Jordan, the priests' sons having hidden at Bahurim, and then gone on farther towards David. [Bib. Com. suggests that Ajeephim was a caravansary, for which the meaning of the word (weary) would be appropriate.—Tr.].—The exact statement of the localities of David's flight [and, indeed, of the whole history of the day of flight—Tr.] is remarkable; comp. xv. 17, 23, 30, 32; xvi. 1, 5, 13, 14.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The starting-point of the shattering of the theocratic kingdom till its very existence was threatened is found in the disruption of David's house and family by the crimes of his two oldest sons. From the royal household itself comes the seducer of the people to conspiracy and insurrection against the divinely ordained government of David. From the morally corrupt soil of the royal court, whose highest officials break faith and rise against the kingly government, springs the evil spirit (the confederate of that seducer) that drags the people into revolution. But the success of Absalom and his accomplice shows that in the nation itself there was already dissension with the Davidic government and a process of disintegration that co-operated with Absalom's act of insurrection; if there had not been widespread dissatisfaction at defects and wrongs in administration of justice, Absalom's treacherous conduct could not have had so great and immediate results. If the bonds of fidelity and obedience, which before held the people to David, had not been sorely loosened, Absalom could not have straightway turned "the heart of the men of Israel" from him. And it is David's own tribe, Judah, whence the rebellion proceeds and is carried on. Absalom's general-in-chief is Amasa, a near kinsman of Joab and David; his counsellor is Ahithophel of Giloh in Judah; and the insurrection begins at Hebron, the old capital of the tribe. "There must, therefore, have been dissatisfaction in David's own tribe. Indeed this tribe murmurs and holds back after Absalom is slain, and the other tribes submit. The hereditary tribe jealousy and the old opposition between Judah and the others, are not extinct" (Ew. Hist. III., p. 239). The first impulse to the insurrection was given in Judah, and in Judah its effects are longest to be seen.

If we inquire, indeed, concerning the innermost grounds and causes of the insurrection and the national disintegration, we must first and chiefly note the treachery of Absalom and his accomplice, which was combined with hypocrisy and with kindness offered as a bribe, and, on the other hand, the fickleness and unfaithfulness of the people. The ambition of Absalom and his associates used all means to befool the people and win their favor. And during time of peace the God-fearing sense that saw in David the Anointed of the Lord, the God-chosen king, had been lost by a great part of the people. Perhaps, also, David had erred in the government of the nation and State as of his house, and was partly to blame for the popular dissatisfaction. All these ethical factors combined to produce the present disintegration.—But, over against this manifold human guilt, David, looking at his present misfortune from the highest point of view, the theocratic, recognizes in it a divine punishment (comp. xii. 10, 11), beneath which he humbly bows. Such a recognition is contained in his flight without attempt to withstand the insurrection. He goes his way a fugitive in tears, bowing humbly and quietly beneath God's hand. "The Lord hath commanded him"—this is the expression of his submission to God. This is the source of his humble tranquillity, as he pursues his fugitive way, of his childlike submission to God's will ("let Him do to me as seemeth Him good") and of the gentle patience with which he takes men's wickedness without return in word or deed, and bears it as a dispensation of God. But in all this there shows itself at the same time the fruit of this sorrowful experience: it proves to him a real visitation; he turns anew to his God with humble obedience and childlike trust; having obtained forgiveness of sins, he makes these sufferings as a paternal chastisement minister to the purification and sanctification of his heart and mind. "Only through new wrestling with the divine grace, only through humble submission to Jehovah's righteous chastisement can he succeed in passing safely through this valley of death-shade."

2. Penitent humility shows itself in the truly pious in patient endurance of ills that they must recognize as the consequence of their own guilt and accept as a chastisement and means of purification, as well as in the rejection of the self-willed efforts of others to ward off the evil or take vengeance on its originators.

3. To this period is to be referred (with most expositors) the origin of Psalm xli. and lv. Both Psalms have, as Delitzsch rightly observes, "the most marked historical, individual physiognomy;" they are mourning Psalms, picturing the hostility and falseness of numerous adversaries of the singer, and especially lamenting the faithlessness of a trusted friend and counsellor, with whom his numerous enemies are combined. The statement in 2 Sam. xvi. 23 shows how near Ahithophel stood to David as friend and counsellor, and how much importance the latter attached to his counsel. According to Ps. xli. a long sickness of the Psalmist is the occasion for his enemies to employ all their false and treacherous arts against him. In the midst of this suffering he implores the divine mercy and help, recognizing and bearing the suffering as chastisement for sin, yet affirms his conviction of God's favor towards him as His servant, the uprightness of his heart, his firm confidence in the saving grace of the Lord, who will not let his enemies triumph over him, and (without expressing any revengeful desires, Hupfeld), holds in view the just requital that will overtake his enemies, "to which he, as a just king, was pledged" (Moll). In Ps. lv. the abruptness of the words, the excited haste of the discourse and the anguished tone of the Psalmist indicate a worsened situation, the extreme danger from the insurrection, which had now flamed openly out. By the hostility of his opponents he is brought to uttermost distress (vers. 2-6 [Eng. A. V. 1-5]). He wishes for the wings of a dove, to find a refuge in the wilderness (7-9 [6-8]), while in the city and on its walls are violence and deceit (10-12 9-11), and a formerly trusted friend and companion joins his enemies (13-15 [12-14]), who are united with the hypocritical and faithless man (21, 22 [20, 21]). On these enemies he invokes destruction as divine punishment for their insurrection against the Lord's Anointed, and for their wickedness from which they do not turn (16-20 [15-19]). In this extreme need (corresponding exactly to the situation at the beginning of Absalom's rebellion) the Psalmist exhorts his own soul to bear patiently the burden of suffering sent by the Lord, or rather, to cast it on Him, and expresses the firm hope and confidence, that the Lord will deliver the righteous by punishing evil-doers, concluding with the energetic exclamation of unconditional trust in God:—"But I, I trust in Thee!"—These traits of humble submission to God's will and confident hope in His help answer precisely to David's frame of mind as given in history. [The correctness of the foregoing historical explanation of these two Psalms is very doubtful. Pa. xli. was written while the author was still on a bed of sickness (ver. 11 [10]), as David certainly was not when he heard of Ahithophel's treachery. The alleged connection between the two Psalms as portraying the rise and full bursting-forth of the rebellion is impossible; for David did not hear of it till it was consummated. As to Pa. lv., its writer seems to be in the city (vers. 9-12 [8-11]), nor does the history say anything of such intimate relations between David and Ahithophel as are indicated in ver. 15 [14]; it was Hushai that was David's friend.—Of course the religious value of these Psalms is not affected by our ignorance of their date and authorship.—Tr.]

4. This event of David's history is of typical significance for the sufferings of Jesus in connection with the betrayal of Judas Iscariot, of which Jesus (John xiii. 18) says, referring to Pa. xli. 10 [9] ("he that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me") that it happened "that the Scripture might be fulfilled." The Old Testament prediction of the betrayal, assumed in John xvii. 12 and Acts i. 16 must be found (according to our Lord's reference to Pa. xli. 10 [9]) in the treachery of Ahithophel, and the fate of Judas in his fate. [This view of typical significance falls of course with the failure to establish the connection of Pa. xli. with this history. Our Lord's reference in John xiii. 18 is not necessarily more than a very general one. Acts i. 16 refers (see ver. 20) to Pas. cix. 8 and lxi. 26 [25]. Since David suffered for his own sins, and had probably grievously wronged Ahithophel (see note on 2 Sam. xv. 12) it is hardly allowable to make him herein typify Christ, and to regard Ahithophel as the forerunner of Judas.—Tr.]—Further, the separate incidents of David's flight are strikingly parallel to the Lord's way over the same path when He was betrayed by Judas. Though David suffered for his many sins, he had yet through penitence already obtained forgiveness of sins. Thus he was the righteous sufferer, who could appeal to God for the purity of his heart and the holiness of his cause. And for this reason he may be regarded as a type of Christ, as indeed Christ Himself by His reference to the passage in Pa. xli. establishes this typical connection.

5. It is noteworthy, how this break-down in David's theocratic government by his own fault, through family-insurrection and popular defection, led to its restoration and confirmation. "We may say: just as David falls away from Jehovah, to be more firmly bound to him, so Israel turns away from David, to be (as the close of the history shows) more devotedly attached to him. The prelude to this first clearing-up of the relations between king and people is given in the conduct of the faithful band who stand firmly by David in the general defection" (Baumgarten). God's instruments for building up His kingdom often sorely injure it by their sins, but receive therefor the deepest humiliations through God's righteous chastisements, and must to their shame admit that He does not for their sin give His cause over to ruin, but raises it the more gloriously up from the fall occasioned by this sin—yea, uses them again as instruments to this end, in so far as they go not their own way in impenitent self-will (as Saul did), but (like David) with broken and grace-filled hearts go the Lord's way and give themselves up wholly to His will.

Proof of the complete resignation to the painful leadings of the Lord occasioned by one's own fall, 1) In humbly holding still under the strokes of God's hand, 2) In patiently enduring the sufferings inflicted by bad men, 3) In quietly awaiting the Lord's decision, whether He will exercise His grace or His justice towards us, and 4) In wisely using the means which please God for overcoming the evil, while decidedly rejecting tempting counsels that are against God's will.

[TAYLOR: Civil war is always a terrible calamity; but when the standard of rebellion is raised by a son against his father, we have about the most painful form of strife of which this earth can be the scene. . . . That he whom we have fondled in our arms and nestled in our bosom, and whose first lisping utterances have been in the attempt to call us father, should live to be at deadly feud with us, and to attempt our destruction—this is misery indeed. FR. ARNDT: In the manner in which David bears this deserved suffering, he appears to us again as the man after God's own heart, in whom faith purified and strengthened by repentance had brought forth quite extraordinary steadfastness, fidelity and virtue-power, and revealed itself in a glory and elevation which throughout shines before us a picture worthy of imitation. This faith developed itself namely: 1) as obedience, 2) as resignation, 3) as prayer.

Chap. xv. 1-6. STARKE: When one winks at gross evil—does too much, they become all the worse. SCHMID: How unfaithful the human heart is towards God, appears also from the unfaithful behaviour of men towards their greatest benefactors.—BERL. B.: David would rather be regarded as a timid man, than resist God. He regarded Absalom as an executor of God's righteousness; accordingly he yields only to God, not to Absalom.—One can scarcely imagine the manifold inventions of which God's strict love makes use, to crucify the converted souls that have once given themselves up thereto. It leaves nothing in them that is not overturned and annihilated. Before Thee, O Lord, all mountains must be made low and all valleys exalted.—STARKE: God makes even severe temptations endurable for His people (1 Cor. x. 13).—F. W. KRUMMACHER: This unexpected meeting (with Ittai) immediately before the gates of the city appeared to the royal fugitive almost like a friendly greeting of his God, and dropped the first soothing balsam-drops into the painful wounds of his deeply lacerated heart.—SCHLIER: Here we have an example of what true fidelity is, and how beautiful it is to remain faithful to one's king and lord. Fidelity becomes a man, and doubly becomes a Christian.

Ver. 25 sq. CRAMER: Everything that opposes thee, endure it, and be patient in every sort of trouble (Eccles. ii. 4). For patience is the best way to win.—J. LANGE: Well for him who has so believing and open an eye that he can see through everything to God.

Ver. 30. SCHLIER: How instructive is this picture of David; how humble and yet at the same time how spiritual is Israel's king! Who can fail to see that David on the Mount of Olives goes up truly bowed and contrite, with an humbled and thoroughly softened heart? But David knew that the Lord cannot reject an humbled and broken heart. Therefore in all his humiliation he is not hopeless.—OSLANDER: The more patiently and humbly we submit ourselves to the cross, the sooner we are released from it.—BERL. B.: The too great strength which one supposes himself to possess, causes self-conceit; weakness, on the contrary, makes a man very little and lowly.—SCHLIER: Whence comes all despair, whence all little faith? Is it not because we still hold ourselves too good?

And a thoroughly softened heart learns also more and more to take courage and be comforted, and believes ever more firmly that the Lord is kind to the humble.

Ver. 31. OSIANDER: The cunning and secret assaults of our enemies and those of the Gospel we can best bear up against and destroy through fervent prayer to God.—Even short prayers are mighty, if they only proceed from faith.—STARKE: God can take the wise in their craftiness (Job v. 13; 1 Cor. iii. 19). When wickedness is armed with cunning and power, none but God can overcome it.—Even when the need is greatest, God causes His grace to be seen, and creates means whereby the misfortune is a little softened.—SCHLIER: Here we see what David, who had before put all in the Lord's hand, did in order really to obtain the Lord's help. First of all David prayed. But after he has prayed he does not lay his hands in his bosom, but he does what he can to get help.—It is wrong to think we might manage the thing without prayer; but it is not less wrong if we think that prayer alone does it, and are disposed then not to do our duty also.

Chap. xvi. 1-4. [SCOTT: Selfish men often affect to appear generous in giving away the property of others for their own advantage, and are great adepts in address and insinuation. Flatterers are generally backbiters; for it is as easy to them to forge slanders of the absent, as to pretend affection and respect for the present.—TR.].—BERL. B.: Shameful as was this slander to David against the innocent Mephibosheth by the false earner of thanks and eye-servant, in like manner inexcusable is the credulity and forgetfulness of David towards his faithful friend, Jonathan, in that he is here so swift to give a decree against his son, and does not once investigate the accusation against him, but condemns him unheard, contrary to his own practical knowledge.—CRAMER: It is wrong to give a decision at once upon the allegations of one side, and to believe one party's account. Persons in authority should guard against this (Prov. xiv. 15). ["Audi alteram partem."—TR.]

Vers. 5-14. STARKE: Judgment begins at the house of God (1 Pet. iv. 17). Who need wonder then if Christ and all holy men of God have been the world's execration and off-scourings?—SCHLIER: It is always wrong to scorn and revile an enemy; and doubly wrong when it is done to an unfortunate, whose sorrow without this might almost break his heart.—STARKE: Pious men should not murmur when they are chastened by the Lord, but should rather remember their sins, and recognize that after God's strict judgment they would well have deserved something more (Mic. vii. 9).—Even in righteous zeal one must take good account of the time; for an untimely zeal, although righteous, amounts to nothing.—SCHLIER: The Lord controls even the sin of men, and where something evil has been devised in one's heart, God takes even the evil into His service, and does not suffer it to do what the man wishes, but God does with it what He wishes. Therefore David bows, not indeed to that insolent man, but he bows to the Lord. He thinks of his sin; he confesses himself guilty and accepts even the injustice that is done him as a wholesome medicine. [HALL: Every word of Shimei was a slander. He that took Saul's spear from his head, and repented to have but cut the lap of his garment, is reproached as a man of blood. The man after God's own heart is branded for a man of Belial. He that was sent for out of the fields to be anointed, is taxed for an usurper; if David's hands were stained with blood, yet not of Saul's house. . . . It is not possible that eminent persons should be free from imputations; innocence can no more protect them than power.—TR.]

Ver. 9. BERL. B.: It is a strong sign of pride to take offence at everything.—CRAMER: Without God's permission nothing evil can befall the pious (Acts xviii. 10).—BERL. B.: Almost all men commit the fault of looking to those who persecute them, instead of fixing their eyes only on God and His holy command. And this causes all the great sufferings that are experienced in such a case, the bitterness and the aversion that are felt for persecutors. David also did indeed commit precisely this fault, when Nabal refused him bread, on which account he also repented afterwards. But as he has now gone further, everything comes to him as a command of God, and his eye discerns God's direction in everything. Therefore he suffered patiently, without growing indignant.—David is here above measure edifying in his behaviour, and beautifully teaches us in what way we should bear every sort of cross, and in all oppression, injustice and distress should bow and humble ourselves, not before man but before God from whom everything comes. There is nothing that amid all injustice and sufferings from men more quiets our mind and gives it peace than this consideration, that nothing befalls us through the wickedness of men without God's holy and wise government.—[MARRICE: To have his people's heart stolen from him, to have his child for his enemy, to be deserted by his counsellors, to lose his kingdom, to be mocked and cursed,—this was rough discipline surely. But he had desired it; he had said deliberately, "Make me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." And that blessing,—if it was granted him in part at once, if he rose up from that very prayer a freed man with a free spirit,—yet was to be realized through his whole life and to be secured by methods which he certainly would not have devised or chosen for himself.—Ver. 11. HALL: Even while David laments the rebellion of his son, he gains by it, and makes that the argument of his patience, which was the exercise of it. The wickedness of an Absalom may rob his father of comfort, but shall help to add to his father's goodness. It is the advantage of great crosses, that they swallow up the less.—TR.]

Ver. 12. CRAMER: It is a great consolation in suffering, to have a good conscience (Ps. vii. 4; 1 Pet. iii. 16).—OSIANDER: If we patiently leave vengeance to God, we move Him to cover us with blessings in place of the evil we have suffered.—STARKE: Even in the midst of the cross we should not allow our hope and trust in God to sink (Heb. x. 35; Rom. v. 3-5).—BERL. B.: David suffers the evil with a gentle, quiet and humble spirit, and hopes that for this evil God will send him good. And this hope did not deceive him.—Ver. 13. David acted like one who does not turn at the barking of a dog, and thereby gives you this lesson: If you know well what you have inwardly within yourself, you will not care what men say outwardly about you.—SCHLIER: We should receive as from the Lord's hand the wrongs that assail us, and if men insult and revile us we should not look at men but at the Lord, who rules and guides every thing.—[WORDSWORTH: S. Gregory observes that David was thus brought to a deeper sense of his own sins, and was exercised in true repentance, and so found cause to be thankful for these indignities, which made him nearer and dearer to God. It was a wise saying of S. Chrysostom that "no man is ever really hurt by any one but himself." And even the heathen poet could bless heaven for injuries, and say, "It is a most wretched fortune to have no enemy."—HALL: In good dispositions, injury unanswered grows wearied of itself, and dies in a voluntary remorse; but evil natures grow presumptuous upon forbearance.—TR.]

Men in responsible positions should be always on their guard. 2) The demagogue; a) his ostentation (ver. 1), b) his painstaking (vers. 2, 6), c) his flatteries (vers. 3, 5), d) his lavish promises (ver. 4). 3) The people—their folly in being duped by transparent arts—the net spread in their very sight, and they go in (Prov. i. 17).—TR.]

[Vers. 7, 8. To make pretended devoutness a cloak for wicked designs, is one of the most heinous sins a man can possibly commit.—Vers. 19–21. David and Ittai—unselfish generosity, and unselfish fidelity.—Vers. 25, 26. Sending back the ark. a) David does not suppose the presence of the ark to be a necessary condition of God's presence. Contrast 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5. b) He does not despair of God's favor. c) He is resigned to God's will. Comp. 1 Sam. iii. 18.—TR.]

As to "the house of Saul," David had been neither a) bloody, nor b) wicked in general. He was indeed "in his calamity" because of his sins, but they were not what Shimei charged. Revilers of the unfortunate often accuse falsely. 3) David's devout patience under gross insult. Represses the resentment of his nephew. a) This insult is a trifle compared with Absalom's course. b) David accepts the reviling as a punishment from Jehovah. c) He has hope that Jehovah may yet requite him for it (comp. xv. 25).—TR.]

CHAP. XVI. 15—XVII. 23.

15 AND Absalom and all the people the men of Israel¹ came to Jerusalem, and 16 Ahithophel with him. And it came to pass, when Hushai the Archite [Arkite]
David's friend² was come unto Absalom, that Hushai said unto Absalom, God 17 save [Long live] the king, God save [Long live] the king. And Absalom said to Hushai, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? why wentest thou not with thy friend?
18 And Hushai said unto Absalom, Nay,³ but whom the Lord [Jehovah] and this

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 15. This phrase, in which the "all the people" is put in apposition with "men of Israel" (not: "all the people of the men of Israel," as Erdmann renders), is peculiar, and is variously changed by the versions: Sept.: "all the men of Israel;" Syr., Arab.: "all the people that were with him, and all Israel;" Vulg.: "all his people." Sept. and Vulg. may have omitted half the expression for simplicity (and they retain different halves), and the Heb. text itself may be a duplet, arisen from a marginal explanation. Thenius: "Instead of these words אִישׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל MS. Cantab. 1 has אִישׁ אֶתְּנָן (added by Syr. and Arab.), which came from the fact that in some MS. that was copied, the words יִשְׂרָאֵל (men of Israel) stood under the אִישׁ אֶתְּנָן (that were with him) of the preceding verse (Kennicott, sup. rat. text. Heb., 449).—TR.]

² [Ver. 16. Sept.: ἀδελταίρος (as above xv. 32) = ἄγγελοι.—Hushai's address to Absalom is literally: "live the king! live the king!" given once only in Sept. and Arabic.—TR.]

³ [Ver. 18. Thenius and Erdmann render: "Not (i. e. I go not with David), because," etc. But it is not likely that Hushai would make his negation with one word, and usage establishes the sense of the phrase given in Eng. A. V.: "nay, but," or "nay, for," see Ges. Lex. s. v. לָא 2.—The Kethib לָא in this verse is approved by De Rossi against the Qeri לֹא, which seems to be adopted by all the versions, even by Syriac and Arab., which make the sentence interrogative. The Kethib (לָא) would be interrogative, and would require a preposition before אִישׁ.—TR.]

people and all the men of Israel choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide.
 19 And again [in the second place], whom should I serve? should I not serve in the presence of his son? ⁴ as I have served in thy father's presence, so will I be in thy presence.

20 Then said Absalom [And Absalom said] to Ahithophel, Give [ins. ye] counsel
 21 among you [om. among you⁵] what we shall do. And Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Go in unto thy father's concubines, which [whom] he hath left to keep the house; and all Israel shall hear that thou art abhorred of [art become loathsome to⁶] thy father, then [and] shall [om. shall] the hands of all that are with thee
 22 [ins. shall] be strong. So [And] they spread Absalom a tent upon the top of the house [on the roof], and Absalom went in unto his father's concubines in the sight
 23 of all Israel. And the counsel of Ahithophel, which he counselled in those days, was as if a man had inquired at the oracle [of the word] of God; so was all the counsel of Ahithophel both with David and with Absalom.

CH. XVII. 1. MOREOVER [And] Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Let' me now choose out twelve thousand men, and I will arise and pursue after David this night;
 2 And I will come upon him while he is weary and weak-handed, and will make him afraid, and all the people that are with him shall flee, and I will smite the 3 king only; And I will bring back all the people unto thee; the man whom thou 4 seekest is as if all returned;⁷ so [om. so] all the people shall be in peace. And
 5 the saying pleased Absalom well [om. well], and all the elders of Israel. Then said Absalom [And Absalom said], Call now Hushai the Archite [Arkite] also,
 6 and let us hear likewise [om. likewise] what he [ins. too] saith. And when Hushai was come [And Hushai came] to Absalom, [ins. and] Absalom spake [said] unto him, saying, Ahithophel hath spoken after this manner; shall we do after his saying? if not, [after his saying, or not?]⁸ speak thou.

7 And Hushai said unto Absalom, The counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not
 8 good at this time [hath given this time⁹ is not good]. For, said Hushai [and Hushai said], Thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be [are] mighty men, and [ins. that] they be [are] cbafe¹⁰d in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field;¹¹ and thy father is a man of war, and will not lodge with the 9 people. Behold, he is hid now in some pit [in one of the ravines] or in some other place [in one of the places¹²]; and it will come to pass, when some of them be

⁴ [Ver. 19. Arab.: "And 'tis not my business to be forever the servant of one man;" Syr.: "whose servant I shall be is not in my power." Instead of וְיָנִי Syr. had יָדִי ("I"), which Arab. read as יָדִיךָ.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 20. This Dativus commodi (דָּלִי) cannot be here given well in English. The phrase: "give ye you counsel," is awkward, and in "give you counsel" the pronoun would be understood as Nominative.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 21. The verb means: "to be in bad odor." The לִּי is the Prep. "with," not the sign of the Accus., as Sept. and Vulg. take it. Chald. paraphrases: "that thou art stirred up against thy father." Syr. and Arab. explain: "that thou hast gone in to the concubines of thy father." Josephus interprets: "the people will believe that a reconciliation with thy father is impossible."—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 1. Or: "I will now choose . . . and will arise." Sept. and Vulg.: "I will now choose me." Arab.: "choose thou . . . and let them go forth to seek David."—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 3. So Erdmann, Cahen, Wordsworth, Bib.-Com. Various other renderings are discussed by Erdmann in the Exposition. In addition to what he says it may be mentioned that Chald. renders nearly (as to the sense) as Eng. A. V.: "they will all return when the man that thou seekest is killed," — "as the return of all is [the killing of] the man," etc. (so Cahen). Syr.: "as if all the men that thou seekest returned," as if reading שָׁבְתָם; so Philippon: "at the return of all the men thou seekest." The translations proposed all either do violence to the text, or fall to suit the connection and give a good sense, or require a bold insertion (as of the phrase: "the killing of" in Chald. and Eng. A. V.).—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 6. Eng. A. V. renders according to the accents, and so Erdmann; but it is better (with Vulg., Cahen, Wellhausen) to take the sentence as a double question. Sept. inserts ἢ οὐ μὴ, which may easily have fallen out (from the preceding ἢ), and is almost necessary for the rendering of Eng. A. V. It is found in some MSS. and EDD.—Instead of the more usual ἢ, we here have ἢ, literally: "is there not" — "is our doing (according to Ahithophel's counsel) not?"—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 7. עַצֵּם, the numeral, not the simple substantive "time" (עֵת). Sept.: τὸ ἄνωγ τοῦτο; Vulg.: hac vice; Cahen: cette fois; Erdmann: dieses Mal.—Ta.]

- overthrown [fall¹²] at the first, that whosoever heareth it will say, There is a slaughter among the people that follow Absalom. And he also that is valiant, whose heart is as the heart of a lion, shall utterly melt; for all Israel knoweth that thy father is a mighty man, and they which be [that are] with him are valiant men. Therefore [But] I counsel¹⁴ that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee from Dan even [om. even] to Beersheba, as the sand that is by the sea for multitude, and that thou go to battle in thine own person. So shall we [And we shall] come upon him in some place [in one of the places] where he shall be found, and we will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground,¹⁵ and of him and of all the men that are with him there shall not be left so much as one. Moreover [And] if he be gotten into a city, then shall all Israel bring¹⁶ ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river [brook], until there be not one small stone found there. And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai the Archite [Arkite] is better than the counsel of Ahithophel. For the Lord had appointed [And Jehovah appointed] to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the Lord [Jehovah] might bring evil upon¹⁷ Absalom.
- Then said Hushai [And Hushai said] unto Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, Thus and thus did Ahithophel counsel Absalom and the elders of Israel, and thus and thus have I counselled. Now, therefore [And now], send quickly and tell David, saying, Lodge not this night in the plains [at the fords¹⁸] of the wilderness, but speedily [om. speedily] pass over, lest the king be swallowed up and all the people that are with him. Now [And] Jonathan and Ahimaaz stayed by [were stationed at] En-rogel, for they might not be seen to come into the city; and a wench [the maid-servant] went and told them, and they went and told king David [And Jonathan and Ahimaaz were stationed at En-rogel, and the maid-servant came and told them, and they were to go and tell king David; for they might not be seen, etc.¹⁹]. Nevertheless [And] a lad saw them and told Absalom; but [and] they went both of them away [om. away] quickly, and came to a man's house in Bahurim, which [and he] had a well in his court, whither [and thither] they went down. And the woman took and spread a [the] covering over the well's mouth, and spread ground corn thereon; and the thing was not known [nothing

¹² [Ver. 9. Or: "when he falls on them at the first" (so Erdmann and Sept.), and some would therefore supply the personal suffix י to the Infinitive; but the present text permits either rendering, and that of Eng. A. V. seems to agree better with the context.—Tx.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 16. Eng. A. V. again adopts the Qeri, which is found in many MSS. and EDD. (De Ross) and in all the versions. Kethib is here preferred as in xv. 23, which see.—The "speedily" of Eng. A. V. is meant as translation of the Infinitive Absolute, but introduces too different a substantive idea from that of the verb (עָרַב); the sense is rather: "actually pass over." The rendering: "lest the king be swallowed up" (so Philppson, Wellhausen) seems to be the best; the phrase is discussed by Erdmann, who adopts the translation: "lest it (transit over the river) be swallowed up (= snatched away)."—Tx.]

- 20 was perceived]. And when [om. when] Absalom's servants came to the woman to the house, they [and] said, Where is Ahimaaz and Jonathan? And the woman said unto them, They be [are] gone over the brook²⁰ of water. And when they had [And they] sought and could [did] not find them, they [and] returned to Jerusalem.
- 21 And it came to pass, after they were departed, that they came up out of the well, and went and told king David, and said unto David, Arise and pass quickly over
- 22 the water, for thus hath Ahithophel counselled against you. Then [And] David arose, and all the people that were with him, and they passed over Jordan; by the morning-light there lacked not one of them that was not gone over Jordan.
- 23 And when [om. when] Ahithophel saw that his counsel was not followed [ina. and] he saddled his ass, and arose and gat him home [and went] to his house, to his city, and put his household in order, and hanged himself, and died, and was buried in the sepulchre of his father.

²⁰ [Ver. 20. The word כִּיכֶל is as yet unexplained. Rashi says that its meaning can only be inferred from the context. Sept.: μικρόν, "little" (perhaps from similarity of sound); Chald. takes the phrase as meaning "the Jordan." Syriac renders: "hence," as if it were כִּיכֶל or כִּיכֶל; Arab. omits it; Vulg.: "having tasted a little water," after the Sept. J. D. Michaelis and Gesenius compare Arab. makil, "a dry pit," mimkal, "a pit containing water," but this does not agree with the form of the Heb. word. Others assume a root יכל (Pūst takes this stem to mean "contain," whence our word — "water-ditch"). Wellhausen would drop כִּיכֶל from the text, or supply some such word as דרך: "the way of the water."—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Chap. xvi. 15–23. Absalom in Jerusalem. He is greeted by Hushai. Ahithophel counsels an evil deed.—Ver. 15. And Absalom, comp. xv. 12, to which this narration attaches itself, the account of David's flight (xv. 13–xvi. 14) being interposed.—And all the people of the men of Israel [literally: all the people, the men of Israel.—Tr.]. Thenius: "Very significant: The old malcontents (ii. 8, 9)."—Ver. 16. Hushai, comp. xv. 32. He was to be the instrument for bringing to naught the designs of Ahithophel (xv. 31).—Ver. 17. That David's trusted friend and counsellor should come to him with the greeting: "may the king live," must have astonished Absalom. But instead of expressing this feeling, he answers (in his double question) with a scornful fling (as his nature was) at Hushai's friendly relation to David. [Patrick: Absalom did not reflect that one might have said to him: "Is this thy duty to thy father?"—Tr.].—Ver. 18 sqq. Hushai in his answer assumes the role of crafty dissimulation, suggested by David (xv. 34). His first word is the answer to Absalom's question: "why wentest thou not with thy friend?" It is therefore not to be rendered: "Nay, but" (De Wette, [Eng. A. V.]), but: "Not (i. e., I went not with David), because, etc." Vulg.: nequaquam quia. [The rendering of Eng. A. V. here seems more natural and appropriate. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]. Whom the Lord has chosen, that is, as the event has shown: I follow him who is king by God's choice. As I served before thy father [so will I be before thee, ver. 19], i. e., it is self-evident that, my service with the father having ceased by God's will, I must attach myself to the son. By the clever use of this double argument, the divine and the human, he easily imposes on the inconsiderate Absalom the delusion that he means honestly. [Hushai's two reasons: 1) the voice of the people is the voice of God (Patrick); 2) former fidelity to the father is ground and pledge of present fidelity to the son.—Tr.].—Ver. 20. Brief statement of a council held by Absalom with Ahithophel and other counsellors (so the plural: "Give ye") on the means of announcing and securing his usurpation. The Datirus commodi (דָּתִירֻס כּוֹמּוֹדִי) gives the sense: "it is your affair to counsel me" [literally: "give ye you counsel," Eng. A. V. wrongly: "among you."—Tr.].—Ver. 21. Ahithophel's counsel was that he should publicly take to himself his father's concubines (xv. 16); this would indicate definite dethronement of the father, and complete assumption of royal authority. Comp. iii. 7; xii. 8. All Israel will hear, etc.—Ahithophel's purpose is, 1) to make the breach between Absalom and his father irreparable, and 2) to infuse energy into Absalom's followers, and confirm their defection from David.—Cornelius a Lapide: "That they may know that thy hatred against thy father is implacable, and so all hope and fear of reconciliation may be cut off, and they strengthened in thy conspiracy." So also Ahithophel hoped to secure his own position [i. e., he feared that, if a reconciliation were effected, he would be sacrificed.—Tr.]. Absalom's deed was the grossest insult to his father (comp. Gen. xlix. 4), and made reconciliation impossible. [Here again Ahithophel was perhaps avenging the wrong done to Bathsheba. So Blunt.—Tr.].—Ver. 22. They spread the tent; the Article [so the original, but it may properly be omitted in an English translation, because the definiteness is not obvious.—Tr.] indicates that it was the tent designed for the roof, used by the king and his family for protection against sun, wind and rain. Thenius: "the expression: the tent is an evidence that the author is relating events of his time." On the roof, the same where David's look at Bathsheba led him into the path of sin, whose evil results for him are completed in this deed of Absalom. Thus is Nathan's threat (xii. 11) fulfilled;

as he sinned against Uriah's house, so is he punished in his own house.—Ver. 23. Explanatory remark attached to ver. 22. The immediate execution of Ahithophel's counsel is explained by the fact that it had almost the weight of a divine oracle with both David and Absalom. It is thus intimated that they both put too much confidence in this bad man, the bitter fruit whereof David is now reaping. In 1 Chron. xxvii. 33 he is expressly called the king's counsellor.* To inquire of God's word = to inquire of God. Comp. Judg. i. 1; xviii. 5; xx. 18, 23, 27; 1 Sam. x. 22; xiv. 37; xxii. 10, 13; xxiii. 2 [comp. Gen. xxv. 22, where, however, the verb is different.—Ta.]

Vers. 1–4. Ahithophel's counsel against David: To surprise him by night and kill him. Against the opinion of the older expositors that Ahithophel wished to avenge the wrongs of his granddaughter Bathsheba, is 1) that this relationship is not proved, for, though Ahithophel had a son named Eliam (xxiii. 34), it is not shown that this man is the same with Eliam, the father of Bathsheba (xi. 3); 2) granting, however, that Ahithophel was Bathsheba's grandfather, it is hard to see how an ambitious man, like him, should have sought revenge, when he saw his granddaughter raised to the highest honors of the realm.—His advice is to fall on David quickly, that same night, with a chosen body of 12,000 men, and get possession of his person. Absalom having publicly and solemnly mounted the throne, there was needed a securing of his usurped power against David and his followers. "This night" is the night that followed David's flight and Absalom's entrance into Jerusalem. In favor of this is ver. 16, and also ver. 2 compared with xvi. 14; for David's exhaustion, on which Ahithophel counted, could only come from the haste and exertion of the day's flight. The sudden night-attack with superior force (the march required was only about four geographical miles) was to throw David's followers into panic and flight, and, while they were thus scattered, Ahithophel was to kill the king "alone," that is, while he was alone (לְבַד).

He reckons on the king's weariness; in the phrase "weakhanded" the "hand" is the symbol of strength, comp. Isa. viii. 11.—Ver. 3. And I will bring back all the people to thee, that is, all the people now gathered around David. Ahithophel regards Absalom's government as the only lawful one, to which those fugitives must submit; their flight is in his eyes an act of insubordination, from which they are to be brought back.—In the following difficult phrase [Eng. A. V. and Erdmann: "the man thou seekest is as if all returned"] the first question is whether we shall (with Thenius) adopt the reading of the Septuagint: as the bride returns to her husband; only the life of one man thou seekest, (and all the people will be uninjured"). But, apart from the fact that no other ancient version has a trace of such a text, why may not the translation of the Sept. come (as Keil supposes) from a wrong reading of our Hebrew? For the rest, Böttcher (against Thenius) rightly objects that we cannot speak of the "husband" of a bride; "where and when," he asks, further, "was the bride brought back to her husband?" Böttcher himself renders: "as her wooer leads back the bride, etc." [where "wooer" is the person sent to propose for the bride, as Eliezer for Rebecca, Gen. xxiv.—Ta.]; against which is the fact that the word he proposes (אָרֵשׁ) is never found in this sense of "wooer," and also the unsuitableness of the adverb "back." The rendering: "if all return, [only] the man that thou seekest [will be killed]" (Mich., Schultz) is to be rejected on account of the apocope and consequent supplements. S. Schmid and Clericus translate: "when all the men that thou seekest return, all the people will be at peace" [so Philipsson and Luther]; but this contradicts the connection, according to which the word "seekest" can only refer to David, and the word "man" (אִישׁ) must be in the Singular referring to him. Maurer proposes two renderings, one: "then I will bring back to thee all the people, as if the man that thou seekest brought back all," where the understanding of the Qal (אָרֵשׁ) as causative, though possible (Num. x. 36; Ps. lxxxv. 5 [4]; Mic. ii. 18), is here improbable, as he says, since two forms [Qal and Hiphil] having the same meaning would not stand so near together; the other: "then I will bring back to thee all the people, as if all returned, would the man return (בָּשׁוּב) whom thou seekest" (i. e., as if David, the man that thou seekest should be brought back with all his men) is to be rejected, (with Thenius) as unintelligible. The translation of the Vulgate: "and I will bring back all the people, as one man is accustomed to return (for one man thou seekest)" gives no clear sense. Ahithophel's words are to be taken strictly according to their connection with the preceding ver. 2, where he sets the one man, David over against all the people with him, and announces it as his plan to kill him alone, so as then to bring back all the people (ver. 3) that had gone out with him. That is, the one man that thou seekest is equivalent to the return of the whole people. Peter Martyr (Vermigli): "one, says he, will perish, the multitude will be spared." Dathe: "it is the same as if all returned, when he that thou seekest is killed" [so nearly Chald.]. De Wette: "the man that thou seekest is equivalent to the return of all." Bunsen: "the return of all that have not yet joined thee, depends on the removal of David; his fall brings peace to the whole nation."—Literally: "the whole people will be peace," = "in peace," adverbial use, as in xx. 9; 1 Sam. xxv. 6.—Ver. 4. "The saying was right in the eyes of Absalom, etc.," pleased him (xix. 6; xviii. 20, 26; 1 Kings ix. 12; Jerem. xviii. 4, etc.).

Vers. 5-14. Hushai's counsel against Ahithophel.—Ver. 5. Though Ahithophel's counsel had been generally approved, Absalom sends for Hushai in order to hear his opinion. There is no need to read the Plural "call ye" (Sept., Vulg., Syr., Then.) instead of the Sing. "call thou" (of the Heb.), since Absalom, as king, might give such a command even to Ahithophel, instead of to the servants. As he had accorded full confidence to Hushai (xvi. 18, 19), he wished at this decisive moment to hear his advice also.*—Vers. 6, 7. Hushai, being asked, pronounces Ahithophel's counsel "not good" ["Not good is the counsel that Ahithophel counsels this time," that is, his former advice was good (xvi. 21), but not this.—Tr.].—Ver. 8 sq. Hushai gives his advice in elaborate and skilful style. Against Ahithophel's opinion that David was "exhausted" (ver. 2), he first affirms the contrary, observing that Absalom knew his father and his men to be valiant heroes, and that they were embittered in spirit, as a bear robbed of her whelps (comp. Judg. xviii. 25; Prov. xvii. 12; Hos. xiii. 8). So he would not stay at night with the people, where he might be surprised. Böttcher and Thenius render: "and lets not the people lodge for the night" (יָלַח as unusual Hiphil); but there is no ground for this, [it does not agree with ver. 9 (Keil)].—Ver. 9 sqq. Description of how David, as a genuine military man, would be on his guard during the night, and, at the approach of Absalom's troops, would rush forth from his cavern† and strong positions, fall on the enemy's advanced guard and defeat the whole body. "In the falling on them," where from the connection David is the subject,—"when he falls on them." [Eng. A. V.: "in the falling among them," = when some of them fall. See "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.]. The "them" refers from the context to Absalom's men, and it is unnecessary to read "the people" (עַמּוֹ דָּאֵה) Dathe). "In the beginning," since David would begin the fight by falling on the approaching enemy. [Or, according to Eng. A. V., the fall of some of Absalom's soldiers at the beginning of the battle would create a panic and flight, there being general fear of the military skill and prowess of David and his generals. Bib.-Com.: "It is likely that Absalom was not a man of courage, and Hushai, knowing this, adroitly magnified the terror of the prowess of David and his men."—Tr.].—And the hearer hears and says, etc.—picture of the spread of a report of defeat by those that are first attacked.—Ver. 10. Though the hearer be lion-hearted, he will melt in fear, because it is known in all Israel what heroes David and his men are. This explains how the report of an attack by David would lead to a general overthrow.

† מְבִטִּים, natural hiding-places, מְבִטִּים, artificially strong positions; in these David would pass the night.

To Ahithophel's proposal to surprise David Hushai replies that on the contrary David would surprise them.—Ver. 11. Therefore his counsel is that Absalom should summon a great force from all Israel, and lead it against David in person. Properly: "but* (or, rather) I counsel." It is unnecessary to read "in their midst" (Sept., Vulgate, Arab., Thenius) instead of "into battle," since a change in the Hebrew from the latter to the former would be easy.—Ver. 12 sq. Hushai explains to Absalom how he could with so great an army easily annihilate David's band. "We shall come unto him in one of the places." The next sentence is rendered in two ways: either: "so we on him," that is, so we fall on him (Vulg.: irruemus super eum), spread over him, as the dew falls on the earth; or, "we light on him" (so Eng. A. V.), as the phrase is used of an encamping army (Isa. vii. 2, 19), and of a lighting swarm of flies or locusts (Isa. vii. 19; Ex. x. 14), and elsewhere (with עָלַה "on") in the sense of "lighting" (xxi. 10; Gen. viii. 4; Ex. x. 14; Nu. xi. 25, 26); not: "we encamp against him" (De Wette). The second translation ["we light on him"] answers better to the figure of the dew, which falls quietly and unperceived on the earth at night, with which (as before with the sand on the sea) Hushai compares Absalom's army, settling quietly in its overwhelming power on David. On the other hand the emphatic "we" at the beginning of the sentence [as in the first translation] is without ground, and does not correspond to the verb "we come" in the preceding clause; while to this latter properly corresponds the verb "we light" (as indeed all the ancient versions have a verb in this place). Böttcher further remarks that this form of the Heb. Pers. Pron. is everywhere else used in a depreciatory sense: "we insignificant, very poor persons," which would here be against the connection. Böttcher, however, would read "locust" instead of "dew," and render: "and sink (rush) on him, as a swarm of locusts falls on the earth;" but this is too remote a conjecture (having no support in any ancient version or in any rendering), and unnecessary besides, since the figure of the dew, together with that of the sand, fitly sets forth the swift and quiet settling of the huge host on the enemy. And with this accords perfectly the statement of the success of the attack: "not even one will be left"—Ver. 13. Hushai, assuming that the imagination of his hearers would be carried from one conception to the other, here passes in a wordy discourse, skilfully adapted to gain his end, to the supposition (which would appear natural to a military man)

* So מִן after a negation, expressed or understood, Ges. § 155, 1, מִן-אִיִּם = "thy person, thyself," the Plu. noun here accompanied by a Plu. Participle.—Instead of מִן-אִיִּם Thenius would read מִן-אִיִּם.

† The fem. numeral (though the subset is found as fem. in Gen. xviii. 24; Job xx. 9) is probably (since the masc. is used in ver. 9) to be regarded as scribal error for masc. (Maurer).

that David, defeated as above described, should "concentrate to the rear," and throw himself into a strong city. Then all Israel set ropes to this city. Vulgate: "all Israel put ropes around that city." Hushai is not speaking of ropes thrown over the walls by which the latter are thrown into the ditch (Michaelis, Dathe, Niemeyer), for nothing is said of a ditch and walls; but in his exaggerated mode of expression, which he forces to a hyperbolical climax (all intended for momentary effect), he shows how easily even then David could be captured, all Israel laying ropes about the city and dragging it into the neighboring brook or river. We are not here with Ewald to understand a city-fosse (נַחֲלִית), "for the fosse was close by the city" (Then.), but the brook or river on which the city is built, "because fortified cities are almost always on the declivities of brooks or rivers" (Then.). "Till not even a small stone be found," so the ancient versions;* comp. Am. ix. 9: "a little grain."—The meaning is: "Your powerful army will easily destroy the fortified place, where David may seek refuge, and leave not one stone on another." Cornelius a Lapide: "we will collect so great a force that we shall be able to put ropes around the city (so to speak), and drag it down to ruin."—Ver. 14. To this advice of Hushai Absalom gives the preference over Ahithophel's. The boldness and highflown extravagance of Hushai's words accorded with Absalom's character and with his wish to secure his throne in brilliant fashion by overpowering the force opposed to him. Clericus: "The counsel seemed good, and at the same time was full of a certain boastfulness, that pleased the young man." The statement about the bravery of David and his men was true; the deceit in Hushai's counsel was only the advice to make a levy of all Israel. Absalom deluded himself with the belief that this could be easily raised, not considering that only the discontented part of the people formed the kernel of the insurrection, that no small portion still remained true to David, and that another part, now for the moment fallen away, would return after the first fit of revolution had passed. For this reason it was an important consideration (to which Hushai slyly had regard) that David gained time while Absalom was preparing to summon all Israel. P. Martyr: "to what does Hushai look in this counsel? to delay; delay, he knows, makes for David's cause."—And the Lord had appointed. In all this the narrator sees a divine appointment or ordination, the aim of which was thus to bring on Absalom the evil (that was determined on). The verb (נָצַח) is used in the signification "appoint, ordain," also in Ps. lxxviii. 29 [28]; cxi. 9; Lam. i. 17; Isa. xlv. 12; the object of the verb is apparent from the connection. Ahithophel's counsel is called good, because it was to Absalom's interest to attack David immediately.

Ver. 15–22. Hushai promptly sends word to David.—Ver. 15. He first informs the two high-priests, Zadok and Abiathar, of the council that was held. Comp. xv. 27, 28. [Bib. Com.: "It is remarkable how persistently Zadok is named first."—Patrick: "Herein Hushai betrayed Absalom's counsels."—Tr.]—Ver. 16. He directs them to send information to David as speedily as possible by their sons, and to convey his advice concerning his next movement. Grotius: "David's plan, above mentioned (xv. 35, 36), succeeded well." Lodge not to-night at the fords of the wilderness (xv. 28), that is, stay not this side the Jordan, but cross over. The necessity of the passage of the Jordan for David's safety is shown by the following (variously understood) words: That it (namely, the transit) be not swallowed up (defeated, rendered impossible) to the king and to all the people that are with him. So (with Böttcher) the sentence is best understood from the connection and from David's dangerous situation, the noun "crossing over" [transit] being taken as the subject of the verb (עָלָה) immediately preceding). It was important that David should get away from this side the Jordan, where the masses were to be called out against him, and meantime, since a hasty expedition might be sent against him, when it was found that he was on the west side (especially if Absalom should change his mind and adopt Ahithophel's counsel), he must pass immediately to the east side, where he might hope to find many followers, as actually happened. To the phrase "that it be not swallowed up" other interpretations are given: that of Maurer and De Wette: "lest destruction be prepared for the king" is untenable because the meaning of the verb ("swallowed up") makes the introduction of such a verbal subject ["destruction"] impossible; that of Gesenius: "that the king be not swallowed up" [so Eng. A. V.] is equally untenable, because then the text should have "the king" as Nominative [in the Heb. it is preceded by the Prep. "to"—Tr.]. Of Ewald's rendering (Gram. 295 c): "that it (misfortune) be not swallowed by the king," that is, that the king may not have to suffer it, Böttcher rightly says: "a very unnatural rendering, with a very remote verbal subject, for which the verb would at least better be Feminine." [It seems allowable here to take the verb as impersonal, and render (with Eng. A. V., Ges., Philippon, Cahen): "lest it be swallowed (destroyed) to the king," i. e., lest the king be destroyed. So all the ancient versions* understood it. The construction adopted by Erdmann requires a somewhat difficult supply of a subject to the verb.—Tr.]—Ver. 17. "And Jonathan and Ahimaas were standing" [= were stationed], where the Participle "were standing" expresses their readiness to go as messengers to David at any moment, according to the arrangement in xv. 28, 36. To this end they were stationed outside the city at the Fuller's Fountain [En-rogel] for the purpose of receiving information. En-rogel (comp. Josh. xv. 7; 1 Kings i. 9) is the "present very deep and abundant Fountain of Job, Bir Eyub (Von Raumer, p. 307), or of Nehemiah, south of Jerusalem where the vallies

[See "Text. and Gram.," where the inversion of Eng. A. V. is pointed out, and a slightly different translation proposed.—Tr.] For they could not let themselves be seen to come into the city—appended explanation of the fact that they were outside the city, and the maid-servant had to go to them. Her going out to the spring would not seem strange, while their entrance and return would have excited suspicion, since it was known (xv. 25 sqq.) that they were on David's side.—From ver. 18 it seems that Absalom closely watched them: A lad saw them and told Absalom. Seeing that they were observed, and expecting to be followed, they hastened off in order to get the start of their pursuers, and then to hide somewhere. They went to Bahurim, where Shimei met David (xvi. 5), whose counterpart is the man in whose house the two young men found refuge. It is again a woman (the man's wife) whose presence of mind and cunning did David's cause a great service. The messengers descended into the empty well in the court.—Ver. 19. And she spread the covering, which (as the Art. shows) was at hand, or was designed for the well (Thenius), over the well, and spread thereon the grain-oorns (Prov. xxvii. 22) with which (so the Art. indicates) was occupied. Absalom's servants come in pursuit, are misdirected by the woman, find nothing and return to Jerusalem.* [Patrick: "It seems to have been a common opinion in those days that these officious lies for the safety of innocent persons had no hurt in them."—Tr.]—Ver. 21 sq. The messengers hastened to David, who, in consequence of the information they brought, crossed the river immediately, so that by the morning light not even a man more was on the west side. The situation of affairs was now favorable to David's cause.

Ver. 23. Ahithophel betakes himself to his city, leaves Absalom's court, that is, out of chagrin at the rejection of his counsel, anger at the frustration of his ambitious plans, and also from fear of the fatal results that David's victory would have for him, the contriver and furtherer of the insurrection. A self-murderer from baffled ambition and despair. Not only is David's prayer (xv. 31) answered, but Ahithophel falls under God's judgment for his unfaithfulness and treachery.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Absalom's insurrection and the establishment of a new kingdom with public dishonoring of the royal house, is the completion of the judgment on David's deep fall and weakness towards his sons' crimes, the purpose of which was to purify him (after penitential self-humiliation on his part), and to subject him to the test of faith, without which he could not rise by God's hand from this deep abasement. On the other hand, the success of the godless rebel shows a lack of a true theocratic feeling in the mass of the people, who, in abandoning God's government, were guilty of opposition to the government of God. At the same time in Absalom's conduct (adopted through Ahithophel's evil counsel) is exhibited the general truth that God permits evil to work out its own consequences, and the wicked to entangle themselves in their own snares, that He may reveal His justice and holiness in the self-condemnation and self-destruction of the power of evil, and thus lead the wandering and apostate, when they will hear His voice, to reflection and conversion, as happened here to the people, after the wickedness of Absalom and Ahithophel had completely worked itself out.

2. The divine justice is anew revealed in and on the house of David through Absalom's publicly committed crime. The answer to the question why God brought on David's house this deed of shame of His own son, is given in the Lord's word through Nathan (xii. 11, 12). The sins of the fathers are visited not only on the children, but through them. "Absalom's deed was another chastisement for David from the Lord, not, indeed, a sign of the divine anger, but a wholesome paternal discipline, that was meant for his good. In such earnest does God deal with His children, even after He has taken them into favor" (Schlier).

3. Absalom's rejection of Ahithophel's good counsel for Hushai's destructive counsel sets forth the truth that evil punishes itself by itself, and especially pride and vanity blind man, so that he errs in the choice of means for his sinful ends, and secures not only their frustration, but also his own destruction. But this occurs in the course of the moral government of the world, under the guidance of the divine justice and wisdom, which takes human sin, blindness and foolishness into its plans as a factor, in order to frustrate its wicked aims and to effect its own holy aims.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. xvi. 15. SCHLIER: Poor, deluded fool, that strives after popular favor, and when he has found it, consoles himself therewith. There is nothing more changeable than popular favor—nothing more transitory than what is called public opinion.—Vers. 16-19. CRAMER: Remain faithful to thy friend in his poverty, that thou mayest again enjoy thyself with him when it goes well with him (Ecclus. xxii. 28, 29).—The saints of God do many a thing with good intentions, and yet we are not on that account to take part in it all. Meantime God lets it happen, and knows how thereby to carry out His work (Isa. xxviii. 21, 29).—SCHLIER: What we say should be true, not merely that it shall contain no lie, but also that it be free from all double meaning. In the times of the Old Testament, God the Lord could overlook such double-meaning; with us, in the times of the New Testament, that is no longer the case, but it holds always and every where that the Lord will make the upright prosper.—Ver. 20 sq. HEDINGER: Worldly wisdom and spiritual gifts do not always dwell under one roof.—S. SCHMID: He must be extremely ungodly who can openly do that of which nature has a horror even in private.—SCHLIER: David certainly thought anew upon his old sins, was ashamed and humbled himself, and in his son's sin again recognized his own sin, and anew repented before the Lord.

Chap. xvii. 1-4. CRAMER: God blinds the ungodly, and confounds them through giddiness, so that they can neither see nor know what in human wise is wholesome and good for them; for He puts to shame the wisdom of the wise (Isa. xxix. 14; Job xii. 17).—[TAYLOR: This plan was worthy of Ahithophel's reputation. If it had been energetically followed, it would have been completely successful, and would have changed the entire color and complexion of Jewish history.—TR.]

Vers. 5-14. Large talking and grand schemes are a means whereby young and inexperienced persons are often deceived (1 Kings xii. 10).—The Lord ensnares the ungodly in their cunning, so that they are deceived by that very thing on which they most relied.—S. SCHMID: If God does not open and rule the eyes of the mind, even the most sensible men are blind (Psalm cxix. 18).—STARKE: God does not leave His enemies to manage as they will, but appoints them a limit, how far they shall go. When they take hold most shrewdly, yet God goes another road (Ps. xxxiii. 10; Isa. viii. 10; Job v. 12).—[HALL: First, to sweeten his opposition, Hushai yields the praise of wisdom to his adversary in all other counsels, that he may have leave to deny it in this; his very contradiction in the present insinuates a general allowance. Then he suggests certain apparent truths concerning David's valor and skill to give countenance to the inferences of his improbabilities. Lastly, he cunningly feeds the proud humor of Absalom, in magnifying the power and extent of his commands, and ends in the glorious boasts of his fore-promised victory. As it is with faces, so with counsel; that is fair that pleaseth.—TR.]—SCHLIER: A good cause always goes the way of truth, and does not need scoffing and self-important words, but goes on soberly and simply. Absalom gave heed to Hushai's bad counsel, because Hushai knew how by means of his vanity to bring him to a fall.—The Lord is with us and lets nothing happen to us; He also knows how to turn the wickedness of our enemies into a blessing to us. And if all the world is hostile and persecutes us, the Lord takes in hand even our persecutors, and does with them as He pleases.

cutes us, the Lord takes in hand even our persecutors, and does with them as He pleases.

Vers. 15-22. SCHLIER: Let us recognize the Lord's hand in the things of common life also, but let us always honor His hand and thankfully accept what it gives. Circumstances are God's messengers, and well for him who in these circumstances recognizes and honors the hand of his Lord. It was God's hand that through all these littlenesses and casualties caused the news of Ahithophel's counsel to come safe to David.

Ver. 23. CRAMER: Ungodly men fall into the pit which they make for others (Psa. vii. 16 [15]; ix. 16 [15]; Prov. xxvi. 27). [HALL: What a mixture do we find here of wisdom and madness! Ahithophel will needs hang himself; there is madness: he will yet set his house in order; there is an act of wisdom. How preposterous are the cares of idle worldlings, that prefer all other things to themselves, and while they look at what they have in their coffers, forget what they have in their breasts.—TAYLOR: This is the first recorded case of deliberate suicide. And the feelings which led to it, and which we can easily analyze, were very similar to those which have impelled many in our own times to commit the same awful iniquity. Chief among them was wounded pride. Then, besides this, there was the conviction that Absalom's cause was now hopelessly ruined Perhaps also there was a mingling of remorse with those other emotions of pride. He had left a master who loved and valued him, and had transferred his services to one who, as he now discovered, had not the wisdom to appreciate his worth, but preferred the gaudy glitter of empty rhetoric to the substantial wisdom of unadorned speech. This contrast, thus forced upon him, might awaken his conscience to the value of the friendship which he had forfeited when he turned against David, until remorse and shame overwhelmed him.—TR.]

[Chap. xvii. 5. It was not unwise in Absalom to seek the advice of another experienced counsellor also (Prov. xxiv. 6); his fault was that he did not know which advice to follow, and was misled by high-sounding and flattering words. In choosing counsellors, and in judging of their counsel, lies great part of the wisdom of life.—Boldness is often true prudence; and "delays are dangerous."—Ver. 14. Hushai's treacherous craft and Absalom's silly vanity are overruled to the accomplishment of the Lord's purpose. Few things are so consoling as the frequency with which we perceive how God brings good out of evil; and doubtless this is often true where we do not yet perceive it (Ps. lxxvi. 10; Is. xlii. 7).—Ver. 23. Ahithophel 1) A model of worldly wisdom (xvi. 23). Excellence of his advice to Absalom (xvi. 21; xvii. 1-3). 2) An example of worldly wisdom failing because it ignores God (ver. 14; Ps. xiv. 1). 3) A suicide; a) probable causes; b) folly and guilt.—TR.]

a. David at Mahanaim. Chap. XVII. 24-29.

- 24 THEN [AND] David came to Mahanaim. And Absalom passed over Jordan, 25 he and all the men of Israel with him. And Absalom made Amasa captain of the host instead of Joab, which [and] Amasa was a man's son,¹ whose name was Ithra, an Israelite [the Ishmaelite], that went in to Abigail the daughter of Nahash, sis-26 ter to Zeruiah, Joab's mother. So [AND] Israel and Absalom pitched in the land 27 of Gilead. And it came to pass, when David was come to Mahanaim, that Shobi the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and Machir the son of 28 Ammiel of Lo-debar, and Barzillai the Gileadite of Rogelim, Brought² beds, and basons, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, 29 and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse [corn], And honey, and butter [curds], and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him, to eat; for they said, The people is [go³] hungry, and weary, and thirsty in the wilderness.

b. The battle in the forest of Ephraim. Chap. XVIII. 1-8.

- 1 AND David numbered [mustered] the people that were with him, and set cap-2 tains of thousands and captains of hundreds over them. And David sent forth [gave⁴] a third part of the people under [into⁴] the hand of Joab, and a third part under [into] the hand of Abishai the son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and a third part under [into] the hand of Ittai the Gittite. And the king said unto the people, 3 I will surely [om. surely] go forth with you myself also. But [AND] the people answered [said], Thou shalt not go forth; for if we flee away, they will not care

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 25. Probably we should read: "the son of a stranger (foreigner)" (אִישׁ נָכָר, or אִישׁ זָר). Instead of "Israelite" editors now generally read: "Ishmaelite" (1 Chr. ii. 17). The old Jewish view is that Ithra or Jithra or Jether (another name for Jesse) was an Israelite by birth, but had lived long among the Ishmaelites, or was an Ishmaelite by birth and an Israelite by religion (a proselyte), and that the phrase "son of a man" — "a man of distinction" (so Philippon); but this is less probable than that our text is corrupt. Wordsworth supposes that the name "Israelite" may be used in distinction from Judahite, to show that Jithra did not belong to the tribe of Judah; but Cahen remarks that this designation (Israelite) seems not to have come into use till after the division of the kingdom. — Wellhausen thinks that "daughter of Nahash" is for "son of Nahash," and is an insertion from ver. 27, a not improbable supposition; the statement would then be: "Amasa was the son of a foreigner named Jethra the Ishmaelite, who went in unto Abigail, sister to Zeruiah, Joab's mother." Abigail and Zeruiah would then be full sisters to David, and Amasa illegitimate son of Abigail, and cousin of Joab. — The reading of Sept. and Vulg.: "Jesreelite" is less probable than the "Ishmaelite" of 1 Chr. ii. 17, because our text indicates (by the maimed phrase: "son of a man") that Jethra was a non-Israelite. The Arabic reading is noticeable: "and Absalom made his lance-bearer in place of Ahithophel, a man named Amasa, son of a rich man named Jether." — Ta.]

² [Ver. 28. The verb does not occur in the Heb. till ver. 29, whence it is proposed to insert (with the versions) a verb or participle (שָׁמְרוּ) at the beginning of ver. 28. The verb in ver. 29 may be retained, and would, indeed, serve to govern the nouns in ver. 28, but for the phrase "for the people to eat," since the things mentioned in that verse are not all eatables. The difficulty, however, still exists if (with Erdmann) we supply the copula before the "brought" of ver. 29; we may then say that the word "eat" is used of the principal part of the things brought (in which case it will not be absolutely necessary to supply the verb at the beginning of ver. 29), or, we may suppose that the articles last mentioned (ver. 29, together with the קֶלֶךְ "parched corn" at end of verse 28, the repetition of which would thus be explained) were brought ready for immediate eating, the others (ver. 28) as a store of provisions. — The word "corn" is retained in its proper sense — "grain," though liable to be misunderstood by American readers for maize. — Ta.]

³ [Ver. 29. The people were not at Mahanaim, and had gotten hungry during the march through the wilderness. — Ta.]

for [pay attention to⁶] us; neither [and] if half of us die, will they care for us [they will not pay attention to us]; but now thou [for thou⁷] art worth ten thousand of us; therefore [and] now it is better that thou succour us out of the city. And the king said unto them, What seemeth you best I will do. And the king stood by the gate-side, and all the people came out [went forth] by hundreds and by thousands. 5 And the king commanded Joab and Abishai and Ittai, saying, Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with [om. even with] Absalom. And all the people 6 heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom. So [And] the people went out into the field against Israel; and the battle was [or, took place] 7 in the wood of Ephraim. Where [And] the people of Israel were slain [smitten there] before the servants of David, and there was there⁸ a great slaughter that day 8 of twenty thousand men. For [And] the battle was there scattered over the face of all the country; and the wood devoured more people that day than the sword devoured.

c. Absalom murdered by Joab. Vers. 9-18.

9 And Absalom met⁹ the servants of David. And Absalom rode [was riding] upon a [the] mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a [the] great oak [terebinth], and his head caught hold of the oak [terebinth], and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth, and the mule that was under him went away 10 [passed on]. And a certain man saw it, and told Joab, and said, Behold, I saw Absalom hanged in an oak [the terebinth]. And Joab said unto the man that told 11 him, And behold, thou sawest him, and why didst thou not smite him there to the ground? and I would have given thee ten shekels [pieces] of silver, and a girdle. 12 And the man said unto Joab, Though¹⁰ I should receive a thousand shekels [pieces] of silver in mine hand, yet would I not put forth my hand against the king's son; for in our hearing the king charged thee and Abishai and Ittai, saying, Beware 13 that none touch the young man Absalom. Otherwise¹¹ I should have wrought falsehood against mine own life; for there is no matter hid from the king, and thou thyself 14 wouldest have set thyself against me. Then said Joab [And Joab said], I may

⁶ [Ver. 3. Literally: "set heart on us."—אָמַתְּ "thou" instead of עַתָּה "now" is read by Sept., Vulg., Sym., and by one or two MSS.—Syr. has "now;" its text here (followed by Arab.) is badly maimed.—Instead of "out of the city" Sept., an anonymous Greek version and Vulg., have "in the city," which is perhaps merely an explanatory rendering. The absence of the Art. in מִן עִיר creates a difficulty. Bib.-Com., taking מִן עִיר as Hiph. participle of עָרָה, proposes to render: "that thou be to us a stirrer-up in helping us," i. e., that thou help us by stirring us up. But the construction here does not favor this rendering; the verb (Hiphil) is followed by the Acc. of the person or thing roused, and frequently by עָל ("against") with the person against whom it is roused; the Infin. here also would from the construction rather have for its subject the roused than the rouser. It is better to supply the Art. מִן עִיר, or else to read מִן עִיר—Kethib לְעִיר for לְהַעֲרִיר Hiph. Infin.; Qeri לְעִיר Qal.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 12. Read the Qeri לִי or לָא (—לֹא)—"Though I should weigh (שָׁקַל) into (upon) my hand;" instead of the Act. Participle. Wellhausen reads the Pass. שָׁקוּל: "though there were weighed into my hand," but the man might easily conceive of the weighing as done by himself.—Ta.]

not tarry thus with thee. And he took three darts¹⁰ in his hand, and thrust them through [into] the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the midst of the 15 oak [terebinth]. And ten young men that bare Joab's armour compassed about 16 and smote Absalom, and slew him. And Joab blew the trumpet, and the people 17 returned from pursuing after Israel, for Joab held back¹¹ the people. And¹² they took Absalom, and cast him into a [the] great pit in the wood, and laid a very great 18 heap of stones upon him; and all Israel fled, every one to his tent. Now [And] Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself a [the] pillar,¹³ which is in the king's dale; for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance; and he called the pillar after his own name, and it is called unto this day, Absalom's place [monument].

d. The tidings of joy and grief. David's lament over Absalom. Vers. 19-33 [XIX. 1].

19 Then said Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok [And Ahimaaz the son of Zadok said], Let me now run, and bear the king tidings how [om. how] that the Lord [Jehovah] hath avenged [delivered] him of [from] his enemies. And Joab said unto him, Thou shalt not bear tidings this day, but thou shalt bear tidings another day; 21 but this day thou shalt bear no tidings, because¹⁴ the king's son is dead. Then said Joab to Cushi [And Joab said to the Cushite], Go, tell the king what thou hast 22 seen. And Cushi [the Cushite] bowed himself unto Joab and ran. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok [And Ahimaaz the son of Zadok said] yet again to Joab, But, however, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cushi [the Cushite]. And Joab said, Wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing that thou hast no tidings ready.¹⁵ 23 But howsoever, said he,¹⁶ let me run. And he said unto him, Run. Then [And] Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and overran Cushi [the Cushite]. 24 And David sat [was sitting] between the two gates; and the watchman went up to the roof over [of] the gate unto the wall, and lifted up his eyes, and looked 25 [saw], and behold a man running alone. And the watchman cried [called] and told the king. And the king said, If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth.

¹⁰ [Ver. 14. The word (שֶׁבֶט) not "dart," but "staff," and is contrasted with the word "spear" (חֲנִיָּה) in 2 Sam. xxiii. 21. Either, then, we must suppose Joab to have used an uncommon weapon (Erdmann) or we must change the text. Erdmann states the objections to Thenius' proposed reading שְׁלֹחִים, and it would be hard to account for an alteration of חֲנִיָּה or חֲנִיתֹת into שְׁבָטִים.—Instead of: "in the heart (בְּלֵב) of the terebinth" Thenius proposes to read after Syr. and Vulg.: "hung in (חָלַל) the terebinth," for which there seems no necessity; the renderings of these two versions are merely interpretations.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 17. Wellhausen objects to the order of vers. 14-17, because it represents Absalom, already half-dead from hanging, as surviving Joab's stabbing with the staves or darts, and finally meeting his death from the young men. He would make the last word of ver. 15 and ver. 16 follow ver. 14, and then insert vers. 15, 17, so as to read: "14. Joab took three darts, etc., . . . in the terebinth, and killed him, 16 and blew the trumpet, and held back the people. 15 and ten young men compassed about Absalom, 17 and took him, etc." Though this is ingenious, it is not required by the text. Joab's wounds did not kill Absalom, and the zealous armor-bearers finished him; then Joab called in his soldiers, and they (indef. subject — Passive) took Absalom and cast him into the pit.—Ta.]

- 26 And he came apace and drew near [he came nearer and nearer]. And the watchman saw another man running; and the watchman called unto the porter,¹⁷ and said, Behold, another [om. another, ins. a] man running alone. And the king said, 27 He also bringeth tidings. And the watchman said, Methinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz the son of Zadok. And the king said, 28 He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings. And Ahimaaz called, and said unto the king, All is well [Peace!] And he fell down to the earth upon his face before the king, and said, Blessed be the Lord [Jehovah] thy God, which hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the king. And the king said, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Ahimaaz answered [said] When Joab sent the king's servant and me [om. the king's servant and me¹⁸] thy servant, 30 I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was. And the king said unto him [om. unto him], Turn aside, and stand here. And he turned aside and stood still. 31 And behold, Cushite [the Cushite] came; and Cushite [the Cushite] said, Tidings, my lord the king, for the Lord [Let my lord the king receive the tidings that Jehovah] hath avenged [delivered] thee this day of [from] all them that rose up against thee. And the king said unto Cushite [the Cushite], Is the young man Absalom safe? And Cushite answered [the Cushite said], The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt [for evil] be as that [the] young man is [om. is]. [Heb. xix. 1]. And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God [O that] I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

¹⁸ [Ver. 29. Erdmann renders as Eng. A. V., but the construction, as it stands, is awkward and improbable. The simplest procedure seems to be that of Wellhausen, to omit אֶת-עַבְדִּי הַמֶּלֶךְ (though it is not easy to account for its insertion). Some (so Bib.-Com.) prefer the Vulg. rendering, on which see Erdmann in the Exposition. Related questions, such as the person of "the Cushite," will there be referred to.—Tr.]

a. Ch. xvii. 24–29. David at Mahanaim.

Ver. 24. To Mahanaim, east of the Jordan (which he had crossed in the night, passing through the Jordan-valley, ver. 22), probably a fortified place, north of the Jabbok, suitable for a rendezvous for gathering an army, whence it was chosen by Abner as Ishbosheth's capital-city. See on ii. 8. [A well-provisioned country, friendly to David (Bib.-Com.).—Tr.]—Absalom's passage over the Jordan took place when he had had time to gather (according to Hushai's counsel) "all the men of Israel," that is, all the military force of the country (comp. ver. 11 sq.). Ver. 25. Whether Amasa, appointed by Absalom captain in place of Joab (who remained faithful to David), is the same with the Amasai of 1 Chron. xii. 17, 18 (Ewald, Bertheau), must be left undetermined. "If this conjecture were correct, the man, so cordially received by David (1 Chron. xii. 17), would have committed grave wrong in attaching himself to Absalom" (Then.). Elsewhere the phrase "son of a man (or woman)" is defined by a following appositional word or genitive (Böttcher); but here the defining phrase is introduced by "and" ["and his name was Ithra"], so that we have the independent assertion: "son of a man," which is meaningless. Perhaps the text originally had: "whose name was" (אִשְׁרֵי שְׁמוֹ), and the relative pronoun has fallen out (from the following אִשְׁרֵי). Böttcher conjectures that "foreigner" (גֵּר) stood after "man," comp. i. 13 [it would then read: "Amasa was the son of a foreigner, and his name was Ithra."—Tr.].—With this would agree that Ithra was an Ishmaelite, for so we must here read instead of "Israelite," after 1 Chron. ii. 17, where Jether is shortened form of Ithra (Sept.: "the Jezreelite," Josh. xix. 18, so David's wife Ahinoam, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3). The designation of Ithra as an "Israelite" would be superfluous; but the statement that he was an "Ishmaelite" serves to illustrate the fact that Amasa was an illegitimate son of Abigail. If Nahash be taken as a man's name, and the word "sister" in apposition with Abigail, then Zeruah and Abigail are daughters of David's mother by her first marriage with Nahash, step-daughters of Jesse, and on this side step-sisters of David (so the older expositors, Michaelis and Schultz). But Nahash may, with Movers and Thenius (who refers to 1 Chron. iv. 12, where it is the name of a city), be taken as a woman's name, here a second wife of Jesse. In this case also the two, Zeruah and Abigail, would be David's step-sisters. Clericus supposes Nahash to be another name, or a surname of Jesse; Capellus would read "Jesse" instead of "Nahash" (after a variant of the Sept.); Böttcher puts "sister" in apposition with "Nahash," which he regards as a woman's name. [It is an old Jewish view that Nahash is another name of Jesse. For many persons, says Kimchi, had two names, and this (Nahash) signifies "a serpent." From whence it is that when Isaiah (xiv. 29) saith: "out of the serpent's root (or, the root of Nahash) shall come forth a cockatrice or basilisk," the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it, "out of the root of Jesse shall come forth the Messiah;" who was typified by the brazen serpent in the wilderness (Patrick). This would be baseless allegorizing, even if Nahash were proved to be another name of Jesse, which is not probable. The omission of the name Nahash in 1 Chron. ii. 16 is against the view that it belongs to a daughter of Jesse; more probably it is the name of the otherwise unknown father of Abigail. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—Ver. 26. Absalom pitched his camp in Gilead. Nothing is said of a siege (Ewald) of Mahanaim. Against this view is the fact that David, as appears from what follows, here got supplies of men and provisions, formed an army, and organized it in three divisions, which required time. It is hence evident that David was able to establish himself strongly at Mahanaim without being attacked by Absalom's army.—Vers. 27–29. David receives reinforcements and provisions. Shobi, the son of Nahash, from Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites; this last statement "guards against the possible error that Shobi was a brother of Abigail" (Thenius). Rabbah, on the lower Jabbok (xii. 26–31), belonged to David's empire, and now remained true to him. Shobi, if not an Israelite, was perhaps a son of the deceased Ammonite king Nahash and brother of the Hanun (x. 1 sqq.) conquered by David (Keil), or a member of the royal house of Ammon favored by David (Ewald). [Shobi was hardly tributary king of Ammon (Bib.-Com.), else he would have been called king.—Tr.]—Machir, son of Ammiel of Lodebar, who had received Jonathan's lame son Mephibosheth into his house (ix. 4).—Barnillai, a Gileadite of Rogelim, an otherwise unknown place, mentioned besides here only in xix. 32. The Sept. (alone among the ancient versions) inserts "ten" before "beds" and before "basons;" but this does not agree with the connection, since the articles mentioned were brought by several persons for "the people" (ver. 29), and therefore certainly in considerable quantities. Ten would have been too few for David's "court and army" (Ew.); the insertion of this number in the Sept. was perhaps suggested by 1 Sam. xvii. 17, 18. Whether they were "fine mattress-beds" (Ew.) must be left undecided. "Basons," metallic vessels for preparing food. "Parched food" (לֶחֶם), comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 17. As not only corn-grains, but also pulse-beans were roasted (Bochart, Hier. II. 582, Harmar, Beobacht. I. 255 sq.), the second word may refer to pulse, of which, as well as of corn, two kinds are named; and therefore the omission of the second (לֶחֶם) as an error (Sept., Syr., Arab.) is unnecessary [Eng. A. V. retains it, and renders: "parched pulse"]. The last term in the list (שְׁמוֹת בָּקָר) is variously translated; Vulg.: "fat calves;" Theod.: "sucking calves;" Chald., Syr., Rabbin.: "cheese of kine (cows)" [so Eng. A. V.]. The last sense agrees better with the preceding words [Eng. A. V. incorrectly: "butter"]; the first sense accords with the "sheep" (small cattle). Sept. transfers the Heb. word: "saphoth of oxen." The meaning of the Heb. phrase is doubtful. The verb in this sentence ("brought") stands strangely and unnaturally after the long list of articles; it is therefore better, with Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab., to supply a verb-form (partic.) at the beginning of ver. 28, and then to insert "and" before the verb in ver. 29: "they brought beds, etc., and gave them to David." [Eng. A. V. simply transfers the verb to the beginning of ver. 28. On the reading see "Text. and Gram." Patrick calls attention to the food of the times (only one sort of meat) as indicated by the list in vers. 28, 29, and Bib.-Com. remarks that God's care for David was evident in the kindness of these people.—Tr.]

b. XVIII. 1–8. The battle in the forest of Ephraim.

Vers. 1, 2. David organises his army, and disposes it for battle.—Ver. 1 sq. 1) The mustering of the whole body of people with David, which had been constantly growing by reinforcements from the country east of the Jordan; 2) the division into smaller bodies of hundreds and thousands; 3) the organization of the whole army in three grand divisions under Joab, Abishai and Ittai the Gittite, comp. xv. 29. He "gave them into the hand" (Vulg.), that is, put them under the command of Joab and the others [Eng. A. V. not so well: "sent forth under the hand"].—Vers. 3, 4. David's attitude in respect to the impending battle. 1) David's declaration that he would himself go into the fight; 2) the declaration of the people that they were unwilling to this, since the point was to secure his safety for the benefit of the whole people in the battle. "Thou* art as we ten thousand," that is, equal to ten thousand of us. David was to remain behind with a reserve-corps, in order in case of need to come to their help from the city, whence it may be inferred that Mahanaim was a strong place, where a stand might be made. The king agreed to this prudent proposition,† and stood at the gate-side, while the army filed out before him.—Ver. 5. David's order respecting Absalom. He said to the generals: Deal gently with the young man Absalom.—[Heb. has the dativus commodi: "deal me gently;" Eng. A. V.: "deal gently for my sake," a fair rendering.—Tr.] The people heard it, that is, from bystanders, who spread it abroad.—[The text rather says that the people heard the king give the order; the fact is mentioned to explain the answer of the man to Joab in ver. 12; notice the phrase: "in our hearing" there.—Tr.] The brief exclamation of David accords with the vividly portrayed scene and with his feeling when he saw his army going forth against his son.—Vers. 6–8. The battle. "The people went out against Israel," that is, David's army made the attack. The battle was in the wood of Ephraim. This name can be understood only of the forest covering the mountains of Ephraim, which, when the Israelites entered Canaan, stretched over the whole mountain (Josh. xvii. 15-18: "go up into the forest.—a mountain shall be thine, for it is forest), and was still extensive in later times; see 1 Sam. xiv. 22-26, where it is said that the children of Israel first hid from the Philistines in mount Ephraim (that is, in the mountain-gorges and in caves), and then that all the people came into the forest. We are thus pointed to the wooded heights in the tribe of Ephraim, not far west of the Jordan. Further, Ahimaaz (ver. 23) traverses the Jordan-valley in order to carry the news to David at Mahanaim. "Ahimaaz could not have gone this way if the battle had been on the east of the Jordan, and he wished to take a short route" (Keil). Ewald admits that the name "forest of Ephraim" seems certainly to point to the west of the river, but yet puts it on the east, because David's army returned after the victory to Mahanaim, "while, if the battle had occurred on the west side, it would obviously have been much better to stay on that side and take possession of Jerusalem." To this it need not be replied with Vaihinger (Herzog, Art. Ephraim) that "David wished to avoid further shedding of blood, and prudence and clemency dictated a return to Mahanaim;" rather it must be urged that Absalom's defeat had put an end to the insurrection (ver. 17, and xix. 9), his followers were completely broken up, and therefore an immediate occupation of Jerusalem was unnecessary. But besides, the battle was a severe one, as appears from the fact that of Absalom's army (which fought very bravely) twenty thousand men fell, and David's army was not in condition after the fight to make a long and rapid march to Jerusalem. Moreover, even in that case it would have been necessary for the reserve with David to join the victorious army; this junction effected (by crossing the Jordan), the whole army marched to Jerusalem under the lead of the king. Thenius holds that the forest of Ephraim was east of the Jordan, on the ground that nothing is said of Absalom's re-crossing the river (according to xvii. 28 he encamped in Gilead, east of the river), that, if he had re-crossed, David (who stood only on the defensive) would have awaited another attack on his present position [Mahanaim], and that the expectation of help from the city [ver. 3] presupposes that the battle occurred near Mahanaim, to which it is to be replied that ver. 6 shows that David did not act merely on the defensive (he marched against Absalom), and that David's unexpected attack on Absalom's army (which could not spread out in the relatively narrow space between Mahanaim and the Jordan) may well have forced its passage across the river, so that the decisive conflict occurred in the wooded hill-region of the tribe of Ephraim. The fact that David stayed behind with one division in Mahanaim, and sent the three generals with their divisions against Absalom, shows clearly that he acted on the offensive. The proposed "help from the city" was only for the case that the attack was not successful, and cannot be urged in support of the view that the battle was near Maha-naim. The narrator here relates only the final and decisive conflict, it not being his purpose to describe the previous actions by which Absalom's army was forced across the Jordan. That the messengers (vers. 19-27) had then to re-cross the Jordan in order to reach David makes no difficulty, since the river could easily be crossed by the fords. From the eastern edge of the wooded Mount Ephraim the messengers could reach Mahanaim by rapid travel in about two hours. The assumption by some expositors of a "Forest of Ephraim" east of the Jordan, presumably so called from the defeat of the Ephraimites by the Gileadites (Judg. xii. 1-5) is a mere conjecture untenable against the demonstrated geographical-historical significance of the name. [Another conjecture is that the "wood of Ephraim" was so called from the place Ephraim where Absalom had sheep-shearers (2 Sam. xiii. 23); but this has nothing in its favor, since, if the forest is to be put west of the river, the region in the tribe of Ephraim is the most natural here. Most expositors hold (against Erdmann) that the battle must have been near Mahanaim and on the east of the river, since the centre of action seems to be Mahanaim, and nothing is said of Joab's crossing the river. But in the absence of all information about a "forest of Ephraim" east of the Jordan, the question must be regarded as unsettled. Mr. Grove suggests (Smith's Bib.-Dict., Art. Wood of Ephraim) that the forest may have been called after this battle, from the prominent part taken in it by the powerful tribe of Ephraim on Absalom's side; but this is not probable.—If the battle were on the east of the river Ahimaaz might still have found a quicker way to Mahanaim through the Jordan-valley; while, if it were on the west, it would seem necessary that the Cushite also should pass through this valley, and it is intimated that he did not go that way.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. Further description of the defeat of Absalom's army. The defeat was terrible because the fight spread* wide over the woody mountain-terrain, and more of Absalom's men perished in the gorges of the mountain than by the sword. "The forest of Ephraim lay no doubt in the northeastern part of the tribe-territory, towards the Jordan and Succoth" (Vaihinger), where there were deep, narrow gorges and steep declivities towards the Jordan. [It is commonly supposed that Absalom's army was far larger than David's; but we know nothing of their numbers. Twenty thousand slain is a great loss, yet not improbable under the circumstances.—The victory may be accounted for by the superior organization of David's troops and the superior generalship of his army-leaders. As to Amasa see xx. 4-6.—Tr.] c. Vers. 9-18. Absalom murdered by Joab.—Ver. 9. In the tumult of the battle Absalom got into the neighborhood of "David's servants." therefore entered a thicket, on the mule which he rode as royal prince (hence the Art.: "the mule"), in order to escape. His head, however, caught in (literally: "made itself fast in") the boughs of a terebinth, not merely from his large growth of hair, but doubtless also because the head was jammed in between the branches in consequence of the entanglement of the long hair; thus he was "set," that is, hung [Eng. A. V.: "was taken up"] between heaven and earth, since the mule went away from under him. [Bib.-Com.: "It would seem that the two things that his vain-glory boasted in, the royal mule and the magnificent head of hair, both contributed to his untimely death."—Tr.]—Ver. 10. Only one of David's men saw it and reported it to Joab as commander-in-chief. [The text does not say that "only one man" saw it, but that "a man" saw it; others may have seen it, but this man reported it.—Tr.]—Ver. 11. Joab's desire of revenge prevents him from regarding David's command given to the whole army (ver. 5). He, the highest commander, forgets himself in disobedience so far as to chide his subordinate for not killing Absalom, and tell him of the reward he had thus lost. This accords precisely with the rude passionateness, violence and barbarity of Joab's character, as before described.—It was my affair richly therefore to reward thee with ten silver pieces (= about seven dollars*) and with a girdle (comp. Esek. xxiii. 15), as a valuable and essential part of military dress.—Ver. 12. The man's reply. And thought I should weigh in (or, on) my hand a thousand shekels [or pieces], that is, if they were already given to me, I would not do such a deed. He refers to the command of the king: Beware, whoever† it be [= all of you], of (touching) the young man. Maurer: "whoever (of you shall come on him)". [So Eng. A. V.: "beware that none touch"]. Most of the ancient versions and some [Heb.] MSS. read: "beware me of touching," etc., where me is Dativus commodi; but this is to be rejected as a conjecture to avoid a difficult construction, and suggested probably by the similar phrase in ver. 5 [Eng. A. V.: "for my sake"]. David's command was to all, not merely to the generals (ver. 5), and to the common soldiers, one of whom here shows himself nobler-minded and more obedient than his commander.—Ver. 13. The initial word "or" (וְ) indicates a contrasted assertion.—The preference is to be given to the text "his life" over the marginal reading "my life." The latter is found in the Sept.: "and how shall I do wrong against my life?", and the Vulg.: "if I had boldly acted against my life," and Ewald: "if I had lied (acted deceitfully) against my conscience." Against Ewald Thenius says that the natural course of thought here is that the man should first state the act itself, and then its consequences for himself. Or, had I dealt deceitfully against his life, wrought falsehood by killing him, inasmuch as I should thus have acted against the express prohibition of the king. The words "and nothing is hid from the king" form a parenthesis; the apodosis begins with "and thou." And thou wouldst have stood against me, that is, have appeared against me before the king as accuser. For this expression comp. Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1. [On other explanations of this difficult verse see "Text and Gram." The man's reply seems to be: "In the first place, I have too much respect for the king's command to lift my hand against his son for any reward; and in the next place, the reward would avail me nothing, for the king would find out what I had done and punish me, and you yourself would be witness against me," wherein he says plainly that he does not trust Joab. That the latter does not resent the answer by violence is perhaps to be ascribed to his consciousness of being in the wrong.—Eng. A. V. follows the marginal reading, which also gives a good sense, as does the reading of the Sept.: "the king charged thee, etc., saying, Beware of doing the young man harm, and nothing will be hid from the king," etc.—Tr.]—Ver. 14. Joab's answer betrays his vengeful, rudely passionate nature: I will not tarry thus with thee, that is, lose time in myself doing what is necessary. He took three staffs; such is the meaning of the word (טַבָּעִים) and not "spear, dart, spit" (comp. xxiii. 21), as Sept. and Vulg. [and Eng. A. V.] give it. Thenius therefore changes the text; but the word he proposes (טַבָּעִים) is used (as Keil remarks) in the older Hebrew only as = "missile" (Job xxxiii. 18; xxvi. 12; Joel ii. 8), and not till postexilic times in the general sense of "weapon" (2 Chr. xxiii. 10; xxxii. 5; Neh. iv. 11); and moreover no change is necessary, since our text-word signifies such sharp wooden staffs as Joab could find in the hard terebinth-wood; and this view is supported by the fact that he had to use three weapons, while one spear-thrust would have been sufficient.—The words: "and he was still alive," etc., are connected with the preceding, not with the succeeding context; in the latter case they would be introduced by a Conjunction or other Particle. Joab thrust "through the heart of the still living prince" (Ewald). The hanging in the tree did not immediately produce death, though it would have done so finally.—"In the heart of the terebinth" (Ex. xv. 8) = "in the midst of the terebinth," agreeing with the description in ver. 9. This expression Böttcher would unnecessarily change to: "in the thicket (רֹמֶם) of the terebinth."—Ver. 15. After Joab's thrust in the heart, Absalom is killed by ten of Joab's young men, probably at his command.—[Thus neither the hanging nor the thrusts in the heart produced death. This, if surprising, is by no means impossible. On Wellhausen's unnecessary re-disposition of the text (putting ver. 16 before ver. 15) see "Text and Gram."—Tr.]—Ver. 16. By Absalom's death the end of the battle was secured, and Joab therefore called the people off from further pursuit. The motive for his barbarous slaying of Absalom was not private revenge

(Kurtz in Herzog), but revenge for the honor of the ejected king, and the conviction that only his death could put an end to the unhappy civil war. He stopped the pursuit, however, because he wished to spare the people, that is, Absalom's people. A piece of clemency alongside of his barbarity! [The rendering of Eng. A. V. is better: "he held back the people" from pursuit. The phrase "the people" here naturally refers to David's (and Joab's) people.—Tr.]—Ver. 17. Absalom cast aside. And they threw over it a very great heap of stones, a sign of embittered feeling against a dead man. [In his translation Erdmann has: "over him."—Tr.] The great heap of stones over the pit (the Art. denotes the well-known pit into which Absalom's corpse was thrown) was to be a monument of shame for his crime;* comp. Josh. vii. 26 (Achan), viii. 29 (the king of Ai). All Israel had fled, every man to his tent, that is, all of Absalom's army (gathered from all Israel) that survived the defeat; this also confirms the view that the battle took place on the west of the Jordan. [But they would have fled to their homes, no matter where the battle was fought.—Tr.]—Ver. 18. In sharp contrast with this mention of the monument of shame stands the following account of the monument that the vain and ambitious Absalom had set up in his own honor during his lifetime. The word "took" [Eng. A. V. "had taken"] (Num. xvi. 1; 1 Kings xi. 37) is pleonastic, as is common in circumstantial and vivid narration: ["took and reared" = "reared"]. But it may be understood as = "took for himself" not pleonastic (Böttcher). The form of the pillar (probably of stone) cannot be determined. In the king's dale, the valley of the Kidron, two stadia east of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. 7, 10, 3); it took its name from the event described in Gen. xiv. 17, and was in later times called also the valley of Jehoshaphat. The "Absalom's pillar" of ecclesiastical tradition, shown even in the Middle Ages, and to-day called "Absalom's grave," a pyramidal pointed monument about forty feet high,† cannot in its present form be the work of Absalom. See Thenius' excellent argument against the view of Winer and Ewald, that the "king's dale" was north of Jerusalem, perhaps (according as the Salem in Gen. xiv. 18 is understood) not far from Salem, a northern city on the Jordan.—I have no son, comp. xiv. 27; his three sons there mentioned must have afterwards died. "It is called to this day Absalom's Hand" (1 Sam. xv. 12), a monument recalling his memory like an uplifted hand. This monument of honor (whether it was "adorned with a splendid inscription of his name" (Ew.) must be left to the imagination) he had himself erected during his life; that monument of shame in the wood of Ephraim was set up by others after his terrible death. A significant contrast!

d. Vers. 19–32. The tidings of joy and grief. David's lament over Absalom.

Ver. 19. Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok, who with Jonathan (xvii. 15 sq.) had brought to David the information concerning Absalom's design, and had remained with the army. He wishes to bear to the king the tidings that the Lord has judged the king [= done him justice] from the hand of his enemies—the theocratic conception of an immediate divine interposition.—Ver. 20. Joab refuses the request. His reason is: "because" the king's son is dead." He says: Thou art not a messenger to-day [Eng. A. V.: "thou shalt not bear tidings this day"], because he knew that David, notwithstanding the victory, would be deeply moved by the news of Absalom's death. He did not wish to expose Ahimaaz to the king's anger, and therefore refused to let him carry the tidings.—Ver. 21. He rather committed this task to the Cushite, the Ethiopian slave, whom he had at hand for all sorts of work. The name is gentilic, not the proper name of an Israelite (Sept., Vulg. [Eng. A. V.]). After the manner of a slave, he cast himself down before Joab. Grotrius: "he sent an Ethiopian, thinking it small damage if he received hurt from the king."—Ver. 22 sqq. A remarkably vivid description of the lively conversation between Joab and Ahimaaz. The latter says: "but happen what may† [Eng. A. V.: "however"], let me run" he thought more of the victory than of the death. Joab still refuses, but gives an exacter reason than before. "Why wilt thou run? if thou go, the message is not a reward-bringing one,"‡ not such a one as will bring thee profit (Böttcher). Luther: "thou wilt not carry a good message." Thenius alters the text after the Sept., and renders: "there is to thee no message leading to profit." But according to the explanation given above, there is no need for such insertion and alteration. [Eng. A. V.: "thou hast no tidings ready," but the signification "ready" is not easily gotten from the Hebrew word. Better: "thou hast no tidings sufficient" (Bib. Com.); that is, the Cushite has already carried the news; or, "thou hast no profitable tidings," none that can do any body good. The Syr. is as Erdmann's rendering, the Vulg. as Luther's. See "Text and Gramm."—Tr.]—Ver. 23. In the quick and lively account of the Maurer [so Syr., Chald.,] retains the Kethib (כִּי עָלָה) and renders: "for concerning the king's son as dead (thou wouldest have to carry tidings)." But 1) this addition [of a sentence to the construction] is suspicious, and 2) if מָת [“dead”] belonged to “the king's son” as Adjective, it must have the Article.

‡ לֵךְ אֶתְּ אֶתְּ בְּשֵׁרָה מִצֵּאתָ. לֵךְ אֶתְּ is here permissive Imperative (Böttcher, Thenius): "go thou" — "and if thou go" (as פָּנָה, Ps. viii. 2 [1]). It can be taken (with Preposition) as Pronoun — לָךְ (Gen. xxvii. 37) only where it is conditioned by the word tone (Böttcher), as Num. xxii. 33; 1 Sam. i. 26; Psalm cxli. 8. Here, however, אֶתְּ, not לֵךְ (as — thou), has the tone, for the message was profitable for nobody. Thenius: לֵךְ אֶתְּ מִצֵּאתָ. Hiph. Partic. of מִצֵּאתָ. But the word is Act. Qal. conversation, the phrase "and he said" (easily supplied by the reader) is omitted, as in 1 Sam. i. 20. The repetition of the "and be it as it may" shows Ahimaaz's ardent desire to carry the tidings to David. He went "by the way of the plain,"* the Jordan valley (Gen. xiii. 10-12; xix. 17, 25, 29; Deut. xxxiv. 3; 1 Ki. vii. 47). As "way" has here a local meaning, it cannot be explained as indicating a particular manner of running (Ewald: "he ran in the manner of the Kikkar (plain-) running"). [Erdmann supposes this statement to support the view that the battle was fought on the west of the river; but it has already been pointed out (see note on ver. 6) that it is here intimated that the Cushite did not go by the way of the Jordan valley, which he must have done if he had come from the west to the east side. (Bib. Com. also calls attention to this fact in note on ver. 23.) Assuming that the scene of battle was on the east, the paths of Ahimaaz and the Cushite cannot be described with exactness; but if it was south-west of Mahanaim and near the river, the Cushite may have struck in over the hills, while Ahimaaz took the more level northward route along the river, and then passed in to Mahanaim (so Patrick). See Bib. Comm. in loco.—Tr.] Vers. 24-27. That the two runners are seen by the watchman confirms the view that they both came through the Jordan valley, and so could be seen afar off coming one after the other. The Cushite is seen in the same direction as Ahimaaz, and therefore they could not have come different ways (Thenius).—Ver. 24. David sat between the two gates (that is, in the space between the outer and the inner gate) waiting for tidings. The watchman went up to the roof of the gate on the wall.—That is, the outer gate connected with the city-wall.—Ver. 25. [The watchman reports to the king the approach of a runner.] The king said: If he be alone, there is good tidings† in his mouth.—He has been despatched as a messenger. If the result was bad, several would come as fugitives.—Ver. 26. The watchman, seeing another man running, called out to the gate;‡ "for here, at the farthest possible distance from the outer gate, the king must have taken his position, if he wished also to see the watchman on the flat roof" (Thenius). He also, said the king, brings good tidings—namely, since he comes alone.—Ver. 27. The watchman recognizes Ahimaaz, probably by the swiftness of his running. The king said, He is a good man, whom Joab would not have chosen as the messenger of evil.

† [The word (בִּשְׂרָה) sometimes means good tidings, sometimes bad tidings, sometimes simply tidings; the meaning in any particular case must be decided by the context. Here either "tidings" or "good tidings" would give a proper sense.—Tr.]

‡ Read שַׁעַר "gate" instead of שַׁעֲרָא "porter." [This change of the text (after Sept., Vulg., Syr.) seems hardly necessary. The watchman may have called to the porter, and the porter to the king. The expression "called to (or, towards) the gate" is certainly possible and intelligible, but still strange and unexampled. The fact that the porter is not said to speak to the king makes some difficulty, but not enough to call for a change of text.—Tr.]

Vers. 28-32. The double message.—Ahimaaz called out: Hail! [or, Peace! Eng. A. V. giving the sense: All is well!—Tr.] The brief exclamation corresponds to the haste of the runner, and gives David assurance of victory. It was understood, as a matter of course, that Ahimaaz would report on this point first. "The Lord hath shut up (the ground-meaning of the Verb is to be retained) thy enemies;" that is, the Lord has set bounds to thy enemies in their revolt, has surrounded and embraced them with His power, so that they can no longer stir. So Sept. and Vulg. Comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 46; xxiv. 19; xxvi. 8; Am. i. 6, 9; Ps. xxxi. 9 [8].—Ver. 29. To David's question concerning Absalom, Ahimaaz answers evasively. I saw, says he, the great tumult. —He describes it from personal observation—hence the Article. In the first part of Ahimaaz's answer, Vulg., Luther and Michaelis render: "when the king's servant, Joab, sent me, thy servant;" but "the king's servant" is not the subject of the verbal form (Infinitive), and besides the copula ("and thy servant") renders this translation impossible, unless the text be altered and the copula omitted. "The king's servant" is the Cushite, while Ahimaaz calls himself "thy servant." The subject of the sentence, Joab, stands (as sometimes occurs in such Infinitive-constructions) after the object (so Josh. xiv. 11; Isa. v. 24; xxix. 23; xx. 1; Ezra ix. 8; Ps. lvi. 1 [title]; 2 Chron. xii. 1. Comp. Ges. § 133, 3 Rem). [Dr. Erdmann renders here as Eng. A. V. Perhaps a better text would be: "when Joab sent thy servant;" it is not likely that Ahimaaz would call the Cushite "the king's servant," or mention him at all. See "Text. and Gramm."—Tr.] Ahimaaz is unwilling to give the sad news; but he not only keeps back the truth, but makes the false impression that Absalom's fate was not decided when Joab sent him off.—Ver. 30. Meantime the Cushite has arrived. At David's command Ahimaaz stepped to one side (literally: "turned about"). The Cushite speaks in completely theocratic style: "The Lord hath done thee justice on thy enemies."—Ver. 32 sq. He answers the question about Absalom indirectly, yet so as not only clearly to make known his death, but also to express condemnation of his hostile attempt against his father and king. The Cushite refers to God's punitive justice in Absalom's destruction—a fact that David in this moment of heart-rending grief loses sight of.—Ver. 33 [Heb. xix. 1]. "And the king was shaken" * [Eng. A. V.: "was much moved"]. David's behaviour is so vividly and touchingly portrayed as only an eye-witness could do it. Augustine (cont. Gaud. II. 14): "Absalom afflicted his father more by his death than by his life."

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The religious-moral character of David's disposition of heart is clearly expressed in the Psalms

* Vulg.: contristatus est, "was grieved." [Erdmann gives the Sept. rendering of this word (יָרֵךְ) as ἰσθῆναι (wept), which he rightly characterizes as weak; but though this word is given in the text of Stier and Thiele's Polyglot (an eclectic text), both the Vatican and the Alexandrian texts have the strong and appropriate rendering, ταράχθη, "violently perturbed."—Tr.]

pertaining to this gloomy time, through which the experiences of the royal singer have become the common possession of the theocratic community, and the source of comfort and strength to innumerable pious hearts. While Ps. xli. and lv. belong to the time of the development of Absalom's insurrection, Ps. iii. and iv. are to be referred to the time immediately after David's flight; for the particulars see Ewald, Hengstenberg, Delitzsch, and Moll [in Lange's Bible-Work]. Indeed, the time of day that gives coloring to each Psalm may be determined. They are not, however, both evening-songs, as Hengstenberg holds, who refers them to the evening of the day of flight; but Ps. iii. is a morning-song (J. H. Mich., Ew., Del., Moll), written after that dreadful day and the following night in which Ahithophel would have surprised him, and only Ps. iv. is to be regarded as an evening-song, whether written the day of the flight or the next day. "There is indeed," says Moll on Ps. iii., "no special note of time, and the absence of such note is felt by many expositors to be a difficulty. But they fail to consider that we have here a specifically lyrical-religious effusion, which is not the expression of the feelings of an anxious father (as 2 Sam. xvi. 11), but sets forth the complaint and the confidence of faith of a commander and king (hard-pressed indeed, but cheerful in prayer) in such terse sentences and vigorous words that the reader hears the royal singer sigh, cry, weep from the bottom of his heart." The first strophe of Ps. iii. (the title of which is: "Psalm of David when he fled from Absalom his son"), vers. 2, 3 [1, 2] describes his distress by reason of his numerous enemies, who revile him for his trust in God. In the second strophe, vers. 4, 5 [3, 4] he indicates his ground of hope, namely that God, who has lifted up his head, will help and hear him. In the third strophe, vers. 6, 7 [5, 6] he expresses his confidence of faith, based on the experience of the Lord's protection during the past night, to which this morning bears testimony. The fourth strophe, vers. 8, 9 [7, 8] contains a prayer for deliverance and blessing, growing out of his confidence of faith and his ground of hope.—Ps. iv., as an evening-song, is a cry of the sorely-pressed singer to "his refuge of righteousness," the creator and possessor of righteousness, the judge of unrighteousness, the protector and restorer of persecuted righteousness. Ver. 2 [1] contains (with a reference to already experienced help) a prayer that God would hear him, vers. 9 [8], the confident conviction of its fulfilment. "The pillars of the bridge (vers. 3–8) between distress and deliverance, prayer and confidence, are: 1) God's choice of the singer, and the enemies' opposition to the divine decision; 2) the singer's sincere piety (vers. 4 [3]), the hypocritical and external religiosity of the enemies (see the words of ver. 6 [5]: 'offer the sacrifices of righteousness'); 3) the singer's living trust in God, vers. 7, 8 [6, 7], while the enemies trust in human helps; comp. the 'trust in the Lord,' ver. 6 [5] (Hengstenberg). To these two Psalms we must add Ps. lxxiii. on account of its direct reference to David's stay as fugitive west of the Jordan. The title: "Psalm of David when he was in the wilderness of Judah" is confirmed by the agreement of the expressions, "thirsting in a dry land, without water," with 2 Sam. xvi. 2, 14;

xvii. 20, compared with xv. 23, 28; xvii. 16. The mention of the sanctuary, ver. 3 [2] and the royal office, ver. 12 [11] forces us to refer it to the flight from Absalom, not to the Sauline persecution. The singer, "pining in the wilderness," desires that God may be as near to him (ver. 2 [1]) as He formerly was in the sanctuary, of which he is now, alas! deprived (ver. 3 [2]). His highest good and only comfort is God's grace, which is "better than life," and his communion with God (vers. 2–4 [1–3]), wherein he now even in suffering rejoices (vers. 7–9 [6–8]), having also the joyful hope for the future that the Lord will bless him (vers. 5, 6 [4, 5]) and judge his enemies (vers. 10, 11 [9, 10]), both of these being combined in ver. 12 [11]: "But the king will rejoice in God; every one that sweareth by Him (God) shall glory; for the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped." To the time of distress, when he was on the east of the Jordan, belong Ps. lxi. and lxii. Ps. lxi. expresses first the sorrowful feeling of homelessness, and removal from the sanctuary, whence the psalmist is banished to the "end of the earth" (ver. 3 [2]). All the more earnestly does he pray from afar (vers. 2–5 [1–4]) for deliverance from the evil, which he likens to a steep rock, and which he cannot escape without God's guidance (ver. 3 [2]), appealing to God's former acts of help (ver. 4 [3]), and begging for protection in the "tabernacle" (ver. 5 [4]). In vers. 6–9 [5–8] he states the ground of his confident prayer, referring to the prophetic word that assures him an everlasting dominion, himself affirming this dominion (on the ground of 2 Sam. vii., especially ver. 29), and closing with joyous thanksgiving for the mercy and truth that would defend him. In Ps. lxii. David first affirms his trust in God, and the truth that rest and salvation are in Him alone (vers. 2, 3 [1, 2]). The wickedness of his enemies, who wish to deprive him of his God-given dignity and of his life, drives him to God (vers. 4, 5 [3, 4]). He calls on his soul to seek God only (6–8 [5–7]), and invites all to trust Him (ver. 9 [8]), warning against trust in all else (10, 11 [9, 10]), and giving in conclusion as the ground of all this God's mighty power and love. Vers. 5, 6 [4, 5], referring to attempts of enemies against his dignity and life, touch Ps. iii. and iv., and point to the time of Absalom. Ewald: "From ver. 5 [4] the enemies seem to be slanderous fellow-citizens, who, relying on a newly-established power, attempt to cast the psalmist down to the ground and destroy him, because they cannot bear his spiritual superiority." Closely allied with this Psalm is Ps. xxxix., which is therefore properly referred by several commentators (for example, Delitzsch) to the Absalom time. David first declares that in the presence of the ungodly he was submissively silent, in order that he might avoid sin (vers. 2, 3 a [1, 2 a]). Yet he gave utterance to his burning grief (3 b, 4 [2 b, 3]), and prays to be taught how brief is the measure of his days (5, 6 [4, 5]). The nothingness of human things forbids trust in them, therefore he will wait on the Lord alone (7, 8 [6, 7]). On this is founded next the prayer to be delivered from transgression, and from the reproach of the ungodly (9 [8]). He will not complain, indeed ("for thou, thou hast done it"), but he prays for deliverance, lest he be destroyed (10–12 [9–11]). Since he is only a sojourner and pilgrim, he prays that help may be given him before he departs.—To this time belong also Ps. xlii. and xliii., which together form a whole. The Psalmist is east of the Jordan (xlii. 7 [6]), and sorrowfully recalls the time when at the head of the rejoicing multitude (comp. 2 Sam. vi. 14) he went to the house of the Lord (ver. 5 [4]), lamenting the present desolation of the sanctuary by the enemy, who mock at him as one forsaken by God, in a land far from any holy place. With this is combined desire and hope of sharing in the service of the sanctuary. In both Psalms the enemies are described as internal as in the Absalom psalms. Comp. Ps. xliii. 1: "Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against a people without love [i. e., 'ungodly'—Tr.]; deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man." Thrice in the same words (xlii. 6 [5], 12 [11], xliii. 5) the Psalmist bids his unquiet soul "hope in God." Not from the soul of David, indeed (Hengst., Thol.), but from his own soul does the Korahite psalmist [the title ascribes the song to the Sons of Korah] utter his lamentations and hopes; but the tones of the song are the same as those of the Davidic psalms of this time.—Further, Ps. xxiii., xvi.—xxviii. owe their origin to the outward and inward experiences of the royal singer at this time (Del., Moll.). In all of them the psalmist is far from the sanctuary, and longs to worship God in His house; in all there is the sharp contrast between the oppression of enemies, and trust in God. The refreshing aid of friends, narrated in 2 Sam. xvii. 27 sq., he extols in Ps. xxiii. as the kindness of God, his good shepherd; here we recognize the tones of Pss. iii. 7 [6]; iv. 8 [7]; lxiii.—The enemies, described in Ps. xxvi. are identical in character with the abettors of the insurrection of Absalom. The psalmist appeals to his righteous life, and to the tribunal of God, and prays not to be carried off with sinners, from whom he has ever been separate, and by reason of his love for the sanctuary will still be separate; confidently he looks for help from the Lord, and restoration to the sanctuary.—While this Psalm closes in joyful hope, Ps. xxvii. begins with the expression of happy confidence in God, affirms the hope of victory over enemies, and vows a thank-offering for deliverance to the Lord in His sanctuary.—Ps. xxviii. (in many respects similar to Ps. xxvii.) is a passionate cry in the midst of danger for requital on enemies, and for deliverance for the Lord's Anointed and for His people. It closes with: "the Lord is the saving strength of His Anointed. O help thy people and bless thy heritage, and feed them and bear them up forever."*

2. In these psalms are contained the following truths, valid for all times and relations of the kingdom of God, especially for times of depression and convulsion. The Lord permits such times to come to purify His people, and by sifting to determine who are for Him and who against Him, and for both these classes they contain lessons. The former [God's people] are, as David,

1) in humble penitence to confess that their own sins have helped to bring distress on God's kingdom; 2) to learn, for the strengthening of their faith, that not human power and wisdom, but God's, conduct and further the affairs of His kingdom; 3) to see, for their consolation, that no human power shall long hinder, or even destroy this kingdom, and 4) to recall, for their joy, God's deeds in the past, which He has not performed in vain, and His sure promises, which will not be left unfulfilled.—On the other hand, the enemies of God's kingdom are to reflect that they are only instruments in His hand for chastising His house, that their anti-godly work has its limits in the will and command of the Almighty God, and that they can escape His wrath only by humbly bowing under His hand and giving Him the honor.

3. The faithfulness of human love, strengthening in need and cheering in misfortune, is not only the copy, but also the means and instrument of the faithfulness of the divine love, granted to those that bow humbly beneath God's hand, and wholly trust Him.

4. In the contest for the holy cause of the kingdom of God all those that are called to defend it, must thoroughly combine all the forces that willingly offer themselves, in order to overcome the power of evil. But, with all bravery and all anger against evil, the servant of God must guard against sinful fleshly anger, and bring God's merciful love as near as possible to the authors of the evil, in order to afford them the opportunity and means of conversion, and to save them from destruction. While their evil cause falls under the divine judgment, through human hands, the human hand is not arbitrarily and self-led to be laid on their persons, but to commend them to God, whether they may not be brought to repentance by His long-suffering, by the failure of their wicked undertakings and the exhibition therein given of God's punitive justice.

5. He who (as Joab), self-determined, angry, merely executing strict justice, anticipating God's judgment, sits in judgment on his neighbor and executes judgment on him, himself falls under the divine judgment. Comp. 1 Ki. ii. 28-34.

6. David's lament over Absalom, as a father's lament over his lost son, was not in itself in conflict with his theocratic calling, with all his force, to restore the kingdom of God, on the ground of God's promises to him, against his son, even at the cost of his destruction. Peter Martyr: "in his heart two feelings met, grief for his son and joy in the divine judgment, so that he could say: just art thou, O Lord, thy judgment is right. But these feelings of joy and grief, being contrary to one another, could not have place together in his mind." It is psychologically perfectly natural and ethically unexceptionable to feel grief at the judicial destruction of a human life and soul near and dear to us, as David here for Absalom, and at the same time to give place to anger at the unauthorized intrusion of a violent human hand into the course of divine judgment on a lost man, whose soul might else have been saved. But one may easily sin (as David did) in such justifiable sorrow and anger, by weakly yielding to passionate excitement, and holding merely to the human, so that the eye of the spirit loses sight of the earnestness of the divine justice, which permits unauthorized human intrusion into its plans, in order thus to complete itself, and to secure its ends over all human thoughts and weakly human feelings. Kurtz (Herz. III. 304): "Absalom's sin and shame had two sides: there was in it the curse that David's sin brought on David's house (2 Sam. xii. 10), the misdeed of the fathers, that is visited on the children (Ex. xx. 5),—and not less Absalom's own wickedness and recklessness, which made him the bearer of the family-curse. David looks at Absalom's deed not on the latter side, but on the former (for his own guilt seems to him so great, that he looks little at Absalom's); hence his deep, boundless compassion for his misguided son."—This king's path was full of tears. He wept when he parted from Jonathan and went into banishment; he wept when Saul and Jonathan perished; he wept over the death of the son of Bathsheba begotten in adultery; he wept over the murder of his son Amnon by Absalom; he wept when, a dethroned fugitive, he ascended the Mount of Olives; he mentions the tears that he so often shed on his lonesome bed; he weeps most violently and longest over Absalom's terrible end, since he saw herein the culmination of God's judgments on his house, which he had incurred by his sin. Augustine: "Not in his life does he weep for him, but when he is dead, because all hope of salvation for him was then cut off." But his unrestrained tears, his immoderate grief, as the following narrative shows, obscured his view of the divine judgment, that of necessity came upon Absalom on account of his own reckless wickedness.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. xvii. 24—xviii. 8. The proof of genuine fidelity in troubled times: 1) By willing gifts of love to relieve bodily need; 2) By swift help in battle against an evil foe; 3) By offering our own person to save the dear life of our friend; and 4) By tenderly showing forbearance towards his wounded heart in the conflict against the author of his distress.—God wonderfully helps His people in battling for the interests of His kingdom: 1) By awakening and revealing hidden and faithful love, which consoles and refreshes (xvii. 24–29); 2) By collecting brave soldiers, who shrink not from taking part in the battle (xviii. 1–4); 3) By securing glorious victory even against the apparently superior foe (vers. 5–8).

XVIII. 5–16. Divine righteousness and human compassion towards the adversaries of God's kingdom: 1) Divine righteousness in executing its judgment upon wickedness and the wicked goes its own way, independently of the feelings of human compassion for their purification and rectification. Yet 2) Human compassion is not excluded by thinking of the earnestness of the divine righteousness; but as a daughter of the divine compassion, when engaged in delivering a human life from eternal ruin, it has a right to ask that it may glory against judgment, so far as in the counsel of God patience and long-suffering is still resolved on.

Vers. 9–18. Heaven-wide opposites that cannot be reconciled: 1) God's strict righteousness, when the measure of His holy wrath is full, and human compassion, when the measure of the divine patience and long-suffering is full; 2) Rude exercise of power, which in self-will and recklessness destroys a human life, and tender conscientiousness, which fears to strive against God by attempts upon a human life; 3) The honor, which man in his pride prepares for himself before the world, and the shame, with which God punishes such pride.

Vers. 19–33. Sweet and bitter in the leadings and dispensations of God: 1) From one source—the Lord's wise counsel; 2) For one and the same human heart—in order to humble and exalt it; 3) To a like end—the Lord's glory.

FR. ARNDT: David's victory over Absalom—how it is 1) prepared, 2) gained, and 3) crowned.

Chap. vii. 27–29. SCHLIER: In the fidelity of men David was to recognize the fidelity of the Lord; he was to take courage from the fact that the Lord, who is such a friend, and in the midst of his wretchedness has cared for him, will also care for him still further, and help him out of all his wretchedness. Precisely thus, at the present day also, the Lord our God deals with His children. He leads us into trouble, it is true, but in the midst of trouble He sends us refreshing again.—STARKE: So God knows how to refresh His people in time of need, even through strangers, from whom nothing would have been expected (Psalm xxxiv. 11 [10]; xxxvii. 19).—S. SCHMID: A righteous cause finds everywhere its supporters and defenders.

Chap. xviii. 1 sqq. FR. ARNDT: O when a man first reaches the point that he is lord of his pain, that no longer sorrow rules over him, but he rules over his sorrow, that thoughtfulness, quiet and peace returns into his heart, then he is again in a good way, no more brought to a stand but in progress, and a door is opened for all help and deliverance.—OSLANDER: Though we ought to trust God, yet we ought in so doing to neglect nothing that we have and can fitly use to turn away the evil.—[HENRY: It is no piece of wisdom to be stiff in our resolutions, but to be willing to hear reason, even from our inferiors, and to be overruled by their advice, when it appears to be for our own good. Whether the people's prudence had an eye to it or no, God's providence wisely ordered it that David should not be in the field of battle; for then his tenderness had certainly interposed to save Absalom's life, whom God had determined to destroy.—TR.]

Vers. 4–8: SCHLIER: Easy gained, easy lost. Absalom's example shows that. And to-day also, in great as in small things, how can it be otherwise than according to the saying, Easy gained, easy lost. But another thing we also clearly see from this history: If God is left, we are not forsaken. David held fast to his God, even when the world stormed in upon him from all sides. Let us hold fast to the Lord, let us perseveringly wait for His help. To us also He will at the right time assuredly send help.—[HENRY: Absalom and David . . . each did his utmost, and showed what he could do; how bad it is possible for a child to be to the best of fathers, and how good it is possible for a father to be to the worst of children; as if they were designed to be a resemblance of man's wickedness towards God, and God's mercy toward man, of which it is hard to say which is more amazing.—TR.]

Ver. 9. STARKE: God punishes the disobedience of children to their parents very severely (Prov. xxx. 17; xx. 20; Deut. xxvii. 16).—OSIANDER: Those who are puffed up with the gifts that God has granted them, and misuse them for the ends of arrogance and luxury, are often brought by these very gifts to ruin.—S. SCHMID: A man whom the divine vengeance is pursuing does not escape.—Vers. 14 sqq. S. SCHMID: He must be a very bad man who is not attracted to what is good by the good example of his subordinates.—Ver. 17 sq. CRAMER: As the death of the saints is precious (Psa. cxvi. 15), so on the contrary the death of the ungodly is little esteemed and horrible (Psa. xxxiv. 22).—STARKE: As the memory of the just is blessed (Prov. x. 7), so the memory of the ungodly abides in dishonor and shame.

Vers. 19 sq. STARKE: Joy is always the beginning of sorrow, and good and evil fortunes are in this world always mingled.—HEDINGER [from HALL]: O how welcome deserve those messengers to be that bring us the glad tidings of salvation, that assure us of the foil of all spiritual enemies, and tell us of nothing but victories, and crowns, and kingdoms.—Ver. 28. STARKE: When one has obtained a victory, he should ascribe it to God Himself, and not to human powers (2 Chron. xxv. 8).

Ver. 29. SCHLIER: David knows well how to bring his duty as ruler into harmony with his duty to his family; for he has a kingly heart full of kingly thoughts, and yet has also a faithful fatherly heart, full of love and compassion, and who should not be glad to learn from such a man? We recognize the upright man in the fidelity he shows to both his calling and his kinamen, and he who little esteems the one or the other does not rightly do his duty. [It is not necessary to maintain that David did just right in the matter. Certainly he sometimes erred very greatly; and in this case his parental fondness seems to have overbalanced his sense of duty as a king.—TR.]—Vers. 42 sq. S. SCHMID: Pious parents are justly more anxious for their dissolute children than for the pious and obedient, because they are nearer to ruin.—BERL. BIBLE: God is the true and only source of all parental love and all the compassion which parents maintain even towards their ungodly Absaloms.—[TAYLOR: But the worst ingredient in this cup of anguish would be, I think, the consciousness in David's heart that if he had himself been all he ought to have been, his son might not thus have perished. David now professes, and I believe with truth, to desire that he had died for Absalom; but that was a vain wish. He ought to have lived more for Absalom. He ought, by his own character, to have taught him to love holiness, or, at all events, he ought to have seen that there was nothing in his own conduct to encourage his son in wickedness, or to provoke him to wrath; and then, though Absalom had made shipwreck, he might have had the consolation that he had done his utmost to prevent such a catastrophe.—TR.]

[Ver. 14. The death of Absalom: 1) He has missed his golden opportunity. (He alighted Ahithophel's counsel, and now David has organized a strong army.) 2) He has fought desperately, but in vain (ver. 6). 3) The very objects of his vanity have occasioned his ignominy (riding the royal mule, his long hair). 4) His father's often abused fondness continues to the end, but no longer avails him (xiii. 39; xviii. 5, 11–15, 33). 5) His splendid gifts and reckless ambition have brought him only ruin, and destined him to immortal infamy (vers. 17, 18).—TR.]

[Ver. 33. David mourning over Absalom: 1) Wherein it was right. a) Parental love is indestructible. b) Absalom was not wholly bad, and his faults had been aggravated by the misconduct of others. c) David was conscious that all this was a chastening required by his own sins. 2) Wherein it was wrong. a) In that it excluded gratitude to his faithful and brave followers (xix. 1 sqq.). b) In preventing attention to the pressing duties of his position (xix. 7). c) In causing him to overlook the fact that as long as Absalom lived, the kingdom could have no peace. d) In so far as it was not tempered by submission to the will of Jehovah.—TR.]

The Restoration of David's Royal Authority, which was now Endangered by Dissension between Judah and Israel and by the Insurrection of Sheba.

CHAPTERS XIX.—XX.

I. The Way opened for the Restoration of David's Kingdom by Joab's Reproof of his Immoderate Grief for Absalom. Chap. XIX. 1-8 [Heb. 2-9].

1 AND it was told Joab, Behold, the king weepeth and mourneth for Absalom.
2 And the victory [deliverance]¹ that day was turned into mourning unto all the people; for the people heard say that day how [om. how, ins. :] The king was [is]
3 grieved for his son. And the people gat them by stealth that day into the city, as
4 people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battle. But [And] the king covered² his face, and the king cried with a loud voice, O my son Absalom, O
5 Absalom, my son, my son! And Joab came into the house to the king, and said, Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants, which [who] this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines, in that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest
6 thy friends. For thou hast declared this day that thou regardest neither [not] princes nor [and] servants; for this day I perceive that, if³ Absalom had lived
7 and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well. Now, therefore [And now], arise, go forth, and speak comfortably unto thy servants; for I swear by the Lord [Jehovah], if⁴ thou go not forth, there will not tarry one with thee this night; and⁵ that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that befel [hath befallen]
8 thee from thy youth until now. Then [And] the king arose, and sat in the gate. And they told unto all the people, saying, Behold, the king doth sit in the gate; and all the people came before the king. [Transfer the rest of this verse to the next verse.⁶]

II. David prepares for his Return by Negotiations with the Men of Judah. Vers. 9-14 [Heb. 10-15].

9 For [And] Israel had fled, every man to his tent. And all the people were at strife throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, The king saved us out of the hand of our enemies, and he delivered us out of the hand of the Philistines; and

¹ [Ver. 2. מִשְׁעָרָא, properly "salvation, deliverance," not the idea of a conquering of enemies, but of being saved from them.—T_a.]

² [Ver. 4. Instead of מִלֵּי, Wellhausen would write מִלֵּי as if from מִלֵּי (1 Sam. xxi. 10).—T_a.]

⁵ [Ver. 7. Sept.: "and know thou that," etc., reading probably לֵךְ דַּעַתָּה for דַּעַתָּה לֵךְ; but it had the latter reading also.—Instead of עַד-עֵתָּה some VSS., EDD. and MSS. have עַד-עֵתָּה, which would not, however, alter the translation. The וְ in this case merely carries on the sequence of time up to the limit, and is not to be rendered "even" (as if emphatic), as Eng. A. V. often does.—T_a.]

⁶ [Ver. 8. So Thenius, Wellhausen, Bib.-Com., Erdmann.—T_a.]

- 10 now he is fled out of the land for [from⁷] Absalom. And Absalom, whom we anointed over us, is dead in battle. Now, therefore [And now], why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back⁸?
- 11 And king David sent to Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, saying, Speak unto the elders of Judah, saying, Why are ye [will ye be] the last to bring the king back to his house? seeing the speech of all Israel is come to the king even [om. even] to his house.⁹ Ye are my brethren, ye are my bones [bone] and my flesh; wherefore, then are ye [and why will ye be] the last to bring back the king?
- 13 And say ye to Amasa, Art thou not of [om. of] my bone and of [om. of] my flesh? God do so to me and more also, if thou be not captain of the host before me continually in the room [instead] of Joab. And he bowed [inclined] the heart of all the men of Judah even [om. even] as the the heart of one man; so that [and] they sent this word unto the king, Return thou, and all thy servants.

III. David's Passage over the Jordan under the Escort of the Men of Judah, with Three Incidents.
Vers. 15-40 a [Heb. 16-41 a].

1. Pardoning of Shimei. Vers. 15-23 [Heb. 16-24].

- 15 So [And] the king returned, and came to [ins. the] Jordan. And Judah came to Gilgal, to go¹⁰ to meet the king, to conduct the king over [ins. the] Jordan.
- 16 And¹¹ Shimei, the son of Gera, a [the] Benjamite [Benjaminite], which was of Bahurim, hasted and came down with the men of Judah to meet king David, And there were [om. there were] a thousand men of Benjamin with him, and Ziba the servant of the house of Saul, and his fifteen sons and his twenty servants with him;
- 18 and they went over [ins. the] Jordan before the king. And there went over a ferry-boat [And the ferry-boat went over] to carry over the king's household, and to do what he thought good. And Shimei the son of Gera fell down before the king as he was come over [ins. the] Jordan; And said unto the king, Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou remember [and remember not] that which thy servant did perversely the day that my lord the king went out of Jerusalem, that the king should take it to his heart. For thy servant doth know that I have sinned; therefore [and] behold, I am come the first this day of all the

⁷ [Ver. 9. מֵעַל is rendered by Gesenius: "from on," as conveying the notion that David had been a burden on Absalom; but it also sometimes — "from the presence of," as in Gen. xvii. 22. There is not sufficient ground, therefore, for Böttcher's remark that the phrase is not Hebrew, and should at least be מִפְּנֵי, or for regarding the מֵעַל as the remnant of an original וּמִמְּלִכְתּוֹ, "and from his kingdom" (Sept.), which may be merely a marginal explanation. Syr.: "come now, let us flee from the land from after Absalom," reading מִבְּרִיחַ.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 16 sqq. Wellhausen regards the statement about Ziba as a sort of parenthesis (ver. 18 b being connected with ver. 16), and makes some changes in the text: he omits the ׀ before צָלְחוֹ, and at the beginning of ver. 18 (Heb. 19) reads עָבְרוּ (so Vulg.; Syr. עָבְרוּ), instead of עָבְרָה. The account would then read: "And Shimei, etc., came to meet David, and one thousand Benjaminites with him. And Ziba, etc., pressed (צָלְחוּ) to the Jordan before the king, and crossed (עָבְרוּ) the ford, etc. And Shimei fell down," etc. The reading of Vulg. at beginning of ver. 18: "and they crossed the ford," commends itself as appropriate, for we should not expect the statement about the ferry-boat to be inserted in the middle of the account of Sheba. But there seems to be no good ground for omitting the ׀ before צָלְחוֹ and thus confining this action to Ziba and his party. Shimei (with whom Ziba was) may have managed the arrangements for the transportation of the king's household. Ziba may have assisted; but it is not necessary to suppose that it was out of gratitude for this service that David made the decision in ver. 29 (Heb. 30).—Ta.]

21 house of Joseph to go [come] down to meet my lord the king. But [And] Abishai the son of Zeruiah answered, and said, Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed? And David said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah [ins. ?] that ye should [for ye will] this day be adversaries unto me? [om. ?] shall there any man be put to death this day in Israel? for do I not know that I am this day king over Israel? Therefore [And] the king said unto Shimei, Thou shalt not die. And the king sware unto him.

2. Mephibosheth's Apology. Vers. 24-30 [Heb. 25-31].

24 And Mephibosheth the son of Saul came down to meet the king, and had neither dressed his feet,¹¹ nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day the king departed until the day he came again in peace. And it came to pass, when he was come to [better from] Jerusalem to meet the king, that the king said unto him, Wherefore wentest thou not with me, Mephibosheth? And he answered [said], My lord, O king, my servant deceived me; for thy servant said, I will saddle me an [the] ass, that I may [and] ride thereon, and go to¹² the king, because thy servant is lame. And he hath slandered thy servant unto my lord the king. 27 But my lord the king is as an angel of God; do, therefore, what is good in thine eyes. For, all of my father's house were but dead men before my lord the king; yet didst thou [and thou didst] set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table; what right, therefore, [and what right] have I yet to cry any more unto the king? And the king said unto him, Why speakest thou any more of thy matter? I have said [I say], Thou and Ziba divide the land. And Mephibosheth said unto the king, Yea, let him take all [Let him also take all] forasmuch as [after] my lord the king is come again [om. again] in peace unto his own house.

3. Barzillai's Greeting and Blessing. Vers. 31-40 a [Heb. 32-41 a].

31 And Barzillai the Gileadite came down from Rogelim, and went over [ins. the] Jordan with the king, to conduct him over [ins. the] Jordan.¹³ Now [And] Barzillai was a very aged man, even [om. even] fourscore years old; and he had provided the king of sustenance while he lay¹⁴ at Mahanaim; for he was a very great man. And the king said unto Barzillai, Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live [How many are the days of the years of my life] that I should go up with the king to Jerusalem? I am this day fourscore years old; and [om. and] can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or [and] what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? wherefore then [and why] should thy servant be yet a burden unto my lord the king? 36 Thy servant will go a little way over [ins. the] Jordan¹⁵ with the king; and why 37 should the king recompense it me with such a reward [do me this favor¹⁶]? Let

¹⁵ [Ver. 36. Wellhausen unnecessarily regards the words "the Jordan" as an addition to the text, on the ground that the expression: "I will go a little way over the Jordan," is inappropriate, and that it was clearly not Barzillai's purpose to cross the river. But he may well have desired to do the king the honor of escorting him across the boundary-line, the river, while he would not attach himself to the court by entering Jerusalem.—Ta.]

thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again [return], that I may die in mine own city and be buried [om. and be buried] by the grave of my father and of my mother. But behold thy servant Chimham, let him go over [let thy servant Chimham go over] with my lord the king; and do to him what shall seem good unto thee. And the king answered [said], Chimham shall go over with me, and I will do to him that which shall seem good unto thee; and whatsoever thou shalt require of me, that will I do for thee. And all the people went over [ins. the] Jordan. And when the king was come over, the king kissed Barzillai, and blessed him; and he returned unto his own place. Then [And] the king went on to Gilgal, and Chimham went on with him.

¹⁷ [Ver. 40. The Heb. has "Chimhan," which Böttch (though with scarcely any ground) regards as a Judaised form of the native name "Chimham." There may have been different pronunciations of proper names (there are signs of this elsewhere in the Old Testament), or this different writing may be a scribal inadvertence (the difference is not retained in the ancient versions), proper names being especially liable to corruption.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Vers. 1-8. David's immoderate grief for Absalom stopped by Joab's earnest representations.—Ver. 1. And it was told Joab, comp. xviii. 33. The purpose of the informant, it seems, was to explain to Joab and the army why the king did not come forth to greet his returning victorious warriors. [Joab had apparently just returned from the field of battle.—Tr.]—Vers. 2, 3. Touching description of the impression made on the people by David's violent grief, and their quiet and repressed behaviour. The deliverance that was achieved by the victory changed into mourning for the whole people.—The news spread everywhere ("the people heard that it was said"); "The king mourns for his son." But these men's hearty participation in the sorrow of the beloved king, for whom they had perilled their lives, soon changed to gloomy dissatisfaction at the fact that the king, absorbed in his private grief, did not deign to bestow a look on them. The description of the manner in which the troops, thus dissatisfied, returned to the city, is psychologically very fine. They stole away to enter the city, i. e., not: avoided entering the city (Vulgate, Luther, Mich., Niemeyer), but, instead of entering in military order as a victorious host, scattered and entered individually or in small groups, unobserved, as people steal in that have disgraced themselves by fleeing in battle, as disgraced fugitives. Mourning, therefore, instead of joy of victory, seeming shame instead of honor.—Ver. 4. Continued violent grief of David, who, overmastered by his feelings, forgets what he owes not only to the army, but also to his people and his royal position. "Certainly the army, which had perilled goods and life to win the fugitive king back his kingdom, is very much concerned at his immoderate affliction, and Joab, who was doubtless conscious of having acted with a proper apprehension of the public situation, takes the liberty by an earnest word to remind the king of his governmental duty" (Baumgarten). [The king covered his face, a sign of extreme grief or shame; comp. Isa. liii. 3: "he was as one hiding his face from us." He cried, with a loud voice, according to the open and violent mode of expressing grief common in the East (and so also the heroes of the Iliad); there are striking illustrations of this in the Arabian Nights.—Tr.]—Vers. 5-7. Joab's representations to David, and first, accusatory reproof (vers. 5, 6), which is only partially just (ver. 5). David had certainly, contrary to his duty as king and commander-in-chief of the army, done what Joab reproaches him with in the words: Thou hast to-day shamed the faces of all thy servants,— "Thou hast destroyed the hopes (thy army's of praise, thy nearest friends' of joy)" (Thenius). It behooved the king to give the victorious army a reception in keeping with the victory. Who have saved thy life and the life of all thine, for this they put their lives at stake. [If Absalom had conquered, David and his whole household would probably have been slain, such being the Oriental custom.—Tr.]—But Joab's reproof goes on to what is partially untrue, ver. 6: in that thou lovest them that hate thee, &c. This was true, certainly, for Absalom, who was his father's enemy, was now the object of his father's love; but it was a bitter untruth when Joab added: and hatest them that love thee; David had not deserved such a misapprehension of his heart and disposition, though his conduct had given occasion to it. That leaders and servants are not for thee, that is, not: that they are nothing (worth nothing) to thee (De Wette, Keil), but: are for thee as if they do not exist; Vulg.: "because thou carest not for thy leaders." I perceive to day that, if Absalom lived, and we were all dead to-day, then.—As Absalom, if he had conquered, would certainly have slain with his father all his household also (ver. 5), so, says Joab, if Absalom had lived (as David in his lamentation desired) and he himself (Joab) had been slain in his place, David's whole army would have shared in his destruction. Joab dissects David's words of lamentation with inexorable cruelty, and draws thence with his intellectual acuteness and the grim bitterness of his rude nature consequences that are seemingly logical, yet lay far from David's nature, though his conduct looked like what he was reproached with.—Happily, Joab's speech—which bears the stamp of military rudeness, disappointed ambition, cruel hard-heartedness and bitter resentment, and finds its justification only in the fact that it set aside David's weak grief—softens in the following words (ver. 7), wherein he earnestly presses good counsel on David, and thus deserves well of him and the people. Arise, go forth, tear thyself from the grief in which thou art lost. Speak to the heart of thy servants (Homer's karabipua [comp. Eng. encourage]), in friendly fashion, satisfy and refresh their minds; so the Vulg. (comp. Gen. xxxiv. 3; 1. 21 and many other passages). The meaning is not: "speak of their heart," i. e., their courage = praise them for their bravery (Joab), which is against the usual signification of the words. I swear, if thou go not forth . . . Joab does not threaten that he will lead the army away [Josephus], but he describes the indubitable result of the dissatisfaction in the army: it will not stay. Thus he points out what consequences David's behaviour will have for his throne. Worse than all the evil, Joab rightly says, that would be; for by abandonment to grief he would give up the kingdom that God had a second time bestowed on him. Clericus: "He intimates that the troops would abandon David, who, from silly weakness and foolish love of Absalom, acted as if he were angry with the victorious army, and elect another king."—Ver. 8. The effect of Joab's sharp words was that David shook off his grief, and seated himself in the gate.* The news goes quickly through the people. All the people came before the king, who, in accordance with Joab's counsel, expressed to them his thanks and his kind feeling. Thus was the danger to David's throne from the spirit of disintegration (which, as the succeeding history shows, continued after the victory) set aside by Joab's sharp and bitter word, which David took patiently, because he was obliged to acknowledge its justness.

II. Vers. 9-14. Negotiations for David's return. The last part of ver. 8 must be combined with ver. 9 into one sentence: And when Israel had fled, every man to his tent (comp. xix. 19) all the people strove together in all the tribes of Israel.—It is the other tribes, excepting Judah, that are meant. Among them, after their terrible defeat, the revolutionary excitement had soon passed away, and by this victory, whereby the land was saved from grievous misfortune, men's minds were turned to David, as they recalled his heroic deeds at home and abroad. All the people strove together, reproaching one another with delay in bringing back the king. Why do ye keep quiet about bringing back the king?—The people are reassembled after their dispersion; their representatives consult together zealously about the restoration to the throne, to which they had raised the insurgent Absalom by the act of anointing. They reproach one another for doing nothing to restore the king. In their hearts, therefore, they feel the grievous wrong they have done anointed of the Lord, as is shown indirectly by their words, in which David's great deeds and the misfortunes of the terrible time just past are mentioned; and now they prepare for the deed of solemnly going to meet David, whereby they will declare that their hearts have returned to him in the old love and fidelity.—In ver. 9 after the word "land," the Sept. adds: "and from his kingdom and," meant doubtless as an explanatory statement.—

At the end of ver. 10 [Heb. 11] the Sept., Vulg. (some MSS.) and Syriac have: "and the word of all Israel came to the king," which occurs in the Heb. at the end of ver. 11 [Heb. 12], and is there repeated by the versions [except Syr.—Tr.] only the "to his house" is not added in ver. 10. If these words belonged at the end of ver. 10, they would assign the motive of David's message in ver. 11 (Then., Böttch., Ew.); but we must hold (with Keil) that the difficulty that was found in them in ver. 11 (as an explanatory sentence) occasioned their insertion in ver. 10 as the ground of David's message in ver. 11.—Ver. 11. David sent, not "the two high-priests Zadok and Abiathar to the elders" (Ewald), but a message to these two priests, who had remained in Jerusalem (xv. 27), to say to the elders: Why will ye be the last to bring the king back to his house? The rest of the verse declares that David's message was occasioned by information of the procedures in the other tribes.—Ver. 12. My brethren are ye, my bone and my flesh are ye, that is, my nearest kindred, and the sharers of my name. The backwardness of Judah in the movement to restore David is explained by the fact that the insurrection started in Judah, and Absalom was first recognized as king in Jerusalem. Cornelius a Lapide: "Conscious that they had offended David, and fearing Absalom's garrison in Zion, they did not dare to recall him."—Ver. 13. David sends to Amasa, Absalom's general (xvii. 25), referring to their relationship (1 Chr. ii. 16, 17), and promises him with solemn oath the chief command of the army in place of Joab. Ewald well says that this "was not only a wise and politic act, but strictly considered no injustice to Joab, who, long notorious by his military roughness, had now shown such disobedience to the royal command in the case of Absalom, as could not be pardoned without offence to the king's dignity."—Ver. 14. And he inquired, that is, David (who is the subject in the preceding verse), not Amasa or one of the priests. It is conjectured by Thenius, and regarded as certain by Böttcher, that a passage has fallen out before ver. 14, because otherwise there is no mention of the carrying out of David's instructions and the effect of the promise to Amasa, whereby the change in Judah was produced; but such an insertion is not indicated in any of the ancient versions, and is not required by the connection.—After telling what David did in order to rouse his own tribe in consequence of the information received from the other tribes, the narrative states briefly that his wise procedure was crowned with complete success. He turned to him the heart of all the men of Judah as that of one man. With one accord they answered that they awaited his return, and made arrangements to bring him solemnly back. ["David was sagacious enough to see that to go back to his own people by force had its dangers, and that to wait long for a universal invitation had equal dangers. His own tribe ought to be foremost in welcoming him home, but they had rebelled with Absalom. He resolved at once to reassure them of his favor, and . . . even to make some concession to them.

* [The gate was the place of assembly and business. See Ruth iv. 1, 2; 2 Kings vii. 2; Job xlix. 7.—Tr.]

* [See "Text. and Gram." In any case the words: "to his house" at the end of ver. 11 (Heb. 12) seem out of place.—Tr.]

... This master-stroke of policy and of magnanimity was successful. The hearts of the people melted as one heart. It was the old David of Engedi and Ziklag. They sent a prompt invitation to him" (Knox, David, the King, pp. 377, 378).—Throughout this narrative the tribal feeling, which never wholly disappeared, is apparent; see ver. 12; xx. 4; xvi. 8.—Tr.]

III. Vers. 15–40. David's return over the Jordan under the escort of the men of Judah. Ver. 15. The king returned, namely, from Mahanaim with his army and all his retinue, and came to the Jordan, comp. xvii. 22; what a contrast to his situation when he went over the Jordan as a fugitive! On the other side Judah came to Gilgal, which (lying west of the Jordan-valley, below Jericho) was the rendezvous for the men that were solemnly to conduct David across the river from his position on the eastern bank. Thus is clearly given the scene of the following three incidents of the transit.

Ver. 16. Shimei—of Bahurim, comp. xvi. 5 sq., 1 Kings ii. 8 sq.—“came down” from the mountainous table-land into the Jordan-valley, having joined the men of Judah as they advanced to Gilgal to meet the king.—Ver. 17. The thousand Benjaminites with him (who had, therefore, joined the procession of the Judahites) show the consideration he enjoyed in the tribe of Benjamin, and testified that a change had taken place in the former hostile feeling in this tribe towards David (comp. ver. 21). He brought this large band in order to do greater honor to the king (S. Schmid). Among the Benjaminites, Ziba (who, at David's flight, had acted a part so injurious to Mephibosheth) is specially mentioned, because he, with Shimei, represented the former adherents of Saul's house. He came with his fifteen sons and twenty servants probably with a bad conscience, in order to ward off betimes the effect of Mephibosheth's counter-statements. For Shimei and Ziba, with their attendants, show themselves very quick and eager to come to the king, who was still on the eastern bank of the river; not: “they went over” (Then. [Eng. A. V.]), nor: “came prosperously to” (S. Schmid), but: “they went quickly (pressed)* over the Jordan,” just as they had hastened down into the valley; and they did this in the presence of the king,† who, they meant, should learn their zeal from their haste.—Ver. 18. Meantime, the ferry-boat, appointed to carry over the king's household, was in motion. While this was going on, Shimei fell down before the king, as he (Shimei) was come over the Jordan; the prostration was synchronous‡ with the completion of the transit. David cannot be the subject [of the verb “was come over”], as Keil and Bunsen suppose, for then, either it must read: “as he was purposing to go over,” which is grammatically inadmissible, or: “when he had gone over,” which would not be according to the fact, since the king was still on the left [eastern] bank, and did not cross till after these incidents, comp. vers. 40, 41.—Ver. 19. The iniquity for which Shimei asks pardon is his curse (xvi. 5 sq.); he begs the king not to remember it, to forgive and forget, not to take it into his heart and keep it there (the translation of Keil and De Wette: “that the king should take note of it” is too weak); not to make it the object of memory and thought.—Ver. 20. The ground of his request, namely, the confession: I acknowledge my sin, and the substantial proof of his penitence: I am come the first of the house of Joseph. Böttcher and Thenius, from the reading of the Sept.: “of all Israel and of the house of Joseph,” adopt “of all the house of Israel” as the true text, regarding the “Joseph” as the insertion of a later hand, in the time of the divided kingdom, when Israel and Judah were distinguished from one another. But not only do we find (Keil) in Solomon's time the “house of Joseph” used as equivalent to the “ten tribes” (1 Kings xi. 28), but in Ps. lxxviii. 67, 68 (which belongs to David's time) we have the contrast between the tent of Joseph and the tribe of Ephraim on the one side (as rejected by God), and the tribe of Judah on the other (as chosen by God). “The designation of the tribes opposed to Judah by the name of the principal tribe Joseph (Josh. xvi. 1) is as old as the jealousy of these tribes towards Judah, which did not begin with the division of the kingdom, but was only thereby permanently confirmed” (Keil). [As Shimei was a Benjaminite, it would seem that the “house of Joseph” here is equivalent to “Israel” (the ten tribes). It is commonly supposed that this designation points to the time of the divided kingdom, and thus so far fixes the date of authorship of this passage (unless Böttcher's emendation of text, above-stated, be adopted). Erdmann's examples do not show that the designation was in use earlier than the division of the kingdom; for the Book of Kings belongs to the time of the Exile, and Ps. lxxviii. was probably written after Solomon's time (comp. the tone of ver. 1). Still it is quite possible that, with the old tribal feeling coming down from the time of the Judges (when there was probably a double hegemony of Judah and Ephraim), Shimei may have used this phrase, which, therefore, cannot be held to be perfectly decisive of the date of authorship. Bible-Commentary suggests that he employed it in order to exculpate his own tribe by intimating that it was drawn away by the preponderating influence of the great house of Joseph. Tr.] Whether Shimei's request for forgiveness was a sign of sincere repentance, must be left undetermined; it may be doubted, when one reflects on his precipitation in seeking to be the first to do homage to David, and on the fact that his somewhat passionate cry for mercy coincided exactly with the happy turn in David's fortunes. Certainly he desired, now that David had regained power, to secure his forfeited life and avoid punishment.—Ver. 21. Abishai storms out against Shi-

“in his crossing over” means “during the general fact of crossing,” and may very well here apply to David. While the crossing was going on (the statements of time are quite general and loose) Shimei fell down, etc. For remarks on the arrangement of these verses (15–19) see “Text. and Gram.”—Tr.]

mei (as in xvi. 9), doubting the genuineness of his penitence, and demands his death.—Ver. 22. David refuses, as in xvi. 10 sq. Though Abishai (in Joab's name also, for David addresses the "sons of Zeruiah") rightly characterizes Shimei's offence as cursing the "Lord's Anointed," for which he deserved death (Ex. xxii. 27; Lev. xxiv. 14 sq.; 2 Kings xxi. 10), David will this day not employ the rigor of the law. "Ye will be to me an adversary," literally, a satan (so Numb. xxii. 22, comp. Matt. xvi. 23), not a "peace-destructor" (Bunsen), or "tempter" (Ewald). He says: "you will be a hindrance to me in the way of joy that I go to-day." Clericus: "to injure me by your ill-timed severity." He lays stress on the to-day. "Should any one be put to death to-day in Israel? for, do I not know that to-day I am become king over Israel?" David will show mercy, not because he is now become king and has the right to pardon, but because he sees in his restoration to his kingdom a proof of restoration to the divine favor, and by showing favor to Shimei as his right will fulfil the obligation of gratitude to the Lord.—Ver. 23. David's oath to spare Shimei shows that his mercy was occasioned by his present experience of the divine mercy. But his injunction to Solomon (1 Kings ii. 8 sq.) to punish Shimei for his reviling contradicts this promise. This contradiction is not removed by saying that Shimei was not promised immunity in the following reign (Hess), nor by the observation that he was a dangerous man capable of repeating under Solomon what he had done under David. David now pardoned Shimei, chiefly, no doubt, for political reasons, in order not to disturb the favorable feeling of the people, especially of Benjamin.*

2. Vers. 24-30. Mephibosheth's apology.—Ver. 24. Comp. ix. 6. He "came down" from Jerusalem to the Jordan. His feet and his beard he had not made; the word make [= "dress"] (Deut. xxi. 12) is so used in German also [comp. similar use of do in English.—Tr.]. The addition of the Sept.: "nor cut his nails," is merely explanatory (Bunsen), and is not to be put into the text. He had not washed his feet or dressed his beard†—thus he had mourled for David; in these signs of deep grief comp. Ezek. xxiv. 17. This was a sign of his sincere, faithful attachment to the house of David, not a sign (Buns., Ewald) that his hopes had not been fulfilled in connection with the new government [Absalom's].—Ver. 25. As now Jerusalem came to meet the king.—Jerusalem here stands for its inhabitants or their representatives; this is often the case, and the expression here cannot be called "strange." The rendering of the Arabic: "and when he came from Jerusalem" introduces a repetition, Mephibosheth's coming having been already stated [ver.

24]; it is therefore the less warrantable (with Thenius) to change the text on the sole authority of this version. The translation: "when Mephibosheth came to Jerusalem to meet the king" (Sept., Luther, Michaelis, Maur.) contradicts the "came down" of ver. 24, and the whole connection from which it appears that during this conversation David was still at the Jordan. [This rendering of Erdmann's is improbable, 1) because it has already been stated that Judah had come to meet the king (ver. 15), and 2) because it does not appear why the coming of the Jerusalemites should be the occasion of David's addressing Mephibosheth.—The rendering "to Jerusalem" (as in Eng. A. V.) would change the scene abruptly and without connection. It is easier to read "from Jerusalem," which makes good sense, and agrees with the context. It is not a mere repetition of the "came down" of ver. 24, since the fact is here added that he came from Jerusalem. It may be, however, that, while he set out and came down to meet the king, the meeting did not actually occur till the latter had advanced on his march as far as Jerusalem.—Tr.]—David's question: Why wentest thou not with me? presupposes the impression made on him by Ziba's words (xvi. 3), and also contains a reproof.—Ver. 26. Mephibosheth's answer: my servant deceived me, injured me by lies, deceived me (Böttcher); this is the common meaning of the word (Gen. xxix. 25; Josh. ix. 22; 1 Sam. xix. 17; xxviii. 12; 1 Chr. xii. 17). The ground of this assertion: For thy servant (= I) said (not "thought," as most expositors render, for it appears from what follows that Mephibosheth had given an order that Ziba did not execute), I will have the ass saddled and ride thereon and go to the king.—Certainly the lame prince could not have thought of going himself to saddle the ass, an objection that Thenius urges against the text as he renders it: "and I thought, I will saddle me the ass." He then adopts the text of the ancient versions (except Chaldee): "Thy servant had said to him: saddle me the ass." But this change of text is unnecessary; the renderings of the versions are merely explanations. How often in all languages the expression "to do a thing" = "to have it done" (this very verb is so used in Gen. xxii. 3)! To refuse to translate: "I will cause to be saddled" is merely to make a difficulty where none exists. The phrase: "I said: I will" characterizes the circumstantialness of the narrative. [According to Mephibosheth's statement, then, Ziba, instead of obeying his master's order, had carried off animals and provisions, and used them in his own interests.—Tr.]—Ver. 27. And he slandered thy servant.—No sentence has fallen out before these words, explaining (Böttcher) how Mephibosheth was deceived by his servant. "It is already involved in the word 'deceived' that Ziba had not obeyed the order" (Thenius). Mephibosheth had heard of Ziba's slander (xvi. 3), and found it confirmed by the execution of David's order that all the property should belong to Ziba. David's reproachful question was a new confirmation of what he already knew. There is no trace here of "a confused way of defending himself" (Bunsen); his curt, summary mode of expression is explained by his excitement and by the situation of David who, occupied with his transit and the solemn escort of the people, had no time to listen to a long narrative. Mephibosheth's statements were sufficient to establish his innocence, and to show how Ziba had deceived and slandered him.—My lord the king is as the angel of God (comp. xiv. 17) to know what is truth and right.—Ver. 28. Mephibosheth refers to David's former kindness and commits to him his fate, remarking that, though innocent, he could not rightfully demand anything, since he was a member of Saul's house, all of whom were "only dead men for the king," that is, all, himself included, might have been slain; being thus without rights, he could not complain or ask for help against the wrong done him.

* [David's charge to Solomon (1 Kings ii. 8, 9) is defended as the act of a prudent ruler, or as that of a righteous theocratic judge; but on neither ground can it be seen why he should break his promise. Perhaps, if we knew the circumstances more fully, there would be some explanation; at present we can only say that David's conduct was wrong, like many other acts of his.—Tr.]

Ver. 29. And the king said to him: Why speakest thou further of thy affairs?—This means: there is no need of further excuse on thy part (Thenius), but also expresses displeasure at Ziba, whose deception David now saw through. Wrongly Bunsen: "David saw through the complainant [Mephibosheth], and, wishing him well, made no further investigation." David is convinced of Mephibosheth's innocence. But the words: I say (= I decide) thou and Ziba shall divide the land, are only a half-exculpation of the poor, innocent man. For they do not "in any case" (Buns.) contain the confirmation of his first arrangement (ix. 7-10) and the retraction of his hasty decision in xvi. 4, as if he meant to say: Everything remains as I ordered at first (Then.). The statement is simply: Divide the land between you, that is, Ziba and his sons (to whom David in xvi. 4 gives all) are now to possess a part of the property; neither is the decision of chap. xvi. 4 entirely set aside, nor that of chap. ix. 7-10, whereby Mephibosheth was made sole possessor, re-established. Thenius thinks that the original arrangement (ix. 7-10) is here restored, "in so far, namely, as Ziba and his sons had of course lived on the produce of the estate;" but a servant's being maintained from the produce of the estate is a different thing from his being part-owner. David now sees the error of his decision in xvi. 4, and wishes publicly to recognize Mephibosheth's innocence, but not factually and expressly to acknowledge his own over-haste by completely revoking that decision; and so open wrong is done Mephibosheth, who gets only a part of the estate. David was herein probably controlled by political considerations, being unwilling to make the respectable and influential Ziba his enemy. That Ziba does not attempt to rebut Mephibosheth's statements proves his own guilt and the innocence of the latter.—Ver. 30. He said to the king: Let him take all also.—Cornelius a Lapide: "Mephibosheth seems to have said this, not from desire to insult David and murmur against God, but in the bitterness of his heart." The words express, not necessarily indeed resentment, but still Mephibosheth's feeling that wrong had been done him; at the same time he indicates that he is not concerned about property, but that his heart rather goes out to his king, who will show him again his former kindness. Let Ziba have all the land, I am only glad that my lord the king is come again in peace to his own house; as his guest, I do not need the land for my support. Mephibosheth could not more touchingly and unselfishly express his faithfulness to David. [David's feeling and motive in this procedure are not clear. If he thought Mephibosheth innocent, he was unjust towards him; if he thought the whole affair too uncertain to permit an absolute decision, he can hardly be defended against the charge of carelessness and precipitancy in making a decision. Perhaps he suspected the prince's fidelity, but thought it not worth while to push the investigation; he was tired of intrigues and conflicts. Opinions differ as to Mephibosheth's innocence, but the tone of his defence, the silence of Ziba, and the absence in the narrative (xv.-xviii.) of any hint of defection on his part, concur with his lameness in inclining us to absolve him from the charge of actual or intended rebellion.—TR.]

3. Vers. 31-40. Barzillai's greeting and blessing.—Ver. 31. Barzillai (see xvii. 27) "came down" from the high region in which Rogelim in Gilead lay. Went with David over the Jordan—anticipatory statement of what did not take place till ver. 39, after the following conversation. To conduct him defines the statement in ver. 39; he intended to go with him only to the other side of the river, and then return.—Ver. 32. And he provided (xvii. 27-29) for the king during his long stay, abode† in Mahanaim. He was a "very great" man, that is, rich, well thought of (Ex. xi. 3; Lev. xix. 15).—Ver. 33. The king said, Thou come over with me. The word "thou" is by its position emphatic, the king being chiefly concerned to take him along. That I may provide for thee.—The "provide" here answers to that in ver. 32. David wished to requite his kindness.—Ver. 34. With modest thanks Barzillai declines the king's invitation: 1) referring to the shortness of his remaining life. "How many days have I to live?" my life is too short to go to court. 2) Referring to his senile weakness, which unfitted him for court-life. Eighty years old, he says, he is intellectually too dull to be useful as a counsellor in distinguishing between good and evil. (For similar constructions see Lev. xxvii. 12; Jon. iv. 11; 1 Ki. iii. 9; Ezek. xlv. 23; Gen. xxvi. 28; Isaiah lix. 2).—But also his bodily senses, he says (taste and hearing), are too weak to enjoy the pleasures of court-life; 3) he objects that, being such a weak old man, he would be only a burden to the king.—Ver. 36. "For a short while," for

* This is the meaning of אֶת־בָּרְזַלַּי. If this Kethib be retained, אֶת is to be taken as sign of Acc. of space with an exacter definition by בָּ. So Gen. (Then.): "that he might accompany him in crossing the river; the words אֶת־בָּרְזַלַּי designate the bed of the Jordan, and אֶת denotes the Acc. of place or space after a verb of going." So Maurer: "that he might accompany him בָּ (i. e. אֶת־בָּרְזַלַּי) — בָּרְזַלַּי (accusative) בָּרְזַלַּי (accusative), and Böttcher: אֶת־ — "id quod, to conduct him what (the piece of way) was in the Jordan (but not farther)." It does not appear how this explanation leads to the absurd statement (Then.) that the octogenarian Barzillai "went in the Jordan alongside of the ferry-boat," for the אֶת־בָּרְזַלַּי — "the in the Jordan," denotes the space that makes the breadth of the Jordan. The Qeri אֶת־בָּרְזַלַּי is adopted by Thenius, who appeals to the Sept., Chald., and Arabic (holding that the Keth. comes from miswriting בָּ for אֶת), and renders: "to escort him the Jordan" [Acc.]; this gives the same sense, but is an attempt to lighten the certainly difficult Kethib.

the present moment, will thy servant go over Jordan with the king; his purpose, he says, was merely to escort the king across the river, as appears from the context, vers. 32, 37. The "short while" does not refer to the time he would have had to spend at court. [The word may also be rendered, as in Eng. A. V., "a little way."—Tr.] "Why will the king requite me this requital or kindness?" namely, with reference to Barzillai's maintenance of the king (ver. 32).—Ver. 37. As the king might have commanded him to go with him, he requests permission to return home. He is done with life, and wishes to die by the grave of his father and mother. F. W. KRUMMACHER: "Can any thing be more amiable than these simple and sensible words? What a cheerful and peaceful spirit they breathe on us!"—But in his stead he offers the king his son Chimham (1 Kings ii. 7), not to ask a favor for him, but to put him into his service. The Syr., Arab. and Josephus add "my son" after "Chimham," which is a proper explanation, but not to be adopted into the text. In ver. 41 the name is written Chimhan—comp. Jer. xli. 17. [Jer. xli. 17 mentions a geruth or sojourning-place of Chemoham or or Chimham. Stanley (Jewish Church, II. 201) thinks that this was a caravanserai (it was on the south of Bethlehem) for travellers to Egypt, and the same in which Joseph and Mary found shelter (Luke ii. 7). The connection between the names is, however, not certain.—Tr.]—Ver. 38. David receives Chimham, and promises Barzillai further to do all that he desires. "I will do whatever thou shalt choose [require] of (literally, upon) me," where the upon expresses David's sense of obligation. He does not here regard Barzillai as a suppliant for a favor. So Clericus. Comp. Judg. xix. 20.—Ver. 39. Not till after this conversation does the passage across the river take place; why it must have occurred during the conversation (Then., Keil) does not appear from the context; and the space of transit was not great enough for the length of the talk. It is not merely "almost" (Thenius), but, from the fresh and individual touches of the picture, quite certain that this is the account of one who himself heard the conversation. And when the king was come over, he kissed Barzillai.—That is, took leave of him, comp. Ruth i. 9. This shows that Barzillai merely intended to accompany the king over the Jordan, and not further.—Ver. 40. The king went on to Gilgal, a noted place in the history of Israel, and specially fitted by its position to be a rendezvous for large bodies of men; comp. Josh. iv. 19; v. 1-12; ix. 6; x. 6; xiv. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 16; x. 3; xi. 14, 15; xiii. 7-9.—And Chimham went on with him.—Ewald's remark that "this account of Barzillai is given at so great length obviously because his son Chimham and his family were afterwards renowned in Jerusalem," impairs the inherent significance of this episode (taken in connection with xvii. 27-29) in David's life, which displays in the most vivid and beautiful way the unchangeable fidelity of this noble and influential Gileadite land-owner, as a representative of the transjordanic region, and the grateful love and devotion of the hard-proved but now once more highly favored king, who in Barzillai's love and faithfulness saw a proof of the divine grace and truth.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Right and wrong are remarkably mingled in the conduct of David and Joab, and in the affair between them immediately after Absalom's death. While the father's grief for the lost son was altogether justifiable, the king by the immoderateness of his sorrow neglected his duty towards his people, through whom God had given him the victory; by his passionate grief, also, he disturbed the clearness of his mental view, and lamed his manly strength; and finally, absorbed in his loss, forgot to thank the Lord that He had avenged the honor of His name by the restoration of the theocratic kingdom to the well-being of the whole people; the whole kingdom of God in Israel, as the bearer and instrument of which he was chosen and called for the present and the future, disappears for him in the gloomy depth of grief, wherein he had buried himself with his feelings and thoughts.—F. W. Krummacher: "It is a reproach to him that he subordinated his kingly consciousness too much to his feelings as head of a family. In view of the general weal, he ought at least to have moderated his grief, given thanks to the Lord, and made acknowledgment of the faithful devotion of his brave soldiers." Over against this wrong Joab is altogether right in reminding the king of the danger of such a course, and reproving him with severe words. But the savage and bitter manner in which he approaches the king (though it was God's means of averting a great evil from David and the nation) is to be condemned. His undisciplined word became a means of discipline to David, and the king turned from the destructive path into which unbridled feeling had led him.

2. David's situation after his splendid victory was, in spite of the change of popular feeling in Israel, a critical one, on account of the hesitation of Judah, the most powerful tribe, and the real historical foundation of the theocratic kingdom, as it was founded in David. For the sins of its bearer, God had before men's eyes permitted this kingly structure, reared by His hand, to fall, in order to show that human sin must obstruct and ruin His cause, but to make manifest at the same time, that the maintenance of His kingdom is not dependent on human power and wisdom. The point now was the restoration of the ethical foundations of the theocratic kingdom, which were destroyed by the revolution first in the tribe of Judah, where the revolution began; this tribe must be brought back to its faithful obedience to David, its defection having been punished by the divine judgment on Absalom. Recognizing this, David showed discretion and wisdom in his negotiations with the elders, which had the desired result. He saw through the grounds of action of the other tribes, and perceived how dangerous it might be, if his own tribe Judah, his home and support, should be, as it were, conquered by the others, especially as the insurrection had found powerful aid among them. He therefore approached Judah with mildness. But he went beyond ordinary bounds in appointing the general of the insurrection, Amasa, his commander-in-chief in place of Joab, who had won him the victory. This act of political shrewdness, brought back Judah to him as one man. Peter Martyr: "I would not altogether defend David in this, but I regard it as an arrangement of divine providence, which purposed through Amasa to turn Judah to David."

3. When Shimei meets David with confession of his fault, Abishai is the same hot-blooded zealot for David's royal honor as in xvi. 9, and is repulsed now, as then. He (with Joab, who was like him in character) is a type of fleshly zeal, as it is seen in the "Sons of Thunder," who would call down fire from heaven on the Samaritans. But, in contrast with the law which, regarding reviling the king as reviling God, punishes it with death, David, by sparing the reviler passes out of the sphere of the Old Testament into that of the New Testament. The decision as to Shimei's sincerity he leaves to God, but, in view of the Lord's pardoning mercy and goodness to himself, is led by the Spirit of the Lord to accept Shimei's actual confession, and pardon him. Thus he is the type of the merciful love of the New Testament kingdom of heaven in Christ, which blots out all guilt of sin on condition of true repentance; and he is also the type of forgiving love of enemies. He who has himself received forgiveness of sin from God, and can only praise God's mercy as the source of all that he is and has, will also forgive his neighbor his sins. The antitype of the forgiving David is the king of the New Testament kingdom of God. Matt. xviii. 23-25. David had accorded Shimei mercy by an oath, without reservation and without limitation to his own reign, as some hold against the sense of his words. His command to Solomon shortly before his death, to execute Shimei, is a falling back to the strictly legal standpoint, above which he had lifted himself here on the Jordan, and can be explained only from the fact that David distinguished between his own personal interest and motive, which led him to pardon Shimei, without taking the theocratic-legal standpoint, and the theocratic interests of the kingdom, of which Solomon was the representative, and so held himself bound on theocratic-political grounds, to commit to his successor the execution of the legal prescription, which he himself had passed over.

4. Half-way reparation of a hastily committed, and afterwards recognized wrong (as in David's conduct to Ziba and Meph. (bth) is as great an injustice as complete negation. While he pardons the criminal Shimei, he gives the innocent Mephibosheth only half his rights, and the other half he gives to the unrepentant slanderer Ziba, without a word of reproof, evidently in order to avoid making enemies of Ziba's not unimportant family in Benjamin. Peter Martyr: "David's acts are not only unjust, but self-contradictory; there he pardons a wicked man, here he oppresses a good man. Yet, though he sins so often, he does not abandon his faith; he is a weak man, but holds on to God's word."—Mephibosheth is an illustration of humility patiently bearing wrong. Peter Martyr: "Mephibosheth thought perhaps, of the word of the law, that God visits sins on children to the third and fourth generation."

Chap. xix. 1-8. The sinfulness of unmeasured grief. I. Wherein it consists and manifests itself.

1) As regards the Lord, in ignoring the gracious gifts which He sends us along with and amid our sufferings, and in frustrating His gracious design to purify us by suffering from all selfishness; 2) As regards our neighbor, in alighting and violating the duties of love that we owe him; 3) As regards our own heart and conscience, in reckoning the powers of spirit and will by exhausting emotion and enervating inactivity. II. How it must be overcome: 1) Through the word of earnest admonition, which gives pain; 2) By energetically rising up to new life and faithful discharge of the duties of our calling; 3) By accepting the consolation and strength which come from above through the Spirit of God.

Vers. 9-15. What wins for a king his people's heart? 1) Risking his life for their welfare in fighting against external foes; 2) Deeds of deliverance in the overthrow of internal foes; 3) Timely words of hearty, reconciling love, which anticipates and makes advances.

Vers. 16-40. The righteousness of love, showing itself in the fact that after the divine ordinance and after the example of divine righteousness it gives to every one his own: 1) As forgiving love, pardon to the enemy who confesses his wrong and begs forgiveness, vers. 16 sqq.; 2) As rebuking love, earnest admonition to the unloving zealot, vers. 21 sq.; 3) As self-denying love, which makes good the wrong done to our neighbor, and unreservedly restores him what belongs to him, vers. 24 sqq.; 4) As thankful love, ready every moment to requite to our neighbor by word and deed the benefits he has done us, vers. 31 sqq.

Barzillai the picture and example of a venerable and pious old age: 1) Blessed of God, it devotes the temporal goods it has received to the service of compassionate brotherly love, far from all avarice; 2) Honored by men, it desires not the vain honor of this world, far from all ambition; 3) Near the grave, it longs only for home, far from all disposition to find blessedness in this life; 4) But as long as God grants life, even with failing powers it still serves the Lord and His kingdom, and in this service honors him by the devotion even of its dearest—far from all self-seeking.—[SAURIN has a good sermon on Barzillai and Chimham, as suggesting and illustrating the fact that court life is in certain respects proper for the young and improper for the aged.—TR.]

FR. ARNDT: Vers. 9-40. How David crowns his triumph, and prepares for himself a new and delightful future. 1) By forgiveness of the evil that has been shown him, and 2) By thankfulness for the good that he had likewise received.

Vers. 1-8. When once a man has overcome his feelings of grief and gives himself up to fresh activity, then the struggle is soon over, the evil is wholly conquered, the fountain of suffering is thoroughly stopped, the sting of suffering broken; reconciled with past and present, there arises to us for the future a new life.—OSLANDER: God often so mingles joy and sorrow together, that the pious have in this world no complete joy, in order that they may the more earnestly long after things eternal. Psa. xlii. 3 [2].—SCHLIER: Let us never forget modesty, but always with genuine respect say what is necessary. Yet when we do that, let us also freely utter the truth, and never keep back through fear of men or men-pleasing.—WUERT. B.: When men do wrong and are overhasty, we should indeed reprove them, but not unseasonably, nor with bitterness, envy, reviling, and too great violence. Psa. cxli. 5.—S. SCHMID: A man of sense must bear a slight evil in order that a greater may be averted.—SCHLIER: How many sore and bitter experiences we might spare ourselves, if we always made it our first wisdom to let ourselves be advised.

Vers. 9-14. [TAYLOR: David had been called to the throne at first by the choice of the people, as well as by the designation of Jehovah, and he would not move in the direction of resuming his regal dignity until, in some form or other, the desire of the tribes had been indicated to him.—TR.]—WUERT. BIBLE: Men do not commonly recognize the good while they possess it, but only afterwards, when they have lost it and would like to have it again.—[HENRY: Good services done to the public, though they may be forgotten for a while, yet will be remembered again when men come to their right minds.—TR.]—It is always better to be too gentle than too sharp; for a good word finds a good place, and gentleness wins hearts. Judg. viii. 3; xii. 3.—SCHLIER: Let us also remember our sins and more and more humble ourselves, then we shall also be mild and gentle toward friend and foe, and so receive the blessing promised to all the merciful.—BERL. B.: For such a God, whose goodness is as infinite as His power, it is not so hard to win hearts; He knows the true secret of winning them in the right way; because He knows how to touch them inwardly. Thus hast Thou, O love, inclined the heart of all believers as if it were only one man.

Vers. 15-23. [TAYLOR: In all this procedure David was not actuated by his usual sagacity; and the result of his apparent preference of Judah over the other tribes not only provoked another rebellion after his return to Jerusalem, but also prepared the way for the division of the kingdom, which took place in the days of his grandson, Rehoboam.—TR.]—There is no true forgiveness till the thought of the offences is wholly effaced from the heart. Psa. xxv. 7.—STARKE: By honest confession and earnest repentance one may obtain mercy and forgiveness from men, how much more from the merciful

God. James iv. 9, 19.—SCHLIER: God's mercy should open our hearts, should make us gentle and mild toward others; for the Lord's sake who has forgiven us, we should also forgive others.—BERL. B.: God cannot suffer such men as under the appearance of righteousness oppose His mercy.—[HENRY: David had severely revenged the abuses done to his ambassadors by the Ammonites (xii. 31), but easily passes by the abuse done to himself by an Israelite. That was an affront to Israel in general, and touched the honor of his crown and kingdom; this was purely personal, and therefore (according to the usual disposition of good men) he could the more easily forgive it.—SCOTT: Our best friends must be considered as adversaries, when they would persuade us to act contrary to our conscience and our duty. Matt. xvi. 21-23.—TR.]

Vers. 24-30. STARKE: For reviling and slander the first and chief occasion is given by selfishness and envy.—God does not let the truth remain always defeated, but causes it at the proper time to come to light.—SCHLIER: When a man does us good, we should remember him for it, and if sometimes wrong is done us, we will quickly forget the wrong, but the good that has befallen us we will not forget. A thankful man is sure to come to honor, even if in the meanwhile evil times do occasionally intervene; while ingratitude always comes to shame.—[Ver. 29. TAYLOR: Every one knows that when he has been entrapped into the doing of an ungenerous or unjust thing, there springs up in him an irritation at himself, which is apt to betray itself in hastiness of speech and manner quite similar to that here manifested by David. But both the temper and the decision were unworthy of David.—TR.]

Vers. 31-40. STARKE: Our gratitude to our neighbor should be shown not only by words, but also by the most devoted affection of the heart, and by actions themselves.—BERL. B.: That is an honorable old age, which dies to the lusts and vanities of the world, seeks peace and quiet, earnestly thinks of the end and prepares for death.—OSLANDER: If we cannot requite our benefactors in their life-time for their good deeds, we should at any rate make their posterity enjoy it.

[Vers. 7, 8. In a time of overwhelming calamity the necessity of exertion is often a great blessing.—Vers. 16, 17. The safety of popular institutions is in them.—Vers. 16, 17. Among the sore trials of high station is the necessity of bearing with men who are grossly unworthy, but manage to command influence.—TR.]

IV. Strife between Judah and Israel over bringing David back. Chap. XIX. 40 b-43.
[Heb. 41 b-44.]

40 AND all the people of Judah conducted¹ the king [ins. over] and also half the 41 people of Israel; And behold, all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto the king, Why have our brethren the men of Judah stolen thee away, and have brought the king, and his household, and all David's men with him, over 42 Jordan? And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us [is near to me]; wherefore then be ye [and why art thou] angry for this matter? have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us 43 any gift? And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We [I] have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye [and also in David? I have more than thou]; why then did ye despise us [and why hast thou despised me], that our [my] advice should not be [was not] first had in bringing back our [my] king? And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.

V. Sheba's insurrection and Israel's defection occasioned by this strife between Judah and Israel. Both quelled by Joab after his murder of Amasa. Chap. XX. 1-22.

1 AND there happened to be there a man of Belial [a wicked man], whose [and his] name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite [Benjaminite]. And he blew a [the] trumpet, and said, We have no part in David, neither have we [and we 2 have] no inheritance in the son of Jesse; every man to his tents,⁴ O Israel. So every man [And all the men] of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri; but the men of Judah clave unto their king, from Jordan 3 even [om. even] to Jerusalem. And David came to his house at Jerusalem; and the king took the ten women his concubines, whom he had left to keep the house, and put them in ward, and fed [maintained] them, but went not in unto them; so [and] they were shut up unto the day of their death, living in widowhood [in lifelong widowhood⁵].

¹ [Ver. 40. Eng. A. V. here adopts the Qeri, so Erdmann, Vulg. This reading is supported by Sept., Syr., Arab., Chald., and by a number of Heb. MSS. and printed editions.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 42. Böttcher and Erdmann: "has anything been taken by us?" The rendering of Eng. A. V. is that of the ancient versions, Gesen., Philippson, Cahen. In defence of it may be said that נָטַף occurs elsewhere as Piel (1 Kings ix. 11), and that the parallelism does not absolutely demand the Infin. Absol. in the second member. On the other hand, Böttcher's rendering of לֵךְ as introducing the agent is strange.—Ta.]

- 4 Then said the king [And the king said] to Amasa, Assemble me the men of Judah within three days,* and be thou here present. So [And] Amasa went to assemble the men of [om. the men of] Judah; but he tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him. And David said to Abishai, Now shall [will] Sheba the son of Bichri do us more harm than did Absalom; take thou⁶ thy lord's servants, and pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities, and escape us. And there went out after him Joab's men, and the Cherethites and the Pelethites and all the mighty men; and they went out of Jerusalem, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri. When they were at the great stone which is in Gibeon, Amasa went before them [came towards them]. And Joab's garment that he had put on was girded unto him [And⁸ Joab was girded with his military dress as his garment], and upon it a girdle with [of] a sword fastened upon his loins in the sheath thereof [its sheath], and as he¹⁰ went forth, it fell out. And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him. But [And] Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand; so [and] he smote him therewith in the fifth rib [into the belly], and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died. So [And] Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri. And one of Joab's men [young men] stood by him, and said, He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab. And Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway. And when [om. when] the man saw that all the people stood still, [ins. and] he removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still [or, because every one that came on him saw and stood still]. When he was removed out of the highway, all the people [every man] went on after Joab to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri. And he went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel and to Beth-maachah and all the Berites;¹¹ and they were gathered together, and went also after him.
- 15 And they came and besieged him in Abel of Beth-maachah [Abel-beth-maachah], and they cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench [at the outer wall]; and all the people that were with Joab battered¹² the wall to throw it

* [Ver. 4. Before "three days" Wellh. thinks 1 ("and") necessary, since the עֶכָר is defined by this term of days. But as Amasa is ordered to present himself immediately after assembling the troops, the time assigned to this assembling will of course apply also to his coming, so that the insertion of "and" is unnecessary.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 8. Erdmann: "and it ((i. e., the sheath) came out, and it (the sword) fell." But this change of subject is harsh, and it is better to read חֲדָר וְהָאֵלֶּיךָ: "it (the sword) came out (of the sheath) and fell." The Eng. A. V., referring the coming out to Joab, makes no sense. We may see also how appropriately the word בְּתֵקֶרָה "in its sheath" stands at the end of the sentence, just before the statement that the sword fell out of the sheath.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 15. Literally: "were rasing (or, casting down) to make the wall fall," a strange expression. Hence

16 down. Then cried a wise woman out of the city, Hear, hear; say, I pray you, unto 17 Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee. And when he was come [And he came] near unto her, [ins. and] the woman said, Art thou Joab? And he answered [said] I am he. Then [And] she said unto him, Hear the words of 18 thine handmaid. And¹² he answered [said], I do hear. Then she spake [And she said], saying, They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely [Let 19 them] ask counsel at Abel; and so they ended the matter. I am one of them that are peaceable and faithful in Israel; thou seekest to destroy a city and a mother 20 [a mother-city] in Israel; why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the Lord [Jehovah]? And Joab answered and said, Far be it, far be it, from me, that I 21 should swallow up or destroy. The matter is not so; but a man of Mount Eph-raim, Sheba the son of Bichri by name, hath lifted up his hand against the king, even [om. even] against David; deliver him only, and I will depart from the city.
 And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee over 22 [through] the wall. Then [And] the woman went unto all the people in her wisdom. And they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab.
 And he blew a [the] trumpet, and they retired [dispersed] from the city, every man to his tent [tents]. And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.

VI. David's chief officers after the restoration of his royal authority. Vers. 23-26.

23 Now [And] Joab was over all the host of Israel; and Benaiah the son of Jehoi-24 ada was over the Cherethites and over the Pelethites; And Adoram was over the 25 tribute; and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder; And Sheva was scribe; 26 and Zadok and Abiathar were the [om. the] priests; And Ira also the Jairite was a chief ruler¹⁴ about [to] David.

Ewald, Böttcher, Thenius and Erdmann make the participle a denominative from שָׁחַת "a pit," and render:
 "were digging ditches to throw down the wall." But the form is elsewhere unknown (and none of the ancient versions suggest it here), and the military practice thus described is doubtful. As the text stands the word hardly yields a fair sense. But Chald. renders כְּתִישְׁתִּין "were thinking, purposing," which agrees with the Sept. ἔπεισαν, and perhaps represents the Heb. כְּתִישְׁתִּין (Wellh.); "the people were devising to throw down the wall."—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 18. The Sept. is the only ancient version that offers material for alteration of the text of the woman's speech, and this is discussed by Erdmann. Chald. paraphrases: "And she said, saying, Remember now what is written in the book of the law to ask of the peace of a city (Walton's Polygl.: to ask of a city) in the beginning, saying, was it in this wise thy duty to ask of Abel, whether they are peaceable? We are peaceable, in fidelity with Israel, etc.;" on this interpretation see further in notes to the Exposition. Syr.: "The woman said, They used to say of old time that they asked the prophets, and then they destroyed; am I to make satisfaction for the sins of Israel, that thou desirest to slay the child and his mother in Israel?" where the misreadings (דָּמָה) for אָמַל and נָעַר (עֵיר) are obvious. These versions (and the Vulg.) confirm the Heb. text, which, with all its difficulties, seems preferable to the Sept. variation adopted by Ewald and Wellhausen.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 41-43. Strife between Judah and Israel about bringing David back.

Ver. 41 [40 b, Heb. 41 b]. The text (י) would be rendered: "and as to the whole people of Judah, they had conducted," etc. (Keil). But this would be a strange and heavy construction, and the Qeri or margin is preferable ["and . . . Judah conducted," as in Eng. A. V.]. This last clause is to be connected with the following verse (Thenius): "and when all the people of Judah had conducted the king, and also half the people of Israel, behold, then came all the men of Israel," etc. Besides Judah, half the people of Israel also acted as David's escort over the Jordan. This part of Israel consisted first of the thousand Benjaminites that had come with Shimei, and then of others living near by, especially, it is probable, from the east-jordanic district (S. Schmid). The passage over the Jordan was completed, and David (as appears from the connection) with his escort had reached Gilgal (Bunsen), when there, not "at the Jordan" (Then., Ew.), "all the men of Israel," that is, the body of deputized representatives of the other tribes (Clericus) arrived and made their complaint to David: Why have our brethren the men of Judah stolen thee away? escorted thee over so secretly, without informing us of their purpose? By directing this question to David, they at the same time reproached him, for "very probably it had been learned that he had a hand in the movement, see vers. 11, 12" (Then.). "All David's men" are the faithful followers that had fled with him from Jerusalem (xv. 17 sqq.). In all this we see, on the one hand, the discord between the main divisions of the nation, Judah and Israel, and on the other the eager rivalry in the exhibition of devotion to the king, which, however, contained in itself the seeds of further disorder.

Grotius: "an honorable contest—but, heated by bitter words, it afforded opportunity to those that desired revolution. 'Honorable indeed,' says Tacitus, 'but the source of the worst things' (Annal. I.)."—Ver. 42. Not David, but the representatives of the tribe of Judah answered the reproach. Literally: "the men of Judah answered against (Böttcher) the men of Israel," they met them with an answer.—There is no need to insert (Thenius, after Sept., Syr., Arab.) "and said" after the word "Israel," as in ver. 43; Böttcher remarks that the "and said" is omitted also in 1 Sam. ix. 17; xx. 28.—Because the king is nearer to me (not: "the king is near to me"); the "because" is the answer to the "why?" of ver. 41. Near = near of kin, comp. v. 1. Why art thou angry? there is no ground for it. [The Singular Pronoun here used (Eng. A. V. substitutes the Plural) perhaps refers to the individual speaker, who represented the nation or tribe, or the nation or tribe may be regarded as a unit.—Tr.]—Have we eaten of the king? To eat of the king = to be fed by the royal bounty (Clericus). Have we enjoyed advantages from him? Have you reason to be envious of us because we have enjoyed advantages that you were deprived of? Whether this is also a side-hit at the Benjaminites (Mich., Then., Buns., Keil), who enjoyed many favors from Saul (comp. 1 Sam. xxii. 7), must be left undecided; nothing of this sort is indicated in the words or the connection. "Or, has anything been taken by us?" not: "has he given us any gift?"* [so Eng. A. V., whose rendering is defended in "Text. and Gram."—Tr.].—Ver. 43. The men of Israel's answer to this hot discourse of the Judahites is still hotter. Over against the latter's qualitative relation to David ("he is nearer to us") they set the numerical quantitative: Ten parts have I in the king, and also in David more than thou.—The "ten parts" are the ten tribes as against the two, "Judah and Benjamin" (Theodoret); "the tribe of Benjamin might already after the removal of the royal residence to Jerusalem have attached itself more to Judah, as indeed it now came a thousand strong with Judah, and afterwards with this tribe formed the Judah-kingdom, 1 Kings xii. 21" (Thenius). Add to this that Jerusalem was within the tribe of Benjamin just on the border of Judah. The king belonged to the whole nation, and therefore Israel, with its ten tribes, had a ten-fold part in and claim on the king.—And also in David more than thou.—The above general statement is here specialized and individualized in respect to the person of David. The men of Israel had indeed "deserved very ill of him." But this cannot be urged against the genuineness of the reading: "in David" (Then.), for the men of Judah had behaved still worse, since the insurrection originated among them. But Israel's claim to superiority to Judah in having ten parts "also in David" "does not refer to the fact that the insurrection began in Judah" (O. v. Gerlach), for they (Israel) had straightway joined the rebellion. The words are to be taken simply in closest connection with the previous numerical statement in reference to the king. The sense is: in the kingdom of Israel you have no claim to a nearer relation to the king, who is put there for all the tribes, and to whom as king all the tribes stand equally near, so that we, with our ten, have a ten-fold claim on him. As this is true of every king, so also of David. Seb. Schmid: "David is here considered not as of the tribe of Judah, but as king. But now we have ten parts in the king, therefore also in David as king, and so your argument from consanguinity is worthless." This hair-splitting calculation and passionate assertion of the mere numerical relation to David is psychologically quite characteristic of the ill feeling towards Judah that prevailed in Israel. Instead of "and also in David more than thou," Böttcher and Thenius adopt the reading of the Sept.: "and I am first-born* (more) than thou." But this reading is suspicious at the outset, because the Sept. has also the reading of the Heb. text. Then Thenius' explanation of the term "first-born" from the tribes of Reuben and Simeon, whose ancestors were born before Judah, does not apply to the other tribes, whose stem-fathers were born after Judah; and to understand the term as meaning at the same time (Thenius) that "Israel after Saul's death had held to his dynasty and continued the national name," seems very far-fetched.—Why hast thou despised me?—The men of Israel felt that they had been made little of in that they had not been informed of the restoration and permitted to take part in it. In contrast with the solidarity of the revolutionary movement, which had united both sections, they here emphasize the jointness of the desire for and return to the old fealty.—And was not my word the first to bring back my king? Literally: "and was not my word first to me to bring back my king?" On Israel's "word," comp. xix. 10, 11. The "to me" is not to be attached (Keil) against the accents (and against the order of the words) to "bring back" [= "bring back to me"], but is apposition to "my word," to emphasize the possessive pronoun "my" (Ges., § 121, 3), and to bring out strongly the thought that Israel had first spoken of and counselled the king's restoration.—Judah's reply to Israel's words was still harder, more violent, than they. A violent war of words flamed up, wherein Israel, as feeling itself the aggrieved party, was led to a new, evil purpose, which shaped itself into a repetition of the rebellion just crushed. Comp. a Lapid: "This scene paved the way to Sheba's war. Learn from this proud quarrel of Judah and Israel how true is the proverb in Prov. xv. 1."

* לָקַח is not Piel, and לָקַחְתִּי Pl. Particp. ("hath he given us a gift?"), for the Pl. is elsewhere לָקַחְתִּי, and this construction would require לָקַחְתִּי. And though לָקַחְתִּי = "to help one with gifts" (1 Kings ix. 11), our phrase does not therefore mean "to give to one" (Böttcher). Rather we have here the Perf. Niph. with Absol. Infin. (fem., as verbs לָקַחְתִּי, Ewald § 240 d), corresponding to לָקַחְתִּי. Literally: "has anything been as to taking taken by us?"—has any thing at all been taken by us?

of the tribes; the word "there" indicates directly the place, indirectly the time of the following history, so that the causal connection between it and the preceding scene is obvious. On the person of Sheba, Luther remarks (probably correctly) in his marginal notes: "he was one of the great rogues of the high nobility, who had a large retinue among the people, and consideration or name, as Catiline at Rome."* He was a "wicked" man (Luther: heilloser [Eng. A. V. wrongly: "son of Belial"]), comp. I Sam. xxv. 17, 25. A Ben-jaminite, probably (to judge from his conduct) one of the rabid Sauline party, if he were not (as is possible) of Saul's own family—We have no part in David.—This is said in contrast with xix. 42, 43, and with a sharp emphasis on the "no" ["there is not to us part in David"]. David is called the son of Jesse contemptuously in contrast with Saul. "We have nothing in common with him, nothing to do with him," comp. Deut. x. 9. From his blowing the trumpet it may be surmised that he was a military commander, having control of a somewhat large body of men.—Every man to his tents, that is, home, as in xviii. 17; xix. 9. The expression is an echo from the tent-life of the people in the wilderness.—Ver. 2. All Israel "went up" from David, namely, from the plain of Gilgal to the hill-country of Ephraim. The whole representation of Israel listens to Sheba's rebellious signal, and follows him, which is to be explained only by the anger against Judah, freshly excited by the quarrel over bringing the king back. The men of Judah "clave to their king," crowded close around him [rather, faithfully adhered to him—Tr.] and escorted him "from the Jordan to Jerusalem." The expression: "from the Jordan" does not contradict the fact that the assembly took place in Gilgal (as Thenius holds from this, that it took place on the Jordan); it is not to be explained (with Keil against Thenius) by the remark that the "Judahites" had already escorted the king over the Jordan, but (Gilgal being near the Jordan) is to be taken as a general designation, such as we often use in respect to rivers.

Ver. 3. David's return to his house at Jerusalem. The ten concubines (xv. 16; xvi. 20 sqq.) that he had left behind—he put in a house of ward, and maintained them, but remained apart from them.† Grotius: "He pardoned their fear indeed [i. e., their fault committed through fear], but would not approach them, since they were impure for him (having been approached by his son), nor let others approach them, as they were royal concubines." They lived in "widowhood of life,"‡ that is, "whereas death had entered the house, widowhood during the lifetime of the husband." (Böttch.), comp. Deut. xxiv. 1 sqq.; Isa. i. 1. [So Targum, Gill, Philippon. It may also be rendered: "in a lifelong widowhood," i. e., as long as they lived; but the objection to this is, that it repeats the statement of the preceding clause.—Tr.]—Ver. 4. And the king said to Amasa, Call me, etc., namely, to follow and attack the insurgent Sheba. In giving Amasa this commission, David's purpose is to fulfil to him his promise, xix. 14. And do thou present thyself here, after three days, when the men of Judah shall have assembled, that thou mayest lead them out to battle. Then David intended formally to appoint him commander-in-chief, and assign him the more important duties. In various respects David here acted unwisely: 1) in bestowing on the late insurgent leader, Amasa an unbounded confidence, that was soon proved to be misplaced, vers. 5, 6; 2) in respect to Joab who, with all his rudeness and cruelty, had remained faithful to David, and by his splendid victory over Amasa, had saved the kingdom; 3) in respect to his faithful tribe of Judah, who must have been offended by this preference shown for the leader of the revolution. [On the other hand, the insurgent Judahites might be pleased by this honor done their general (comp. xix. 14), and the men of Israel affected by seeing their former general in David's service (Patrick); Amasa had probably shown himself an efficient commander, and Joab was not undeserving of punishment.—Tr.]

—Ver. 5. He tarried* over the set time, (three days), either because he met with distrust and opposition among the people, and could not so soon execute his commission, or because he did not wish to make haste, and nourished in his breast traitorous designs, [or, possibly, because of natural lack of vigor.—Tr.].—Ver. 6. And David said to Abishai. Instead of "Abishai," Thenius (after Syr. and Josephus) would read "Joab," since from the present text we cannot account for the appearance of Joab in ver. 8, (he is previously not mentioned—only his people mentioned in ver. 7); the "men of Joab" would certainly not have marched out, unless Joab had had the supreme command. He takes the original reading (after the Sept.) in ver. 7 to be: "and there marched out after him Abishai and the men of Joab," and thinks that from this, "Abishai" got into ver. 6 instead of "Joab," while in ver. 7 the word "Abishai" fell out from its likeness to the following word (שָׂמַי). Against which Böttcher rightly says that the Syriac and Josephus here made an arbitrary change in the Hebrew, and put "Joab" instead of Abishai, because they thought (from what follows) that the former ought to be named here. "How," asks Böttcher, "if Joab had originally stood in the text, could Abishai have been accidentally or purposely written for it, since the two names are very different, and Abishai is not mentioned till ver. 10?" Rather in the Sept. (Cod. Vat.) the Abishai might have gotten from ver. 6 (beginning) into ver. 7 (beginning); indeed its insertion is evidently due to the exception that was taken to the omission of his name in ver. 7 while in ver. 6 he is entrusted with the command. To get rid of the difficulties, Böttcher proposes to read in ver. 6: "And David said to Joab: behold, the three days are past, shall we wait for Amasa? now will Sheba, etc." (Sept. Vat. reading: "and David said to Amasa"). But this adoption of a variation of the Sept. (which clearly came from a misunderstanding), and the supposed omission of a whole line by the error of a transcriber is artificial and untrustworthy. There remains nothing but to retain the masoretic text (which is confirmed by all the Versions except the Syriac): "and David said to Abishai." Joab was still David's official commander-in-chief, though the latter had unwisely promised the command to Amasa; the sending of Amasa to collect the troops was indeed occasioned by that promise; but Joab was not yet deprived of the command. But David speaks to Abishai about Amasa's delay and not to Joab, because he wished to have nothing to do with the latter on account of his crabbedness, and further knew that he would take Amasa's appointment ill. David expresses the apprehension: Now will Sheba . . . become more hurtful (dangerous) than Absalom, the revolution will become more widespread and powerful than before, unless we march immediately against Sheba. Take thou thy Lord's servants, the troops with the king in Jerusalem, the standing army (the particular parts of which are mentioned in ver. 7), in distinction from the levy of the people, for which Amasa was sent. And pursue after him, for, as Sheba had gotten a good start in these three days, everything depended on quickly overtaking him. Lest he get him fenced cities,—this he fears has already happened (as the form of the Hebrew verb* shows). And turn away our eye; the verb (לָשׁוּ) means "to take away" (Gen. xxi. 9, 16; Ps. cxix. 43; 1 Sam. xxx. 22; Hos. ii. 11), "lest he take away our view," deceive us (Maurer); Vulg.; "and escape us" [so Eng. A. V.]; Gesen. and De Wette: "that he may not escape our eye by throwing himself with his followers into fortified cities" (as actually happened, ver. 15). Maurer well compares the similar expression: "to steal one's heart (mind)," i. e., to deceive him, Gen. xxxi. 20; 2 Sam. xv. 6. Ewald translates: "lest he trouble our eye," deriving the verb from a stem † = "to be shaded" (Neh. xiii. 19, comp. Ezek. xxxi. 3), that is, lest he cause us care and vexation; so also Bunsen, and so already the Sept.; "Lest he darken (shade) our eyes." Certainly this translation gives too weak a sense (Then.). But, with this derivation of the verb, the meaning might still be: "that he darken not our sight," hiding himself from us in fortified cities, so that our sight of his hostile preparations is obscured, and we cannot clearly follow and overcome him.—Böttcher, Thenius and Keil, referring to Deut. xxxii. 10; Zech. ii. 10, where the "apple of the eye" is the figure of valuable possession, render: "and pluck out our eye," i. e., severely injure us; but it is the eye, not the apple of the eye, that is here spoken of, nor is there anything here that is compared to the apple of the eye, since the "fortified cities" could not be so meant.—Ver. 7. "After him," that is, after Abishai. The men of Joab—his immediate military followers, under his special control. Yet they were not the less "David's servants." This view is favored by the expression: "Joab's people." If the phrase were intended to indicate a body of men "that Joab in this emergency had collected at his own costs, and with whom as volunteers he himself as volunteer intended to go into this war" (Ewald), this fact would necessarily have been mentioned in the narrative. The Cherethites and Pelethites, the royal body-guard (see on viii. 18), whom "the necessity of the case now brought out" (Ewald). The Gibeonites [mighty men] are the six hundred heroes, (xv. 8) who with the body-guard accompanied David when he fled from Absalom. These two bodies together with the "men of Joab" formed the only troops now at the king's disposal, whom he calls "the servants of thy lord" (ver. 6). As the case required the greatest haste (ver. 6), he ordered Abishai to follow Sheba for the present with those troops (Ew.). The words "out of Jerusalem" are added because of the local statement that follows.—Ver. 8. When they came to the great stone of Gibeon—which was doubtless an isolated rock of considerable size. Gibeon lay northwest of Jerusalem in the mountains of Ephraim, whither Sheba (ver. 2) had gone. Amasa came towards them, literally "before their face" (De Wette). He was (ver. 4) to have proclaimed the arriere-ban [summoned the people to war] in Judah. Here he is found in the tribe of Benjamin. As he meets the troops advancing to the northwest, he must be coming from the opposite direction, as we should expect from David's order. The cause of his delay thus was that he had gone northward from Judah into Benjamin. Coming thence on his way to Jerusalem (ver. 4) with the troops he had raised, he meets these others at "the great stone in Gibeon." Here Joab, before mentioned, suddenly comes on the scene. As David had not deprived him of the command, we must suppose that he was advancing with the permanent force under Abishai to the field, where Amasa's retarded levies were to join him. Joab regarded himself as still commander-in-chief, and, that Amasa might not attain this honor, he put him out of the way (ver. 10) by murder. It is not to be assumed that David (ver. 6) had ordered Abishai to march out with Joab, and that this is not mentioned for brevity's sake (Keil), nor that David had given Joab the command (omitted in this compendious account) to go along to the field.—The minute description of Joab's military dress and arms is intended to make it clear how the latter could suddenly kill Amasa without any one's noticing his purpose. "And Joab was girded with his military coat as his clothing," and on it the girdle of the sword, which was fastened on his loins in its sheath; and this [the sheath] came out, and it [the sword] fell down." The girdle is expressly mentioned in order to show how the sword did not depend from it as usual, but, with its sheath, was thrust in and held by it (Thenius). "And it (referring to the preceding "sheath") came out" of the girdle, as if accidentally in consequence of a movement, "and it (the sword) fell to the ground"; so Maurer, Böttcher. Mich., Dathe, Schulz render: "he brought (Hiphil) it (the sword) out, so that it fell"; but this, inasmuch as it is supported by no ancient version, is arbitrary. To render "and he (Joab) went forth" (De Wette, Keil [Eng. A. V., Philippon, Bib.-Com.]) is against the connection, since it does not appear whence Joab went forth. [A slight change in the Hebrew, making pronoun and verb feminine (after Sept., and substantially Vulg.) will give: "and it (the sword) came out and fell down," which is much simpler and more natural.—Tr.]—Ver. 9. Joab performed this manipulation with the sword just before he met Amasa, making such a movement that the sword should fall, as it were accidentally, to the ground, and he could take it up in his left hand, so as with the right hand to lay hold of Amasa's beard in friendly greeting. No surprise would be felt, therefore, at his holding the sword in his left hand, with which he had taken it up from the ground. From the friendly address: Art thou in health, my brother? Amasa would all the less suspect anything evil, since he was Joab's rival. The grasping the beard with the right hand is not for the purpose of kissing the beard* (Winer, Art. Bart.), but is a caressing gesture, like an embrace, intended to draw down the face to kiss it [so Eng. A. V., to kiss him]. So Amasa could suspect no evil. ["My brother"—he was his first cousin, 1 Chr. iii. 16, 17 (Bib.-Com.).—Tr.]—Ver. 10. And Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's (left) hand. The murder of Amasa by Joab was, therefore, a cleverly contrived and malicious act, the product of jealousy and desire of revenge. "Thus this rude soldier's friendship and repose was merely a pretence, that he might take his revenge at the first opportunity" (Ewald). "He did it not the second time," did not repeat the blow; his stroke was mortal! [He stabbed him in the belly (not "in the fifth rib," as in Eng. A. V.), so that his bowels came out.—Tr.]. With the same violence that he had shown in the murder, Joab, with his brother Abishai, now rushes after Sheba, without bestowing a moment's notice on Amasa struggling in the agonies of death. The words: Joab and Abishai his brother, from the connection favor the view that Joab had gone out at the head (together with Abishai) of the body of troops under Abishai.—Ver. 11. One of Joab's henchmen remained by (לְ) Amasa; no doubt at Joab's command, in order to send Amasa's levies on to Joab and Abishai with the cry: "He that hath pleasure in Joab, etc."; pleasure: Joab, used to victory, doubtless inspired more confidence. "And he that is for David"—this refers to the defection from David into which Amasa had led the people, [and is intended to identify Joab's cause with David's.—Tr.].—Ver. 12 sqq. How vivid and touching the picture here of Amasa wallowing in his blood on the road, the advancing crowd of people stopping by him, his consequent hasty removal from the road, and the throwing a cloth over him to hide him from the sight of the passers-by, and so to prevent their stopping, and avoid the possible unfavorable impression for Joab and his cause that the sight of the body would make on the people! [Nobody knew the cause of his death, in the hurry there was no time to inquire, the danger from Sheba was imminent, and so the crowd passed on without investigating the matter.—Tr.]—Ver. 13. Only now, it is expressly stated, do the people follow on after Joab without delay. "Every man (or, all the men) went on." As it is clear from the context that these are Amasa's levies out of Israel, it is not necessary (with Then., after Sept.) to insert "of Israel" after "all the men."—Ver. 14. "And he went through." This refers to Joab, who now, as general-in-chief of the army, rushed through all the tribes of Israel northward from Ephraim (Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali), Sheba flying before him and first reaching a strong position in the extreme north. [Others (Patrick, Wellhausen) think that Sheba is here the subject, and this is favored by the fact that the "him" in ver. 15 (and so in ver. 14, end) which refers to Sheba, seems to represent the same person as the subject of the verb "went through;" moreover this verb would naturally refer to the person last mentioned in ver. 13.—Tr.] To Abel and Beth-Maachah.—Abel, in the north of Naphtali, very near Beth-Maachah, the two being near and west of Iyon [Iyyon] and Dan (1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Kings xv. 29); in 2 Chron. xvi. 4 it is called Abel-mayim, from the neighboring lake Merom on the south, or, more probably, from the well-watered Merj Ayun, the present village Abil el Kamh, i. e., Wheat-meadow. On account of its proximity to Beth-Maachah, it is often combined with this = Abel-Beth-Maachah, ver. 15; 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Kings xv. 29; but the "and" here connecting the two names is not for that reason to be stricken out (Ewald, Thenius). By the addition "Beth-Maachah" and Mayim (2 Chron. xvi. 4) it is distinguished from several other places of this name [Abel], which signifies "meadow." If the word Berim (בְּרִים) indicates a region of country [Eng. A. V.: Berites] it must be connected with the preceding verb: and he went through all Berim, though then the absence of the preposition [in the Heb., as in Eng. A. V.], and still more, this appended statement of place after it has been mentioned to what point Joab went, would be surprising. But no such region is known in northern Palestine, nor any similar name of a place. We are therefore justified in supposing a corruption of the text. A suggestion for an emendation of the text is given by the Sept.: "to Beth-Maachah, and all in Charri [this suggests the Heb. bachurim, "choice, chosen young men"], and they were gathered together," etc.; and by the Vulg.: "and all the chosen men were assembled to him." Clericus remarks that this looks as if they read "chosen" (הַבְּחֹרִים), but declines to express a judgment in the matter. We must probably read: * "and all kinds of arms-bearing men" (Then., Winer, s. v., Habbarim), or: "and all the (there residing) young men" (Ew., Böttch.). Böttcher thinks it probable (but without sufficient ground) that we should add: "who were in the cities." We may render then (changing to Perfect the following verb): "and all the young men were gathered together," † etc., or (keeping the form in the text): "and all the young men, and (as an additional fact) they were gathered together and went also after him," i. e., in his march through all the tribes to Abel and Beth-Maachah. That is, the young men as far as the extreme north gathered about him; the "also" refers to the statement in ver. 13 that "every man went on after Joab," that is, all that had assembled in Ephraim at Gibeon [ver. 8]; to these were added all the young men in the other tribes. Thereby the victory was already decided for Joab.

* לְבָשׁוֹ "his clothing" is descriptive addition to מָדוֹ "his military garment" over which he had put the sword-girdle. It is unnecessary (with Then., after Sept. and Vulg.) to point קוֹנָה "girded" instead of קָנָה "girdle."

Ver. 15 sqq. Sheba besieged.—Sheba had found refuge in Abel † Beth-Maachah—a strongly fortified place, which, as fortress, served by the quantity of water about it, also as a protection towards the north and east. In this city they besieged him.—He had therefore thrown himself into it. It cannot be gathered from the connection that the inhabitants (who could have done nothing against his sudden seizure of the city) took part with Sheba against David; we may rather infer from the procedure of the "wise woman" that they were opposed to the insurgent. They threw up an embankment against the city; and it (the embankment) stood—that is, rose at [= joined on to] the wall of the outer works of the fortress, the outer wall (Sept. πορευξισματα [the pomerium, or open space without the wall, in which the embankment was placed in order the more easily to batter the city-walls.—Tr.]). The rest of ver. 15 is to be taken as protasis, the apodosis beginning with ver. 16: "And as all the people, etc., then cried a wise woman." The usual rendering: "as they destroyed, in order to throw down the wall" [so Eng. A. V.] involves a contradiction; for if they destroyed, what was left to be thrown down? and this verb (שָׁחַת) is used (Ezek. xxvi. 4) of the complete tearing down of walls (Then.). Also in ver. 20 Joab says: "Far be it from me to destroy." It is better with Ewald and Böttcher ‡ to take the Participle as a denominative (from שָׁחַת, "a pit, ditch"), and render: "they dug ditches to throw down the wall," by undermining. Josephus: "he ordered them to undermine the walls." Then cried a wise woman (comp. xiv. 2 sq.; 1 Sam. xxv. 3 sq.) from the city.—This expression gives a sufficiently vivid picture of the situation, and there is no need (with Thénius) to change the text after Syr. and Arab.: "down from the wall of the city," and Sept.: "from the wall," where the differences of wording show these renderings to be explanatory local descriptions.—Ver. 18 sqq. The woman's words to Joab are variously explained. Maurer (after Dathe: "inquiry ought first, said she, to have been made of Abel, and then it ought to have been decided what is to be done") renders: "and she said: it should first have been said: 'let the city be consulted; so they would have finished the matter.'" So also De Wette: "one should first have said: one must inquire in Abel, and so the end would have been reached." But this is too artificial an expression for the situation. The same remark is to be made of Böttcher's translation: "And she said, as if she would say: One should first, however, speak, speak, as if she would say: 'One should ask, ask in Abel; and so the matter would be finished,'" that is, the woman protested against Joab's violent procedure without previous negotiation. Certainly such a protest is to be supposed in the woman's words. But these are to be translated (with Thénius) simply after the text as follows: "They used to say in old time: let Abel be inquired of; and so they ended (the matter)." Vulg.*: "It was said in the old proverb: those that ask, ask in Abel; and so they finished." Sept.: "It was formerly said, They shall ask in Abel, and so they left off." The sense is: It was formerly a proverbial saying: "inquire at Abel," and if the decision there made was acted on, the affair was satisfactorily concluded; so now, the inhabitants of Abel ought first to have been communicated with, instead of straightway investing and besieging the city; then your design respecting Sheba would have been accomplished. It is assumed and affirmed that Abel was proverbial for the discretion and wisdom of its inhabitants. This wisdom the "wise woman" illustrates factually by her discourse. It is to be noted also that the negotiation before laying siege to a city (and a foreign city, indeed) such as the woman here refers to, is prescribed in the law, Deut. xx. 10 sqq., comp. Num. xxi. 21.—Some codices of the Sept. read: "It was formerly said, It was asked in Abel and in Dan if they left off what the faithful of Israel established," after which Ewald † adopts as original text: "Let it be asked in Abel and in Dan, whether what the devout men of

† Instead of the Kethib ויקהל we are to read the Qeri ויקהלו (Sept., Vulg., Chald.). If, instead of changing this to Perfect ויקהלו, we keep the Impf. ויקהלו, the † must be regarded as adding a new statement, as in Gen. xlii. 24; 1 Sam. xxv. 27 (Böttcher).

‡ On the ה-בַּחֲרִי Böttcher remarks: "where the relation remains purely local (which is not the case in ver. 18), the adverbial ה- in innumerable cases remains with the Preposition in names of cities."

§ Böttcher: שָׁחַת may easily, along with its proper Hiph., have had a denominative Hiph. from שָׁחַת, —

"to make ditches;" comp. הִפְרִים, proper Hiphil of פָּרַס, and also denominative from פָּרַסָה — "to cleave the hoof," and הִשְׁבִּיר, Hiph. of שָׁבַר and denom. from שָׁבַר, — "to sell grain." Israel formerly ordained has there gone out of use" [that is, if, when a new custom comes up, one wishes to find out whether old Israelitish usage exists anywhere, he must go to Abel and Dan; the implication being that Joab is violating old custom.—Tr.] But Keil rightly remarks that this addition of the Sept. ("what the devout men," etc.), which is critically of so little value that Tisch. in his edition of the Sept. does not think it worthy of mention, is evidently a gloss or paraphrase of the last words of the verse: "and so they finished" [in connection with the "faithful in Israel" of the next verse.—Tr.] Tisch. in his Sept. (4th ed.) does give these words as a part of the text of the Vatican manuscript; but they seem to be clearly a duplet or double rendering.—Tr.]—Ver. 19. I am of the peaceable, faithful ones of Israel. The woman says "I" in the name of the city; the plural predicates ["peaceable, faithful"] refer to the inhabitants of the city. Clericus: "I am of the number of the peaceable and faithful in Israel, says our city." The meaning is: We are peaceable and faithful people, averse to insurrection; you ought first to have communicated with us, and then the thing would have been understood. It is herein indirectly stated that the city had no thought of taking part with Sheba, who had thrown himself into it. Whether this was the feeling in the city from the beginning, or was reached only when it was threatened with destruction by the siege, cannot be determined. Anyhow the woman was able cleverly to avert the threatened evil.—Böttcher changes the text, so as to read: "people* (that are) the peaceablest, truest in Israel thou seekest to kill," and Ewald: "we are (or better, we are still) peaceable, etc., and thou seekest," etc.; but there is no necessity for any change.—Thou seekest to kill a city and mother in Israel, that is, one of the chief cities of Israel, comp. viii. 1. Why wilt thou destroy the inheritance of the Lord? The city pertained to the people that the Lord had chosen for His possession. Comp. the discourse of the wise woman of Tekoah, xiv. 16. [Though the Heb. text of the woman's discourse here is harsh and obscure, no proposed changes better it. As it stands, she seems to say: "Abel is proverbial for its wisdom. You should have entered into negotiations with us instead of attempting to destroy an important city in Israel." The margin of Eng. A. V. reads: "they plainly spake in the beginning, saying, Surely they will ask of Abel, and so make an end," that is, in the beginning of the siege the inhabitants expressed the expectation that Joab would communicate with them, and this rendering is approved by Patrick as more literal than the text of Eng. A. V.; but it does not give the proverb-like coloring of the original. Philippon mentions among other Jewish renderings that of the Midrash which haggadistically identifies the wise woman with Serah, the daughter of Asher (Gen. xlv. 17), who is made to refer in her sharp discourse with Joab to Deut. xx. 10, the law of sieges. Erdmann also holds that this law is here alluded to; but there is no intimation of this; the woman intimates only generally that it would have been conducive to a proper understanding if Joab had communicated with the besieged.—Tr.]—Ver. 20 sqq. Joab, impressed by the woman's words, declares that it is not his purpose to destroy the city, but only to get possession of the insurgent Sheba, who [ver. 21] has lifted up his hand against the king. Perhaps the woman first learned from these words the real state of the case and the guilt of Sheba. She said immediately that his head should be thrown through the wall, through one of the openings in the wall, where the besieged might watch and shoot at the enemy, and through which perhaps she spoke with Joab. [Eng. A. V., wrongly: "over the wall."—Tr.]—Ver. 22. She went to all the people, to report concerning her interview with Joab—a self-evident fact that it was unnecessary to mention in the text. After "people" Sept. adds: "and spoke to the whole city," a correct explanatory remark, but not to be inserted in the text (as Ew. and Then. think). Equally unnecessary is Böttcher's alteration: "and the woman went into the city, and spoke to all the people." The words of the text: She came . . . in her wisdom (i. e., with her proposition to Joab, which she persuaded the people to accept) are indeed of laconic curtness; but this quite suits this rapid narration. By the delivery of the traitor's head Joab's end was gained. He ordered the trumpet to be sounded, as sign that the army should retire from the siege, and set out on the return-march. And they dispersed from the city, namely, the warriors that had joined him (ver. 13). And Joab returned, with the warriors with whom he had left Jerusalem (ver. 7), to the king, to announce to him the end of the insurrection. "The issue of this occurrence, how David received the victorious Joab, is omitted in our present narrative; he was doubtless now also forbearing to a man who as a soldier was indispensable to him, and who, with all his punishment-deserving savagery, always meant well for his government" (Ewald).

See the Introduction, p. 18 sq., as to the relation between this list and that in viii. 16-18, and their position and significance in respect to the two chief periods of the history of David and his kingdom, of which history they form the conclusion. mentioned in the list of Solomon's state-officers, iv. 1-6. [The name Adoram, if it be correct (Sept., Syr., Arab. have Adoniram, Vulg. and Chald. as Heb.) must be considered an unusual contraction of the longer form; possibly it is an imitation (though an incorrect one) of such names as Jehoram.—Tr.]—4) Jehoshaphat, son of Ahilud was "chancellor" [Eng. [The word here rendered "counsellor" (Eng. A. V.: "chief ruler") is the ordinary term for "priest," which rendering some would here retain. See on viii. 18 for the discussion of the meaning.—Tr.] Instead of "Jairite" Thenius (after Syr.) reads "Jattirite" (of Jattir), especially as this city Jattir in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 48; xxi. 14) is mentioned in 1 Sam. xxx. 27 among those particularly friendly to David. But the rendering of the Syriac is derived from xiii. 38 on account of the name Ira there found, which, however, represents a different person from this. Thenius, holding that the narrator wrote the history chaps. xi.—xx. in David's life-time, since he here breaks off without relating the history up to David's death, concludes from the way in which Ira is introduced ("and also Ira," etc.) that the author [Ira] here at the close appends his own name; but this latter assumption is unwarranted, even granting the other.

1. The truthfulness and justice of the theocratic historical narrative is shown, as everywhere in the frank statement of the sins of God's instruments, so here in the unveiled narration of David's errors in the way whereby God brought him back to his kingdom, and also of the unhappy results of his overhasty measures. His message to Judah, after he heard of Israel's preparations to bring him back (xix. ii. 12) was a mistake, since it was of such a nature as to kindle anew the fire of jealousy between the two sections of the people; he thereby put Judah before Israel (who had begun the movement for restoration), and the result was the violent war of words,

* הַרְבֵּי, from כָּרַר "to dig."

† [It seems to have this meaning in Esth. x. 1, but is commonly used as Dr. Erdmann says.—Ta.]

xix. 41-43. His mistake in holding out to the rebel Amasa the certain prospect of the chief command, led to the murder of the latter by Joab. David had made Joab the companion and instrument of his crime against Uriah; and this community in crime was a collateral cause of the retention of the latter in the highest military office (xx. 23).

2. God the Lord, as king of His people, permits sin to work out its extremest evil consequences, in order to reveal His justice in the punishment of sin by sin, and in wise ways hidden from men to further the ends of His kingdom, by making human sin serviceable thereto. By one bad man the greater part of the nation is seduced into insurrection, after David had erred in looking too much to his own honor at his restoration, and regarding flesh and blood (xix. 12), neglecting to make the Lord's honor his highest point of view, and to subordinate everything to it. By the second sudden failure of his hopes, based on the popular favor, and his natural-fleshly relations to the people, he is to be brought again to know that the Lord alone is his strength, his protection and his help. The unjustly displaced Joab becomes a second time the saviour and restorer of the theocratic kingdom, striding over the corpse of the murdered ex-traitor to victory over the insurrection; whence David was to learn anew, that the ways of the Lord are not our ways, and His thoughts not our thoughts, and that He in His wisdom and might in the ways that He chooses and to the goal that He has fixed, performs things that in men's eyes, and through men's sins are most involved and confused.

3. The greatest confusion of affairs suddenly arises by the concatenation of various sins and crimes, just after the certain prospect of restoration to kingdom, and peace dawns on David. Jealous quarreling divides the people into two hostile parts. The king is powerless to extinguish the fire of anger and hatred. An insurgent quickly carries the greater part of the people off from David. Civil war once more rages throughout the whole nation. The army-leader appointed by the king is treacherously murdered by the unwisely aggrieved Joab. But in this confusion God's wisdom goes its quiet, hidden way, and His almighty hand leads the sorely tried king, who in this chaotic whirl, must see the consequences of his own errors, back to complete and triumphant royal dominion. While to men's eyes the co-operation of many evil powers seems to endanger the kingdom of God to the utmost, and its affairs appear to be confused and disturbed in the unhappiest fashion, the wonderful working of the living God reveals itself most gloriously in the unravelment of the worst entanglements, and in the introduction of new and unexpected triumphs for His government.

Chap. xix. 41-43. Envy and jealousy among God's people always spring from a passionate self-interest, which puts one's own honor in place of God's honor, and often, under the pretence of zeal for the one, makes the other the aim of all its striving;—they produce a spiritual blinding in which it becomes impossible to recognize God's designs in the matters of His kingdom, an embittering of hearts and minds, whereby brotherly love is changed into hate, and a rending of the divinely joined bonds of union, from which follow wrangling, discord and party hostility.—[HENRY: If a good work be done, and well done, let us not be displeased, nor the work disparaged, though we had no hand in it.—TR.]—From hearts full of bitterness, and rancor flow evil words; these react upon the hearts of those who quarrel, and nurse the flame of hate and discord.—An unloving disposition ends in hard and injurious words; and from evil words it is but one step to evil deeds.

xx. 1. sq. The ambition of one man often pulls down what many with united forces have built up in a state, and may from one spark of discord kindle a great fire of uproar and insurrection, whereby a whole people is plunged into ruin.—The traitorous voice that leads to uprising against the divinely ordered authorities is followed by all that will not recognize in these authorities the ordination and action of God, and that have turned their hearts away from the living God.—OSIANDER: God tempers with a cross the prosperity of His elect, in order that they may be kept in His fear. Rom. v. 3 sq.—SCHLIER: David must learn from every new experience, what grief and heart-pain it brings to forsake the Lord and not fear Him. And assuredly David did recognize in all these chastisements that again and again broke over him, not merely the hand of men, but above all, the hand of the Lord.—STARKE: It is righteous in God to requite, and to measure with the measure wherewith we have measured, Luke vi. 38. [From HALL]: He had lift up his hand against a faithful subject; now a faithless dares to lift up his hand against him.—That is the way of the world: now it exalts one to heaven, now casts him down to earth; let us not then trust in men, but in God.

Ver. 3. SCHLIER: David well knew that nothing more surely and quickly brings in the Lord's help than to put away what is unbecoming. When trouble rises let us turn to the Lord, and put away what is an offence in His eyes, and cleanse heart and house of all that is displeasing to Him.

Ver. 4. The Lord forsakes not His people even when they make mistakes, and does not inflict on us the penalty even when we go astray.

Ver. 6. WUERT. B.: Pious men are not always steadfast and strong in faith, but amid assaults and trouble often grow pusillanimous, often as weak as if they had never met and withstood an assault. Then let us diligently pray: Lord, increase our faith.

Vers. 8-10. STARKE: The world is full of insidious courtesies and flatteries, a love-token is the sign and the design is to betray. Ps. lv. 22 [21].—HEDINGER [from HALL]: There is no enmity so dangerous, as that which comes masked with love. . . . Thus spiritually deals the world with our souls, it kisses us and stabs us at once:

if it did not embrace us with one hand, it could not murder us with the other.

Vers. 13-15. SCHLIER: From this we may learn how much a man that does his duty at the right time can perform; that which does most harm is not the evil men do, but their weakness in respect to doing good.—STARKE: Let the ungodly flee where they will, and seek shelter for themselves and their sins, yet the divine vengeance pursues them, Ps. cxxxix. 7.

Great is wisdom. Blessed are the peacemakers.—TR.]

THIRD DIVISION.

ECLECTIC APPENDIX TO THE CONCLUSION OF THE HISTORY OF DAVID'S REIGN.

CHAPS. XXI-XXIV.

FIRST SECTION.

Three Years' Famine on account of Saul's Crime against the Gibeonites, and Expiation of the Crime.

CHAP. XXI. 1-14.

- 1 THEN [And] there was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year. And David inquired [sought the face]¹ of the Lord [Jehovah]; and the Lord answered [Jehovah said], It is for Saul and for his bloody house [for the blood-guilty house²], because he slew the Gibeonites. And the king called the Gibeonites, and said unto them; (now [and³] the Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites; and the children of Israel had sworn unto them; and Saul sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah.) Wherefore [And] David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for you? and wherewith shall I make the atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord [Jehovah]? And the Gibeonites said unto him, We⁴ will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel. And he said, What ye shall say, that will I do for you. And they answered [said to] the king, The man that consumed us, and that devised against us that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts [in any region] of Israel, Let seven men of his sons be delivered⁵ unto us, and we will hang them up unto the Lord [Jehovah] in Gibeah of Saul, whom the Lord did choose [the chosen of Jehovah⁶]. And the king said, I will give them. But [And] the king spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, because of the Lord's [Jehovah's] oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of

¹ [Ver. 1. The phrase: "to seek the face" is simply "to go to one," while "to inquire of God" (דרש באלהים) is "to investigate, seek wisdom" at His hands. The two verbs בָּקַשׁ and יִרְשׁ are often coupled.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 1. It is better to express in the translation the idea of "guilt" contained in the דָּמַיִם. Sept. renders: "on (על) Saul and on his house (בֵּיתוֹ) is iniquity [in death] of blood," where we may omit in θανάτου and αἵματος the דָּמַיִם being taken as subject and rendered: "iniquity of blood." Böttcher, Thénius and Wellhausen adopt this text, and render: "On Saul and on his house is blood-guiltiness." This translation avoids the hard expression: "the house of blood-guiltiness," where we should expect the possessive pronoun. On the other hand the מֵלֵךְ — "concerning" (Eng. A. V.: "for") is a correct expression, and the hardness of the phrase is not unsuitable to an oracular response; the Heb. text is supported also by Vulg., Syr. and Chald.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 2. Böttcher's view, that this parenthesis is a later insertion, may be correct, for ancient editors were accustomed to make such insertions. But there is no necessity for regarding it as an insertion (particularly, as a marginal gloss), because the Hebrew historical style permits such interposed remarks. Böttcher is unfortunate in charging a historical error on our text in that it has "Amorites" where Josh. ix. 1 sqq. has "Hivites;" for the name "Amorite" is sometimes a general one, given to the dwellers over a large area (see Art. Amorite in Smith's Bib.-Dict.). On the other hand Winer thinks that instead of "Hivites" in Josh. ix. 7 should be read "Amorite."—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 4. Properly: "There is not to us silver and gold with Saul and with his house, and there is not to us a man to kill in Israel," that is, as some (Thénius, Erdmann): "we have no right to these things," or, according to others (Böttcher, Bib.-Comm., Eng. A. V.): "we lay no claim to them."—The Qeri "to us" is better than the Kethib "to me."—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 6. This phrase is a strange one, and various attempts have been made to amend the text. Three are mentioned by Erdmann; Wellhausen proposes another, to read "Gibeon" instead of "Gibeah," and to suppose

- 8 Saul. But [And] the king took the two sons of Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, whom she bore unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth, and the five sons of Michal [Merab'] the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for [bare to] Adriel the son of Barzillai the Meholahite; And he [om. he] delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the Lord [Jehovah]; and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, in the beginning of the barley-harvest.^a And Rizpah the daughter of Aiah took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of the harvest until water dropped [poured] upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither [not] the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night. And it was told David what Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, the concubine of Saul, had done. And David went and took the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son from the men [citizens'] of Jabesh-gilead, which [who] had stolen them from the street [square] of Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul in Gilboa; And he brought up from thence the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son; and they gathered the bones of them that were hanged. And the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son¹⁰ buried they in the country [land] of Benjamin in Zelah in the sepulchre of Kish his father; and they performed all that the king commanded. And after that God was entreated [= listened to entreaties] for the land.

SECOND SECTION.

Accounts of Victorious Battles against the Philistines.

Vers. 15-22.

- 15 Moreover [And] the Philistines had yet [om. yet] war again with Israel; and David went down, and his servants with him, and fought against the Philistines; 16 and David waxed faint. And Ishbi-benob,¹¹ which was of the sons of the giant, the rest of the verse an insertion from the ^א בְּרִיר of ver. 9. It is, however, impossible to say whether the Gibeonites would think Gibeon or Gibeah the fitter place for the execution, and the most natural emendation would seem to be to adopt the phrase of ver. 9, and read: "in Gibeah of Saul, in the mountain in the presence of Jehovah." The phrase: "mountain of Jehovah," would require us to suppose some particular mountain at Gibeah (or Gibeon) dedicated to Jehovah, and we do not know of such a one.—Ta.]

But the phrase is so natural a one that there is no good ground for rejecting it.—Böttcher's explanation of the Kethib שְׁעָתָם as dual is accepted by Erdmann, though the resulting sense is not clear (see Ewald, § 299 b).

The Qeri שְׁבַעֲתָם, "the seven of them" (Eng. A. V.: "all seven") seems better.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 12. The word בָּעַל occurs in the sense of "citizen" in the Books of Joshua, Judges and Samuel only.

As it in such cases means (in the plural) "possessors of the city," it may throw light on the civil-political constitution of ancient city-life. It seems not to occur in this sense in any other Sæmistic language.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 16. The strange form of this name has suggested emendations of the text. The Syriac (followed by its copyist the Arabic) omits it altogether, Vulg. and Chald. are as Heb., Sept. has Jesû. Wellhausen proposes to read: וַיִּשְׁכַּח בִּנְיָמִן, "and they sat down in Gob" (taking Nob as error for Gob), and to place this after the "with him," in ver. 15; and in the וַיִּנְיָח דָּוִד he would see the name of the giant, and perhaps some verb, as "and he arose." The sentence would then read: "David went down and his servants with him, and they sat down [—took position] in Gob, and fought against the Philistines; and there arose [here the man's name], who was of the sons," etc. Similar to this is the emendation proposed in Bib.-Com.: "And David waxed faint. So they halted [—sat down] in Gob. And there was a man (in Gob), which was of the sons," etc.; instead of changing the "David waxed faint" (as Wellhausen does), this reading supplies the phrase: "and there was a man." These are both ingenious, and to both there are objections. The dislocation of a phrase supposed by Wellhausen is not accounted for; and in the other reading the statement that the man was in Gob is unnatural (since he was not residing there, but had come with the army), and David's weariness (which more naturally explains the giant's attack on him) is given merely as the reason for the army's halting. It is likely that the text is corrupt (and the corruption must have been made before the Sept. translation was made), the phrase: "David was weary" receives no explanation as it stands, and the וַיִּנְיָח supposes another verb before it; but a satisfactory emendation has not yet been proposed, though Wellhausen's seems the least objectionable.—Instead of the second

כְּשֶׁל we should probably read שָׁקַל (so perhaps Sept.).—Ta.]

- the weight of whose spear weighed [was] three hundred shekels of brass in weight [om. in weight], he being girded with a new sword, thought to have slain David.
- 17 But [And] Abishai the son of Zeruiah succored him, and smote the Philistine and killed him. Then the men of David swore unto him, saying, Thou shalt go no
- 18 more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel. And it came to pass after this, that there was again a battle with the Philistines at Gob; then
- 19 Sibbechai the Hushathite slew Saph, which was of the sons of the giant. And there was again a battle in Gob with the Philistines, where [and] Elhanan" the son of Jaare-oregim [Jair], a [the] Bethlehemite, slew the brother of [om. the brother of] Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam.
- 20 And there was yet a battle in Gath, where [and there] was a man of great stature, that had on every [each] hand six fingers, and on every [each] foot six toes, four
- 21 and twenty in number; and he also was born to the giant. And when [om. when] he defied Israel, [ins. and] Jonathan the son of Shimeah the brother of David slew
- 22 him. These four were born to the giant in Gath, and fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

¹² [Ver. 19. The text here is generally regarded as corrupt, the oregim being manifestly a repetition of the last word of the verse. Whether then we are to adopt the text of 1 Chron. xx. 5: "And Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite," or to regard the latter as a conjectural emendation of ours, or, finally, to consider them both as corruptions of one original, it is hard to decide. Böttcher reads: "Elhanan the son of Jesse the Bethlehemite slew Goliath," etc., and identifies Elhanan with David, on which see translator's note in the Exposition. Against the reading of "Chronicles" is the fact that it is the easier, against ours is the improbability of the existence of two Goliaths, or of the identity of Elhanan and David. But these presuppositions are all manifestly untrustworthy. See Erdmann's discussion in the Exposition, and for various other views see Poole's Synopses.—Here and in ver. 18 some MSS. have Nob instead of Gob.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

On the section Chs. xxi.-xxiv. and its relation to the preceding narration, see Introduction, p. 21 sqq. [Though Dr. Erdmann's statement of his view—that these chapters present six sections arranged in elaborate symmetry, from the point of view of theocratic historiography—is very ingenious, a comparison between these sections and similar ones in "Chronicles" and "Judges," makes it at least not improbable, that they constitute an appendix of materials for which no convenient place was found in the body of the history. This appendix is thus not accidental, is truly theocratic (since it gives various sides of David's character and life, as theocratic king), only has not the somewhat artificial arrangement that Dr. Erdmann proposes.—Ta.]

1. Ch. xxi. 1-14. The three years' famine, and the expiation of a crime committed by Saul against the Gibeonites.—Ver. 1. In the days of David, an indefinite phrase, which does not help us to fix the date of the following occurrence.* The mention of Mephibosheth in ver. 7 shows that it must be subsequent to the narrative of ch. ix., where David's first acquaintance with the young prince is described. It is to be put perhaps before Absalom's conspiracy (Ew.), since Shimei's words (xvi. 7, 8) may refer to the execution here narrated, though also to the deaths of Abner and Ishbosheth.—And David sought the face of the Lord—by prayer he endeavored to learn the cause of this judgment. The answer is given by the oracle [Urim and Thummim] consulted through the high-priest: "concerning Saul and the house of blood-guilt," †

the house on which rested blood-guiltiness; comp. the phrases "city of blood" Ezek. xxii. 2; xxiv. 6, 9, "man of blood" 2 Sam. xvi. 7, 8.—Because he slew the Gibeonites, a fact of which we have no account.* Ver. 2 states only the motive of this act of Saul.† The Gibeonites are here termed a remnant of the Amorites. According to Josh. ix. 3-27 an oath was sworn to these "Non-Israelites" that they should not be slain; comp. especially ver. 20. They are there called "Hivites," while here they are designated by the general name "Amorites" (Ew.), under which all the Canaanitish tribes are often embraced (Keil) [though in other cases the Amorites are distinguished as a separate tribe from the Hivites.—Ta.] And Saul sought to slay them, that is, to exterminate them. Thenius regards this statement as contradictory of the fact narrated [since he would not incur blood-guiltiness by merely seeking to slay them], and proposes to read "exterminate" ‡ instead of "slay,"; but no contradiction exists, for, as Böttcher remarks, "it is intended in the words 'in his zeal' only to give the motive of the attempt [and it is not said that the attempt did not succeed]." Saul's zeal "for the children of Israel and Judah" § consisted in an attempt (in accordance with Deut. vii. 2, 24) to cleanse the Lord's people

* [Abarbanel (in Patrick) thinks they were slain when the priests were put to death (1 Sam. xxii.) in Nob; but there is no trace of this in the history.—Ta.]

† [The way in which this statement is introduced: "And the Gibeonites were not Israelites," shows not so much that the Book of Joshua was not a part of the same work as the Books of Samuel (Bib. Com.), as that the present Book of Joshua was not in existence when our narrative was written.—Ta.]

‡ להכריתם instead of להחיותם.

§ [The word "Judah" is perhaps a later addition after the division of the kingdom, since the phrase "children of Israel" would in Saul and David's time include the whole nation.—Ta.]

* [The whole phrase rather indicates that the chronological order is here not observed (Bib. Com.).—Ta.]

from the remnant of the heathen, as He purified the land from the necromancers and soothsayers (1 Sam. xxviii. 3) according to the law. He thus "sought" to exterminate the Gibeonites, but his attempt did not succeed, as the presence of these Gibeonites shows. Wherewith shall I appease? namely, the anger of the Lord against this deed, comp. Josh. ix. 19, 20. "So that ye may then bless the Lord's inheritance," literally: "bless ye." The Imperative "is a curt and vigorous expression, indicating a certain result, a Future Imperative, as it were" (Ew. § 347 a).—Ver. 4. Literally: "there is not to me * silver and gold with Saul and with his house," that is, I have nothing to do with it, have no right to it, according to Numb. xxxv. 31. [They would not take money as compensation for murder. The custom of so compensating by money was common in ancient times, and its existence is supposed in the law above quoted. See Art. Blood, Revenger of, in Smith's Bib.-Dict.—Tr.]. And we have no right to kill any one in Israel, that is, it is not permitted us without more ado to execute blood-revenge for the murder of our people; their wrong, they thus intimate, must be expiated by blood, but they cannot proceed without the consent and command of the king.† The king's question: What say ye then that? I shall do for you? assumes the necessity of blood-expiation, and asks them to explain themselves more distinctly, since it is His duty thus to make expiation, and so relieve the land of the famine. [We may also render, as in Eng. A. V.: "what ye say, I will do."—Tr.].—Ver. 5. As to the man? (Saul) that consumed us; it appears, then, that Saul had broken the power of this tribe by his bath of blood. "And who devised against us, that we should be destroyed," so as not to stand in all the territory of Israel." Comp. Josh. ix. 15, 26.—Ver. 6. The Apodosis. For the blood wrongfully shed by Saul, blood must flow from his house in return; according to Numb. xxxv. 31, 33 homicide was to be expiated by death [but the death of the murderer, not of his kindred; it is, however, intimated in ver. 1 that Saul's kindred had shared in the murderous act.—Tr.]. The execution was to be by hanging with extended limbs, crucifixion [impaling, so the term σταυρώω used for the crucifixion of Christ.—Tr.]. They demand seven men of Saul's sons. The sacred number seven is determined by the significance of this punishment, as work in the service of God, whereby God's wrath was to be appeased. They were to be hung up to the Lord (comp. ver. 9 "before the Lord," Numb. xxv. 4), in God's honor, to appease His anger, in Gibeah of Saul, because that was the home of Saul's house, on which the blood-guilt rested. The anointed of the Lord need not be regarded as "holy irony" (Keil). Saul was really the anointed of the Lord; all the more must there be such expiation by blood to the Lord for his sin as the Lord's Anointed. Exception has been taken to this designation of Saul by non-Israelites, and various conjectures* made to set it aside: Böttcher makes the adjective plural: "we will hang them as the Lord's chosen ones" (after the Sept.); Houbigant [and Dathe]: "according to the word (oracular utterance) of the Lord;" Then., Ew. [Bib.-Com.]: "in the mountain of the Lord," the place of prayer on the mountain at Gibeah (1 Sam. x. 5); if any change is to be made, the last conjecture is preferable, because it demands only the dropping of a single letter.—David declares himself ready to satisfy this demand immediately.—Ver. 7. From the members of Saul's house he excepts only Mephibosheth on account of his oath to his father Jonathan (1 Sam. xviii. 3; xx. 8, 16; xxiii. 18).—Ver. 8. Members of Saul's house doomed to death: two sons of Rizpah†, Saul's concubine (comp. ver. 11 and iii. 7), and five sons of Merab. The name Michal in our text is obviously a copyist's error, for Saul's oldest daughter, given in marriage to the Meholahite Adriel of Abel-Meholah in Issachar, and named Merab, 1 Sam. xviii. 19. The Chald. has: "the sons of Merab, whom Michal had brought up," a baseless attempt to retain the text reading. [This is followed by Eng. A. V. Render: sons of Merab, whom she bare to Adriel.—Tr.].—Ver. 9. And they crucified them on the mountain, namely, near Gibeah (1 Sam. x. 5) before the Lord, at the place there devoted to the worship of God, which was indicated by an altar. Retaining the text †, render: "they fell sevenfold at once," that is, "by sevens, in the same manner" (as the Dual denotes). [This rendering of the Kethib or text: "by sevens" is not appropriate here, since there was only one "seven," and it is better to adapt the Qeri or margin: "the seven of them" (Philippon) or "all seven" (Eng. A. V., Cahen).—Tr.].—The execution occurred at the time of the harvest ‡ (Keil, Bib. Arch. II. § 118, Winer I. 340 [Smith's Bib.-Dict., Art. Agriculture]). This chronological statement serves to define the following procedure of Rizpah (Thenius).—Ver. 10. Touching picture of Rizpah's maternal grief.

* The Kethib Sing. "to me" (indicating the one person speaking for all) is to be preferred to the Qeri Plu. "to us" [as in Eng. A. V.], which is an imitation of the following "to us."

† According to others (Bib.-Com.) their meaning is that it is not against the nation Israel, but against the individual Saul, that they cry for vengeance, which is better.—Tr.]

‡ כִּי is omitted before the Imperf., as sometimes occurs when the dependent sentence expresses a process or obligation; comp. Lev. ix. 6; Ew. § 336 b.

§ אֵשֶׁת is asyndetically proposed Accus. Absolute, defined by "his sons" in ver. 6. Ges. § 145, 2.

|| לְשֵׁמֶרְנִי depends on לְמָרְנִי with omission of כִּי. It is unnecessary to supply the ל consequent of the Perfect, (Then.), or to read לְשֵׁמֶרְנִי (Ew., Böttcher).

* Böttch.: בְּחִירִי; Houb.: בְּרִירִי; Then.: בְּרִירִי. [See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

† [Bib. Com. suggests that, as Aiah occurs as a [masculine] Horite name (in Gen. xxxvi. 24), Rizpah may have been a foreigner, and this may have been the reason for selecting her sons as victims.—Tr.]

‡ Kethib: שֶׁבַע־נְפִלִים is with Böttcher to be retained against the Qeri שֶׁבַע־נְפִלִים, since the Dual properly denotes what is repeated in equal measures according to the number (Böttcher).

§ לְפָחוּלָהּ (not Qeri with כִּי) is adverbial Accusative; Ges. § 118, 2.

She took the sackcloth, a rough, hairy cloth used in mourning (the Art. points out that it was the cloth usual on such occasions) and spread it out on the rock, for a bed for herself; she wished to remain all the time by the corpses, in order to protect them against beasts and birds; it was regarded as the greatest disgrace for corpses to be left unburied, a prey to ravenous birds and beasts, 1 Sam. xvii. 44.—The law (Deut. xxi. 22 sq.) that the hanged were not to be left overnight on the stake, but to be buried before the evening, did not apply here, because the exhibition of the executed persons as a propitiatory offering was necessary till the appearance of the sign that the plague had ceased. From the beginning of harvest till water poured down on them from heaven, i. e., the bodies hung till rain descended on the parched land as sign that God's anger was appeased. The text says neither that the rain came immediately after the execution (Josephus, Cler., Ew., Böttcher), nor that it did not come till the usual rain-season, October (Thenius). [We therefore do not know how long Rizpah kept her watch.—Tr.]—Vers. 11-14. Hearing of Rizpah's touching care of the bodies, David provided for their burial together with the bones of Saul and Jonathan, which for this purpose he caused to be brought from Jabesh in Gilead. [He thus honored the maternal faithfulness and showed that he cherished no ill-will against the house of Saul (Patrick).—Tr.]—Ver. 12. [David takes part personally in the matter]. He took the bones of Saul and Jonathan from the citizens of Jabesh, see 1 Sam. xxxi. 8 sq. There it is said (ver. 10) that the Philistines fastened the corpses on the wall of Bethshan. This is not contradicted by the statement here that the Jabeshites had stolen the corpses (i. e., taken them away secretly) from the square; for this "public square" (רָצוֹן) is not the market-place in the middle of the city, but the open place at or before the gate (2 Chr. xxxii. 6; Neh. viii. 1, 3, 16), where the people were accustomed to assemble, and where they might see the bodies hung† on the wall.—"When (כִּשְׁמֹרֶת) the Philistines had slain Saul," not "on the day when," but "at the time," since (1 Sam. xxxi. 8 sq.) the hanging up of the corpses did not take place till the day after the battle.—Ver. 14. They buried the bones of Saul and Jonathan; from ver. 13 we must suppose that the bones of the seven executed men were also buried. [Sept. adds: "and the bones of the hanged," which some critics insert in the Hebrew text; Dr. Erdmann thinks the insertion unnecessary, because the fact would be taken for granted. But it is not clear that the bones of the seven were interred along with those of Jonathan and Saul:

they may have been put into a separate sepulchre.—Tr.]—In Zelah; the locality of this city is unknown. Comp. Josh. xviii. 28.

2. Vers. 15-22. Individual heroic deeds in the Philistine wars. This chronicle-like section (and so the similar section xxiii. 8-39) is probably taken from a writing that contained a historical-statistical collection of David's wars and of the exploits of his warriors. As the three deeds here described (vers. 18-22) are attached in 1 Chr. xx. 4-8 to the history of the Ammonite-Syrian war (comp. xii. 26-31), this collection may be conjectured to belong to a fuller chronicle of David's wars, to which may have belonged also the sections v. 17-25; viii. 1-14; x. 1-9; xii. 26-31, in which the wars against the Philistines and other nations are narrated.

a. Vers. 15-17. Exploit of Abishai in a new war against the Philistines. The "again" cannot possibly refer chronologically to the immediately preceding narrative, but indicates that the following is a fragment from a history of Philistine wars. Comp. the "again" in v. 22. Probably this fragment belongs chronologically in the group v. 18-25, in favor of which is the fact that David is here already king of all Israel, since he is called (ver. 17) the "light of Israel." Comp. v. 1-3.—And David was weary. A Philistine giant essayed to take advantage of this weariness of David, and kill him. His name was Ishbobe-nob, not Ishbo at Nob (De Wette), "for neither the fact that he was born at Nob, nor that the incident occurred at Nob (there is no third supposition) could be so expressed" (Thenius). The name (not to be read with Vulg. [and Eng. A. V.] Ishbubenob) perhaps means: "the dweller on the height" (Gesen.); he probably lived on a high, inaccessible rock. [The name, which has a strange appearance, is probably a corrupt reading, but it is difficult to restore the text. See "Text and Gram."—Tr.]—Who belonged to the sons of the Rapha. one of the giant-race of the Raphaites [Rephaim], who formed part of the primitive inhabitants of Canaan, comp. Gen. xiv. 5; xv. 20; Deut. ii. 11, 20; iii. 11, 13; Josh. xii. 4; xiii. 12. The name Rapha, "the giant" designates the ancestor of this race. [Rather the name Harapha seems here to designate simply the father of the four giants here mentioned, since it is said (ver. 22) that they were born to him in Gath. On the old races of Canaan see Art. Giants in Smith's Bib. Dict.—Tr.) The brazen head* of his lance weighed three hundred shekels = eight pounds, half the weight of Goliath's, 1 Sam. xvii. 7.—He was girded with a new suit of armor—so with Böttcher we are to take the Feminine Adjective (נֶחֱשֶׁת "new") in a collective sense; comp. Judg. xviii. 11; Dent. i. 41. [The Heb. has: "he was girt with a new," to which Eng. A. V. supplies sword; Philipsson renders as Böttcher: "he was newly armed," and Wellhausen suggests that the word means not "new," but some weapon, not otherwise known.—Tr.] "And he thought [= purposed] to smite David" (Ew. § 338 a).—Ver. 17. Abishai inter-

* On the construction of נֶחֱשֶׁת with אֶת see Ges. § 143, 1 a. [According to Gesenius the אֶת here introduces the Accusative of limitation; according to others (not so well) the Nominative.—Tr.]

† Kethib נֶחֱשֶׁת is the Heb. form (from נֶחֱשֶׁת), the Qeri נֶחֱשֶׁת the Aramaizing form; see Ges. § 75, 22; Ew. § 252 a.—Instead of Keth. 'הָם שָׁם read Qeri 'הָם שָׁם the Art. being out of place before 'פָּ.

* קֶיֶן = ferum hastas (Vulg.).

posed, and slew * the giant. Thereupon the men of Israel swore that David should not go into battle with them. Thou shalt not quench the light of Israel, thou shalt not abandon thyself to death, and so quench the light and well-being that the Lord has given Israel in thee. On the designation of David as the light of Israel, comp. xxii. 29 and Ps. xviii. 29 (28).

b. Ver. 18. The exploit of the Hushathite Sibbechai. Comp. 1 Chr. xx. 4. On Sibbechai, one of David's heroes (1 Chr. xi. 29) comp. 1 Chr. xxvii. 11, where he is mentioned as leader of the eighth army-division. On "the Hushathi" as patronymic from Hushah comp. 1 Chr. iv. 4. [The "Mebunnai" of 2 Sam. xxiii. 27 is probably (see Dr. Erdmann's note there) corruption for "Sibbechai."—Tr.].—Instead of Gob, an unknown place, the chronicler has Gezer, which Thenius adopts here. But as Gob is mentioned also in ver. 19 it is better to suppose (Keil) that Gob was perhaps a small place near Gezer, the old Canaanitish royal city (Josh. x. 32; xii. 12). Perhaps the name may be recognized in El Kubab on the road from Ramleh to Yalo [Rob. III. 143, 144].—Saph = Sippai of Chron., which is the "older form" (Böttcher).

c. Ver. 19. The exploit of Elhanan. He is called the son of Jaare-oregim. 1 Chr. xx. 5 has "son of Jair" without the "Oregim." This latter is here evidently a repetition by error from the following line. Further, instead of "Elhanan the Bethlehemite slew Goliath," Chron. has "Elhanan slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath."† The question is, whether our text gives the original reading, and Chron. has changed it (Berth., Böttch., Ew., Then., the last against his former view), or Chron. has the original and our text has been changed (Piscator, Cler., Mich., Movers, formerly Then., Keil). In the former case, the change of text in Chron. is attributed to the difficulty felt in the statement that Elhanan killed a giant Goliath, in connection with David's combat with Goliath (1 Sam. xvii.), it being maintained that our text could not have originated from that of Chron. But the supposition of a designed falsification of text by the Chronicler is to be rejected so long as the origination of our text admits of explanation. If the above-mentioned error [insertion of Oregim] crept into our text even in the statement of Elhanan's descent, this favors the conjecture that the following words also (given correctly in Chron.) have undergone change. Now there is an Elhanan of Bethlehem, who is mentioned among David's army-leaders, xxiii. 24 (comp. 1 Chr. xi. 26). When the error above-mentioned had gotten in, the result might easily be that a transcriber thinking of the Elhanan of xxiii. 24, would add the local designation Bethlehemite, and, having in mind the verbal agreement of the descriptions of Lahmi's spear and Goliath's (1 Sam. xvii. 7), would change the "brother of Goliath" into "Goliath." Further, it is not probable that there were two giants named Goliath. As for the view that vers. 19, 21 "contain the true old model of the elaborate description in 1 Sam. xvii." (Then.), and that the latter (notwithstanding the historical fact that underlies it), has, it may be conjectured, borrowed especially the giant's name from these verses (Ew., Then.)—against this is that (apart from the mention here of two giants, and the description of the giant in ver. 20, which does not suit the Goliath of 1 Sam. xvii.) neither in ver. 19 or ver. 21 is David named as the victorious warrior, but two heroes, Elhanan and Jonathan, are the conquerors. [The old opinion (Chald.: "and David, son of Jesse the veil-weaver of the sanctuary, of Bethlehem, killed Goliath," and so Rashi) that Elhanan is David, is adopted and pressed by Bött., who renders: "and Elhanan, son of Jesse, killed Goliath." After referring to the fact that a man often had two names, he gives six reasons for his identification of Elhanan and David: 1) the mention of David in ver. 22 can not, he says, be otherwise explained.—But see note on ver. 17, and, further, this insertion of David does not necessarily imply more than a general sharing by him in the exploits. 2) Two other sons of Jesse have names containing El.—This proves nothing for the remaining sons. 3) Persons ill-disposed towards David call him simply "son of Jesse" (Ben-Jesse), having forgotten his old name (Elhanan), and avoiding his later, happier name (David). Here that an earlier name was forgotten is assumed without a shadow of evidence. 4) In our passage, something must have stood in the place of the corrupt Oregim, and what can it have been but: "he is David" (הוא דוד)?—There is no need to suppose that anything stood there. 5) In xxiii. 24 we find: "Elhanan the son of Dodo," which, says Böttcher, is for "Elhanan, son of David," and this (combining 1 Chron. xi. 26) is for: "Elhanan, son of Jesse, he is David of Bethlehem."—But the change of Dodo into David is unwarranted, and the rest arbitrary. 6) The text of Chron. is corrupt, for ours could not have come from it.—Thus Böttcher builds his opinion on a series of arbitrary assumptions. As Thenius remarks, this sudden and isolated change of name (from David to Elhanan) would be in the highest degree strange and misleading.—The text is difficult, and no satisfactory account of it has been given. All that is clear is that Elhanan killed a giant. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

d. Vers. 20, 21. The exploit of Jonathan, David's nephew. There was again a battle with the Philistines in Gath. According to the text* probably: "there was a man of measures, extensions" [Eng. A. V.: of great stature], so De Dieu, Maurer, Movers, Ew., § 177 a. Bertneau and Thenius render: "a man of length;" Böttcher: "a man of strife," a quarrelsome fellow, bully. Six fingers and six toes, an abnormality that has always occurred, and still occurs. Pliny

* [Patrick would render: "Abishai helped him, and he (David) slew the Philistine," in order to explain the mention of David in ver. 22. The Heb. does not certainly decide this point, but more probably Abishai is said to be the slayer.—Tr.]

† Sam.: אֶת-לַחְמִי אֵת הַחֹמֶי אֶת הַחֹמֶי; Chron.: אֶת-לַחְמִי אֶת הַחֹמֶי אֶת הַחֹמֶי.

* Kethib: כְּדֵין probably — כְּדֵין, as archaic or Aramaic Plural (for which Chron. has Sing. כְּדֵה), "extensions;" Berth. and Then. take Qeri כְּדֵין (= כְּדֵה of Chron.), "length;" Böttcher: Kethib כְּדֵין — כְּדֵין, "contention."

(Hist. Nat. XI. 43) mentions sedigiti, six-fingered Romans.—Ver. 21. He was killed by Jonathan, son of Shimea (called Shimeah in xiii. 3, and Shammah in 1 Sam. xvi. 9), Jesse's third son.—[In our text he is called Shimei, in the margin Shimea.—Tr.]

Ver. 22. Concluding remark. These four. Literally: "as to these four (Accus.), they were the scions of the Rapha," descendants of the race of Rephaim at Gath, remains of the pre-Canaanitish inhabitants, distinguished by their gigantic size. See Josh. xi. 22.—The phrase: "by the hand of David," refers, not to his personal conflict with Ishbubenob, ver. 16 (Then., Keil), but to the fact that his heroes killed these giants under him as commander.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The blood-guilt that Saul had brought on his house by slaying the Gibeonites was produced by his perverted zeal for the purity of God's people and for the Lord's honor; the means he chose thereto were violation of oath (Josh. ix.) and murder. The result of this crime of the king of Israel, the representative of the people of God, was God's wrath on the land announced in the famine. A dark shadow here passes from Saul's time over into David's, in the account of which the following fundamental thoughts are interwoven. 1) Zeal for the Lord and His cause must not be conjoined with sin; if the good end makes holy the bad means, the bad means makes unholy and void the good end. 2) God's anger cannot fail against crime committed in ostensible zeal for the honor of His kingdom; in men's eyes the evil may assume the appearance of the alleged holy end, in God's eyes the evil impulses in the human heart are evident; the punishment may delay, but comes in its time in all its severity. 3) He who sheds man's blood, by man shall His blood be shed (Gen. ix. 5, 6), because man is made in God's image, and murder is therefore a crime against the holy God Himself. Such a crime Saul committed against the Gibeonites, for the law of extermination did not apply to them (Josh. ix.), and if they were not members of God's people, they were men, made in God's image. 4) Saul's guilt becomes also the guilt of his house and people. The land must expiate its king's wrong. This is rooted in the idea of the solidarity of the people and the theocratic king as representative of God's people, whence comes solidarity of guilt between king and people. If through the fault of an individual member of the theocratic people, the whole theocratic State is unhallowed and exposed to God's anger, how much more must this be the result of a sin committed by their king. [Kitto: If it be asked—and it has been asked—why vengeance was exacted rather for this slaughter of the Gibeonites, than for Saul's greater crime, the massacre of the priests at Nob?—the answer is, that the people, and even the family of Saul, had no sympathy with or part in this latter tragedy, which none but an alien could be found to execute. But both the people and Saul's family had made themselves parties in the destruction of the unhappy Gibeonites, by their sympathy, their concurrence, their aid—and above all, as we must believe, by their accepting the fruits of the crime. Yet, although this be the intelligible public ground on which the transaction rests, it is impossible to withhold our sympathy for these victims of a public crime in which it is probable that none of them had any direct part.—Tr.]

2. Blood-vengeance was ordered in the Law only in case of intentional killing. The fundamental law is given in Gen. ix. 5, 6; the preciser statements are made in Ex. xxi. 12-14; Numb. xxxv. 9-34; Deut. xix. 1-13. The Lord is the proper avenger of blood, Gen. ix. 5, 6; Ps. ix. 13 [1]; [Rom. xii. 19]. And no other means of absolution or expiation may be substituted for the blood of the guilty. Numb. xxxv. 31. For the intentional murderer there is no protection against blood-vengeance, not even at the altar, Ex. xxi. 14—in such case only the blood of the slayer can atone. And so in consequence of this crime Saul was exposed to blood-vengeance according to the divine Law.

3. According to the law, blood-vengeance was to be executed only on the criminal himself. "The legislation of the middle books of the Pentateuch [Ex., Lev., Numb.] never permits the avenger of blood to go beyond the murderer, and seize his family" (Oehler in Herzog, II. 262). Comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 6-11. When the Gibeonites demanded seven descendants of Saul (who was fallen under the divine judgment) David was under no legal obligation to yield to the demand. When now he nevertheless yielded, and no complaint was made against him, this points to the fact that custom had originated a practice going beyond the law, based on the oriental notion of the solidarity of the family, and on the idea (found in the law) of guilt inherited by children from parents—and that David acted in accordance with this practice; the words of Deut. xxiv. 16 (comp. 2 Kings xiv. 6), as supplement to earlier legislation, may be directed against this practice (Oehler, as above, Kleinert on Deuteronomy, 1872, p. 133). Kurtz (Herz. III. 305): "David yields to their request, and the persons delivered up are hanged. To understand this procedure, we must bear in mind the ancient oriental ideas of the solidarity of the family, strict retaliation and blood-vengeance, ideas that, with some limitation, remained in force in the legislation of the Old Covenant." [David certainly did wrong, if he yielded to a mere custom against the prescriptions of the law; the custom was a cruel one. Nothing is said in the text, indeed, about a conflict between custom and law; it seems strange that neither priest nor prophet raises his voice against a public crime. But the brevity of the account withholds the circumstances that might throw light on the incident.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1 sq. SCHLIER: A famine in the land is a sign of the divine wrath. The Lord our God has every thing in His hand, even natural phenomena depend on Him; even dew and rain come from Him. [HALL: Justly it is presupposed by David that there was never judgment from God where hath not been a provocation from men; therefore, when he sees the plague, he inquires for the sin. Never man smarted cause-

lessly from the hand of divine justice. O that, when we suffer, we could ask what we have done, and could guide our repentance to the root of our evils.—TR.—J. LANGE: God does indeed put off His judgments; but He does not therefore annul them, Exod. xxxii. 34. [HENRY: Time does not wear out the guilt of sin; nor can we build hopes of impunity upon the delay of judgments. There is no statute of limitation to be pleaded against God's demands. . . . Let parents take heed of sin, especially the sin of cruelty and oppression, for their poor children's sake, who may be smarting for it by the just hand of God, when they are in their graves. Guilt and a curse are a bad entail upon a family.—TR.]

FR. ARNDT: A secret judgment of God goes through history, and he who is spared by time is certainly judged by eternity. That so many years lie between the sin and the punishment, and the expiation comes not in Saul's, but in David's time, is only a sign of the divine patience. God often waits long before He punishes; He not seldom makes the whole life a day of grace, and only in the day of judgment, long, long after the guilt was incurred, does the threatened punishment begin.—OSIANDER: It often happens that God in His righteous judgment visits a wicked man's great sins not on him, but on His posterity.—HALL: Every sin hath a tongue, but that of blood over-cries and drowns the rest, Gen. iv. 10.—OSIANDER: A common prayer and a common curse have very great power; for the sighing of them that suffer violence pierces through the clouds and draws divine vengeance. Ecclus. xxxv. [xxxii.] 21-23.—FR. ARNDT: There are also well-founded complaints against us, occasioned by our behaviour, and woe to us if as secret and frightful accusers against us they go up before God's throne of judgment. [HALL: Little did the Gibeonites think that God had so taken to heart their wrongs, that for their sakes all Israel should suffer. Even when we think not of it is the Righteous Judge avenging our unrighteous vexations.—TR.]

Vers. 6 sq. SCHLIER: Our time does indeed think of the rights of the criminal; but of the rights of those whom the criminal maltreats or threatens, people no longer think much, and still less do they think now-a-days of duty towards the criminal himself.—Ver. 9. Mercy and righteousness do not exclude each other. He who fears God should exhibit both at the same time righteousness in mercy, and also mercy in righteousness.—[Vers. 10, 11. "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." The king is moved by the lowly mother's devotion. The passage, vers. 1-14, is impressively treated by Taylor.—TR.]

Vers. 15 sq. The conflict of the world-power against God's kingdom is 1) A continual conflict, ever again renewed; 2) A conflict carried on with malicious cunning, frightful power and mighty weapons; 3) A conflict perilous to the people of God, demanding all the power given them by the Lord and their utmost bravery; 4) A conflict that by God's help at last ends in the victory of His kingdom.

[Vers. 1-3. The solidarity of human society (comp. above, "Hist. and Theol." No. 3). 1) As to guilt. 2) As to punishments. 3) As to expiations.—Ver. 14. "And after that God was entreated for the land." Reparation of wrong-doing a condition of being heard in prayer.—TR.]

THIRD SECTION.

David's song of thanksgiving for the victories that the Lord gave him over his enemies through his deeds of might.

CHAPTER XXII.

- 1 And David spake unto the Lord [Jehovah] the words of this song in the day that the Lord (Jehovah) had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and
- 2 out of the hand of Saul: And he said,
The Lord [Jehovah] is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer,
- 3 The God of my rock [My Rock-God], in him will [om. will] I trust,
He is [om. he is] my shield and the horn of my salvation, my high tower [fortress],
and my refuge,
My Saviour, thou savest me from violence.
- 4 I will [om. will] call on the Lord [Jehovah] who is worthy to be praised,
So shall I [And I shall] be saved from mine enemies.
- 5 When [For] the waves of death compassed me,
The floods of ungodly men [streams of wickedness] made me afraid,
- 6 The sorrows [toils] of hell [Sheol] compassed me about,
The snares of death prevented [encountered] me.

- 7 In my distress I called upon the Lord [Jehovah],
And cried to my God [And to my God I cried],
And he did hear [heard] my voice out of his temple [palace],
And my cry did enter [entered] into his ears.
- 8 Then [And] the earth shook and trembled,
The foundations of heaven [the heavens] moved
And shook, because he was wroth.
- 9 There went up a smoke out of [in] his nostrils
And fire out of his mouth devoured, Coals were kindled by it [Red-hot coals burned from him].
- 10 He bowed the heavens also [And he bowed the heavens], and came down,
And darkness [cloud-darkness] was under his feet.
- 11 And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly,
And he was seen [And appeared] upon the wings of the wind.
- 12 And he made darkness pavilions round about him,
Dark waters [Gathering of waters], and [om. and] thick clouds of the skies.
- 13 Through [Out of] the brightness before him
Were coals of fire kindled [Burned coals of fire].
- 14 The Lord [Jehovah] thundered from heaven,
And the Most High uttered his voice.
- 15 And he sent out arrows, and scattered them, Lightning, and discomfited them.
- 16 And the channels [beds] of the sea appeared,
The foundations of the world [earth] were discovered
At the rebuking of the Lord [Jehovah],
At [By] the blast of the breath of his nostrils.
- 17 He sent [reached] from above [on high], he took me,
He drew me out of many [great] waters.
- 18 He delivered me from my strong enemy,
And [om. and] from them that hated me, for they were too strong for me.
- 19 They prevented [came upon] me in the day of my calamity,
But the Lord [And Jehovah] was my stay.
- 20 He brought me forth also [And he brought me forth] into a large place,
He delivered me, because he delighted in me.
- 21 The Lord [Jehovah] rewarded [rendered] me according to my righteousness, According to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.
- 22 For I have kept the ways of the Lord [Jehovah],
And have not wickedly departed from my God.
- 23 For all his judgments were [are] before me,
And as for his statutes I did [do] not depart from them.
- 24 I was also [And I was] upright before [perfect towards] him,
And have kept myself from my iniquity.
- 25 Therefore the Lord [And Jehovah] hath recompensed me according to my righteousness,
According to my cleanness in his eyesight.
- 26 With the merciful thou wilt show [showest] thyself merciful, And [om. and] with the upright [perfect] man thou wilt show [showest] thyself upright [perfect].
- 27 With the pure thou wilt show [showest] thyself pure,
And with the froward [perverse] thou wilt show [showest] thyself unsavory [perverse].
- 28 And the afflicted people thou wilt save [savest],
But [And] thine eyes are upon [against] the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down.
- 29 For thou art my lamp, O Lord [Jehovah],
And the Lord [Jehovah] will lighten [lightens] my darkness.
- 30 For by thee I have run [I run] through a troop [troops],
By my God have I leaped over [I leap over] a wall [walls].

- 31 As for God, his way is perfect;
The word of the Lord [Jehovah] is tried [pure],
He is a buckler to all them that trust in him.
- 32 For who is God save the Lord [Jehovah]?
And who is a rock save our God?
- 33 God is my strength and power [strong fortress].
And he maketh my way perfect.
- 34 He maketh my feet like hinds' feet (like the hinds),
And setteth me upon my high places.
- 35 He teacheth my hands to war,
So that [And] a bow of steel is broken by mine arms [my arms bend a bow of bronze].
- 36 Thou hast also [And thou hast] given me the shield of thy salvation,
And thy gentleness [hearkening] hath made me great.
- 37 Thou hast enlarged my steps under me,
So that [And] my feet did not slip [my ankles did not tremble].
- 38 I have pursued mine enemies, and destroyed them,
And turned not again until I had consumed them.
- 39 And I have consumed them, and wounded [crushed] them,
That [And] they could [did] not arise,
Yea [And] they are fallen under my feet.
- 40 For [And] thou hast girded me with strength to battle,
Them that rose up against me hast thou subdued under me.
- 41 Thou hast also [And thou hast] given me the necks of mine enemies,
That I might destroy [And I destroyed] them that hate [hated] me.
- 42 They looked, but there was none to save [and there was no saviour], Even [om. even] unto the Lord [Jehovah], but [and] he answered them not.
- 43 Then did [And] I beat them as small as the dust of the earth, I did stamp [crushed] them as the mire of the street, and [om. and] did spread them abroad [stamped them].
- 44 Thou also [And thou] hast delivered me from the strivings of my people, Thou hast kept me to be head of the heathen,
A people which I knew not, shall [om. shall] serve me.
- 45 Strangers shall submit themselves unto me [Strangers fawn on me],
As soon as they hear, they shall be [are] obedient unto me.
- 46 Strangers shall fade away,
And they shall be afraid out of their close places [strongholds].
- 47 The Lord [Jehovah] liveth, and blessed be my rock,
And exalted be the God of the rock of my salvation.
- 48 It is God [The God] that avengeth me,
And that [om. that] bringeth down the people [peoples] under me,
- 49 And that [om. that] bringeth me forth from mine enemies, Thou also [And thou] hast lifted me up on high above them that rose up against me [hast exalted me above my adversaries], Thou hast delivered me from the violent man.
- 50 Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord [Jehovah], among the heathen,
And I will sing praises unto thy name.
- 51 He is the tower of salvation for his king,
And sheweth mercy to his Anointed,
Unto [To] David and to his seed for evermore.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This song of praise and thanksgiving is (a few deviations excepted, which will be examined in the exposition) identical with Ps. xxviii. The superscription is substantially the same in the two productions. In the Psalm the opening words:

"to the precentor, by the servant of Jehovah, by David," are like the title of Ps. xxxvi.; then follows (in the form of a relative sentence: "who spake to Jehovah") the historical introduction in the same words as in ver. 1 of our chapter (except only that the second "hand" is given by different words): "And David spake to the Lord the words of this song," etc. The Davidic origin of the song, which is universally recognized (except by Olshausen and Hupfeld) is thus doubly attested. The redactor of our Books regards this as equally indubitable as in the other sayings and poems attributed to David, iii. 33, 34; v. 8; vii. 18-29; xxiii. 1-7. The high antiquity of the song is favored by its use in Ps. cxvi., cxliv., and the quotation of ver. 31 in Prov. xxx. 5, and of ver. 34 in Hab. iii. 19; and especially the early recognition of its Davidic origin is shown by the fact that the author of the Books of Samuel found the superscription, which ascribes the song to David, already in the historical authority whence he took the narrative (comp. Hitzig on Psalms, i. 95 sqq.). The source, whence Ps. xviii. also with its identical historical introduction was taken into the psalter (since it was evidently not taken from 2 Sam.) is doubtless one of the theocratic-prophetic historical works, from which Sam. has drawn. See the Introduction, pp. 31-35. The content also of the song puts its genuineness beyond doubt. The victories that God has given the singer over internal and external enemies, so that he is now a mighty king, the individual characteristics, which agree perfectly with the Davidic Psalms, and especially the singer's designation of himself by the name David (ver. 51), compel us to regard the latter as the author. "Certainly," says Hitzig, "this opinion will be derived from ver. 51. And rightly; for, if the song was not by David, it must have been composed in his name and into his soul; and who could this contemporary and equal poet be?"—On the position of the song in this connection midway among the sections of the concluding appendix, see Introduction, pp. 21-23. The insertion of the episodes from the Philistian wars (xxi. 15-22) gives the point of connection for the introduction of this song of victory, which David sang in triumph over his external enemies. And the reference at the close of this song (ver. 51) to the promise of the everlasting kingdom (2 Sam. vii. 12-16, 26, 29), which David now sees is assured by his victories, has obviously given the redactor the point of connection for David's last prophetic song (xxiii. 1-7), wherein is celebrated the imperishable dominion of his house, founded on the covenant that the Lord has made with him. Noticeable also is the bond of connection between the two songs in the fact that David calls himself by name in ver. 51 and xxiii. 1 just as in vii. 20.—The time of composition (the reference in ver. 51 to 2 Sam. vii. being unmistakable) cannot be before the date when David, on the ground of the promise given him through Nathan, could be sure that his dominion despite all opposition was immovable, and that the throne of Israel would remain forever with his house. The words of the title: "in the day when the Lord had saved him from the hand of all his enemies" agree with the description of victories in vers. 29-46, and point to a time when David had established his kingdom by war, and forced heathen princes to do homage (comp. vers. 44-49). But, as God's victorious help against external enemies is celebrated in the second part of the song, and the joyous tone of exultation shows that David's heart is taken up with the gloriousness of that help, it is a fair assumption that the song was written not after the turmoil of Absalom's conspiracy and the succeeding events (Keil), but immediately after the victorious wars narrated in chaps. viii. and x. Vers. 44, 45 may without violence be referred (Hitzig) to the fact related in viii. 9 sqq., that Toi, king of Hamath, presented his homage to David through his son Joram. So the reference to viii. 6, where the Syrians are said to have been conquered and brought gifts, is obvious. The conviction of the theocratic narrator (as expressed in the repeated remark, viii. 6, 14: "the Lord helped David, wherever he went") that David had the Lord's special help in these wars with Syria and Edom, accords with the free, joyous praise of the Lord's help in our song. The song was therefore very probably produced after the victories over the Syrians and Edomites, which were epoch-making for the establishment and extension of David's authority. David composed it doubtless at the glorious end of this war, looking at the same time at God's mercies to him in the early period of the Sauline persecution, and the internal wars with Saul's adherents (ii. 8-iv. 12), and making these subject-matter of praise and thanks to the Lord. The poet's imagination, in its contemplation of the two principal periods of war, moves backwards, presenting first the external wars, which were the nearest, and then the internal, with Saul and his house. The designation of time "in the day" (i. e., at the time, as in Gen. ii. 4 and elsewhere) "when the Lord had saved him from the hand of Saul," points to the moment of David's victory over all his enemies, when he could breathe freely and praise God.—The form of the superscription is similar to that of the superscriptions of the songs that are inserted in the history in Ex. xv. 1; Numb. xxi. 17; Deut. xxxi. 30. In Ps. xviii., as here, the song is introduced with the words: "and he said."

Vers. 2-4. The prologue of the song. With an unusually great number of predicates, David out of his joyously thankful heart, praises the Lord for His many deliverances. The numerous designations of God in vers. 2, 3 are the summary statement of what, as the song exhibits in detail, the Lord has been to him in all his trials. In ver. 4 the thankful testimony to the salvation that God (as above designated in vers. 2, 3) has vouchsafed him, is set forth as the theme of the whole song. The opening words of Ps. xviii. (ver. 2 [1]): "I love thee, O Lord, my strength," are wanting in our passage. The originality of this introduction, which the Syriac [of 2 Sam. xxii.] contains, and which "carries its own justification" (Thenius), is not to be doubted; it has here fallen out either "from illegible writing" (Thenius), or through mistake. "I deeply love thee," David's deep love to his God is the fruit of God's manifestations of love to him. Luther: "Thus he declareth his deepest love, that he delighteth in our Lord God; for he feelth that his benefits are unspeakable, and from this exceeding great delight and love it cometh that He giveth him so many names, as in what followeth." These words of Pa. xviii. 2 have occasioned the noble hymns: * "With all my heart, O Lord, I love Thee" (M. Schalling), and: "Thee will I love, my strength" (J. Scheffler).—The phrase: "my strength"† denotes not the inner power of heart received by David from God (Luther), but (as is shown by the following names of God, which all refer to outward help) the manifestations of the might of God amid the trials brought on him by enemies.—My rock and my fortress; the same designation is found in Pa. xxxi. 4 [3] and lxxi. 3. "My rock, properly cleft‡ of a rock, which gives concealment from enemies, = he who conceals me to save me. So in Pa. xlii. 10

[9] the strong God (לֵךְ), is called, over against pressing enemies, "my rock."—My fortress, § a place difficult of access from its height and strength, offering protection against ambush and attack, a watchtower. The natural basis for these figures is found in the frequent rock-clefts and steep, inaccessible hills of Palestine. Comp. Judg. vi. 2; Job xxxix. 27, 28; Isa. xxxiii. 16. The historical basis is furnished by David's experiences in Saul's time, when he was often obliged to betake himself to clefts and hills. Comp. 1 Sam. xxii. 5; xxxiii. 14, 19; xxiv. 1, 23.—The meaning of these concrete figures is indicated in the added expression: My deliverer. Böttcher would change the pointing and read: "My deliverance,"|| but there is no good ground for this, either in the occurrence of this latter word in Pa. lv. 9 [8] and cxliv. 2, or in the abstract expressions of ver. 4 [3]. Rather the indication of the Lord's personal, active help in the words saviour and saves, favors the reading "deliverer."—Ver. 3. God of my rock, of my house, my rock-God.

Pa. xviii. 3 [2] has: "my strong God (לֵךְ), my rock;" these separated predicates are here united into one expression. The word "rock" (comp. stone in Gen. xlix. 24), denotes the firmness and unshakableness of God's faithfulness, which is founded on the unchangeableness of His being (comp. Isa. xxvi. 4 sqq.) and gives assurance of unendangered, certain security. So in Deut. xxxii. 4, 37 God is called the rock as the God of faithfulness, whom one securely builds on and trusts (Pa. xcii. 16 [15]). Comp. ver. 47, where the name "rock-God" again occurs.—In whom I trust (the construction is relative). The "trust" as firm confidence answers to the rock-like firmness of the divine faithfulness, on which one may rely.—My shield, figure of covering against the attacks of enemies, protection against dangers. So in Gen. xv. 1 God calls Himself Abraham's shield, and in Deut. xxxiii. 29 He is the shield of the help [= the saving shield] of Israel. The figure is frequent in the Psalms; see iii. 4 [3]; vii. 11 [10, Eng. A. V.: defence]; xxviii. 7; lix. 12 [11], and elsewhere.—And horn of my salvation, denotes God's might and strength, which gives not only protection, but also help and salvation in the overcoming of enemies. The figure refers not to the horns of the altar (Hitzig, Moll), as if protection were the only thing involved, but to the horns of beasts, in which their strength is shown in the victorious repulse of an attack [or, in making an attack] (see 1 Sam. ii. 1, 10; Job xvi. 15; Pa. lxxv. 5, 6, 11 [4, 5, 10]; lxxxix. 18 [17]; xcii. 11 [10]; cxii. 9; cxlviii. 1). The Lord is not only protection against attacks, but also "a trusty shield and weapon" ("ein gute wehr und waffe") for victoriously combating and repelling them. Comp. Deut. xxxiii. 29, where the God of Israel is called the shield of their help and the sword of their excellency. The reference of the "horn" to a mountain-peak has small support from Isa. v. 1, and, as the comparison with the strength of horned beasts is so frequent, must be rejected.—My stronghold [Eng. A. V.: high tower], steep, lofty place, inaccessible and therefore safe, see Pa. ix. 10 [9 Eng. A. V.: refuge]. And my refuge, my Saviour, who saves me from violence. These words are wanting in Pa. xviii. Their insertion is not to be explained from the desire to give rhythmical completeness to the strophe left imperfect by the omission of the "I love Thee, Jehovah" (Keil), but from the effort (in accordance with the position of the song here in the midst of the history) to explain the preceding declarations about God in respect to the help actually given by Him. As a testimony to the deliverance vouchsafed David by God as his rock, etc., the words make the transition to ver. 4.—Most modern expositors regard all these appellatives as in apposition with "Jehovah," putting the latter in the vocative (so also Hitzig and Delitzsch) ["O Jehovah, my rock . . . my Saviour, Thou savest me from violence"]. But as Hupfeld (on Pa. xviii. 3 [2]) rightly remarks, this would produce too long and heavy an address. The "Jehovah" is therefore (with the older expositors and the ancient versions) to be taken as subject, and the appellations as declarations: "Jehovah is my rock and my fortress," etc.—Ver. 4. As the praised one I call on the Lord, or: I call on the praised one, the Lord.

The participle (מְלִי) does not mean "glorious" (Hengst., Hupf.), but (conformably to the frequent hallelujah) = "blessed," Pa. xlviii. 2 [1]; xvi. 4; cxlii. 3; cxlv. 3, comp. 1 Chr. xvi. 25; nor does it mean laudandus, "praiseworthy." [The Participles may have the force of the Lat. Fut. Passive; Eng. A. V.: "worthy to be praised," Vulg.: laudabilem; Sept.: ἀνεκλόω. The Chaldee (which paraphrases largely in ver. 3) takes it as active, and renders: "Said David. With praise I will pray before Jehovah." Ewald (on Pa. xviii.) renders it: "worthy to be praised."—Ta.] It is not vocative, but Accusative, and is put at the beginning of the sentence for the sake of emphasis, as in ver. 2; vii. 16; x. 7, 14, 17. David has actually praised the Lord in the preceding predicates; they form the content of the praise. The rendering: "Praised be Thou, I cry, O Jehovah" (G. Baur, Olshausen) does not accord with the following member: "and from my enemies I am saved." The verbs are not (with many old expositors) to be taken as future: "I will call, shall be saved," but as expressing undefined past time, comp. Ps. iii. 5 [4] [or, better as indefinite as to time, the Eng. general present.—Tr.]. David prefaces his song with this general, all-embracing declaration (based on all his experiences of the Lord's help), of which the sense is: "as often as (= when) I call on the Lord, I am saved," and he now proceeds to exhibit its truth by the citation of his experiences. He bases his confident appeal to the Lord for help on His manifestations of might, wherein he recognizes and praises God as his deliverer.

Vers. 5-28. First part of the description of the divine manifestation of help, experienced by David in the time of Saul's persecutions.

Vers. 5-7. From the description of the dangers that pressed on him (vers. 5, 6), he proceeds to the avowal that he called on the Lord for help, and was heard (ver. 7).—Ver. 5. For breakers of death had surrounded* me. The "for" (lacking in Ps. xviii. 5 [4]) introduces the following as the ground of the declaration of ver. 4. Instead of "breakers" the Ps. has "cords (bands)," representing death under the image of a hunter, comp. Ps. xci. 3. The "breakers" here correspond better to the "floods" of the next member.

"Floods of wickedness," the word (פְּלִיטָה) means properly "uselessness, worthlessness," commonly found in an ethical sense: "wickedness," comp. xvi. 7; xx. 1; xxiii. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 12; x. 27; xxv. 17, 25. It is found also in the physical sense of "destruction, harm," Nah. i. 11; Ps. xli. 9 [8, Eng. A. V.: evil disease]. So it must be taken here also, on account of the parallels: "breakers of death, nets of hell, snares of death." "Had terrified† me" (suddenly come upon me). [Dr. Erdmann in his translation, renders: "floods of wickedness," but his preceding statement requires: "floods of destruction," (so Delitzsch).—Tr.]—Ver. 6. Nets of hell [better: Sheol.†—Tr.]—snares of death. From the figure of water-waves the poet passes to that of the hunter, under which is represented the suddenly and treacherously attacking power of death. "Snares of death fall on me" (קִשְׁקִשׁ) comp. ver. 19; Ps. xvii. 13; Job xxx. 27.—The words of vers. 5, 6 describe not all the dangers of David's life up to this time (Keil, Ew., Hupf., Thol.), but the snares and persecutions that befell him in Saul's time. The description of peril of life agrees only with this time, which the title also expressly mentions. This view is favored also by the relation between the two sections, vers. 5-28 and 29-46, "in the first of which David is saved by God without effort on his part, while in the second, he is both object and instrument of the divine deliverance" (Hengst.). In the same direction Riehm (in Hupfeld) well remarks that David in the whole of the first part is only passive, not active (only God's hand saves him), but in the second part on the contrary himself as a warrior, wards off his enemies.—Ver. 7. Looking back at those deadly dangers, David affirms that he was driven by them to call on God, and was heard by him. In my distress* I called upon the Lord, and to my God I called. Instead of "called" the Ps. has "cried," answering to the distress that forced such a cry from him. And he heard my voice out of his palace, out of God's heavenly dwelling, as contrasted with the depth of distress on earth, out of which he sent up to God his cry for help. Comp. Ps. xvi. 4: "The Lord is in his holy palace, the Lord's throne is in heaven." Thence appears the Lord's help. [Eng. A. V., not so well: "temple," for, though heaven may be regarded as a temple, Jehovah is here represented as a king, enthroned in heaven and the word "temple" would most probably be understood by English readers of the earthly building consecrated to His service. The Hebrew word means both palace and temple.—Tr.] And my cry into his ears. The Ps., has the fuller vivid description: "and my cry came before him, into his ears;" our passage has the advantage of more emphatic brevity (comp. Hengst., Rem.).

Vers. 8-20. Splendid poetical description of God's help appearing in answer to his prayer, under the image of a terrible storm accompanied by an earthquake, the individual features being given with vivid coloring in accordance with the natural order of the phenomena. Comp. Tholuck, on Psalms, p. 91.—As the preceding description of distress refers not to the whole of David's life, but only to the Sauline period, so this poetical description is not to be understood of a real storm (as in 1 Sam. vii. 10) that terrified the enemy and saved David. Thenius, Ewald and Hitzig, indeed, so understand it, and refer it to a storm in a battle with the Syrians (2 Sam. vii. 5), and similarly others. But, in the first place, the connection is against this; for the deliverance described in vers. 17-20 is clearly none other than the salvation from the distress pictured in vers. 5-7. Further, the figure (here poetically elaborated) of a terrible storm, is the standing form of representation of God's glory and majesty in the revelation of His holiness and punitive justice, as in the fundamental passage, Ex. xix. (the legislation on Sinai). So are often represented God's theophanies for the revelation of His anger, for the accomplishment of His judgments, for the deliverance of His people from their enemies and for new unfoldings of the glory of His kingdom; comp. besides Ex. xix. 16-18, especially Judg. v. 4, 5; Isa. xxix. 6; xxx. 27-30; Joel ii. 10, 11; iii. 3 sq. [ii. 30, 31]; Nah. i. 3-6; Ps. 1. 2, 3; lxxvii. 17-19 [16-18]; xcvi. 2-5.—Certainly, "if the poet had meant by all this to say merely: 'God even in the greatest need, has accorded me almighty help,' the apparatus would in fact be too great" (Thenius). But the connection shows that he means to say more; looking at the fears and dangers of the gloomy time of Saul's persecution, he will comprehensively set forth how the Lord visited His wrathful judgments on the enemy that so oppressed him, God's servant, and in him endangered the cause of God's kingdom, and how the Lord by His invincible might, saved him and gave victory to his cause. "The combination of the figure of ver. 17 sqq., with other and general features, suggests that it also has a general reference." (Hupfeld). So Riehm (in Hupf., p. 465) remarks that the description has no historical reference, but by its poetical form, holds itself above the plane of concrete history.

* אָמַן, not: "press, drive" (after the Arab.), but, after indubitable tradition (comp. אָמַן "a wheel"), "encircle, surround," as poetic synonym of הִקִּיף וְהִקִּיף כִּבֵּר (Del. on Ps. xviii.).

* צָר, comp. Job xv. 24. Literally: "in the distress to me," that is, in this my distress; for the construction comp. Ps. lxi. 14; cvi. 44; cvii. 6 and elsewhere. This mode of expression is based on the common formula צָר לִי "it is strait to me," "I am in distress," the preposition being prepended here to a whole sentence, as commonly to a noun (Hupf.).

Ver. 8. The earthquake is the sign of God's approaching wrath; as the Lord descends from His temple in heaven to judgment on earth, the whole earth quakes before Him. There is probably in this an allusion to thunder as the voice of the approaching wrathful God, under the mighty peals of which heaven and earth shake; see Joel ii. 10, 11; iv. 16; [iii. 16]. Nah. i. 5. The effect is vividly represented in the text by paronomasia* in three verbs ("the earth was shaking and quaking, the foundations of heaven quailing and shaking").—The foundations of the heaven shake together with the earth. The Psalm, in which only the shaking of the earth is spoken of, has: "the foundations of the mountains." The mountains rising up towards heaven are, according to the natural view, regarded as the foundation on which heaven rests; comp. Job xxvi. 11, where they are called "the pillars of heaven." "The text of 2 Sam., represents the whole universe as trembling before Him, in order to picture strongly the terribleness of the wrath of the Almighty; so Joel. ii. 10, 11; iv. 16 [iii. 16]; Isa. xlii. 13." For he was wroth. The wrath of God is here expressly stated to be the cause of the trembling of heaven and earth.—Ver. 9. Elaboration of the preceding "he was wroth," by the description of the approaching appearance of the wrath of God, under the figure of smoke and fire. Smoke rose in his nostril—not: "in His anger" (Sept., Vulg., Stier), but (in keeping with the parallel "mouth") His nose, which is considered the seat of anger (so also in Greek and Latin writers); and so its smothering (comp. ver. 16), as in the case of an angry man, is the figure of God's anger, which, as a heightening of the image, is compared to smoke, as in Ps. lxxiv. 1; lxxx. 5 [4, Eng. A. V.; "be angry," literally: "smoke"]; Deut. xxix. 19. And fire devoured out of his mouth. Fire is a standing image of God's consuming anger (comp. Deut. xxxii. 22). The smoke, as the natural accompaniment of fire, denotes the uprising and approach of God's anger. For similar figure of smoke and fire see (besides the fundamental passage, Ex. xix. 18), Isa. lxi. 5. The "out of his mouth" is parallel to "out of his nose." The image of the mouth answers to the consuming force of the fire of wrath. The verb "devoured" is to be taken without an object (as "the enemy"); it stands absolutely (as in Ps. 1. 3), only the consuming power of the fire being indicated. Glowing coals burned out of him; the "glowing coals" is parallel to the "devouring fire," adding to the picture the feature of the flames that proceed from the fire. "Out of him," that is, out of His mouth, as a burning oven, pour the flames of the sea of fire (comp. Gen. xv. 17). The mouth is designated as the medium of the revelation of anger; because the fire of human anger pours from the heart through the mouth in angry words. The fire in the Lord's mouth is symbolized "as one flaming in full glow" (Hupfeld). There is no reference here to flashes of lightning. "These are the later product (comp. ver. 13) of the flame of fire and anger, that is here just kindled" (Hengst.). But since the representation of a rising storm (breaking out afterwards in ver. 13 with thunder and lightning) is carried out in the poetical conception, so in the picture thus far the image of smoke and flaming fire is to be referred to the rising of the storm-cloud and the flaming of the sheet-lightning that announces the storm (Tholuck).

Vers. 10-12. Now follows the poetical description of the appearance of the Lord from heaven under the figures of the thickening and gathering clouds, on which the Lord sweeps on as on a throne, and of the storm-wind, on whose wings He rushes.—Ver. 10. And he bowed the heavens—a picture of the low-hanging storm-clouds, at whose approach the heaven seems to bend down to the earth. Comp. Ps. cxliv. 5; Isa. lxiii. 19.—And came down, the descent of the Lord from heaven to earth to execute judgment on David's enemies, and deliver him. On the indication of God's coming to judgment by His "descent from heaven," comp. Gen. xi. 7; xviii. 21; Isa. lxiv. 1.—And cloud-darkness under His feet, i. e., He thus descended. The dark, black cloud* (= darkness, ver. 12) is the symbol of the terror that the wrath of God carries with it; see Ex. xix. 16 [Sinai]; xx. 21; Deut. v. 19; Ps. civ. 29 (a figure of the hiding of God's face); Nah. i. 3 ("clouds are the dust of his feet").—Ver. 11. And he rode on the cherub and flew.—As to the signification of the cherub, see on 1 Sam. iv. 4. As the cherubim on the cover of the ark (Ex. xxv. 18 sqq.; xxxvii. 7 sqq.) are the bearers of the divine majesty and glory (vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; Ps. lxxx. 2 [1]; xcix. 1; Isa. xxxvii. 16), so here also the cherub is the symbol of God's almighty power and glory, as it appears in the creaturely world, and exhibits itself as the revelation of the highest and completest being (Winer, R.-W., s. v., Hengst. on Ps. xviii. 11 [10]). The "rode" is defined by the "flew." The conception of flying is harmonized with that of riding on the cherub (as a chariot or throne) by the wings with which the cherub is provided.—And appeared on the wings of the wind; this, as the preceding, sets forth the majesty in which God appears in the creation in the elementary substratum of the wind, to hold judgment. Comp. Isa. v. 28; Nah. i. 3: "in tempest and storm is his way," and Ps. civ. 3, where, instead of the cherub, the clouds are conceived of as the vehicle, and the wings of the wind as the bearers of the appearance of His glory.—Instead of "appeared" Ps. xviii. 11 [10] has "flew" (הָמָה). The latter (which occurs also Deut. xxviii. 49; Jer. xlviii. 40; xlix. 22) carries out the figure of the wings of the wind; here, on the contrary, our "appeared" is, if not an elucidation (Keil, v. Leng.), a real statement instead of a poetical figure. But there is no necessity for regarding it as a scribal error (Stier, Thenius), or as a "vague, flat and inappropriate reading" (Hupfeld).—Ver. 12. Development of the second half of ver. 10, as ver. 11 is of the first half. And he made darkness around him booths [Eng. A. V.: pavilions]. The clouds mass more closely; their darkness grows blacker. The "darkness" is that of the clouds of ver. 10 b. He makes the cloud-darkness "booths, tents" for Himself. The Psalm has more fully: "he made darkness his secret place, his pavilion round about him darkness of waters, thick clouds of the skies." On the "round about" comp. Ps. xcvi. 2 ("clouds and darkness are around him"), and on the "booths [pavilions]" Job xxxvi. 29, where the clouds are called God's tabernacle or tent.—Gathering of waters, cloud-thicket is further explanation of the "darkness" of the first clause. Instead of "gathering* of waters" the Ps. has "darkness of waters" [which is here unnecessarily adopted by Eng. A. V.—Tr.]; the former is obviously more picturesque.—Vers. 13-15. Issuing of lightning-flashes out of this darkness, and bursting of the storm amid thunder and lightning. Out of the brightness before him burned coals of fire. The expression "brightness before him" points back to the fire in ver. 9, the flames of sheet-lightning as symbol of the divine anger. Out of this fiery brightness before him "burned coals of fire," i. e., darted the flashes of lightning, which are, as it were, the sharpening of that flaming fire-anger into separate fiery arrows (comp. ver. 15). The "brightness before him" is not the dora [glory] of God embracing light and fire (Hupf., Del.), because in the connection only the fire of God's anger is spoken of, and if the singer had here had in view the light in which God dwells (Ps. civ. 2), he would necessarily have used the general term "glory" (כְּבוֹד, doḥa). The natural basis of the poetical description is the blinding brightness of the flaming fire, which in a storm seems to cleave the clouds and send forth flashes of lightning.—To this refers the deviating text of the Psalm: "from the brightness before him his clouds passed away (or went to pieces)," comp. Job xxx. 15.—Ver. 14. The Lord thundered from heaven. Since lightning and thunder appear so close together, the storm is very near, God's wrathful judgment bursts on the enemy. Instead of "from heaven" the Ps. has "in heaven." God is here called the Most High as "the all-controlling, unapproachable judge" (Del.). The "giving [uttering] his voice" is poetical designation of thunder; see Job xxxvii. 3; Ps. xxix. 3 sqq., comp. Ex. ix. 23; Ps. xlv. 7 [6]; lxxviii. 34 [33]; lxxvii. 18. The phrase "hailstones and coals of fire" found in the Ps. in this verse and the preceding, is wanting here.—Ver. 15. And he sent out arrows; the Ps. has: "his arrows." These are the flashes of lightning (comp. lxxvii. 18) into which the foe-destroying fire of wrath concentrates and sharpens itself. The wrathful, punishing God is represented under the figure of a warrior armed with bow and arrows, as in many other passages, Ps. vii. 13, 14 [12, 13]; xxxviii. 3 [2]; Job vi. 4; Deut. xxxii. 23; Lam. iii. 12, 13.—And scattered them, that is, the enemies, comp. vers. 4, 18. The pronoun "them" does not refer to the arrows and lightning. The first effect is the scattering of the compact masses, into which the enemies had thrown themselves. Lightning, and discomfited (them). The Ps. has: "and lightnings much (innumerable)" [Eng. A. V. (with Kimchi) "shot out lightnings"]. The verb here is to be supplied from the preceding, as in vers. 12, 14, 42. "He discomfited" (so Jerome); the Ps. has: "and discomfited them," from which the Qeri [margin] omits* the suffix "them." The further effect of the Lord's interference is the complete destruction of the enemy; comp. Ex. xiv. 24; xxiii. 27; Josh. x. 10; Judg. iv. 15; 1 Sam. vii. 10.—Ver. 16. And the beds of the sea became visible. The Ps. has the weaker expression: "brooks of water." Uncovered were the foundations of the earth;† that is, the bottom of the sea, the waters being blown away; a parallel description to the preceding. In addition to the thunder and lightning from above comes the storm-wind (which accompanies the storm) and the earthquake, which has already been pictured (ver. 8) as an effect of God's anger. By the rebuking of the Lord, that is, the expression of anger in the voice of the thunder (ver.

* נָעַשׂ, רָעַשׂ, רָגַז.—The Qeri רָעַשׂ is doubtless an imitation of the following רָגַז (especially as נָעַשׂ does not elsewhere occur in Qal), and is to be rejected, since then רָגַז immediately afterwards would be Masc. and Fem. The רָעַשׂ (Kethib) is, as in the Psalm-text, to be pointed רָעַשׂ (forming complete paronomasia with the רָעַשׂ), unless it be preferred to read (with several codices) רָעַשׂ according with the רָעַשׂ, = properly "to move hither and thither" (Hitzig).

‡ תִּבְלָה, poetic designation of the earth, Ps. lxxxix. 12 [11]; xc. 2; xciii. 1; xcv. 10—יִבְלָה by poetic license without י, which is to be supplied from the preceding verb.

14); comp. Ps. civ. 7, where the waters of the chaos are affrighted at the rebuke of God (parallel to His thunder-voice). At the snorting of the breath of his nose, comp. ver. 9. The Psalm has the second person, turning in sudden address to Jehovah: "at thy rebuke and thy anger." The "breakers of death" and the "streams of evil" have, according to ver. 5 overwhelmed David. Under the image of water-waves he has there depicted the dangers that threatened his life. This alone would prevent our supposing that we have here a mere poetic-hyperbolic delineation of the tumult of the waters as result of the storm, in order to fill out the picture (Hupf.). But the following account (ver. 17) of deliverance "out of great waters" is still more opposed to this view. In his distress David was overwhelmed as by mighty water-floods. The Lord, revealing His anger against his enemies, saves him by laying bare the depths of the sea in which he had sunk, and uncovering the foundations of the earth by the storm-wind of His wrath (so Delitzsch). Thither descending from on high the Lord seized him and drew him forth from the waves, as is described in the following verses. There is therefore as little ground for the view of Hitzig, that the waves denote the host of the enemy, and the bottom the ground on which they stood and from which they were driven, as for that of Thenius, that the assumed battle was near a large inland sea (he conjectures the Bahr el Atebe near Damascus, about as large as the sea of Genesaret), and that the description is thus to be taken "almost literally." The interpretation of the "foundations of the earth" as Sheol (Hengst., Keil) is without support in the text.

Vers. 17-20. After the description of the descent of God from heaven to save, David now traces the deliverance itself, and praises the Lord for it.—Ver. 17. "He sent forth," the word "hand" (Ps. cxliv. 7) is to be supplied, as in vi. 6; Ps. lvii. 4 [3] = He reached out from on high, that is, from heaven. In spite of the "came down" of ver. 10, which refers to God's throne in heaven, the poetical view holds fast to the conception of God's elevation above men. "He drew me out of many waters." The verb (מָשַׁךְ) occurs elsewhere only in Ex. ii. 10 of Moses, whose name is formed* from it, and whose deliverance from the waters of the Nile is here probably alluded to. Luther: "he made a Moses of me." The "many waters" [better in Erdmann's translation: "great waters"—Ta.] are not enemies, but the deadly perils that had befallen him, comp. ver. 5; Ps. xxxii. 6; lxvi. 12; lxix. 2, 3 [1, 2]; Isa. xlii. 2, where water is a figure of great distress and danger.—Ver. 18. Here David first passes from his perils to his enemies. He delivered me from my enemy, the strong† one. "The song here passes from the epic to a more lyric tone, and direct discourse takes the place of figurative" (Del.). The Sing. "my enemy" does not justify the supposition of an individual enemy, but from the following "my haters" is to be taken as collective, though the name Saul rightly stands as superscription to this whole picture of distress. Because they were stronger* than I, had overpowered me. God's saving interposition was necessary, since David in his weakness felt himself overpowered by his enemies—extreme impotence requires divine help.—Ver. 19. Elucidation of the last words of ver. 18. They fell on† me in the day of my calamity. This is not a definite day, but the time of his helplessness in the Sauline persecution; their purpose was to finish him by a sudden attack, and so self-help was impossible. And the Lord became a stay to me. After deliverance comes support.† Compare for the thought Psalm xxiii. 4.—Verse 20. And he brought me forth into a large place, into a condition of freedom,‡ in contrast with narrowness, straits. The "me"|| is emphatic. The words: He delivered me, here in conclusion embrace all that has been heretofore said of the process of deliverance. Observe the progression in the description up to this point: the dispersion and confounding of the enemy by the arrows of the lightning, the driving off of the water-waves and laying bare of their foundations by the storm; then the stretching forth of the hand, seizing, drawing out of the great waters, supporting the helpless man, bringing him out of straits into freedom, and thus completing the deliverance.—For He delighted in me—the ground of the Lord's deliverance, over against the enemies, on whom had come God's wrath and judgment. This delight of the Lord in Him (Ps. xxii. 9 [8]; xli. 12 [11]) is based on his integrity, as is brought out in what follows. There follows, namely.

Vers. 21-28, the exhibition of the ground of his deliverance; it is his righteousness, according to which the Lord required him.—Ver. 21. The declaration and avowal that God in saving him required him according to his righteousness. The verb|| [Eng. A. V.: "reward"] (comp. Ps. vii. 17 [16]) signifies to do something to a person, whether bad or good, but with reference to his conduct as ground, hence to requite.—According to the cleanness of my hands he recompensed me.—The hands are the instrument of action, and "cleanness of hands" signifies the purity of his actions from sin and unrighteousness. Comp. ver. 25; Ps. vii. 5 [4]; xxiv. 4; xxvi. 6; Job ix. 30; xxii. 30. To this answers purity of mind (expressed in the "upright" of ver. 24), as source of purity of conduct. David often thus affirms his uprightness, for ex., xvii. 3-5. The truth of this testimony to himself is exhibited in his actual conduct as described in vers. 22-24, where he gives the ground (י) for the declaration that he is "righteous" and "his hands clean."—[On the ethical and religious significance of this claim to righteousness, see "Historical and Theological" to this chapter, paragraph 6.—Tr.]—Ver. 22. He proved his righteousness by the affirmation: I have kept the ways of the Lord. "Have observed, held to," so Job xxii. 15. "The ways of the Lord" are the rules of human conduct given in His law, which David's enemies had wickedly transgressed.—And have not wickedly departed from my God, as he has kept God's ways, so he has not sinned himself away from God Himself. The phrase is literally: "to be wicked from God," that is, to fall away from God by wickedness. Not (as Grotius): "to be wicked against (י) God," nor is it a designation of judgment or decision proceeding from God, as if the sense were: "I have not sinned according to God's decision, according to His judgment I am guiltless" (Hupf.); comp. Job iv. 17; Jer. li. 5. Against this is both the "keeping the Lord's ways" in the first member, to which corresponds "not departing from" the Lord, and the following reference [ver. 23] to his abiding in God's statutes and judgments.—Ver. 23. "For* all thy judgments are before me," that is, as a guide in my ways.—And His statutes, I do not depart from them.† The reading of the Psalm: "His statutes I do not put away from me," is not elsewhere found, while our text is the usual expression for the conception. For the thought compare the divine testimony to David, 1 Kings xiv. 8: "who kept my commandments, and walked after me with all his heart," and xv. 5; "David did what was right in the eyes of the Lord, and departed not from all that He commanded him." Comp. also David's testimony concerning himself, 1 Sam. xxvi. 23 sq.—Ver. 24. "And I was upright‡ towards him," that is, upright in soul, the "towards him" (ל) expressing the immediate relation to God, in contrast with outward works, which are done for one's own sake or for men's. The "with him" of the Psalm expresses still more exactly cordial communion of life with God.—And guarded myself from my iniquity, the negative side of his moral character, of which he has just given the positive side: "I guarded against committing a sin, and so contracting guilt." A similar hypothetical expression [i. e., if I sinned, I should be guilty] is found in Ps. xvii. 3 (Hupfeld), and so essentially Job xxxiii. 9: "there is no iniquity in me." David declares that he constantly watches over and restrains himself; otherwise, the assumption is, he would have fallen into sin; this is an indirect testimony to indwelling sinfulness, whereby he might have been led to sinful deed, and against which such self-guarding was necessary. Comp. Psalm li. 7 [5], where David expressly declares his consciousness of sinfulness inborn in him, which is not the case here.—The historical proofs of David's declaration of purity are given in 1 Sam. xxiv. xxvi. though he at this moment may not have had all the individual facts in mind.—Vers. 22-24 exhibit the climax: ver. 22 proof of uprightness in outward walk, ver. 23 practice of righteousness in obedience to God's commands as its norm, ver. 24, source of righteousness in a pious disposition directed towards God.—Ver. 25. Repetition of the affirmation of ver. 21 (the proof of his "righteousness" and "cleanness of hands" having been given in vers. 22-24) in the form of a logical conclusion: And so the Lord required me, etc. Literally: "and required me the Lord," where the "and," connecting this with the preceding, indicates a logical relation [the logical relation is indicated by the progress of the discourse, not by the Conjunction, in Hebrew or in Eng.—Tr.]. Instead of "my cleanness" the Psalm has "the cleanness of my hands," as in ver. 21.

Vers. 26, 27. General proposition, explaining and supporting the word: "the Lord required me" by the truth, that God deports Himself to man as man to Him. This moral relation between God and man is carried out in four parallel members, "in which the divine conduct is expressed by reflexive verbs, formed from the adjectives expressing human conduct" (Keil). The Imperfects express what is universal and necessary. The general truth that the manifestation of God's retributive righteousness is conditioned by man's position and conduct towards God, is set forth positively in vers. 26, 27 a in relation to the pious, and negatively in ver. 27 b in relation to the ungodly. Towards the pious [better: merciful—Tr.], upright and clean, God shows Himself pious [merciful], upright and pure. The adjectives express qualities* of man in relation to God; the "love" here expressed is not towards man, but towards God, (חַסֵּד, Eng. A. V. merciful), and to such God shows Himself loving. [Rather the adjectives express general qualities without any statement that they refer only to God. The first of these adjectives means either "favored, beloved" or "merciful," and the latter sense is more appropriate here.—Tr.].—Towards the perverse thou shewest thyself perverse, that is, requiting to the perverse man perverse things as the consequence of his sin, thou seemest to Him to be thyself perverse. The ungodly man, failing to recognize his own sin, thinks of God as unjust and cruel towards him. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 23, 24; "if ye walk perversely towards me; I will walk perversely towards you." Moral perversity in man produces perversity and confusion in his knowledge of God. [The thought here, however, is simply that God does evil to the man that does evil.—Tr.].—Ver. 28 gives the ground and confirmation of the general truth in vers. 26, 27, by pointing to God's actual conduct towards the two principal classes in the people, the humble and the proud, who represent concretely the preceding contrast between the upright (merciful, pure) and the perverse. The factual relation of this verse to the preceding is indicated in the Psalm by the initial "for thou," while here the simple "and" is used, in order to avoid a too frequent recurrence of the causal conjunction, as ver. 29 begins with "for thou," and ver. 30 with "for." The word "people"* is here limited (by the contrast with the "haughty" of the following clause) to a large community within the nation, characterized by the epithet "afflicted," and the following contrast shows that they are also "humble." "Thine eyes are against the haughty," who oppress the poor and afflicted; "whom thou bringest down" (the verb is to be taken as relative, Ew. § 332 b, comp. Josh. ii. 11; iii. 12; v. 15). The Psalm has in the second member: "lofty eyes (elevated eye-brows, sign of haughtiness) thou bringest down." Comp. Prov. vi. 17; xxi. 4; xxx. 13; Ps. ci. 5.

Vers. 29–46. Second part of the description of the help that David received from the Lord, namely, in wars against external enemies.—Looking back at these wars, he tells how through the Lord's help he had overcome his enemies. But he looks also to the present and to the future, declaring what the Lord, after such aid, still is to him and ever will be. So in this section occur verbs of past, present and future times.—Ver. 29. First, he declares what the Lord (in connection with the exhibitions of grace in the Sauline persecution) is for him perpetually. The "for" attaches this verse as the ground or confirmation of the preceding, where David included himself among the "afflicted people," the oppressed; the Lord has helped him "the afflicted one" out of the affliction brought on him by his enemies. All these experiences of divine help find their reason or ground in the fact that the Lord is his lamp.† While "light" is always the symbol of good fortune and well-being (Job xviii. 5), the burning lamp denotes the source of lasting happiness and joyful strength; Job xviii. 6; xxi. 17; xxix. 3; Ps. cxxxii. 17;

comp. Isa. xlii. 3; xliii. 17. The Psalm has the unusual expression: "thou makest light my lamp."—What the lamp is for a man in his house, the source of joy and good fortune, this the Lord is for David: his lamp, the source of his well-being. This is the ground of David's being called (xxi. 17) the lamp of Israel. This is the ground of the declaration: "the Lord is my light." (Ps. xxvii. 1). The consequence of this is: The Lord enlightens my darkness. Darkness is the symbol of affliction—in contrast with light, without God, his lamp, he would have remained in wretchedness and ruin. His experiences are based on the general truth: it is the Lord who, as His lamp, makes even the darkness light about Him. Comp. Job xxix. 3. In the Psalm: "The Lord, my God, makes my darkness light." This general declaration, proved by the past, is confirmed also for the future by setting forth the foe-conquering might which he, through the Lord's help, has shown and will forever be able to show.—Ver. 30. For with thee I run against troops, with my God I leap over walls—literally: "in thee;" "David declares that he is 'in God,' and therefore has such power." (Hengst.). By "troops" David means the hostile bands that he has attacked on the battle-field, and by "walls" the fortified places that he has conquered. Such power of victory he has now also in his God. Since the verb "run" here properly takes an Accus., it is unnecessary to take the word in the sense "crush" (Ew., Olah.)*. "Running" is represented as an essential quality of the warrior in ver. 34; 1, 19, 23; ii. 18, and means (with the prep. "against" or "to") hostile attack Job xv. 26; vi. 14; Dan. viii. 6. [Eng. A. V., not so well: "run through.—Tr.].—Ver. 31. The word "God" is in apposition with the: "with my God" in ver. 30 (as in vers. 33, 48), not nominative Absolute [so Eng. A. V.], since then the Art. [Heb.: the God] would be unexplained: The God whose way is blameless, that is, whose government is perfect. This human quality of perfectness is transferred to God, and denotes His trustworthiness. The word of the Lord is purified, that is, without guile, pure, true, comp. Ps. xii. 7 [6]. God's promises do not deceive. He is a shield to all that trust in Him. He offers sure protection against all dangers. The second and third members of this verse occur word for word also in Prov. xxx. 5. All these affirmations respecting God give the ground for the declaration in ver. 30, that he can do so great things in and with his God.—Ver. 32. The solemnity of the Lord as such a God, is next stated as the ground ("for") of the fact that His way is perfect. His word pure and His protection sure. The expression "rock" (comp. ver. 3) especially emphasizes the quality of trustworthiness, firmness as the foundation for immovable trust, and the ground of his help and protection. Parallel is vii. 22; "for there is no one as thou, and there is no God beside thee." Comp. Deut. xxxii.

* אָרָץ with Acc. (as the following אֲרָץ, object reached by the motion. Ew. and Olah. unnecessarily take it from רָצַץ.—The Ps. has בָּךְ instead of בְּךָ, and אָרָץ instead of אֲרָץ.

31; 1 Sam. ii. 2.—Ver. 33 carries on the thought connected with the figure of the "rock." The "God" here is in opposition with the "God" at the end of the preceding verse. The God who is my strong fortress. [Eng. A. V., not so well: "my strength and power."]. On the "fortress" comp. Ps. xxxi. 5 [4]; xxvii. 1. [Eng. A. V.: "strength."]. The noun "strength" defines "my fortress," literally: "my fortress of strength," as in Ps. lxxi. 7*.—The Psalm has: "who girds me with strength," = ver. 40 a (with omission of "to battle").—And leads† the perfect man on his way. The pronoun on "his way" refers not to God, but to the "perfect man," as is required by the "his feet" [Eng. A. V.: "my feet"] of the next verse. The Psalm has: "who makes my way perfect." [This is the marginal reading (Qeri) here also: "my way," and seems to agree better with the context, in which the Psalmist is speaking of his own experiences.—Tr.]—Ver. 34. He makes his feet like the hinds, that is, like hinds' feet; Hab. iii. 18. (On this abridged form of expression see Ges. § 144, Rem.) Hengstenberg: "In Egyptian paintings also the hind is the symbol of fleetness." Comp. ii. 18; 1 Chr. xii. 8. The Psalm: "my feet" [so Eng. A. V. here, after the margin]; the third personal pronoun is used here because the reference is to the "perfect (or innocent)" man [in ver. 33 according to the author's translation]. The swiftness refers not to fleeing (De Wette), but to the pursuit of enemies. And on my high-places He sets me. The "high-places" are not those of the enemy, which he ascends as victor, and through faith declares beforehand to be his own (Hengst.), but "those of his own land, which he victoriously holds against his enemies" (Keil). Comp. Deut. xxxii. 13.—Ver. 35. He instructs my hands for war,† and my arms bend the bronze bow. Or, perhaps (with Hupf.): "He instructs my hands for war, and my arms to bend‡ the bronze bow." "The Egyptian weapons were almost all of bronze" (Hengst.). To bend the bronze bow is the sign of great strength; the thought expressed is: God has given him not only skill, but also strength for victorious war.—Ver. 36. From the figure of the bow David passes to that of the shield. As in attack, so in defence the Lord is his strength. And thou gavest me the shield of thy salvation, the shield that consists in God's salvation, whereby He protects His people. Comp. Eph. vi. 17: "helmet of salvation." The following words in the Psalm: "and thy right hand supported me" are wanting here; they seem to have been omitted, not through error, but for brevity's sake, as in general our song, compared with the Psalm, shows a preference for curt, pregnant expression. And thy hearing made me great. Hearing = favorable acceptance of a request. This "hearing" (not "thy lowliness," Hengst., or "thy toil," Böttch.) answers to the "salvation" of the preceding clause; he received salvation through God's granting his petition. The Psalm has: "thy humility, condescension" (comp. Ps. cxlii. 6; Isa. lvii. 15; lxvi. 1 sq.) [Eng. A. V., following the pointing of the Psalm, renders: "thy gentleness" ("meekness" would be a more accurate translation). Our text reads literally: "thy answering," or "thy toiling, suffering," neither of which gives a satisfactory sense in the connection. The reading of the Psalm is better.—Tr.]—Ver. 37. Thou enlargedst my steps under† me, gave me free room, so that I could advance without hindrance. Prov. iv. 12 presents the contrasted condition of straitness and stumbling: "when thou goest, thy steps shall not be straitened, and when thou runnest, thou shalt not stumble," comp. ver. 34. Hupfeld remarks rightly that we have not here merely the usual contrast of narrowness and wideness = distress and deliverance (Ps. iv. 2 [1], comp. Ps. xxxi. 9 [8]); the wide path (step) is prepared by the Lord for the successful termination of the battle, especially for the unhindered pursuit of the enemy (ver. 38). And my ankles wavered not (elsewhere: "my feet, or steps, Ps. xxvi. 1; xxxvii. 31), that is, thou gavest me the power so to go with free step. Wavering, as opposed to standing firm, comes from weakness in the knees or ankles.

Vers. 38-43. After this preparation and equipment for battle by the Lord's strength, David destroyed the power of his enemies.—Vers. 38, 39. The act of pursuit and destruction is declared to be his own act. The verbs are to be taken in the Imperfect signification, since it is clear from ver. 40 sqq.† that the reference is to the past. I pursued my enemies and destroyed them; the Psalm has the weaker expression: "overtaken them" (Ps. vii. 6 [5] comp. Ex. xv. 9). In the Psalm there is an advance in the thought, here a simple synonymous parallelism (Hengst.). Ver. 39 expresses the idea of total destruction by an aggregation of words: "and I destroyed them (wanting in the Psalm) and crushed them." That they rose not; Psalm: "and they could not rise," that is, in the hostile sense, rise to further contest. And they fell under my feet, = under me, vers. 40, 48; Ps. xlv. 6; xlvii. 4 [3]. Vers. 38 and 40 present a picture not of subjection and dominion (Hupf.), but of conquering enemies in battle by casting them down and passing over them.—Vers. 40, 41. David declares, however, that he received the victorious might only from the Lord, and gives Him praise therefor. And thou didst gird me . . . and didst bow my wretched (comp. Ex. xviii. 18). In the next clause the Psalm has "trembled" [= came trembling], while our passage (unless it be an error of copyist for the Psalm-word*) has: "they hobble (their strength being broken) out of their enclosures (or, fortresses);" it is not to be rendered: "they gird themselves (in order to come forth)" (Hengst. [Phil.]), since this does not accord with the representation here given of voluntary subjection. The reference of the words to "prisons and bonds," into which the strangers are thrown as "refractory" (Böttcher) is against the connection, which speaks only of unconditional obedience and complete subjection of enemies. Rather there is supposed here the wretched condition produced by a long siege; the enemy come out of the fastnesses, in which they have long been cooped up, in miserable condition, in order to submit themselves to the victor.—[Eng. A. V. adopts the Psalm-text: "shall be afraid," and so Erdmann in his translation: "tremble," and this is perhaps preferable, comp. Micah vii. 17.—In vers. 45, 46, Erdmann renders the verbs Present in his translation (fawn, obey, wither, tremble), while in the Exposition he makes them Aorist (fawned, etc.); the former is better.—Tr.]

Vers. 47-51. Conclusion of the song. On the ground of the deliverances he has experienced (here briefly recapitulated from the content in a number of epithets) David first again praises God (vers. 47-49), as in the beginning of the song. To this phrase, which looks to the past, he adds the vow of thanksgiving (vers. 50, 51), looking beyond Israel to the salvation to come to the heathen, and prophesying the fulfilment for all time of the promises given to him, God's Anointed, and to his seed.

Ver. 47. "Living is the Lord." So must the phrase ("יְיָ") be rendered, and not optatively: "long live Jehovah," transferring (as most modern expositors do) the usual formula of homage: "long live the king" (xvi. 16; 1 Sam. x. 24; 1 Kin. i. 25, 39; 2 Kings xi. 12) to God as king of Israel. That formula (יְיָ הַמֶּלֶךְ) relates to the mortality of the king. Our phrase is the standing oath-formula [as the Lord liveth, by the life of Jehovah], and always assumes life [vitality] to be exclusively an attribute of God. Here only the formula is not an oath, but a declaration: living is the Lord!—an exclamation in the tone of a doxology. Comp. 1 Tim. vi. 16: "God, who alone has immortality." God is here called living not in contrast with the idols of the heathen (v. Leng., Hengstenberg), to which there is no allusion in the context, but in reference to the enemies and dangers from which God saved him. And so the two following exclamations are simply declarations of the being of God as it has been revealed in the preceding experiences of the singer. Blessed (praised), my rock! (see ver. 2).—Exalted is the rock-God of my salvation.—The Psalm has merely: "The God of my salvation." The "exalted" is to be taken not subjectively (exalted by the praise offered Him), but objectively, exalted in His own majesty and might (Ps. xlii. 11 [10]; xxi. 14 [13]; lvii. 6, 12 [5, 11]). Not: "be he exalted" (so Eng. A. V.) The rock-God of my salvation = the rock-like God, who brings me salvation; comp. ver. 3. To the three declarations of what God is, answer, in vers. 48, 49 the statements of God's deeds, wherein David has learned what He is to him, and wherein He has shown Himself to be the living, rock-firm and exalted God. Here God's deeds of deliverance (as described in vers. 5-20, 29-46) are briefly brought together.—Ver. 48. The God that avenges me.—This shows that God lives, inasmuch as He does not leave His servant as a guilty man in the power of the enemy, but manifests his innocence by executing vengeance† for him. In Ps. xciv. 1 God is "the God of vengeance." And subjects (lit.: makes come down) nations under me.—The Psalm has: "drives† [or subdues] nations under me" (the expression is found elsewhere only in Psalm xlvii. 4 [3]).—Ver. 49. Who brought me forth from my enemies (comp. ver. 20).—Psalm: "delivered me." [In ver. 48 Dr. Erdmann renders the verbs in past time (gave, subdued) in his translation; the time can be determined only from the context; here the present seems better.—Tr.] And from my adversaries thou liftedst me on high—that is, on a rock, pregnant construction for: thou liftedst me up and thereby savedst me from my enemies. The declaratory discourse here passes into address. From the man of violent deeds thou savedst me.—Instead of the unusual plural (Ps. cxl. 2, 5 [1, 4]) the Ps. has the Sing. "man [or, men] of violence." Most expositors take the phrase collectively: "men of violence," (as Prov. iii. 31) of a whole class of enemies. But it accords better with this conclusion and with the whole content of the song to refer the phrase to Saul, who is also expressly mentioned in the superscription. In ver. 47 David declares in general what God is to him, and how He has announced and attested Himself to him in all His deeds of deliverance; then in ver. 48 he looks at God's help against external enemies ("thou broughtest down nations under me"), comp. vers. 29-46; in ver. 49 he recalls the deliverances of the Sauline persecution. With the thought of Saul, whose rejection by the Lord was the cause of his enmity to the Lord's Anointed called in in his stead, connects itself naturally in David's mind (on the ground of the Lord's choice) the thought of the salvation that God has bestowed on him as His Anointed, and—of this he is sure—will also further bestow on him and his seed. This salvation He will also proclaim among the heathen, that they along with Israel may share therein.

Vers. 50, 51. The "therefore" attaches the declaration in these verses as a consequence to the

* The Psalm has the ar. ley. חָרַן (Chald. חֲרָנָא) "to be frightened," — חָרַן "tremble" (in Mic. vii. 17 in the same connection). Our passage has חָרַן, perhaps error for חָרַן; if it be correct, it is not "gird" (which does not suit the connection), but (with Hitz., Del., Böttch., Then.) after the Aramaic, — "halt, hobble" (Talmud. חָרַן "lame").

* This would require יָלִים instead of יָרִים.

† This would require יָלִים instead of יָרִים. "To take" vengeance, always in the plural. "To take" vengeance, here and iv. 8. עָשָׂה Judg. xi. 36; Ezek. xxv. 17. חָרַן.

preceding summary laudation of God's deeds of salvation. David here expresses a resolution and a vow ever to praise the Lord's name. This vow of thanksgiving he so presents that he 1) expressly declares his praise (by the therefore) to be a thank-offering due to the Lord, also his rightful fruit from the preceding experiences of his salvation. To thy name will I sing.—The name of God is here the concept [or representative] of all His deeds of deliverance, whereby He has revealed Himself as his God and his people's, as which David has hitherto praised him. 2) David declares the extent to which he will proclaim the praise of his God: I will praise thee, O Lord, among the nations.—The nations are not only to be subdued by force, but are now to learn to know the living God of Israel and His salvation; His praise is therefore not to be confined to the land of Israel, but to be proclaimed among the heathen. This presumes that He is the God of the heathen also, and that they are called to share in the salvation revealed to Israel. Comp. Ps. ix. 12 [11]; lvii. 10 [9]; xcvi. 3, 10; cv. 1; Isa. xii. 4. In proof of this truth Paul (Rom. xv. 9) quotes this passage along with Ps. cxvii. 1, and Deut. xxxii. 43.—3) As the ground of his vow David declares the Lord's promise of good to Him, and his seed (ver. 51). "Who makes great the salvation of his king," literally: "salvations," the plural indicating the manifoldness and richness of the salvation. The marginal reading: "fullness of salvation" is a singular conjecture,* and must be rejected; it is obviously instead of the similar form, = "tower," Ps. lxi. 4 [3]; Prov. xviii. 10 [Eng. A. V. also adopts this reading "tower," against which, however, are all the ancient versions and the best Heb. manuscripts.—Tr.]. The text, = "he who makes great," is to be retained. It refers to the fullness of salvation (certainly to be expected on the ground of the divine promises) that the Lord will bestow in ever increasing richness on His king, the theocratic ruler that He has called and inducted, who regards himself only as God's instrument. God's "grace [mercy]" is the source of his "manifestations of salvation." A threefold prophetic declaration of the future factual proof of this grace to His Anointed, is here expressed: a. David affirms that he is sure of it for himself; the "to David" stands independently, not, as Hengst. says, along with "and to his seed" as definition of the "to his anointed;" b. the promised salvation will, however, be extended to his seed also. The direct reference of these words to the promise in 2 Sam. vii. 12-16 is apparent; on the ground of this promise David declares the certainty of continuance through his heirs, of the dominion of his house; c. the testimony of praise culminates in the prophecy of the everlasting duration of God's manifestations of grace and blessing, which will be imparted to David, and his seed according to the promise. Comp. 2 Sam. vii. 15, 16.

Hupfeld rejects these closing words: "to David and to his seed forevermore" as a later addition to the song (in so far as it is to be ascribed to David) on the following grounds: 1)

David would not have spoken of himself by the phrase: "to David," and 2) not David, but only a later adherent of the Davidic dynasty could have said: "and to his seed forevermore." But these grounds are not valid; for in fact David does call himself by name in xxiii. 1, and in the prayer 2 Sam. vii. 20, 26; and how can the reference to his seed and its continuance be regarded as not Davidic, when David was assured of the perpetuity of the royal dominion of his family by the promise 2 Sam. vii. 12 sqq.?—Thenius' supposition, that the words may have been an afterwards added bit of flattery to David's posterity, can be explained only by a complete ignoring of David's hope based on that promise 2 Sam. vii., and receives at best meagre support from the very subjective argument that the two preceding clauses sufficed to express the author's thought.—Böcher regards the whole of ver. 51 as a later addition in imitation of other Davidic conclusions to songs "as homage to the royal house." But his affirmation that this does not accord with genuine Davidic productions is set aside by the fact that ideas, and even words here agree with David's words in 2 Sam. vii. He further contends that by the retention of ver. 51 the probably significant number [50] is exceeded; but (apart from his "probably,")—the untenableness of this conjecture is strikingly shown by his manipulation of ver. 3 into two verses in order (after the omission of ver. 51) to get 50 verses besides the superscription, while the retention of ver. 51 gives this number already.

On the mutual relation of the two recensions of this song in Ps. xviii. and 2 Sam. xxii., critics are very much divided. Hengstenberg's view (which is that of the older expositors)—that the two texts are two different recensions of the same song by David himself, both equally authentic and good, the Psalm being the original, and the 2 Sam. the later—is altogether untenable in the face of the not few variations that are obviously unintended, accidental, and are to be referred to the carelessness of the written tradition or the uncertainty of the oral. Thus the carelessness of a transcriber is shown in the interchange of certain letters in vers. 11, 43 (ו and נ), ver. 33 (י and נ), ver. 12 (ו and נ), and the omission of words in vers. 13, 36, where the text of the Psalm is complete.—The question as to the originality of the two texts is to be decided by examination of the intentional changes. And to such intentional changes is to be referred a long list of deviations in the Psalm-text as Sommer (Bibl. Abh. I. pp. 167-173, Bonn, 1846) has convincingly shown in detail. "We find," he remarks, "occasional free change of text in order to remove possible difficulties, to make clear, by the expression, the antiquated writing, the grammatical forms, and, where it can be easily done, to put what is usual and known in place of what is peculiar in conception or language. For the same reason that the transcriber of the Psalm abandoned the ancient sparseness of vowel-letters (Ges. Lehrs. p. 51) and, where it seemed necessary, carefully inserted a Waw or Yod, he has resolved and regularly inflected the contracted verbal forms, and here and there separated a preposition from a noun, in order to facilitate the apprehension of the words (which were written without vowel-signs) and avoid possible misunderstandings." (For particulars see Sommer, as above.) It does not however hence appear, that the preference is to be accorded to the Psalm-text that is given it by the latest critics, Gramberg (in Winer, Exeg. St. I. 1), De Wette, Hupfeld, Hitzig, Ewald, Olshausen,* Delitzsch. But neither can the text of 2 Sam. xxii. be regarded as the original, since it contains variations that are explained by careless transcription and tradition (Hupf.), and probably also by the fact that this psalm, incorporated in a historical book, shared the fate of all historical texts, care for poetic form and rhythm early yielding to regard for the mere sense (Hitzig). It is, however, characteristic of the text of 2 Sam. xxii., that it contains not a few "licenses of popular language" (Del.), and that the defective mode of writing, which points to higher antiquity, is the prevailing one. On the other hand in the psalm-text (which Böttcher calls the "priest-recension" over against the 2 Sam. xxii. as the "laic recension") a later revision is unmistakable. "The vulgarisms, and in part the archaisms also, are there effaced; the whole style is more cultivated" (Böttch.). Therefore Von Lengerke's view, that the two texts are of about equal value (comment. crit. de duplici Ps. xviii. exemplo, Regiom. 1833, 4) cannot be looked on as proven, but the preference is to be given to the recension in 2 Sam. xxii. on account of its stamp of higher antiquity, which Von Lengerke must admit is given it by its more sparing use of vowel signs. The two recensions are independent of one another, neither of them being the authentic; but 2 Sam. xxii. is the older, whether it was taken from an older manuscript (Ewald), or, as Delitzsch supposes, belonged to the "Annals of David" (Dibre ha-yamim), one of the sources of the Books of Samuel. Böttcher: "Thus then, the text of Ps. xviii. is, as a whole, completer and purer, but 2 Sam. xxii. though somewhat more defective, yet in details truer to the original and archaic form."

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. This longest and most artistic of David's psalms that have come down to us is also one of the most important in respect to the history of God's kingdom and salvation. For it embraces all God's deliverances in David's life before and after his accession to the throne, and extols them as proofs of the favor and faithfulness of his God, who chose him as his servant to this high royal dignity, and gave him the most glorious promises of the permanent duration of his kingdom in his seed. The pillars on which this great royal psalm rests are the two self-revelations of God to David, that determine His theocratic royal position: His call to be king in Saul's stead, and the promise of the everlasting duration of his kingdom; the first supports that part of the Psalm that refers to the Sauline persecution, the second the part that describes God's help against foreign enemies. Looking on these deliverances as fulfillments of the promise, he expressly refers to it at the close, and at the same time looks to the future with sure hope of the fulfilment of the promise in the imperishable dominion of his house. So Delitzsch [introductory remarks on Ps. xviii.; he compares the Ps. to the Assyrian monumental inscriptions.—Tr.].

2. Because God's deeds are incommensurable for human feeling and apprehension, David's thankful heart can find in language no adequate expression for them. Hence the exuberant aggregation of terms in vers. 2-4, which set forth the inverse relation of human capacity for praise to God's manifestations of grace. "The poet begins a lay, in which he wishes to praise God for His help, the strength given him to do great deeds, his elevation to be king over nations, for all the blessings of his long and eventful life. Here at the outset the recollection of these exceeding mercies comes over his soul with overwhelming force; he can find no satisfactory term wherewith to call on the God of his salvation, and therefore piles term on term" (Sommer, as above, p. 152).

3. The praise of God's name is not only fruit, but also root of prayer (ver. 4); for the experiences of God's grace and faithfulness, which impel to praise, also strengthen faith, are the foundations of hope for further mercies, assure the fulfilment of promises in the future, and warrant fervent prayer for new help under appeal to past blessings.

4. The cordial intercourse of prayer between the Old Testament saints and their covenant-God (comp. vers. 4-7) is the factual proof of the positive self-revelation of the personal, living God, without whose initiative such overspringing of the chasm between the holy God and sinful man were impossible, but also the most striking refutation of the false view that the religion of the Old Covenant presents an absolute chasm between God and man. The real life-communion between the heart that goes immediately to its God in prayer and the God who hears such prayer is, on the one hand, in contrast with the extra-testamental religion of the pre-Christian world alone founded on God's positive-historical self-revelation to His people and the thereby established covenant-relation between them, and, on the other hand, as sporadic anticipation of the life-communion with God established by the New Testament Mediator, it is a factual prophecy of the religious-ethical life-communion (culminating in prayer) between man redeemed by Christ and His Heavenly Father.

5. Nature, as God's creature and man's fellow-creature, is the symbolical means for the figurative presentation of the personal self-revelation of God to man. The images derived from the light, which is God's garment (Ps. civ. 2), the cloud, which is called His tent (Job xxxvi. 29; Ps. xcvi. 2), the thunder, in which His voice is heard (Ps. xviii. 14 [13]; Job xxxvii. 2), the lightning and fire-flames, wherein burns His wrath and punitive justice (Judg. v. 4; Isa. xxx. 27 sq.; Ps. l. 2, 3; lxviii. 8; xcvi. 2), and the earthquake, the terror that precedes the revelation of His judgment (Ps. lxxvii. 19 [18]; cxiv. 4; Joel ii. 10; iv. 16; Nah. i. 5; Isa. xxiv. 18) exhibit those sides of the being of the self-revealing God to which natural phenomena, by virtue of their divine origin, are related. "This symbolism of nature rests on the conception that certain qualities in God's being and work answer to it. Hence God is sometimes represented as present and efficient in these natural phenomena (not merely accompanied by them), and in bold and vivid expression the rousing and utterance of His anger is portrayed as the kindling of His light-nature in all the turns of fiery and flaming figures, even to the point that smoke issues from His wrath-snorting nose (Deut. xix. 9; Ps. lxxiv. 1; lxxx. 5 [4]) and devouring fire from His mouth (comp. the description of the crocodile, Job xli. 10 sqq.) from the burning coals within Him. Not in themselves, therefore, but only under certain circumstances and limitations do these phenomena of nature form in part the symbol, in part the means of the theophany" (Moll [in Lange's Bible-Work] on Ps. xviii., Doct. and Eth. 5).—"All nature stands in a relation of sympathy to man, in that it shares his curse and blessing, ruin and glory, and in a (so to speak) synergetic [co-operative] relation to God, in that it pre-announces and instrumentally accomplishes His mighty deeds" (Delitzsch on Ps. xviii. 8-10).

6. The law of God's retributive righteousness is the fundamental law of the divine government of the world. The condition of man's deliverance by God is life in righteousness before God, which pre-supposes full devotion of heart to God, and shows itself in earnest striving after faithful fulfillment of God's commands. God bestows His salvation and blessing on the faithful righteous (comp. Deut. xxviii.); on the apostate wicked He sends His judgments, and hears not their cry for help, because, they being in trouble, turn to Him not in living faith and trust, but in superstition. He who (like David), with heart, life and desire turned towards God, seeks and finds in life-communication with Him his highest good and complete satisfaction, may (with David), on the ground of this law of retributive righteousness, affirm that he has had help of the Lord, because God cannot leave without proof of His faithful mercy those who trust in Him and in His word without wishing to gain or lay claim to merit for themselves. Self-praise, indeed, and vain self-contemplation in such an appeal to one's own righteousness is not lawful; and it is here excluded, since David expressly declares that pride is the object of the divine judgment (ver. 28). Comp. Isa. ii. 11; Prov. vi. 17. This humble appeal to one's righteous walk before God under God's guidance is indeed at bottom only praise to God Himself. For the righteousness, wherein one walks before God, is God's own work. "David owes his righteousness wholly to his faithful adherence to God, who preserves His servant from sins so that they do not rule over him.—He here dwells on his righteousness, not from vain self-contemplation, but to quicken himself and others to zeal in the fulfillment of the law.—The charge of pride of virtue, if it were true, would lie also against many expressions of Christian hymn-writers. So, for example, in Anton Ulrich's fine hymn: Nun tret' ich wieder aus der Ruh, the strophe: So ist getrost mein frischer Muth,—Mein Gott geht nimmer meinen Steg, wo ich nicht wandle seinen Weg [never goes my God my path, when I walk not in His way]" (Hengst. on Ps. xviii. 20).

7. To this truth of the retributive righteousness of God attaches itself as further ground for it (vers. 26, 27) the thought of ethical reciprocal action between God in His ethical bearing towards man, and man in his ethical position in respect to God. There is no question here of an intellectual conception of God's being, as if David meant to say: God appears to every man according as the man is disposed and constituted. Certainly the history of religion everywhere (Christian and non-Christian) proves that the views of God that the unaided reason arrives at are the reflection of the ethical condition of soul, which determines the intellect; the character of the knowledge of God depends on the ethical character of the whole life. Here, however, is expressed the truth that God's objective, real conduct towards men according to His retributive righteousness corresponds exactly to man's ethical conduct towards God, and by the reflection of this righteous conduct of God, as exhibited in His punitive judgments, in man's perverted mind arises a caricature of God's nature, which is more and more confirmed and filled out in the conception of the man that turns from God and continues to harden his heart against Him. Comp. Moll, on Ps. xvii., Doct. and Eth. 6; who refers to 1 Sam. xxvi. 33; Isa. xxix. 14; xxxi. 3; Job v. 13; Prov. iii. 34. [This last view, the perverted conception of God in men's minds, while correct in itself, is not contained in this Psalm.—Tr.]

8. In the gracious helps, wherein God reveals Himself to His people as the living one, faith in the living God grows to the ever completer knowledge of the truth that God is the Living One in the absolute sense, and finds involuntary utterance in the declaration: "Living is the Lord" (ver. 47). The experiences and guidances of the lives of God's children are the proof that God is a living God, who enters into their life with His light and His strength, with the consolation of His love and the help of His might." "That David is living, exalted and blest, shows that his God is living, exalted and to be blessed. He is the living proof of his livingness, exaltedness and praiseworthiness" (Hengst.).

9. The jubilant tone in which Old Testament piety speaks of revenge on enemies lacks the thorough sanctification and consecration, whose only source is in the holy love of God, poured out by the Holy Ghost (Rom. v. 5) in the hearts of those who are become children of God through faith in Jesus Christ, and can practice that love of enemies that was necessarily still foreign to the Old Testament standpoint. But while this difference between the standpoints of the Old and New Testaments is maintained, the relative truth and justification of these utterances of David on revenge on enemies (ver. 48 sq.) must not be ignored. For David here speaks in the consciousness of his calling as theocratic king, who had to fight for the Lord's people, and carry on the Lord's wars; it is the Lord Himself that has taken the revenge and given it him; the victories that have laid at his feet the enemies of God's kingdom are the Lord's own deeds. And this is the prefigurement and symbol of God's mighty deeds in the defence of the New Testament kingdom of grace, and of the conquest of the hostile world by the spiritual weapons of His word and the power of His Spirit, till after this conquest comes the triumphant kingdom of glory.

10. David affirms (ver. 50 sq.) the universality of the salvation, whose original source is the glorious revelations of God to His chosen people; the God of Israel is also the God of the heathen. The means of bringing them to the knowledge of the living God is not the sword, but the proclamation of God's great deeds for His people. As David, in his character of missionary to the heathen world, praises his God's grace, so at bottom all missionary work among the heathen is, in the announcement of the word of the God who is revealed in Christ, a continuous praise of the name of the living God. In David's word: "I will praise thee among the heathen," the missionary idea of the universal, all-embracing salvation of God breaks over the bounds of national-theocratic particularism.—"As it was among the heathen that he himself most proudly sang Jahve's praise, and by his whole life proclaimed to them His sole majesty (wherein he followed, only with far more power, Deborah's example, Judg. v. 3), so from now on could and should every member of this congregation of Jahve take position towards the heathen" [Ewald, Gesch. [Hist. of Israel] III. 273, Rem.].

11. As the centre, whence the light of salvation was to shine on the heathen, David has in view God's revelations of salvation and grace, as they were imparted to him, the Anointed of the Lord, and, according to the promise, 2 Sam. vii., were to be imparted to his seed that was destined to everlasting royal dominion. But the line, in which his prophetic glance at the end of the Song in the light of this promise looks into the future of this seed, runs in the historical fulfilment of this Messianic prophecy beyond the earthly throne of the Davidic house, and ends in "the Son of God, who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rom. i. 3), and is the Anointed of God in the absolute sense. In Rom. xv. 9 Paul, quoting David's words here (ver. 50), declares him to be the Saviour, through whom, according to God's mercy, the heathen also become partakers of salvation, and praise God therefor.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. [TAYLOR: Let us learn to thank God for our mercies and deliverances. When the crisis of some great agony is on us, there are no words which leap so readily to our lips as these: "God help me!" At such times we feel shut up to go to God, and we engage our friends to pray to Him on our behalf. But when the danger is past and the suffering is gone, how seldom we think of Him on whom, while they lasted, we called so passionately for relief. Of the ten lepers whom Jesus cleansed, only one returned to give Him thanks.—HENRY: Every new mercy in our hand should put a new song into our mouth, even praises to our God.—TR.]—Ver. 2. Human speech cannot find words enough to praise sufficiently the fulness of the divine grace and the riches of God's goodness. Comp. Rom. xi. 33.—God not merely gives to them that trust in Him all that is necessary for them, but He Himself is to them all that they need. The Lord is to His people through

His power a firm support, an invincible ally both in defence and in offence. [SPURGEON: "In Him will I trust." Faith must be exercised, or the preciousness of God is not truly known; and God must be the object of faith, or faith is mere presumption.—TR.]

Ver. 4 sq. The praise of God has its ground in the benefits received from God and in the experience of His salvation; it forms the foundation for new requests, it confirms the heart in child-like confidence, and it heightens the courage of faith.—The wholesome fruit of severe afflictions and sore conflicts is for the children of God so much the more unconditional confidence in God's compassion, so much the more hearty supplication for God's help, so much the more blessed experience of His hearing and delivering grace.—God speaks to men through the powers and gifts of His visible creation the language of His goodness and compassionate fatherly love, Matt. v. 45; but He also speaks through the mighty forces of nature the language of His wrath and His punitive righteousness.—BERL. B.: The Lord is such a soul's rock; for it has no other steadfastness than God, who establishes Himself in it and confirms it in perfect immovableness, for it is the immovableness of God Himself.—LUTHER: David wishes hereby to instruct us that there is nothing so bad, so great, so vast, so mighty, so lasting that it cannot be overcome through the power of God, if we only trust therein; likewise that then especially should we have cause to hope for God's power to become mighty in us, when many great, strong and persistent evils powerfully press upon us.—"I call on the Lord, who is worthy to be praised." This is in time of trouble the noblest of doctrines, and thoroughly golden. It is incredible what a powerful means such praise to God is when danger assails. For as soon as you begin to praise God, so soon the evil becomes lessened, the consoled spirit waxes stronger, and there follows the calling on God with confidence.

Ver. 7. [LORD BACON (in Spurgeon): If you listen even to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols. Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes; and adversity is not without comforts and hopes.—TR.]—CRAMER: It is God's counsel and will that we should call on Him. Ps. l. 15.—CALVIN: In naming God his God, he distinguishes himself from the coarse despisers of God and from the hypocrites, who do indeed when pressed by need call confusedly on the heavenly divinity, but do not either with confidence or with one heart draw near to God, of whose fatherly grace they know nothing.—BERL. B.: If thy God has now heard thee, O thou afflicted king, instruct us also how it has gone therewith and with thy cry and prayer for deliverance. [SPURGEON: There was no great space between the cry and its answer. The Lord is not slack concerning His promise, but is swift to rescue His afflicted.—TR.]

It is not at all an opposition to the doctrine of salvation by grace, and no sort of evidence of a Pharisaic spirit, when a gracious man, having been slandered, stoutly maintains his integrity, and vigorously defends his character. . . . Read the cluster of expressions in this and the following verses as the song of a good conscience, after having safely outridden a storm of obloquy, persecution and abuse, and there will be no fear of our upbraiding the writer as one who sets too high a price upon his own moral character.—HENRY (ver. 23): A careful abstaining from our own iniquity is one of the best evidences of our own integrity; and the testimony of our conscience that we have done so, will be such a rejoicing, as will not only lessen the griefs of an afflicted state, but increase the comforts of an advanced state. David reflected with more comfort upon his victories over his own iniquity, than upon his conquest of Goliath, and all the hosts of the uncircumcised Philistines; and the witness of his own heart to his uprightness was sweeter, though more silent music than theirs that sang, "David has slain his ten thousands." (Isa. xxix. 14, comp. Lev. xxvii. 23 sq.).—BERL. B.: For this very reason does that which is most righteous, seem to the perverse world to be perverse and unrighteous, because the world is perverse and this does not agree with its evil principles. SCHMID: Well for the man that can in true faith call the Lord his God. Ps. xviii. 2, 3.—Vers. 33 sq. CRAMER: War is not in itself sinful nor blameworthy, and God makes righteous soldiers. Ps. cxliv. 1.—S. SCHMID: Ye warriors of Jesus Christ, who have to contend with princes and mighty ones (Eph. vi. 12), call God to your help, who will teach your hands to war.

Ver. 35. HENGSTENBERG: The outward conflict against the enemies of the kingdom of God is not in itself carnal, but becomes so only through the disposition in which it is conducted; just as the spiritual conflict is not in itself spiritual, but only when it is conducted with divine weapons alone, with the power which God supplies. With right does Luther find in our verse the promise, "that to preachers who are taught by God Himself, there is given an inexhaustible and invincible power to withstand all opposers." This is therein contained not merely inasmuch as what holds of one believer, also holds of all others, but more directly too, inasmuch as David here speaks not merely of himself but of

Vers. 36 sq. LUTHER: Who are we then, that we should either want to presume and undertake to protect the truth and overcome the enemies, or when we cannot succeed therein, that we should want to get angry about it? It depends upon divine grace how we are preserved and enlarged, not upon our undertakings and presumptuous fancy, that the glory may remain with God alone.—Ver. 38. LUTHER: And this has happened and still happens in all victories of the people of God, since in the beginning of the conflict the enemies appear to be superior and invincible; but so soon as the assault is made there is a growing strength; the enemies take to flight, and are slain; thereupon the church does not cease to follow up the conflict won and the victory gained, until it sweeps away all enemies.

Ver. 39. CALVIN: As the wars of David are common to us, it follows that to us there is promised an unconquerable protection against all onsets of the devil, all lusts of sin, all temptations of the flesh.—CRAMER: Christian knights must not practice hypocrisy with the enemies of God, or show them ill-timed compassion, but use earnestness and zeal against them. 1 Sam. xv. 15; Psa. cxxxix. 21.—Vers. 40 sq. S. SCHMID: Nothing is more intolerable to the ungodly than when they are humbled under those over whom they have exalted themselves. [Ver. 42. SPURGEON: Prayer is so notable a weapon that even the wicked will take to it, in their fits of desperation. Bad men have appealed to God against God's own servants, but in vain.—Tr.]

Ver. 47. BERL. B.: The Lord lives! Hence comes all the satisfaction of a true and pure soul, because God is always living in him, and this life of God no one can hinder. Psa. xlii. 3 [2].—This alone constitutes the joy of a soul wholly penetrated by pure love. Its joy consists not in its salvation, but in the glory which from this salvation accrues to God. Exod. xv. 2.—Ver. 50 sq. STARKE: A Christian should awake himself ever anew to the praise of God.—SCHLIER: The more we think on what the Lord has done for us, the more we gain courage and confidence for the future. Ingratitude makes men despairing and afraid; true gratitude produces consolation and courage. In thanksgiving we of course think of the Lord and His goodness; and when we think of the Lord, how should we not also be consoled? The more gratitude, so much the more confidence; and the more confidence, so much the more help for time and eternity.

FOURTH SECTION.

David's Last Prophetic Words.

CHAPTER XXIII. 1-7.

- 1 Now [And] these be [are] the last words of David. David the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said. The Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] spake by me [or, into me], and his word was in [on] my tongue. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God. And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even [om. even] a morning without clouds, as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain [when from shining after raining the herb springs from the earth]. Although my house be not so with God; [For is not my house so with God?] yet [for] he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he make it not to grow [for all my salvation and all my pleasure, shall it not prosper or, shall he not cause it to prosper]?). But the sons of Belial shall be [And the wicked are] all of them as thorns thrust away, because they cannot be taken with hands [for they are not laid hold of with the hand]. But the man that shall [And if a man] touch them, must be [he is] fenced with iron and the staff of a spear, and they shall be utterly burned with fire in the same place.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These "last words of David" have not a merely lyrical (Ewald), but a lyrical-prophetical character. Their historical pre-supposition is the prophecy through Nathan, 2 Sam. vii. Their connection with the preceding song, chap. xxii., is not indeed a chronological one, since there is no chronologically definite statement in either; but as both obviously belong (xxii. by its content, xxiii. 1-7 by its title) to David's last years, they cannot lie far apart in time, and both, partly by their retrospect of a long and eventful life that rose out of the depths to high honor, partly by their outlook into a still more glorious future, have the character of the solemn, grand final words of a king. For an inward connection of the contents of the two songs is clearly to be seen in the fact that the closing view of ch. xxii. (based on the prophecy of an everlasting house, 2 Sam. vii.) traverses and controls this whole song, xxiii. 1-7, that the seed of the Anointed of the Lord (xxii. 51) is here individualized into a person, and the salvation there promised as an everlasting possession to the Anointed and his seed by God, is here more definitely announced as one proceeding from and secured by the messianic Ruler.—On the theocratic attitude in the biblical-theological content of this Song, see further in the appropriate section [Historical and Theological].

Ver. 1. The superscription.—And these are the last words of David.—The Davidic origin of this song, affirmed by the superscription, is raised above all doubt by the archaic form of the introduction, the pregnant curtness of the expression, the characteristic peculiarity of the thoughts, the Davidic stamp borne by form and content, and the originality of the Messianic thought, as well as the direct reference of the latter to 2 Sam. vii. "Only hyper-criticism could declare against the Davidic origin by first forming an arbitrary conception of David's poetic style, and then rejecting this song for not coming up to that conception.—A poem that was composed later and put into the mouth of the royal singer would certainly betray its origin by a fuller and clearer exposition of the idea of the Israelitish kingdom" (Baur, as above, p. 388). So H. Schultz, as above, 464. Though the song is by its superscription attached to ch. xxii., the opinion held by some (Mich., Dathe, Maurer), that the "last words" are only words later than the song in chap. xxii., is untenable. Nor can the superscription refer to the following history of David, as given in the remaining part of "Samuel" and the beginning of 1 Kings (Paulus, exeg. krit. Abhandl., pp. 99-134). Further, it does not mean: the last prophetic word in the list of David's prophetic utterances (Grot.), or the last psalm (Vatablus: "after he produced all his psalms"), or, his last will and testament, "though he said, did and suffered much afterwards" (Luther); but it is to be understood in the absolute sense: the last of all his words, which he spoke at the end of his life in his theocratic calling and royal consciousness, and in reference to the kingdom of God in Israel, "the last poetical flight that he ever took, perhaps shortly before his death, and which was specially noted down for the reason also that it was (from ver. 2) regarded as the utterance of a seer (נָבִיא, Num. xxiv. 3, 4, 15, 16)" (Thenius).

Divine saying (נְבִיאִי*) of David. The word always signifies a saying or oracular utterance based on immediate revelation or inspiration. It is the passive participle, = "the thing breathed in, inspired word," and stands here with the Genitive of the human receiver, as in Num. xxiv. 3 seq. (Balaam) and Prov. xxx. 1 (Solomon),† while it is as a rule followed by "Jehovah" as the author of the inspiration. The following words of David are thereby announced to be a peculiarly prophetic declaration, which rests on an inspeaking of God by His Spirit into his soul. The introduction of the song corresponds in form and content with that of Balaam's prophecy, Num. xxiv. 3. It begins with a simple personal designation, and then designates the qualities of this person that here come into consideration, and may serve to give the reasons for the expression "divine saying" (Hengst.). [As this expression is frequent in the prophetic writings (in Eng. A. V., rendered by "saith the Lord") it is not improbable that the title is from the hand of a later prophetic editor.—Tr.]—The son of Jesse. "How humbly he proceeds, boasting not his circumcision, his holiness or his kingdom, not ashamed of his lowly stock, that he was a shepherd; for he will speak of other things that are so high that they need no nobility or holiness, and shall be hurt by no sorrow, neither by sin nor by death" (Luther).

And divine saying of the man who was raised up on high*—the contrast to his lowly origin, as in 2 Sam. vii. 8, "with omission of those above whom he was raised, in order to express absolute superiority" (Hengst.). Tanchum: "Fixed on the plane of loftiness." On this idea see xxii. 44, 48.—Next follows the unfolding of the content of this idea in two members: the Anointed of the God of Jacob, and the pleasant in the praise-songs of Israel [the sweet psalmist of Israel]. The first designates his high position not only in the theocratic royal dignity conferred on him by God, but also in his royal dominion as Anointed of the Lord as God's representative and in God's name over against the people, and "not merely as an individual, but also as representative of his race" (Hengst.). The second member characterizes David as the representative towards God of the people in their praise of the Lord for His mighty deeds. "Pleasant (lovely) in the praise-songs of Israel." The Adjective (נָחֵם) does not mean "approved, well-pleasing," as Fries takes it, explaining: "chosen to sing Israel's songs of triumph," which is contrary to the constant signification of the word; comp. Ew. § 288 c, 291 a. Nor is it: "beloved [popular] through the songs that Israel sings" (Mich.), or "kindly through songs" (Maurer). It is not an ordinary song that it is here named (נָחֵם), but a solemn, joyful song of praise, Job xxxv. 10; Ps. xcv. 2; cxix. 54; Isa. xxiv. 16, and so in Ex. xv. 2 (נָחֵם) and in the titles of the Psalms (נָחֵם).—As the "Anointed of the Lord" he is equipped with the Holy Spirit from above; as one that is "pleasant in Israel's songs of praise" he likewise shows himself filled with the Lord's Spirit. His high position consists on the one hand in the dignity of his royal office as God's representative towards the people, and on the other hand in his priestly position, wherein as representative of the people towards God he guides their worship to the height of praise and prayer; and in so far as he is raised to and enabled for both positions by the invoking of

* עָלָה absolutely = "above," as in Hos. xi. 7 and perhaps vii. 16 (so הָיָה often — adverb "below," for example Gen. xlix. 25). Sept. wrongly: "whom God [Vat.: the Lord] raised up to be God's anointed" whence Thenius would without ground read: הָיָה יְהוָה עָלָה. Luther, following Vulg. (cui constitutum est de Christo Dei Jacob) renders: "who is assured by the Messiah of the God of Jacob." Against the latter (Vulg.) is that there is no Dative sign corresponding to the cui. Against the former (Sept.) is that עָלָה is not — ל [as introducing what a thing is made to be]; in the passages cited by Then. (Lev. iv. 35; v. 12, comp. vii. 5) עָלָה denotes either "being conformed to" or "coming in addition to" the other free-offerings.—D. Kimchi and Böttcher arbitrarily make עָלָה — עָלִיזָה "whom the Above (= Most High) has raised up." On the form הָיָה, with doubling, see Ew. § 181 d.

* Const. state of נְבִיאִי, from נָבִיא, properly — הִמְנוּ "to boom, murmur, buzz," used of any dull tone (kernel of the root m), hence especially of secret, confidential impartation (as Germ. raunen [Eng. roun, whisper]) — inspirations, of divine inspiration to prophet or poet as the confidant of God, which is conceived of as whispered into the ear" (Hupf. on Ps. xxxvi. 3 [1], where נָבִיא is used of the inspiration or oracle of wickedness personified as an evil demon).

† [Eng. A. V.: "the man spoke unto Ithiel." The text is probably corrupt, but there is no mention of Solomon in it.—Tr.]

the divine Spirit, he is also a prophetic king and singer of his people, and his word is now spoken as a "divine word."

In accordance with this it is said in ver. 2: —The Spirit of the Lord speaks into me, and his word is on my tongue. These words explain the phrase "divine saying" above, and declare that what follows is given him by God's Spirit. The old Rabbis and Crusius (as above, p. 221), connect ver. 2 closely with the preceding, and suppose that David meant herewith to establish the theopneustic authenticity of his psalms, and dying, to put his seal, as it were, on them. The verbs must then be taken as real preterites [spake, said, as in Eng. A. V.], ver. 2 must be understood of all David's songs and prophecies, and ver. 3 specially of the individual prophecy concerning his seed, which was fulfilled in Christ (sanctio natiuitatis Christi e progenie Davidis). That is: "the Spirit of the Lord has always spoken through me, His word has always been on my tongue in all my lays and songs, and especially the God of Israel has spoken through me the prophecy of the future Messiah." But against this Fries (as above, p. 652) properly remarks, that it would distort the relations to reckon in this especial way, among all David's direct and indirect prophecies, precisely that one that was in fact given not through him, but through Nathan. The very definite expression of the second member: "and his word on my tongue," does not permit such a general reference, and is besides to be taken on Present time. Then also the parallel verb in the first member is better taken as Present (speaks), and vers. 2, 3 a are the announcement of what follows as the content of the divine inspiration from ver. 3 b on. "The Spirit of Jehovah spake," not "through me," which would require the Participle rather than the Perf. (Hengst.), nor "in me," against which is the meaning of the phrase elsewhere, but "into me," as in Hos. i. 2. Thereby the origin of the following declaration is affirmed to be divine inspeaking. [The reading "through (by) me" as in Eng. A. V., is allowable, and corresponds very well with the second member.—Tr.]. On the other hand: the "his word is on my tongue" refers to the human expression of this divinely given word. While in ver. 1 the prophetic organ of the divine saying is doubly characterized, ver. 2 sets forth in two-fold expression the twofold divine medium of the inspired prophetic word: the Spirit and the word of God.

The first half of ver. 3: Says the God of Israel, to me speaks the Rock of Israel is identical in form with ver. 2, and expresses in two members the same thought, with special emphasizing of the relation of God (who speaks through David's mouth) to His people, and particularly of His rock-like faithfulness towards them as the foundation of all manifestations of salvation. There is therefore no tautology here. "Says the God of Israel," the God that has chosen Israel as His possession, giving them the promises of salvation, whose fulfilment the following revelation announces. "To me speaks the Rock of Israel," the God that fulfils His promises according to His faithfulness and unchangeableness (xxii. 3, 32, 47). The Present rendering is preferable here also. But if the Past be taken: "spake the Rock of Israel," what is here said in ver. 3 a cannot belong to the content of the "divine saying" (ver. 1), "since then David would have derived a very simple, psychologically easily explicable recapitulation of former revelations from present inspiration, and have introduced it with a disproportionate outlay of solemn words" (Fries); rather the Past form is explained by the fact that the act of divine inspeaking preceded the outspeaking of the divine word. The object of the verbs (says, speaks), is not a number of prophecies relating to blessed rule, that were received before by David (Tanchum), or (as Thenius thinks probable) the declaration of a prophet, who uttered vers. 3 b, 4 (here recalled by David) at the beginning of David's reign (this thought would have been necessarily otherwise expressed), but the now following declaration. What God now, at the moment of His speaking, immediately imparts to him, is declared in what follows: The "to me" stands emphatically first ("to me speaks the rock of Israel"), because David has in view his theocratic relation to the following divine word and its relation to him, and because it will be fulfilled in his seed; he expresses his consciousness (which was connected with his prophetic endowment) of the soteriological significance of his person for the people in respect to the future fulfillment of the glorious promises given to his seed.—The four members in vers. 2, 3 a stand in chiasmic relation to one another; the first member of ver. 3 a corresponds to the second of ver. 2, and the second of ver. 3 a to the first of ver. 2.

Vers. 3 b, 4. First part of the divine saying. The thoroughly abrupt, lapidary style corresponds with the solemn announcement of the imparted divine declaration, and with the fact (thereby declared) that the poet is filled with the divine Spirit and word; the words are inspired exclamations, whose pregnant and enigmatic curtness, heightened by the omission of verbs, is in keeping with the condition of the writer's soul, overpowered by the mighty impulse of the prophetic Spirit, and the immediate view of truth produced by it. Comp. Tholuck, as above, p. 58. A ruler over men just, a ruler in the fear of God. These words are not to be taken as apposition to the "God of Israel" in vers. 3 a (Vulg., Luth.), nor as object of the verb "says" taken as = "promised" (Maurer: God promised a ruler), or as apposition to "me" ["me a just ruler"], that is, as David's praise of himself (Sachs). Nor with Trendelenberg (in Thenius) are we to read "derision" (קִטְשׁ "proverb, by-word") instead of "ruler," and render: "a by-word the righteous may be among men, a by-word the fear of God, but as morning-light, etc." Further, the words are not to be understood as an affirmation concerning a pious king: "if among men one rules righteously—he is as morning-light, etc." (Cler., Herder, De W., Ew., Then., Baur), as if they expressed for a parenthetic end the ethical-religious significance and mission of the Israelitish royal office in general. Such laudation of the governmental virtues of a king would accord neither with the preceding solemn announcement of a divine oracle, nor the thence naturally to be expected weighty content of the divine saying, would indeed make the prophetic character give way to the didactic. To the view that any pious and righteous king is here meant, by the portraiture of whom David wished to convey an exhortation to his sons, is opposed also the content of the individual statements that follow, picturing a royal form far above the proportions of an ordinary regent, and especially the reference in ver. 5 to 2 Sam. vii. as giving the ground of the picture. The "ruler" here spoken of stands to David's prophetic gaze, in the light of the divine word spoken into him, as the ideal royal form proceeding from his seed, wherein he sees fully realized the idea of a theocratic king according to his religious-moral qualities, and the wielder of a dominion that stretches over all humanity. This last is expressed in the phrase "over* men." The "men" are not, however, the people of Israel, for the expression would then be surprisingly weak and flat, nor are they men as subjects in general and necessary appendage to "any ruler" (Then.), which would be a meaningless pleonasm, but "men" in the absolute sense, humanity, the human race (Fries, as above, p. 656 sq.). If David already sees himself made head and ruler of "the nations," his royal dominion extended wide over "the strangers," and praises the Lord's name before the heathen, so that they acknowledge him and give him the honor (xxii. 44, 45, 48, 50), here his prophetic glance takes in all the nations of the earth as embraced in the kingdom of God, wherein the portrayed ruler of the future will bear his universal sway. Comp. Ps. lxxii. 8-17.—This ruler is just, perfectly conformed to the holy will of God, compare Psalm lxxii. 1 sq.; Jer. xxxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. ix. 9.—A ruler in the fear of God. His moral integrity combined with religious perfectness; the "fear of God" is not merely the attribute of the Messianic king, but will be seen completely to fill and control him. Compare Isa. xi. 2, 3. "A ruler of the fear of God, that is, a ruler that will be, as it were, the fear of God itself, the bodily fear of God" (Hengst.). [When we compare this song with Ps. xlv., lxxii., Isa. xi., and similar passages, it seems correcter to regard it as the picture of the ideal theocratic king, than as a vision of a future king. This ideal king is, in the view of the pious Israelite, invested with all conceivable moral and governmental grandeur, and the picture finds its perfect realization only in Jesus of Bethlehem. The "men," however, can hardly be said here to mean "all humanity," but the expression must be taken in the general sense: "a human ruler."—Ta.]

Ver. 4. Picture of the blessings that follow the appearance of the future ruler, under the figure of the wholesome effects of the light of the rising sun on a bright morning. And as morning-light, when the sun rises, morning without clouds, from brightness, from rain grass out of the earth (sprouts). These words are not to be connected with the following ver. 5, protasis to it as apodosis [as morning-light, etc., is not my house so?] (Dathe); against this is the "for" at the beginning of ver. 5. Nor are they to be connected syntactically with ver. 3—either by adding the first clause of ver. 4 to complete the preceding sentence: "he is as the light of the morning," (De Wette, Thenius, Sept., which reads: "and in the morning-light of God")—or by regarding the whole statement about the morning-light as the continuation of the description of the "ruler" in ver. 3 (the Rabbie, Maurer: "and He will come forth as the morning-light shines," etc.). Against this connection is both the form of ver. 3 b, which is a sharply defined, isolated exclamation, and the form of ver. 4, "which sensibly enough deviates from the sharply-cut, monumental style of the six words compressed in ver. 3 b by a peculiar fullness of lingering description" (Fries, as above, p. 663). Besides, it is only by isolating ver. 4 on both sides that we can find the ground of its content in ver. 5 (which is introduced by "for"), since the statements of ver. 5 agree only with the content of ver. 4, standing in factual [or real] connection therewith, while ver. 3 b presents the ideal of a person.—Ver. 4 has the same abrupt, enigmatical, exclamatory tone as ver. 3 b, though it differs from it in its particular statements, a natural result of the fact that here a comparison taken from nature is carried out. As in ver. 3 b, there is not a single verb, and the different statements are unconnected. Even from this formal similarity, ver. 4 is to be regarded as continuation of the immediate divine saying in ver. 3; and not less from its content, which is closely connected with that of ver. 3, describing under the figure of natural light the effect of the light that proceeds from the ruler portrayed in ver. 3, and in similar lapidary style. Fries, however (pp. 663, 665), separates ver. 4 from the preceding, holding that the "divine saying" ends in the latter, and that in the former (ver. 4) follows a vision to the ravished eye of the dying David, while at the same time his opened ear heard the revealing word of God; accordingly he translates: "God speaks —: and before me it is as morning-light in sunshine." But against this view is 1) that the "divine saying" (confined to ver. 3 b) would be singularly short in comparison with the elaborate announcement [vers. 1-3 a]; 2) that if David here consciously began to describe a vision (different from the divine saying above), he would have somehow intimated the fact, instead of proceeding with "and as the morning-light;" and 3) that the explanation: "before me it is light," etc., introduces into the text what is not intimated in it, for there is no hint here of any special vision given to David along with the immediate word of God divinely imparted to him. The appearance of the bright glory of a clear life-awakening morning does not now for the first time dawn on the singer, but he sees it from the same height of prophetic contemplation whence he saw the ruler in ver. 3 b. He sees both together, and certifies both by the "divine saying," which extends over ver. 4; on both sections of this divine saying, ver. 3 b and ver. 4, is stamped the same plastic objectivity of prophetic view, as it is produced by the Spirit of prophecy.

The subject is not the Messiah, as was held by several early expositors (for ex., Crusius [and so Wordsworth now]), who took "the sun rises" as principal sentence, and "sun" as figure of the Messiah (after Mal. iii. 20): "as the morning-light will the sun rise," this is forbidden by the collocation of words, and by the fact that this comparison would involve a tautology. It is rather an impersonal expression, the subject being left undetermined: "And it is as morning-light, when the sun rises," or, its appearance is as morning-light. The "light of morning" stands in contrast with the darkness of the preceding night, and denotes (as the figure of light generally does) the well-being that comes with the ruler after wretchedness and ruin. Comp. Ps. lix. 17 [16]. The "when the sun rises," defining the "morning-light," indicates its source, and answers to the "ruler over men." The "without clouds," parallel to the preceding, strengthens the conception of the well-being as wholly unalloyed. In the "brightness" [Eng. A. V.: clear shining] of the risen sun its light unfolds itself and shows itself active. The "rain" stands in connection with the "without clouds;" after the rain of the night the clouds have dispersed; but from rain and sunshine now sprouts forth the verdure. The expression may be rendered either: "from brightness, from rain comes herb," where "brightness" and "rain" are both causes, or: "from brightness after rain." The former rendering is favored by the immediate repetition of the same Preposition. The fact involved [which is the same, whichever rendering be taken] is the morning sunshine, following the night-rain, dispersing the rain-clouds, and making the fresh herb sprout vigorously from the moist soil. On rain as a figure of blessing see Isa. xlv. 3. The verdure sets forth the blessings that are the fruit of dispensations from above. Comp. Isa. xlv. 4; xlv. 8; especially Ps. lxxii. 6: "He will come down as rain on the mown field, as showers that water the earth."—"Here," says Thenius rightly, "ends the divine saying," only there is described therein not "the happy work of a ruler, as he ought to be" (Then.), but in general the blessing brought by the definite ideal ruler of the future seen by divine revelation.—The whole figure carries out the thought that the ruler described in ver. 3 will bring weal and blessing in his train.

Ver. 5 gives the ground for the divine revelation in vers. 3, 4, by reference to the promise in chap. vii., which forms the foundation of this prophetic view. The introductory conjunction is simply "for," not: "is it that my house?" (as if = הֲיִשָּׁה, Crus., Dathe). The first member is not to be taken as an affirmation: "for not so is my house" [so nearly Eng. A. V.]. Several Rabbis so understood it, putting an artificial and foreign sense into the words: thus in the preceding verse they take the "morning without clouds" as = "not a cloudy morning,"* and the "from shining after rain," etc., as defining this "cloudy morning" when sunshine after rain produces mildew (Isaaki), or only fleeting light breaks through the clouds (R. Levi), or under the capricious alternation of sunshine and rain "nothing better springs up than quickly withering grass" (D. Kimchi), that they may find in contrast therewith the glory of the Davidic House set forth in ver. 5 (comp. Fries, p. 688). So

Luther takes the sentence as an affirmation, but with the exactly opposite contrast with ver. 4, namely, he regards ver. 5 as an humble confession: "it is not such a house as is worthy of such unspeakable honor from God," that is, such honor as is pictured in ver. 4. "Here David falls into great humility and astonishment that such great things should come from his flesh and blood." In accordance with this he takes the following words: "all my salvation and doing is that nothing grows," that is, "I am also a king and lord, and have well ordered and established the kingdom; but such kingdom of mine, yea the realm of all kings on earth, is, in comparison with the dominion of my son Messiah, nothing but a dry branch, that has never grown nor thriven." Against this view is the absence of the subject assumed in it, or, if this subject be found in the "not" taken as = "nothing," the absence of the defining term ("earthly"); nor could David possibly have based the thought that his house would not continue on the prophecy in chap. vii. Rather the first member of ver. 5, as well as the third, is to be taken as a question.—"For is not my house so with God?" As ver. 3 and ver. 4 are in content inseparably connected, the "for" assigns the reason of the whole divine saying, not merely of ver. 4; and the "so"† refers to the whole of vers. 3, 4, that is, so as is said above of the ruler, the wholesome influence that he brings (light) and its happy effects (verdure). But the thought on which this statement is based is not that David says that his own reign was in accord with the truth (vers. 3, 4), that a pious king is like the morning-light, under whose influence every thing prospers—that God has granted blessing to his house and his house's future—that he thence infers that he answers to that figure of a pious ruler, the whole being an instance or example (in the form of a question) attached to the preceding general statement about the "ruler" (De Wette, Then.). For (apart from the fact that this interpretation of vers. 3, 4, as a statement concerning any pious ruler, whose government diffuses blessing, has been above refuted) against this is that the sentence speaks only of David's house, not of himself and his government, and that, if David had intended to derive an argument respecting himself from the blessing that came to his house, he must have expressed himself quite differently. And Fries rightly remarks that instead of such self-assertory thoughts, it would be seemlier to put into the dying David's mouth a "who am I and what is my house?" (vii. 18).—The sentence is rather to be rendered: "For—stands not my house in such a relation to God?" Hearing and declaring the divine saying (vers. 3, 4), the picture of the ideal theocratic ruler and his attendant blessings, David recalls the promise of imperishable royal dominion that has been given to his house and seed. These two divine declarations he here so combines that the latter

* לֹא without the Interrog. particle, xix. 23; Deut. xx. 19; Hos. xi. 6; Mal. ii. 16. Ew. § 224 c.

† כֵּן is Adverb, — "so," not Adjective — "firmly fixed," firma (Fries), or — כֵּן, vii. 26; 1 Kings ii. 45, 46 (Crusius).—עִם-אֱלֹהִים = "with God," not "before God" (De Wette).

* לֹא בִּקְרָא עֲבוֹת in the sense of בִּקְרָא עֲבוֹת.

(chap. vii.) is made to confirm and give the ground of the former (vers. 3, 4). The sense is, then, not merely: Stands not my house in such relation to God that out of it shall arise the righteous ruler? (Keil), but also that the promised blessings will proceed from him? On the connection between this divine saying (vers. 3, 4) and ver. 5, Fries admirably remarks: "This 'for' serves as in innumerable cases, to attach a reflection that is meditating an explanation, and we need only put aside the erroneous opinion (that so often makes difficulty in the explanation of Old Testament passages) that sentence on sentence must be taken, as it were, in one breath, and grant the speaker a short pause of quiet thought, and we shall then understand the free transition of ideas here between ver. 4 and ver. 5. The quiet transition lies in the successful effort of the soul to gird itself to conscious justification of its belief in the offered blessing." [The connection may be thus indicated: the ruler of men is just and God-fearing, and brings with him all blessings, and this is true of my house, for it is thus in communion with God, for He has made an everlasting covenant with me.—Tr.]—The second "for" gives the reason not merely for the "so" (Böttch., Then.), but also for the whole phrase "so is my house with God," since the following sentence involves the position of his house towards God: for He has made with me an everlasting covenant. These words refer directly to the promise in vii. 12 sq. It is called a covenant because of the reciprocal relation between God and the seed of David, as set forth in vers. 12-14. It is according to ver. 16 an everlasting covenant: "And sure is thy house and thy kingdom forever before thee, thy throne will be established forever." The phrase "ordered (arranged) in all things" denotes that the draught of the instrument or deed of covenant is legally correct and exact, is arranged by the declaration of God (Fries). Comp. vii. 14 sqq., where the eventual apostasy of the bearer of the covenant is considered, and in spite of this the maintenance of the covenant is contemplated. The covenant is preserved, secured, guarded against non-fulfillment by the truthfulness of the divine promise. Comp. 1 Kin. viii. 25, where Solomon, with reference to 2 Sam. xxiii. 12-16, prays: "Preserve to thy servant David, my father, what thou spakest to him."—As these words ("for a covenant, etc.") thus undoubtedly refer to chap. vii. it is inadmissible with Crusius to refer them to ver. 3 sqq.; for in this latter passage the reciprocity involved in the term "covenant" is altogether lacking, and the predicates, ordered and preserved are not applicable to it.—The third "for" now introduces the interrogatory third member (whose reference to the image in ver. 4: "verdure (sprouts) from the earth" is indubitable), and grounds the writer's confidence in the sureness of the covenant on the future blessings secured by that covenant. For all my salvation and all pleasure, should He not make it sprout? My salvation, that is, the salvation promised, assured to me and my seed. The pleasure must be taken (as the salvation is from God) as = what is well-pleasing to God, not as = "what is well-pleasing to me" (Then., Hengst.); the pronoun "my" is not to be repeated with it [as in Eng. A. V]. David refers the salvation promised him and his house—not also "the religious and ethical culture of his people" (Then.)—to its source in God's good pleasure, expressed in the covenant as a divine counsel of salvation. "David will say of the divine resolution of salvation that it, because it has once been lodged as a principle in the bosom of the Davidic house by the divine covenant, cannot be accomplished except by thorough development, elaboration of all its elements, conclusive revelation of its deepest secret" (Fries).—"Should he not* make it sprout?" The verb is transitive, having "salvation and pleasure" as its object. This corresponds also with the idea of divine causality that controls the whole of ver. 5 and is distinctly expressed in the phrase "made a covenant with me" (lit.: established a covenant to me). Fries would find here "the first example and fundamental passage for the solemn use of this verb (נָצַח "sprout") that occurs afterwards in Isa. iv. 2; xliii. 19; xlv. 4; xlv. 8; lviii. 8; lxi. 11; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12;" but here the "sprouting" (comp. ver. 4) is affirmed not of the person of the "righteous ruler," but of the salvation and blessing that accompanies him.† [Comp. the parallel statement in Isa. liii. 10, where it is said that the "pleasure" of Jehovah shall prosper in the hand of the righteous servant of Jehovah. Possibly there is a connection between this passage and ours, though the verb employed is different. The general declaration here is, that God in His covenant-mercy will secure all blessing to the writer.—Tr.]

Vers. 6, 7. From the form of the righteous ruler, and in the light of the blessing that proceeds from Him, David sees in prophetic perspective, on the basis of the promise given him, not only the salvation and blessing of the everlasting covenant under the dominion of the future everlasting king, but also the judgment (which will come with Him) on the ungodly and the enemies of the Messianic theocracy. But the wicked—as cast-away thorns are they all.—The abstract worthlessness (for the concrete worthless, Deut. xiii. 14) designates the ungodly in their general character, in contrast with the abstract fear of God (ver. 3), which forms the religious-moral nature and character of the righteous ruler; as in him only fear of God, so in them only worthlessness. The thorns set forth the hurtful and dangerous enemies of God's people and kingdom, Num. xxxiii. 55; Isa. xxvii. 4; Nah. i. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 24. The thorns, con-

* The fourth נָצַח resumes the third, the interrogation being continued. It (the נָצַח) might have been omitted, but its double use makes equally emphatic the salvation and the sprouting.—נָצַח is Hiphil, causative. [Instead of נָצַח Wellhausen proposes to read נָצַח, which is smoother, but perhaps for that very reason suspicious.—Tr.]

† Sept. separates the נָצַח לֹא from ver. 5 and inserts it before ver. 6, omitting the לֹא: οὐκ ἐν μὲν βλαστῆσθαι ὁ παράνομος. So Michaelis: "the ungodly will not spring forth." Against this is the Hiphil, and the fact that if this last clause were intended to express the thought: "He (God) alone is my salvation, etc." we should at least expect to find the words "for he" (נָצַח אֱלֹהִים).

sidered as representing enemies, are said (literally) to be "hunted, driven away,"* when the thing itself (the thorns) is had in view, this meaning is modified into "put, cast away." The basis of the figure is the field (comp. the "verdure out of the earth," ver. 3), whose yield is obstructed by thorns. The rapid, prophetic glance, not pausing at the details of the process, but hastening to the end, sees the enemy already overpowered, and now tarries by the final act of destruction, which makes the enemy harmless. While the production of blessing under the righteous ruler is represented (by the figure of sprouting, growing) as a gradual process, the judgment on the ungodly is set forth as final judgment (the burning of the thorns). The thorns are no longer hurtful; they appear to David "already as thorns torn up, with which one may no longer hurt his hands, since all kindness to them has been in vain" (Herder).—For they are not taken with the hand, that is, one does not grasp them with naked, unarmed hand in order to throw them into a heap for burning, but he that touches them for this purpose, provides,† arrais himself with iron and shaft. The poetical discourse names the various parts of the implement with which the thorns are seized and thrown into a heap (not: "torn out of the earth." Then.). The expression refers not to the attacking and overcoming of the ungodly, but to their final destruction, set forth by the burning of the thorns, to which this seizing and heaping up is preparatory.—And with fire are they utterly consumed; the fire is symbol of the divine wrath; the expressions indicate the indubitable certainty and completeness of destruction in this final catastrophe (the same figure in Matt. iii. 10; xiii. 30).—The concluding word (בְּשָׁנָה)‡ is to be rendered: "so that there is an end to them" [Eng. A. V.: "in the same place"]. Not "at the seat," as euphemistic expression for the place where trash and filth are thrown (Böttcher, Deut. xxiii. 12 sq.).—why should the thorns be first brought to this place? not: "in the place of dwelling," the place where they grow (Kimchi, Keil), for the term "dwelling" would be here unsuitable, and the thorns are burnt not where they grow, but where they are cast; and so not: "at the seat," = "on the spot," "burnt straight-way," because no other use can be made of them than to manure the fields with their ashes (Then. [Eng. A. V.]); not: "at home" (Cler., Buns.), for one does not take the trouble to carry them home, nor: "at length" (Dathe). The word = "in ceasing" not, however: "as the extirpation is ended" (Thenius formerly), but: "in that they cease;" the burning proceeds so that a complete ceasing, disappearance takes place. "They are there only for burning, and this end awaits them, that not even the place where they stood is seen" (Herder). The complete cessation or annihilation of the thorns follows naturally on the "burning" as its final result. "This figure also . . . is taken from the promise in vii. 10. Israel is there represented as a vineyard, his family is to be its guardian, and so the rebels are hurtful, unfaithful thorns" (Herder).—The Prep. "in" serves to supplement the verbal statement by the substantive-idea, as in Ps. lxxv. 6: I have heard thee in or with salvation, that is, so that I gave thee salvation; so here: they are burned in ceasing, so that they cease.

‡ שָׁנָה is Subst. from שָׁנָה "to cease" (Prov. xx. 3); it may also be pointed as Infin. בְּשָׁנָה. For the verb see Gen. viii. 22; Isa. xxiv. 18; xiv. 4; Lam. v. 15; Prov. xxii. 10; Josh. v. 12. [The word is possibly not part of the true text. It occurs again in the next line, and in both places S. pt. reads בְּשָׁנָה, αἰσχύνω, "shame" (see on ver. 8); it may have gotten into our verse from the following (Wellh.). Vulg.: usque ad nihilum; Syr.: "for cessation."—Tr.]

[Condensed paraphrase of David's last words: "God said to me: The righteous theocratic king dispenses blessings as the rain and sunshine. God, in His covenant, has assured me salvation; but the ungodly shall be destroyed." The acumen or oracle is thus first, a description of the ideal theocratic king, and then the expression of the writer's personal relation to God, with the implication that godliness is the basis of the divine procedure. This conception of the true theocratic king is realized perfectly only in Jesus Christ, and may thus be termed a typical conception, that is, one that was partially realized for the contemporaries, and destined hereafter to be completely realized.—The versions here are not very useful; the Chaldaee paraphrases throughout, and interprets the passage directly of the Messiah, the text of the Sept. differs from that of the Heb., but Vulg. and Syr. conform in general in text and rendering to the masoretic text.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The prophetic element, which appears in David's Messianic Psalms, comes out most strongly here. In Nathan's promise and prophecy in vii. 12 sq. David is merely passively receptive, and his prayer (ver. 18 sq.) is only the echo of the divine word he has received; but here he rises to highest prophetic action, which presupposes indeed a passive bearing towards the divine saying (the Neum) by which he receives an immediate revelation in plastic form of what he had previously received as a promise through Nathan, and this revelation he announces in a prophetic discourse, which in form and content answers to the complete possession of his soul by the power of the divine Spirit. The theocratic king is here also the theocratic prophet, applying to himself as God-inspired singer epithets that are suitable only for prophecy (ver. 1 sq.), and then, on the historical ground of his kingship and its blessings, and on the revelation-ground of the word of God that came directly to him, prophesying the antitype of his kingdom in the appearance of the royal glory and saving work of the righteous ruler of the future. It is clear from the preceding exposition that this picture transcends the form of an ordinary pious king and his blessings; and strict exegesis also shows that David here looks wholly away from himself to a royal personage in the far future.

2. The content of the prophecy is the picture of a future ruler perfect in righteousness and the fear of God. He is accompanied by the light of salvation, which has dissipated the darkness, and diffuses itself in purest radiance like morning-light at sunrise. The effect of this light-appearance is the manifestation of gracious blessings, set forth under the image of verdure springing from the earth. But with the blessing of the future ruler's peaceful work is completed also the revelation of judgment (presupposing victorious conflict), whereby the righteous ruler puts an end to all the enmity of godlessness and to all opposition to his rule.

3. From the height of prophetic view and in the line of prophetic perspective David's look rests on the ideal of a glorious royal person, raised high above all earthly royal forms in Israel (his antitype in the historical person of Christ), in whom righteousness and piety appear absolute and complete, and whose dominion in truth extends over all men. Comp. Ps. lxxii. The fulness of salvation and blessing, which is to appear with the prophesied king, is the object of the Messianic hope and expectation through all the periods of Israel's history, but does not appear as here portrayed, in historical reality till the coming of Christ. The final judgment (following the appearance of the righteous ruler) that annihilates all ungodliness, is completed only under the rule of Him to whom all judgment has been committed by the Father, and in the final decision to which the opposition between the kingdoms of light and darkness is pressing on.

4. The historical presupposition of the prophecy is the promise in chap. vii.; here for the first time is shown how, on the basis of this promise, the view [anschauung, intuition, conception] of the Davidic kingdom becomes clear. "In that the song gives the image of a righteous ruler with a glorious future, adding that such a government is signified by the everlasting covenant that God made with the house of David, we see clearly here already how the knowledge of the idea advances to individualization in the ideal, and so (to use Sack's expression) typical prophecy [Bildweisung] arises. Doubtless epithets may be applied to any king that sits on David's throne, that are true not of himself, but of the dynasty he represents (comp. such passages as Ps. xxi. 5, 7 [4, 6]; lxi. 7 [6]). But, impelled by the Spirit, the sacred poetry produces a royal form that transcends all that the present shows, and exhibits the Davidic-Solomonic kingdom in ideal perfectness" (Cehler, in Herz. IX., 412, Art. Messias).

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

A blessed end, when in looking back upon the path of life that lies behind, and the manifestations of God's grace that have been made to him, one has nothing to utter but gratitude and praise—when in looking around upon his own life's acquisitions and his possession of salvation, all self-glorying is silent, and only the testimony to God's grace and mercy, that has done all and given all, comes upon the lips—when in looking forward into the future of God's kingdom upon earth, on the ground of the grace experienced in life one's faith becomes a prophet, beholding the ways along which the Lord will lead His kingdom through darkness to light, through conflict to victory, and by such a proclamation of the coming glory strengthening the hearts of many and confirming them in the hope of the Lord's gracious help to the end, which never suffers His people to be put to shame—and when in looking up to the everlasting hills from which all help has come,* the "last word" upon earth is a loud Hallelujah, that sounds across into eternity.—The humbler the heart is, the more highly does it praise the gracious gifts and guidance of the Lord; the more a man feels himself little and poor in the sight of the great and gracious God, so much the greater and more glorious will that appear to him which without desert on his part God has given him, in bodily good and spiritual gifts, so much the more joyfully will he, under the guidance and impulse of the Holy Spirit, regard all that flesh and blood might boast of, as coming from the foundation of divine grace.—A servant of God should (every one) show himself, who like David is called to service in God's kingdom; every one's place is in God's sight high and glorious, however lowly and mean it may be in men's eyes, and in his place he should 1) as an "anointed of the Lord" perform the duties of his kingly office, and with his God and Lord conquer and rule the world, 2) as a priest of the Lord proclaim His praise in word and deed, and to the Lord's honor make the harp of his heart sound out into the world, and 3) as a prophet of the Lord prophesy of the glory of the Lord and of His kingdom, the Spirit of God and not his own spirit speaking through him, the word of God and not his own word sounding from his lips.

True preaching is always a prophetic testimony, 1) as to its origin: the Spirit of the Lord speaks through it, 2) as to its content: the word of the Lord is upon its tongue, and 3) as to its subject: the mysteries of God's saving purpose, which only God's Spirit can explain; the great deeds of God's grace, which can be proclaimed only on the ground of personal inner experience and of one's own seeing and hearing; and the future affairs of God's kingdom, in the manifestations of divine salvation and divine judgment, which only the eye illuminated by the light of the Spirit can behold.—When the Lord speaks through His Spirit and in His word, then should man's own thoughts bow and be silent, but then also should the human spirit and the human word be the instruments of God's Spirit and God's word.—The prophetic photograph of the future ruler in the prophecy of David answers in its outlines to the counterpart of the fulfillment in Christ, and this 1) in respect to his personal appearing, perfect righteousness and holiness in complete fear of God (religious-ethical perfection); 2) in respect to the extent of his royal dominion—he is ruler "over men," universality of world-dominion; 3) in respect to the foundations of his kingdom, the promises of God; 4) in respect to the activity and effects of his royal rule on the one hand in the enlightening, warming, animating and fructifying light of his manifestations of grace and blessings of salvation, on the other hand in the fire of His judgment, consuming all ungodliness.

The morning-light of divine grace and truth in Christ. 1) Breaking in the dawn of the promises and predictions of the Old Testament; 2) Flashing up out of the night that before covered the world, and frightening away its darkness and its clouds; 3) Appearing in the Sun of righteousness and salvation; 4) Bringing salvation and blessing, dispensed from on high to all men—and a new life, fruitful for the kingdom of God, which springs from below out of the earth.—The rain in the night is the image of the blessing coming from above, which has been hidden in the trouble brought by the night, and not merely becomes manifest when the night is gone, but also in the shining of divine grace and truth dispenses the fructifying life-force, from which springs new health and new life.—“Morning-light—sunrise—morning without clouds—shining after rain—grass out of the earth—then—then—then.” this is the gradation in which faith beholds the process of appearing of salvation and life from above, and the effects of salvation beneath—this is the surpassing fullness of salvation, in presence of which our human speech, unable adequately to express the unspeakable, can only speak and testify in such a lapidary style.

LUTHER: Here David comes forth and boasts high above all bounds, yet with truth, without any arrogance!—Here David is another man than Jesse's son. This he did not inherit from his birth, nor learn from his father, nor gain by his kingly power or wisdom. From above it is given him, without any desert on his part; in this he is joyous, praises and gives thanks so heartily.—Faith is and also should be a fortress of the heart, which does not shake, totter, quake, writhe nor doubt, but stands fast and is sure of its point.—Faith is not quiet and silent; it comes forth, speaks and preaches of such promises and grace of God, that also others come to them and partake of them.—SCHLIER: In the first place we see the natural ground and soil in which the prophecy grows, namely the person of David, who out of a shepherd's son has become the anointed of the Lord. If no prediction attaches itself to this historical ground, it is to be feared that it is no true prophetic word. But the main matter now first comes, namely, the Spirit of the Lord, that the prophet does not bring his own thoughts but God's thoughts, and that he does not speak what has pleased himself, but what God has put into him.—LUTHER: David means not only the loveliness and sweetness of the psalms, as to grammar and music, in that the words are ornamentally and skillfully arranged and the song sounds sweet—but much rather as to Theology, as to the spiritual understanding, therein are the Psalms very lovely and sweet; for they are consoling to all troubled and distressed consciences, which are involved in sin's anguish and deadly torture and fear, and all sorts of need and sorrow.—[TAYLOR: David spoke, and the human style had all the characteristics of his usual productions; for the Spirit and not the vocal organs of the prophet alone, but his intellectual and emotional powers as well. But God spoke by David, and that which he uttered was the truth, infallible as He who gave it.—TR.]

Ver. 2. LUTHER: What a glorious, noble pride it is; he who can boast that the Spirit of the Lord speaks through him, and his tongue speaks the Holy Spirit's word, must indeed be sure of what he says. Such boasting may still be made by every one of us that is not a prophet.—This may we do, inasmuch as we also are holy and have the Holy Spirit, so that we boast ourselves catechumens and disciples of the prophets, who say after them and preach what we have heard and learned from the prophets and apostles, and are also certain that the prophets have taught it.—Ver. 3. SCHLIER: So profess all the prophets of themselves, so professes all Scripture from beginning to end, and God be thanked that we have before us such a revelation of God, wherein God unveils Himself to us and draws near in the Holy Spirit.—STARKE: The chief aim, the star and heart of Holy Scripture is Christ. Luke xxii. 44; John v. 39. Christ, while a true high-priest and prophet, is also a true king. Luke i. 32, 33.—LUTHER: They fall into Jewish blindness who make David such a righteous ruler and ruler in the fear of God, and pervert the promise into a command and law, to the effect that whoever wishes to rule over men should be righteous and God-fearing, while David so devoutly and heartily boasts that they are words of promise of the Messiah of the God of Jacob, and not a command to secular lords. [This represents an extreme view of the present and many similar passages which some still entertain. The language is completely fulfilled only in Messiah, but had its suggestion and basis in what was true of David, and what every good ruler ought to strive to reproduce in himself. So above, in additions of Tr. to “Exegetical.” TAYLOR: David describes the character of a ruler: and reduplicating on that description, he in effect says (ver. 5), “Is it not to be the distinctive feature of my lineage that it shall rule in justice, and in the fear of the Lord?”—a feature which came out not only in Solomon, but also in Aza, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah and others, and especially and pre-eminently in Jesus Christ, in whom this prophecy culminated, and by whom it was thoroughly fulfilled.—TR.]

Ver. 4. SCHLIER: Is not the Lord really our sun, which after a long movement at last rises upon us and with the splendor of His light makes all bright and clear and warm, and now under the blessing of His beam all begins to be green and blooming; everything grows and prospers, at least whatever does not shut itself against the Lord, but opens itself to Him and repels not His sunny beams?—The Lord brings blessing and prosperity, and in Him there is nothing lacking, if only we would like to receive such a blessing which is present for us.—LUTHER: Like the spring, so is also the rule and reign of grace a joyous, lusty time, wherein Messiah makes us righteous and God-fearing, so that we become green, blooming, fragrant, and grow and become fruitful. For He is the sun of righteousness, who draws near to us. Mal. iv. 2.—And now go so: Who lives in spring, he dies no more; who dies in winter, he lives no more;—for the sun goes away from the latter; but to the former the sun rises up of which David prophesies. Where the sun, Christ, does not shine clear, the spring also is not pleasant; but Moses with the law's thunder makes everything dreadful and quite deadly. But here, in Messiah's times (says David), when He shall reign over Israel itself, with grace to make us righteous and save us, it will be as delightful as the best time in spring, when before day there has been a delightful warm rain, that is, the consoling gospel has been preached, and quickly thereupon the sun Christ comes up in our heart through right faith without Moses' clouds and thunder and lightning. Then all proceeds to grow, to be green and blooming, and the day is rich in joy and peace.

Ver. 5. CRAMER: God's covenant is an everlasting covenant, and remains also when the world passes away.—S. SCHMID: In Christ alone our salvation blooms; He alone can quiet all our longing. Acts iv. 12.—LUTHER: Of the everlasting covenant and house of David the two words "ordered" and "sure" are designedly used to instruct and console. For if you look at the histories, it will seem to you that God has forgotten His covenant and not kept it sure;—after Messiah His kingdom the Church is, when outwardly looked at, much more waste and disorderly, so that there is no more distracted, wretched, good-for-nothing government or dominion than the Christian Church, Christ's dominion. Here the tyrants distract and waste it with all their might. Here the fanatics and heresies root up and spoil it. So also the false Christs with their evil life make it as if there were no more shameful, disorderly government upon earth. And these are working, or rather the evil spirit through them, to the end that Christ's dominion shall not exist, or at any rate shall be a wretchedly disorderly thing. And in fine Christ acts as if He had forgotten His dominion and was never at home, so that here neither "ordered" nor "sure" is seen by the reason. Though we do not see it, He sees it who says, Song of Sol. viii. 12: My vineyard is before me; Matt. xxviii. 20, Lo, I am with you even to the end of the world; John xvi. 23, Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. However, we see that there has always remained and still remains a people which honors the name of Christ, and has His word, baptism, sacrament, key and Spirit, even against all the gates of hell.

Vers. 6, 7. 8. SCHMID: He who seizes thistles with the naked hand acts imprudently; but yet more imprudent is he who holds close friendship with the children of Belial. 2 Cor. vi. 7.—SCHLIER: Where Christ the Lord counts for something there is blessing and prosperity; but where He is despised there are thorns and thistles.—A man's true worth is determined by his attitude towards Christ.—Every tree that brings not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire.—He who cares for Christ is also cared for in the sight of God. But he who despises Christ amounts to nothing, and is counted in the sight of God as mere thorns and thistles.

FIFTH SECTION.

David's Heroes.

CHAPTER XXIII. 8-39.

- 8 These be [are] the names of the mighty men whom David had: The Tachmonite that sat in the seat [margin, Josheb-basshebeth the Tachmonite], chief among the captains [margin, head of the three], the same was Adino the Eznite [om. the same was A. the E.]; he lift up his spear [write without italics] against eight hundred whom he slew [slain] at one time. And after him was Eleazar the son of Dodo the Ahohite, one of the three mighty men with David, when they defied the Philistines that were there gathered together [probably: he was with David at Pasdammim, and the P. were there assembled] to battle, and the men of Israel were gone away [went up]. He arose and smote the Philistines until his hand was weary, and his hand clave unto the sword; and the Lord [Jehovah] wrought a great victory [deliverance] that day, and the people returned after him only to spoil. And after him was Shammah the son of Agee the Hararite. And the Philistines were gathered together into a troop [or, to Lehi], where was [and there was there] a piece of ground full of lentiles, and the people fled from the Philistines.

- 12 But [And] he stood in the midst of the ground, and defended [saved] it, and slew [smote] the Philistines; and the Lord [Jehovah] wrought a great victory [deliverance].
- 13 And three of the thirty chief went down, and came to David in the harvest-time unto the cave of Adullam; and the troops of the Philistines pitched [encamped] in the valley of Rephaim. And David was then in an hold, and the [a] garrison of the Philistines was then in Bethlehem. And David longed and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!
- 16 And the three mighty men broke through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Bethlehem, that was by the gate, and took it and brought it to David; nevertheless [and] he would not drink thereof, but poured it out unto the Lord [Jehovah], And he said [And said], Be it far from me, O Lord [Jehovah forbid] that I should do this; is not this [shall I drink] the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives? therefore [and] he would not drink it.
- These things did these [the] three mighty men.
- 18 And Abishai, the brother of Joab, the son of Zeruiah, was chief among three [better, chief of the thirty]. And he lifted up his spear against three hundred and slew them [300 slain], and had the [a] name among three [the thirty]. Was he not [He was] most honourable of three [the thirty], therefore he was [and became] their captain, howbeit [and] he attained not unto the first [om. first] three.
- 20 And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of [om. the son of] a valiant man of Kabzeel, who had done many acts [man, who had done many acts, of Kabzeel], he slew two lion-like men of Moab. He went down also [And he went down] and slew a [the] lion in the midst of a [the] pit in time [in a day] of snow. And he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man [or, a man of great stature], and the Egyptian had a spear in his hand, but [and] he went down to him with a staff, and plucked the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and slew him with his own spear. These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had the [a] name among three mighty men [among the thirty heroes]. He was more honourable than the thirty, but he attained not to the first [om. first] three. And David set him over his guard [made him of his privy council].
- 24 Asahel the brother of Joab was one of the thirty, Elhanan the son of Dodo of 25, 26 Bethlehem, Shammah the Harodite, Elikah the Harodite, Helez the Paltite, Ira the son of Ikkeah the Tekoite, Abiezer the Anethothite, Mebunnai the Hushathite, 27 Zalmon the Ahohite, Maharai the Netophathite, Heleb the son of Baanah a [the] 28 Netophathite, Ittai the son of Ribai, out of Gibeah of the children of Benjamin, 29 Benaiah the Pirathonite, Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash [or, of Nahale-Gaash], 30 Abi-albon the Arbathite, Azmaveth the Barhumite, Eliahba the Shaalbouite, of 31, the sons of Jashon [probably, Hashem the Gizonite], Jonathan, Shammah the 32, 33 Hararite [or. Jonathan the son of Shammah (Shage) the Hararite], Ahiam the 34 son of Sharar the Hararite [Ararite], Eliphalet the son of Ahasbai, the son of [or, 35 Hephher] the Maachathite, Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, Hezrai the Carmelite, Paarai the Arbite, Igal the son of Nathan of Zobah, Bani the Gadite, 36 Zelek the Ammonite, Nahari the Beerothite, armour-bearer to Joab the son of Ze- 37, 38 ruiah, Ira an [the] Ithrite, Gareb an [the] Ithrite, Uriah the Hittite; thirty and seven in all.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. Superscription. These are the names of the heroes that David had. In the parallel section 1 Chron. xi. 10-41 there are two superscriptions. Chap. xi. 10 has: "And these are the heads [chiefs] of the heroes that David had, who stood stoutly by him in his kingdom with all Israel, to make him king." With these words the Chronicler attaches the following list of heroes to the account of the choice of David by all the Tribes (vers. 1-3), comp. 2 Sam. v. 1-3, thus giving a reason for inserting the list here. Further the list follows immediately the narrative of the conquest of Zion and the choice of Jerusalem as capital, vers. 4-9 (2 Sam. v. 6-10), especially to illustrate the remark in ver. 9: "and David grew greater and greater" (comp. 2 Sam. v. 10).—Besides the fuller superscription, which assigns the list its historical position, the Chronicler has a second simpler one, ver. 11 a: "And this is the number of the heroes that David had." The Gibborim [Heroes, Mighty men], elsewhere given in round numbers at six hundred men, formed a standing central corps, which (just as the body-guard, the Cherethites and Pelethites) remained near David and at his personal disposal. On the origin and development of this corps comp. 1 Sam. xxii. 2; xxiii. 13; xxv. 13; xxvii. 2; xxx. 9-24; 2 Sam. x. 7; xv. 18; xvi. 16; xx. 7, and Ewald's Hist. of Israel, III. 122, 140; 189 sq. [Germ. ed.] The first superscription in Chron.: "these are the heads of the heroes" (ver. 10), corresponds exactly with the list, which gives not the "names" (2 Sam., ver. 8) nor the "number" (1 Chron., ver. 11) of the heroes, but only the chief among them. The list in Chron. gives no number, though the superscription (ver. 11) states this to be the number of the heroes, while the list in 2 Sam. xxiii., speaking only of names on the superscription, gives at the close the whole number as thirty-seven. As in our list only thirty-seven out of six hundred Gibborim are mentioned, we may conjecture (with Then., after Chron.) that the word "heads" has here fallen out after "names" ["the names of the heads of the heroes"]. Otherwise the term Gibborim must be taken in a narrower sense (heroes among the heroes) [which is the more probable explanation.—Tr.]. Neither the form nor the content of the list indicates a division into three classes (as held by most expositors); there is only a triple gradation in respect to the bravery of the heroes, first, three of the first rank (vers. 8-12), then two, distinguished for bravery, but "not attaining to the three" (vers. 18-23), and finally thirty-two, of whom no deeds are mentioned. The five of the first and second ranks, and seven of the third, altogether twelve, were named by David leaders of the twelve divisions into which he divided the army, each of which had to do service one month in the year (1 Chron. xxvii. 1-15). In the list in 1 Chron. (xi. 41-47) occur sixteen names that are lacking here. In other respects the two lists agree materially, only that in both there is a considerable number of textual errors.

Vers. 8-12. The three greatest heroes, Jashobeam, Eleazar, Shammah, and their deeds.—Ver. 8. Our text has Joheeb-bassebeth, while Chron., has Jashobeam; the latter (according to 1 Chron. xxvii. 2) is the correct reading.* Instead of Tachmoni read "the son of Hachmoni" as in Chron.; comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 32, where it is said: "Jehiel the son of Hachmoni was with the sons of the king;" this Jehiel was perhaps a brother of Jashobeam. Comp. also 1 Chron. xxvii. 32, where Jashobeam is called the son of Zabdiel; but this "is no discrepancy, since Zabdiel might be the proper name, and Hachmoni the patronymic but better known name of the father" (Böttch.).—"Head of the knights (body-guardsmen)." "Head" here is not = "leader" (which would be שׂר according to the usage of our books, comp. ver. 19, Böttch.), but = "chief, most distinguished." "Shalishim or riders (knights)," this word (שָׁלִישִׁים)† is to be taken with Thenius as meaning the most distinguished warriors standing nearest the persons of kings and generals; the name [lit.: "third man"] it may be conjectured, had its origin in the fact that from these warriors was chosen the man who, when the king or general went to battle, stood with him in the chariot (along with the driver) as third man. With this agrees (Then. p. 276) 2 Kin. ix. 25, where Jehu says to his Shalish: "Remember how I and thou rode together after Ahab;" and so in the pictures at Nineveh (Layard), in which the principal personage, drawing the bow, is covered by the shield of a warrior on his left, while the driver stands in front of the two. According to Ex. xiv. 7 (comp. xv. 4) every chariot was in unusual wise provided with a shalish [Eng. A. V. captain]. From Ezek. xxiii. 15, these favored men seem (later, at least) to have been distinguished by a special dress. From these shalishim (who afterwards formed a special Corps, near the person of the king, 2 Kin. x. 25) the kings seem to have chosen their adjutants, comp. 2 Kin. vii. 2 (xvii. 19); ix. 25; xv. 25, and in 1 Kin. ix. 22 they appear as a special military rank or office. The term signifies, therefore, not: chariot warriors, three on a chariot, nor: (with a different pointing) the 30 leaders of the 600 Gibborim [Heroes] (Ew., Berth.), nor: regulars drawn up "three deep," that is, superior soldiers (Böttch.), but: *shalish-corps, shalish-men, lifeguardsmen, "knights" (Luther, in "Kings"). [The meaning of shalish is obscure, but here it seems better to adopt the reading "three." Jashobeam was chief or most eminent of the three highest, which agrees best with the context. So margin of Eng. A. V.—Tr.]—The text of the next following words [Eng. A. V.: "the same was A. the E."] is corrupt and unintelligible, and is to be read (after ver. 18 and Chron. ver. 11): "he brandished his spear."† Instead of 800 Chron. has 300, taken probably from ver. 18, in order to soften the seemingly monstrous number 800. "At one time" = in one battle. "Eight hundred slain" (חַלָּל), not "warriors," as Kennicott (according to Thenius) renders: "he brandished his spear over 800 warriors, was their leader." The meaning is, either that in one battle he swung his spear till he had killed 800 men (Ew., Berth., Böttch., Keil), or that after the battle he brandished his spear over those that were killed by him and his men, as symbol of victory over them (Thenius). [For various forced interpretations of the verse see citations in Wordsworth and Philippeon.—Tr.]

Ver. 9 sqq. After him, next him in the list, was Eleazar . . . with David; comp. ver. 11. "The son of Dodai," as the text reads (pointed according to 1 Chron. xxvii. 4). The margin has Dodo, 1 Chron. xi. 12 [so Eng. A. V. here]. "The son of an Ahoite," in Chron.

—Tr.]

* In שְׁלִישִׁי the י is Adj. ending (as in בְּרִי and פְּלִי), denoting rank. Ew. § 177 a, § 164.

† [Some hold that עֵרִינוּ is corruption of עֵרִיר, and that עֵרִיר = "spear" (comp. Arab. عَرْن and عَسَن), but this last is altogether uncertain.—Tr.]

* According to Kennicott the two last letters of עֵרִינוּ stood in a MS. under the כְּשֶׁת of the preceding line (ver. 7), and a transcriber by mistake attached the latter word instead of עֵרִיר. [Or it may be that the כְּשֶׁת here is corruption of עֵרִיר in Chron., and passed from ver. 8 into ver. 7. Sept. Teßendorf — אֲשֶׁנֶּעֶל אֲשֶׁנֶּשֶׁת (Wellh.). See on כְּשֶׁת ver. 7.—Tr.]

† So read here and in Chron. instead of our text; so in vers. 13, 23, 24, and 1 Chron. xi. 15, 42; xii. 4; xxvii. 6

"the Ahohit." "Among the three heroes,"* that is, the renowned trio, Jashobeam, Eleazar and Shammah (ver. 11).—Instead of our text† read with Chron.: "with David (Chron.: he was with David) at Pas-dammim, and the Philistines, etc." Pas-dammim is probably the same place with "Ephes-dammim," 1 Sam. xvii. 1.—And the Philistines had there assembled to battle. The words from "and the men of Israel went up" (ver. 9) to "and the Philistines were gathered together to Lehi [Eng. A. V.: into a troop]" (ver. 11) have fallen out of the text of Chron.,‡ so that the name of the third hero Shammah" is there wanting, as his deed (vers. 11, 12) falls to Eleazar.—The verb "went up" [Eng. A. V. wrongly: were gone away] denotes simply the marching of the men of Israel against the Philistines; it is unnecessary to add: "in flight" (Then.). The flight or holding back of the Israelites (involved in the "and the people returned," ver. 10), inasmuch as it occurred after the advance to battle (wherefore Eleazar undertook the contest with the Philistines alone), is not expressly mentioned in the concise narrative, but is first indicated by the "returned." If the word "went up" had been intended to indicate "flight to higher positions earlier occupied" (Then.), then necessarily a corresponding additional statement would have been made, such as Böttcher too boldly conjectures: "they went up on the mountain and lost heart." A correct explanation of the "returned" is given by Josephus [Ant. 7, 12, 4]: "when the Israelites fled, he alone remained," and by the Vulgate, in its addition in ver. 10: "and the people, who had fled, returned." [There is not necessarily any hint in the text that the people had fled; the "returned" might refer to the withdrawal from pursuit of the defeated enemy. Bib.-Com., suggests that this view (as in Eng. A. V.: "gone away") may have arisen from the misapplication in 1 Chron. xi. 13 of the phrase "the people fled" to this battle, whereas it belongs to Shammah's exploit.—Tr.]—Ver. 10. He arose, that is, when the others had fallen back. Josephus: "he alone remained." And smote the Philistines till his hand clave to the sword, his hand was cramped around the sword-hilt by weariness. "Jehovah wrought great deliverance," that is, a great victory [observe the theocratic form of the Heb. expression: a victory is a deliverance or salvation from God.—

Tr]. And the people returned after him. After this exploit the people had nothing to do but to follow for the purpose of plundering, to strip the slain (Sept.).

Ver. 11 sqq. The third principal hero, Shammah. Another of this name (not to mention the incorrect reading in ver. 33) is given in ver. 25, and called the Harodite. Here "a Hararite" is no doubt to be taken as the same with "the Hararite," ver. 33, since in the parallel passage, 1 Chron. xi. 34, the same name Agee is given. Therefore we read: "Shammah the son of Agee, the Hararite."—"And the Philistines were assembled at Lehi."† So we must render [and not: into a troop], because the words "there" and "assembled" both presuppose the name of a place (Then., Ewald). Chron. has: "to battle," no doubt from ver. 9.—Lehi (= "jaw-bone") = Ramath Lehi, where Samson smote the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, Judg. xv. 9, 14, 17, 19. In Josephus' time the place was still called Siagon (Σιαγών, "jaw-bone," Ant. 5, 8, 8, 9). The Philistines had encamped in a lentil-field, because they found provision there (instead of "lentils," Chron. has "barley" [probably both barley and lentils were found there.—Tr.]). The Israelites had fallen back. Then Shammah planted himself in the field, took it from the Philistines and smote them. A situation like that of vers. 9, 10, is here described in short, sharp strokes, and the hero's victory extolled as the immediate gift of God.

Vers. 13-17. Exploit of three other principal heroes of David, whose names are not given. Instead of the text: "thirty," the marginal reading "three" is to be taken (with Chron. and all the Versions). As the Art. is lacking both here and in Chron., the heroes here named are not the chief three above (De Wette, Jos.), but other three out of the list, ver. 24 sqq.†—And three of the Shalish-men (that is, the life-guardsmen, knights, see on ver. 8) went down, that is, from the heights of the mountains of Judah. The masoretic text has: "three of the thirty," but instead of "thirty" we are to read "shalish-men" (Then.), as in ver. 8.—[There is no need to change the text. We have here an anecdote of three of the thirty afterwards mentioned. Perhaps this anecdote interrupts the list proper, in which Abishai should follow immediately after Shammah (Wellh.); but it is also possible that Abishai and Benaiah were two of the three here engaged.—Tr.]—"Three of the knights, captains" [Eng. A. V.: "three of the thirty chief"]. The ראש is to be rendered as in ver. 8 ("head"), but is here postposed as apposition

* The Qeri and Chron. insert the Art. before צָרִיחַ. But there is nothing strange in the absence of the Art., as Böttcher remarks against Thenius, who would read צָרִיחַ, thinking it necessary on account of following references (vers. 12, 16 sqq.). On the stat. abs. of the Numeral before the Subst., see Ges. § 120, 1.

† Against our text is 1) the following שָׁם "there," which supposes a preceding name of a place, 2) צָרִיחַ takes not צ, but the Accus. (xxi. 21; 1 Sam. xvii. 10, 25 sq., 36), 3) the failure of the Rel. Pron. before צָרִיחַ "were assembled." Instead of צָרִיחַ read צָרִיחַ "and the Philistines."

‡ By erroneous passage from צָרִיחַ (ver. 9) to the similar צָרִיחַ (ver. 11).

* Vulg.: populus qui fugerat reversus est. According to Thenius an אִשְׁרֵי "who had fled" (comp. ver. 11) seems to have fallen out after "the people" If this be rightly taken as probable (Ew.), then there is the less propriety in explaining the "went up" with Thenius as above mentioned.

† The masoretic pointing לְחִיָּה came no doubt from the לְחִיָּה in ver. 12. לְחִיָּה would be the proper name Lehi with ה local, = "to Lehi."—Tr.]

‡ This is favored also by the צָרִיחַ, which introduces them as other persons.

(="captains"). The text, however, is difficult.* "In the harvest-time" (רֹאשׁ הַקֵּץ), for which Chron. has: "on the rock," but there is no reason to reject our text as spurious, since the rendering "in harvest-time" is not set aside by the context (Then.).—To the cave of Adullam, see 1 Sam. xxii. 1. According to the situation here described this exploit occurred in the Philistine war narrated in v. 17 sq.—"And the troop (חֵיָל, Num. xxxv. 3; Ps. lxxviii. 11 [10]; 1 Sam. xviii. 18) of the Philistines encamped in the valley of Rephaim." Thenius thinks that (on account of the "post, garrison" of ver. 14) the "host" of Chron., as a larger body, is to be read instead of the "troop" of our passage; but this cannot be established. On the valley Rephaim see on 1 Sam. v. 18.—Ver. 14. On the "post" (בֵּית) see 1 Sam. xiii. 23; xiv. 1, 4.†—Ver. 15. "Who will give me to drink?" that is, Oh that some one would, etc., (Ew. § 329 a). Clericus explains this exclamation of David from his desire to see Bethlehem soon freed from the enemy's siege; but this does not accord with the idea of appetite that especially belongs to this verb. The connection does not indicate that David wished to refresh himself after a hot fight (Ew.). Perhaps the water was bad or failed, and he had a longing desire for water from the well "at the gate," which was perhaps particularly good. The traditional "David's Well" lies half an English mile from the present Bethlehem, and is, according to Ritter (Erdk. xvi. 286) "deep, and well provided with clear, cool water." Comp. Tobler, Bethlehem, p. 10.—Ver. 16. The camp of the Philistines was in the valley of Rephaim in the direction from Adullam towards Bethlehem; comp. the local statements in 1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2 Sam. v. 18.—David would not drink the water, but poured it out to the Lord, not in thanksgiving for the preservation of the heroes (Jos.), nor as prayer for forgiveness of his fault in sending them into such deadly peril (Kennicott), but to honor the Lord (Vulg.), as an offering to the Lord, to whom alone it ought to belong, since it was too costly for David.—Ver. 17. His reason: Far be it from me, O Lord! to do this. One would expect here the usual form of an oath: ‡ "the Lord forbid that I should do this" (1 Chron. xi. 19, Syr., Chald., Then.). "But," rightly remarks Böttcher, "the Chronicler and the modern critics have failed to note the difference in the situation. Here David pours out a drink-offering to Jahwe, and in connection with it, invokes him; here, therefore, the elsewhere unusual vocative is necessary."—"Should I [or, shall I] drink the blood of the men, etc.?" Not: "The blood of the men, etc.?" (interrogation with aposiopesis, Ew. § 30 3 a), which would be too unclear (Böttch.). The words do not permit Movers' rendering: "is it not the blood?" [so Eng. A. V.]. The verb "drink" † must be supplied, and the sense is: should I drink this water, which has the same value for me as the blood of these heroes, since they brought it "at the price of their souls," at the risk of their lives? According to Lev. xvii. 11 the soul [life] is in the blood; to drink this water would be equivalent to drinking the blood of these men.

Vers. 18-23. Feats of two other heroes of David.—Ver. 18 sqq. Abishai, see 1 Sam. xxvi. 6. He was (as Jashobeam), a chief man, captain of the shalish-corps. (Erdmann retains the text (Kethib) shalish, Eng. A. V. follows the margin (Qeri): "chief of (the) three;" but it seems better to read: "chief of the thirty." Abishai and Benaiah attained to fame and distinction among the thirty, without reaching to the three (vers. 8-12).—Ta.] He brandished his spear over, etc., as in ver. 8. And he had a name among the three, Jashobeam, Eleazar and Shammah. Among these greatest heroes he had a name for heroic bravery.—Ver. 19. But also above the Shalish-corps (knights) was he honored. Our text reads: "above the three he was honored," but, while the "three" at the end of ver. 18 is to be maintained against Thenius (who would unnecessarily change it to Shalish), here it must be regarded as a scribal error, and changed to Shalish, partly because of the following words: "and he became their captain," partly because of the relation of these words (which indicate his position) to the "chief of the Shalish" in ver. 18.—The text here is as to one word (יְהִי) unintelligible, and must be changed after Chron., so as to read: "above the Shalish he was doubly honored," so that he became their leader, which answered to his position as "chief of the Shalish-corps" (ver. 18). But to the three (first) he attained not, they were beyond him in bravery and heroic achievement. [Dr. Erdmann thus, by somewhat arbitrary changes of text, brings out of this list a Shalish-corps with Abishai as captain; but we hear nothing elsewhere of such a corps, and it seems foreign to the design of this list to mention it. Moreover, the statement in ver. 23 concerning

† אֲשַׁתָּה (Sept., Vulg.) may easily have fallen out after מִן־הַשְּׁלִישִׁים by homoteleuton.

‡ הָיָה is not to be taken as a question, equivalent to a lively asseveration (= is it so that? — certainly, comp. ix. 1; Gen. xxvii. 36; xxix. 15); "he was certainly honored"—"for what is a question doing in the midst of this perfectly smooth narration?" (Then.); nor is it to be explained as having arisen from the preceding הָיָה and an inserted בִּי. Instead of this unintelligible reading the text of Chronicles is to be taken, only pointed בִּשְׁנֵי, "in two, double." Comp. Ewald § 269 b. [It is easier to suppose הָיָה an insertion than to get it out of בִּשְׁנֵי, though the presence of the latter in Chron. is not easily explained. Wellh. suggests הִנֵּה "behold, he" for הָיָה.—Ta.]

* Of the Versions אֲשַׁתָּה is found only in the Chald., and Thenius would therefore regard it as an [inserted] explanation of the preceding word. But it is perhaps better to detach the אֲשַׁתָּה from the preceding word (which would then end in אֲשַׁתָּה, as in ver. 8), prefix it to אֲשַׁתָּה, then insert הָיָה (as in Chron., omitting עָלָה), and render: "descended three of the knights from the top of the rock."

† [This phrase cannot be rendered: "in the harvest-time," and it would seem better, therefore, to adopt the reading of Chron., or Erdmann's suggestion in the preceding note.—Ta.]

‡ ["The hold" in which David found himself, was a strong-hold or fortress near the cave of Adullam.—Ta.]

Benaiah seems to be parallel to that in ver. 19 concerning Abishai, and ver. 23 gives a clear and appropriate sense, in accordance with which it is better to render ver. 19: "He was more honorable than the thirty, and became their captain, but did not attain to the three." Thus, between the three and the thirty we have the two eminent soldiers, Abishai and Benaiah, of whom the first was made Captain of the Thirty, and the second Privy Councillor. The change of text required in order to give this reading (that is, to conform ver. 19 to ver. 23) is slight, involving only the alteration of ah to im.—Tr.]

Vers. 20–23. Benaiah; first, his person and character. The son of Jehoiada, according to 1 Chronic. xxvii. 5 the priest Jehoiada (compare ch. xii. 27); he was (viii. 18; xx. 23) the commander of the body-guard (Cherethites and Pelethites), and became (1 Kings i. 35) in Joab's stead commander-in-chief of the army. He was the son of an honorable man. As both texts have the "son," it is not to be stricken out (Ew., Berth., Then., Böttch.), though of the Versions only the Chald. has it. Not: "the son of a valiant man"—that would not suit the priest Jehoiada—but: "of an upright, honest, capable* man" (as in Numb. xxiv. 18; 1 Kings i. 52; Ruth iv. 11; Prov. xii. 4: xxx. 10, 29). [It is not probable that, after the name of his father has been given, he would then be described afresh by this general phrase: "son of a man of force," in spite of the concurrence of the two texts (Sam. and Chron.) in retaining the word "son," it is better to omit it.—Tr.].—He was "rich in deeds." Of Kabzeel, in the south of Judah, Josh. xv. 21; Neh. xi. 25.—His deeds: 1) He slew the two Ariels [Eng. A. V.: two lionlike men] of Moab. Thenius (after the Sept., with a slight alteration) renders: "he slew the two sons of Ariel, the Moabite." So also Ewald, who conjectures that Ariel was a name of honor of a king of Moab. But as both texts have the same reading, the renderings of Sept. and Targ. are mere conjectures. Nor can our text be translated: "two lions of God" (God-lions) (De W., Böttch.) = monstrous lions; poetical expressions such as "mountains of God, cedars of God" (Ps. xxxvi. 7 [6]; lxxx. 11 [10]) [= great mountains, goodly cedars] are not suitable to wild beasts and to "historical prose" (Then.). Among the Arabians and Persians "Lion of God" is the designation of a hero, comp. Boch. Hieroz. II. 7, 63, ed. Rosenmüller; Indian princes call themselves Davasinha, "god-lions" (Ew.). It was two famous Moabite heroes that Benaiah conquered and killed. Why is it so improbable (Then. [Wellh.]) that this name should have been given to two contemporary men of a nation? This exploit belongs, therefore, in the history of the Moabite war, of which we otherwise know little.—2) He went down and slew the lion in the pit.—The word (אֵרֶץ) denotes a lion-animal, a beast that looks like a lion (Böttcher).* The Art. points out that the fact was generally known. On the day of snow, on a snowy day, when more snow than usual had fallen, and the lion, having approached human habitations to seek food, fell into an ordinary cistern, or a pit dug to catch him.—3) Ver. 21. And he slew the Egyptian; the Art. denotes that the man was known according to this account. He was a "man of appearance," that is, a large man. Chron. has: "a man of measure," = a man of great height." Which is the original reading must be left undetermined; both denote gigantic stature, Chron. adding: "he was five cubits high, and his spear as a weaver's beam." The heroic nature of Benaiah's deed consisted in his going down with a staff to the Egyptian, who was armed with a spear. We must suppose that there was a battle, in which Benaiah stood with Israel on a height, while the Egyptian and the enemy were below in the plain; he showed his skill and strength by snatching the spear out of the Egyptian's hand and killing him with it.—Ver. 22. His name also (as Abishai's) was renowned among the three chief heroes (comp. ver. 18) [here, as there, it seems better to read: "among the thirty,"]—Tr.].—Ver. 23. Here (as in verse 19) instead of the "thirty" of the text, we are to read "Shalish" (knights).—Above the knights he was honored (as Abishai), but also he came not up to the three, the first-named three heroes.—And David made him his privy-councillor.—See on 1 Sam. xxii. 14. On his high military position see viii. 18 and xx. 23.—[As above remarked, it is simpler to retain the text here (as in Eng. A. V.), and make ver. 19 conform to it.—Tr.]

Vers. 24–39. The remaining heroes [thirty-two in number], who belonged to the corps of Shalishim, and, in comparison with the above-named, formed the third grade.—Ver. 24. Asahel, Joab's brother; see ii. 18. He was one of the Shalishim [the text reads "thirty"], and this designation "among the Shalish" applies to all the following names. Chron. has as superscription: "and brave heroes were" (Asahel, etc.).—Elhanan, the son of Dodo, is to be distinguished from the Bethlehemite Elhanan mentioned in xxi. 19. Instead of "Bethlehem" read "Bethlehemite"; Chron. has "of Bethlehem" [so Eng. A. V.].—Ver. 25. Shammah, Chron. has the Harorite; here correctly the Harodite, of Harod, Judg. vii. 1; Chron. writes the name

* אֵרֶץ (Keth.) as distinguished from אֵרִי (Qeri). [This distinction of Böttcher's is hardly sustained by usage.—Tr.]

† Instead of אֵשֶׁר read Qeri אִישׁ (Chron.).—Instead of מִרְאָה Chron. has מִדָּה. [As אִישׁ מִרְ (Sam.) means a "goodly man" (so Eng. A. V.), not a "large man" (Erdmann), the reading of Chronicles is to be preferred.—Tr.]

‡ [Wellh.: כְּשֵׁלִישִׁים הַנְּבוֹרִי "among the thirty heroes."—Tr.]

§ [Kennicott and Böttcher think that Asahel forms a second triad with Abishai and Benaiah, and ought to be separated from the list, but the text is against this. "The early death of Asahel (ii. 32) would make it likely that his place would be filled up, and so account (in part) for the number 31 [32] in the list" (Bib.-Com.).—For the Captains of the several months see 1 Chron. xxvii. 1–15.—Tr.]

* הִי is certainly scribal error for חִיל (Chron.).

† He inserts בְּנֵי and reads הַמְּאֹאכִי instead of מִדָּה.

‡ אֵרֶץ, more fully אֵרֶץ אִישׁ. [The reading of Vulg.: "two lions of Moab" is less likely on account of the following special mention of a lion. The Ariel of Isa. xlix. 1 is different.—Tr.]

Shammoth (1 Chron. xxvii. 8: Shamhuth).—Elika, wanting in Chron., omitted by reason of the identical "Harodite" in the two clauses.—Ver. 26. Heles the Palitite, of Beth-pelet in the south of Judah, Josh. xv. 27; Neh. xi. 28. In 1 Chron. xi. 27 and xxvii. 10 stands by error "the Pelonite."—Ira, of Tekoa in the wilderness of Judah, see xiv. 2, comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 9.—Ver. 27. Abieser, of Anathoth in Benjamin, Josh. xxi. 8; Jer. i. 1, comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 12.—Instead of Mebunnai read Sibbekai (1 Chron. xi. 29) the Hushathite, xxi. 18; comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 11.—Ver. 28. Zalmon, of the Benjaminites family Ahoha; Chron. (ver. 29) has Itai [perhaps corrupted from Zalmon].—Maharai, of Netophah near Bethlehem (Ezra ii. 22; Neh. vii. 26; comp. 2 Kings xxv. 23), now Beit Netif (Rob. II. 600 [Am. ed. II. 15, 223], Tobler, 3 Wand. 117 sq.).—Ver. 29. Heleb, according to 1 Chron. xi. 30 and xxvii. 15 Heled = Heldai, also of Netophah.—Ittai, Chron. Ittai, not to be confounded with the Ittai of xv. 19 [since this was a Benjaminites, and the other a Gittite.—Tr.].—Ver. 30. Benaliah; read "the Pirathonite" (Chron.), of Pirathon in Ephraim, now Ferata, near Nablus, comp. Judg. xii. 13.—Hiddai (1 Chron. xi. 32: Hurai), of Nahale-Gaash [Eng. A. V. less well: "brooks of Gaash"], near the mountain Gaash in Benjamin, Josh. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9.—Ver. 31. Abi-Albon (Chron.: Abiet) of Beth-ha-arabah = Arabah, Josh. xv. 61; xviii. 18, 22, in the wilderness of Judah.—Asmaveth of Bahurim, see xvi. 5; Chron. has: "the Baharumite" for "Bahurimite" (Thenius), see iii. 16.—Ver. 32 sq. Eliabba, of Shaalbon = Shaalbin, Josh. xix. 42, perhaps the present Selbit.—Instead of the following text, Chron. has Benehashem the Gizonite, Jonathan the son of Shagee the Hararite. This is probably the correct text, since "Bene Jashen Jonathan" [Eng. A. V.: "of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan"] gives no sense; but probably the Bene ["sons"] has gotten into the text by erroneous repetition from the preceding word [Shaalboni], so that we must read simply: Hashem. The locality of Gizon is unknown. Shammah has probably gotten in here from ver. 11, in place of Ben-Agee.—Ahiam, the son of Sharar (Chron. Sakar, comp. 1 Chron. xxvi. 4); the Ararite (Chron. Hararite [so Eng. A. V.]).—Ver. 34. Eliphalet (Chron.: Eliphal, the t having fallen out). It is surprising that the text here gives not only the father, but also the grandfather, which is not done elsewhere in the list; nor does the word "son" suit before the gentile name "the Maachathite." Chron. here (ver. 35 sq.) has: "Eliphal (-phelet) the son of Ur, Hephher the Mekarathite." The first part of the Sam. text might have arisen from that of Chron.† (not the converse, Thenius), while the latter part of our text is to be preferred, so that the reading will be: Eliphalet the son of Ur, Hephher the Maachathite, of Maachah in Gilead, see on x. 6; comp. Deut. iii. 14 and 2 Kings

xxv. 23.—Eliam, son of Ahithophel the Gilonite; Chron. has an entirely different text: "Ahi-jah the Pelonite." On Ahithophel see on xv. 12. [This Eliam is supposed by some to be the father of Bathsheba (xi. 3).—Tr.].—Ver. 35. Hezro, as in the text and in Chron. [the margin has Hezrai, and so Eng. A. V.; Bib. Com. thinks this name the same with the Hezron of 1 Chron. ii. 5, the ancestor of Nabal the Carmelite.—Tr.]; the Carmelite, of Carmel, 1 Sam. xxv. 2 [south of Judah].—Paarai, of Arab on the mountains of Judah, Josh. xv. 52. Chron. has: "Naari the son of Ezbai," both names doubtless scribal errors [it is hardly possible to determine the correct reading here.—Tr.].—Ver. 36. Jigal [Eng. A. V.: Igal] the son of Nathan, of Zobah. Chron.: "Joel the brother of Nathan." The designation "brother" instead of the usual "son" is suspicious from its reference to the prophet Nathan, whom the "of Zobah" (in Syria) does not suit. Whether Jigal [Igal] or Joel is the original name must be left undetermined.*—Bani the Gadite; Chron.: "Mibhar the son of Hagri," probably a corruption of our text.†—Ver. 37. Zelek the Ammonite, a foreigner, as Igal of Zobah in Syria.—Naharai [Eng. A. V.: Nahari] the Beerothite, of Beeroth (see on iv. 2), armor-bearer to Joab. The text has the Plu. "armor-bearers," but the Sing. (Qeri and Chron.) is to be preferred. If several armor-bearers were meant, their names would be connected by "and."—Ver. 38. Ira and Gareb, both Ithrites of Kirjath-jearim, comp. 1 Chron. ii. 53, see on xx. 26.—Ver. 39. Uriah, also a foreigner, comp. xi. 3.—In all 37; not including Joab, who, as Commander-in-chief of the whole army, is not named, but after correcting the text of ver. 34, and reading three names there instead of two. Otherwise there would be only 36 names.‡ [This seems a better explanation of the numbers than the supposition that one name in a second triad (vers. 18-23) has been omitted (Bib. Com., Phil.), for which there is no good ground.—In 1 Chron. xi. 41-47 follow sixteen additional names, probably heroes that "took the place of those that died, or were added when the number was no longer limited to thirty" (Bib.-Comm.).—Tr.].

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The heroes of David here enumerated as the most prominent and important, and of whom particular exploits are narrated, represent David's whole heroic army, with which he carried on the Lord's wars, and gained the Lord's victories; they are the heads and leaders of the people in arms, which with its king fought the heathen nations as enemies of Jehovah's king and kingdom in Israel (comp. 1 Chron. xxvii.). Their deeds are deeds

* [The reading "son of Ahinathan" in some MSS. of Chron. is probably merely an attempt to conform this clause to the others.—Tr.]

† The כִּנְחָר is probably out of מִנְחָר, and the בְּנֵי הַנָּרִי out of הַנָּרִי.

‡ [Wellhausen: "More successful corrections in this list will be possible only when the proper names of the Old Testament, together with the variations of the Sept., have been all collected and thoroughly worked up."—Tr.]

* And omit the ו of כִּנְחָר [this is unnecessary.—Tr.]

† [This reading is preferred by Bib.-Com., Abialbon being regarded as a corruption of Shaalboni below, which 15 MSS. of Kennicott write ש. עבִלֹן. Wellh. suggests Abibaal = Abiel.—Tr.]

‡ The אֲחִיבֵּי may have come from אֲחִיבֵּי.

of God, whereby He "works great deliverance" for his people and their king against their enemies (vers. 10, 12).

2. As the Prophetic Office is the organ of God's immediate word of revelation to the theocratic king and the chosen people, so is the Body of Heroes the instrument whereby God's kingdom in Israel is protected against heathen powers, and triumphs over them. To the School of the Prophets, which gathered around Samuel, and whence came the heroes of the word and the Spirit, answers the School of Heroes gathered about David, whence came those whose forms are here slightly sketched. In them is mirrored the splendor of the royal power and glory of the Anointed of the Lord, to whom, as the visible representative of God among His people, they are devoted body and soul, and in whose person they serve the invisible Lord and King of His people with inviolate fidelity even unto death. These heroes "know themselves to be the banner-, shield-, and armor-bearers of him who stands at their head, not by human commission, but by divine investiture—to be the divinely-appointed watchmen and guardians of hearth, throne and altar, of the noblest and most inalienable possessions of their people, against attacks from without and from within. As the armed population of the land they form the brazen wall of defence of God's kingdom, and the respect-compelling hedge-row of the soil in which their people ripens in body and spirit towards its God-appointed destiny. Such a rich consciousness must have given David's warriors a peculiar exaltation of feeling; it imparted to them the true knightly sense, which alone up to the present hour has conferred true nobility on the profession of the soldier" (F. W. Krummacher).

2. A beautiful and touching proof of the love and fidelity that bound these heroes of David to their lord is given in the reckless devotion with which they put their lives in peril to gratify a casually expressed wish of his. Though in form it may seem to be a piece of foolhardiness, the moral kernel in it is the faithful, self-sacrificing love, which perils even life for a neighbor, and shuns no danger, in order to serve him.

4. In David's conduct to the heroes that bring him water from Bethlehem at the risk of their lives, are set forth these things: 1) Noble modesty, which regards the love-offering of one's neighbor as too dear and valuable for one's self, and declines to receive it; 2) Sincere humility before the Lord, which lays the honor at His feet, as He to whom alone it belongs; 3) A clear view and tender estimation of the infinite moral worth of human life in men's relations towards one another and towards God.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Where heroism and bravery put themselves exclusively in the service of God and subserve only the aims of His kingdom, the Lord causes great things to be performed through them, and often a victory to be torn from the enemies of His kingdom that they had already gained.—Even the military calling God has chosen and sanctified through His word, that through it in times of sore conflict of right against wrong and of truth against falsehood He may "work great deliverance."—A military hero should seek his highest honor in dedicating his sword to the Lord, and as a servant of God helping to work deliverance for his fatherland and his people against their enemies.—Often in history does God the Lord use one man's heroism and bravery to make a people great from small beginnings, or to lift it up from disgrace and downfall, or to turn its defeats into victory and triumph. Examples are furnished by every period of history.

The source of true heroism is life-communion with God, wherein deeds of arms are 1) undertaken in His fear, 2) performed for the ends of His kingdom, 3) crowned with glorious results.—A threefold garland of victory for the hero, who 1) bravely repulses the pressing foe, 2) mightily strikes down the foe that is already victorious and triumphing in advance, and 3) lifts up again his people's sunken courage.—Happy the people that has heroes, who 1) advance in God's strength, 2) courageously stake their life for God's honor and the people's welfare, and 3) are counted worthy by God to work great deliverance for their people.—Hail to the throne that is encompassed by heroes, who 1) find their highest mobility in the real knighthood that roots itself in true fear of God, 2) with humble heroism defend altar and throne, 3) seek their highest honor in being God's instruments for the aims of His kingdom and for the revelation of His power and righteousness, and 4) set the whole people an example of self-devoting love and fidelity, and of untiried courage.

TUEB. B.: Even the soldier's calling is well-pleasing to God, especially when he wages the Lord's wars.—CRAMER: Bravery and other gifts of God should be directed not to arrogance and display and oppression of the poor, but to the maintenance and propagation of the kingdom of God and of His righteousness.—Ver. 10. Through bodily strength, however great, nothing can be performed where God does not give the success (Jer. ix. 23).—Ver. 12. STARKE: We may indeed glory in and praise heroes for their heroic deeds; but it must be so done that God shall keep His honor and His glory (Psa. cxv. 1).

Ver. 16. F. W. KRUMMACHER: A knightly deed this! But was it not rather foolhardiness, if not downright servility, and was not this expending courage recklessly, and dealing wastefully with human life? This question resembles that with which Judas Iscariot presumed to censure the anointing of Mary at Bethany. True love has its measure in itself, and in its modes of manifestation puts itself beyond all criticism.—The joyfully self-sacrificing deed of the three heroes regarded not so much the man David, as rather the "anointed of the Lord," and so the Lord Himself. [Hardly.—TR.].—SCHLIER: David's pious mind would have no right over the life of his men; that the Lord alone had, to whom all belongs. We have no right to claim for ourselves the sweat and blood of others; men do not exist for us, but we exist for others. We should not get ourselves served, but should rather serve others.—Genuine fear of God shows itself in this, that one serves another in self-devoting and self-sacrificing love, such as was mutually shown by David and these three heroes.

David's circumstances. Recollections of youth, longing for the water he used to drink when a boy at home. Strong affections which a great soldier awakens in his followers—they are eager to gratify his slightest wish. Romance of military life—brave men love sometimes to go off on an unpractical adventure. David's regard for human life; affectionate gratitude to his men; generous sentiments overcoming bodily appetite; devout desire to honor Jehovah.—Tr.]

SIXTH SECTION.

The Numbering of the People and the Plague.

CHAP. XXIV. 1-25.

- 1 And again the anger of the Lord [Jehovah] was kindled against Israel, and he moved [incited] David against them to say [saying], Go, number Israel and Judah. For [And] the king said to Joab the captain [Joab and the captains¹] of the host which was [were] with him, Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even [om. even] to Beersheba, and number ye the people, that I may know the
- 2 number of the people. And Joab said unto the king, Now [om. Now²] the Lord [Jehovah] thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundred-fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it; but why doth my lord the
- 3 king delight in this thing? Notwithstanding [And] the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host. And Joab and the captains of the host went out from the presence of the king, to number the people of Israel.
- 4 And they passed over Jordan, and pitched in Aroer on the right side of the city [better, and began from Aroer and from the city³] that lieth in the midst of the river [valley] of Gad [toward Gad] and toward Jazer. Then [And] they came to Gilead and to the land of Tahtim-hodshi [perhaps land of the Hittites to Kadesh],
- 5 and they came to Dan-jaan, and about to Zidon, And came to the stronghold of Tyre, and to all the cities of the Hivites and of the Canaanites, and they went out
- 6 to the south of Judah, even [om. even] to Beersheba. So when they had gone through all the land, they came to Jerusalem at the end of nine months and twenty
- 7 days. And Joab gave up the sum of the number [the number of the census] of the people unto the king; and there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men [warriors] that drew the sword; and the men of Judah were five hundred thousand men.
- 8 And David's heart smote him after that⁴ he had numbered the people. And David said unto the Lord [Jehovah], I have sinned greatly in that I have done.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 2. So in 1 Chron. xxi. 2, and required by the phrase "with him," and by the plural verb "number ye."—Tr.]

² [Ver. 8. Böttcher shows (against Thenius) that the ³ here must be given up (it is wanting in Chron.). Erdmann retains it.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 5. Syr., Vulg.: "came to Aroer (Syr.: Sarub) on the right of the city." But the reading (given above in brackets) of the Holmes MSS. 19, 82, 93, 108, as cited by Wellh., commends itself as more natural. We should not here expect the statement that they encamped, but it is natural that the point where they began should be mentioned; moreover the phrase: "on the right of the city" is a strange one. The amended text would read: וְהָיוּ מֵעֵרֹתָיִם וְכָן הָעִיר—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 10. The אַחֲרָיִךְ (which is an Adverb) here followed by the finite verb סָפַר is contrary to usage. Either, one of the two (the "afterwards" or "he numbered the people") must be omitted (Wellh.), or עַל אֲשֶׁר must be inserted: "after this, because he had numbered" (Bib.-Com.), or אֲשֶׁר must be written instead of כִּי, and the Conjunction retained (as in the Vulg. and Eng. A. V.).—What the Piques in vers. 10, 12 signify, is uncertain.—Tr.]

- And now, I beseech thee, O Lord [Jehovah], take away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly. For when David was up [And David arose] in the morning—[ins. and] the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came unto the prophet Gad, David's seer, saying, Go and say unto David, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah], I offer⁶ thee three things; choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee. So [And] Gad came to David, and told him, and said unto him, Shall seven [better three⁶] years of famine come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or that there be three days' pestilence in thy land? now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me.
- 14 And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the Lord [Jehovah], for his mercies are great; and let me not fall into the hand of man.
- 15 So [And] the Lord [Jehovah] sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even [om. even] to the time appointed; and there died of the people from Dan even [om. even] to Beersheba seventy thousand men. And when the angel [And the angel] stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the Lord [and Jehovah] repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough, stay now thine hand. And the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] was by the
- 17 threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. And David spake unto the Lord [Jehovah] when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house.
- 18 And Gad came that day to David, and said unto him, Go up, rear an altar unto the Lord [Jehovah] in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. And David,
- 20 according to the saying of Gad, went up as the Lord [Jehovah] commanded. And Araunah looked, and saw the king and his servants coming on toward him; and Araunah went out, and bowed himself before the king on his face upon the ground.
- 21 And Araunah said, Wherefore is my lord the king come to his servant? And David said, To buy the threshing-floor of thee, to build an altar unto the Lord
- 22 [Jehovah], that the plague may be stayed from the people. And Araunah said unto David, Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him; behold, here be [are] oxen for burnt sacrifice, and [ins. the] threshing-instruments
- 23 and other [the] instruments of the oxen for wood. All these things did Araunah, as a king, give unto the king [All gives Araunah, O king, to the king; or, the whole gives the servant of my lord the king to the king⁷]. And Araunah said unto the
- 24 king, The Lord [Jehovah] thy God accept thee. And the king said unto Araunah, Nay, but I will surely buy it of thee at a price, neither will I [and I will not] offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord [Jehovah] my God of that which doth cost me nothing. So [And] David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty she-
- 25 kels of silver. And David built there an altar unto the Lord [Jehovah], and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. So [And] the Lord [Jehovah] was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

⁶ [Ver. 12. נָטַח "lay upon;" Eng. A. V. rather translates the verb in Chronicles (ver. 10) נָטַח "stretch out." Erdmann: "I hold over thee;" Philippson: "I lay before thee."—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 13. So Chron. (ver. 12), and so the symmetry of the statement requires.—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 23. So Böttcher, writing אָרְוֶה for אָרְוֶה and inserting נָטַח. The words must be regarded as part of Araunah's speech, since it is not true that he gave the things to the king; he offered them, but they were not accepted (Welsh).—Tx.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Vers. 1-8. David's sin in numbering the people.

Ver. 1. And again the anger of the Lord was kindled. The "again" evidently refers to the famine in xxi. 1-14; comp. especially ver. 1 and the identical endings of the two accounts (ver. 25 here and ver. 14 there): "Jehovah

(God) was entreated for the land." From this both sections may be inferred to be from the same source. [Hence some regard xxi. 15-xxiii. as inserted in the midst of this history, and the two poems xxii., xxiii. 1-7 as an insertion in the narrative xxi. 15-22, xxiii. 8-39. Erdmann regards these various sections as separately selected, and put together according to a definite plan.—Tx.]—The additions in the parallel section 1 Chron. xxi. 1-22, are to be referred to another fuller authority that the Chronicler had before him (Mov., Ew.), but not also in part to "pure remodeling by the Chronicler himself." (Ew.).—The time of this census is certainly to be put in the later years of David's reign, "partly because the pestilence here described is expressly said to be the second of the two great plagues under David, partly because such a measure as the census, which occupied Joab 9 months and 20 days, could have been begun only in a perfectly quiet year" (Ew.). It cannot belong to the time before the insurrections of Absalom and Sheba (Seb. Schmid), because it presupposes a permanent condition of peace without and within. The late date is also favored by the fact that the Chronicler attaches immediately to this history (in accordance with its conclusion, the purchase of Araunah's threshing-floor as the site of the future temple) the description of the preparations for the building of the temple and David's arrangements for divine service, which Chron. puts in this peaceful last period of his reign. "One would not, indeed, think of David's very last days, when death was daily before him; such great matters are not undertaken at such a time" (Hengst.).—The kindling of God's anger presupposes a grave offence against God; and this not merely by David (whose guilt is expressly affirmed in vers. 3, 10, 12 sqq.), but also by the whole people, since "Israel" is designated as the object of the divine anger (ver. 1), and the punitive plague was intended to include the whole nation (ver. 13 sq.). This offence of the people consists, however, not in any "hidden sins" (D. Kimchi), nor in the insurrections under Absalom and Sheba (Keil), but (since God's anger is obviously causally connected with David's deed) in their participation in David's sin.—And He incited David against them, that is, against Israel, and the subject of the Verb is Jehovah, not Satan (so several older expositors [and Ewald] after Chron.), nor David's thought of numbering the people (Theod.) The outburst of God's wrath against Israel is produced by a sin of David's, to which the "incitement came from the Lord;" the statement in Chron: "Satan* stood up against Israel and incited David" is not in contradiction with this, since Satan is not an independent agent alongside of God, but appears always as subject to and dependent on Him. Job i.; Zech. iii. Buddæus' explanation: "God and the devil may concur in one and the same evil deed, though in different ways, the latter by impelling, the former by permitting" must be corrected in accordance with this statement.—"The Lord incited David" means, not that He destroyed his free will and forced him, but that He permitted the temptations, resident in the circumstances ordained by Him, to approach David, and so developed the germinal ungodly desire in David's heart into a determination of the will, and thence into the deed. See on 1 Sam. xxvi. 19, and "Historical and Theological" to that chapter [see James i. 13, 14; there is here involved the whole subject of the co-relation of divine and human action, about which we can only insist on the two unharmonizable facts of the absolute efficient control of God, and the complete independence of man.—Tr.].—Saying, go, number Israel and Judah! David's aim in this census could not have been pleasure at the great number that it would show, and at the growth and well-being of his subjects thus brought out (S. Schmid and other older expositors); that would have been a childish undertaking, considering the great expenditure of time and strength made. Ewald (Hist. III. 218, bibl. Jahrb. 10, 34 sq.) holds that his purpose was to perfect the royal power internally, and establish a strict rule that should embrace the whole life of the nation; the census, he thinks, was intended "to drag the people as far as possible" into all sorts of taxes, such as existed in Egypt and Phenicia, and on this supposition he bases the opinion that the people, apprehensive of the subversion of their liberty by the royal power, withstood this innovation, and David had consequently to recede from the complete execution of his measure. But there is not a sign in the narrative of such a purpose on David's part; and against it is the military character and aim of the measure. Apart from 1 Chron. xxvii. 23 sq. (according to which it was connected with the military organization of the people, and probably intended to complete it), it is here discussed in the council of military officers, and executed by Joab the commander-in-chief himself in conjunction with them; and the census took account not of all classes of the people, or of all independent men, but only of "valiant men that drew the sword." As is stated at the outset, military camps were formed for the numbering (mustering). "The military character of the procedure is clear also from the fact that Joab delayed as long as possible carrying it into Benjamin, in order not to arouse the insurrectionary spirit of this tribe, which could not forget the leadership it had possessed under Saul" (Hengst., ubi sup. p. 128).—Ver. 2. The king said to Joab: Go now through all the tribes of Israel, . . . and muster ye the people, that I may know the number of the people—a general mustering for a military-statistical purpose. That is, after having subjected foreign nations and established internal order and quiet, David wished to know the military force of the whole people. [Bender: "the king said to Joab and to the captains (or princes) of the host that were with him."—Tr.].—In itself this census by David was no more sinful than that of Moses, Ex. xxx. 12 sq. Wherein David's sin consisted is indicated in Joab's words in ver. 3: May now the Lord thy God add to the people, as it is, a hundred-fold, and may the eyes of my lord the king see it! but why does my lord the king delight in this thing? The speech has the form of a conclusion* from what precedes, and indicates that Joab perceives David's purpose to be to please himself with the exhibition of the imposing military strength of his people; and the question at the end conveys a moral reproof. The ungodly feature in this undertaking, therefore, was its motive, David's haughty over-estimation of himself and his people. His sin was one both of the lust of the eyes and of pride. So much is true in Josephus' explanation (followed by Bertheau), which is otherwise incorrect, namely, that David's sin consisted in his not demanding the expiation-money that, according to Ex. xxx. 12 sqq., had to be paid by every man mustered; for this requirement of the law (the aim of which was: "that there be no plague among them") had reference to the danger in such a census of falling into haughtiness and presumptuousness. "David wished to glory in the multitude of the people" (S. Schm.). And the punishment that followed the attempt—so that the number of warriors was diminished, and the result of the census was not noted in the State-annals (1 Chron. xxvii. 24)—shows that it was made in proud self-feeling without the will of the Lord, Israel's true king, and for a self-chosen end that did not accord with the aims and purposes of the Lord. It is going too far to regard it as David's purpose here to summon the whole nation to war for new conquests (J. D. Mich.), or to transform the theocratic State (Kurz in Herz. III. 306). Such a complete recession from the dependence of his kingdom on the Lord, such thought of a political world-dominion of Israel, such a complete abandonment of Israel's national-theocratic calling, presupposes a complete defection on David's part from the living God. But doubtless he who had led Israel to so lofty a height, forgetting himself before the Lord, had a proud desire to exhibit the splendid array of his people's military strength, as pledge of the further advance of his house and people, and of the future development of the promise: "thine enemies shall cringe before thee, and thou shalt tread on their high-places" (Deut. xxxiii. 29). "To this height David now thought he could advance without God; the annals should show for all time that he had laid the foundations of this mighty work of the future" (Hengst.). The people also, filled with proud national conceit of their strength, shared David's sin. Though the chief fault was not with the people (Hengst.), yet the solidarity [unity] of David's sin and his people's in this haughty anti-theocratic movement, is beyond doubt.—Ver. 4. David submits, indeed, to Joab's opposition now also (comp. iii. 27; xix. 1-7); but he did not follow the voice of good conscience that he heard from his mouth. The word of the king prevailed against Joab, comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxvii. 5; not: "stood fast" (De W.).* "It is noteworthy that such a man as Joab, without living fear of God, but with natural directness and sound practical sense, sees sooner than David, how such a sinful exaltation does not become a king of Israel" (O. v. Gerl.). "Nothing more was said in opposition" (Grotius). In silence Joab and the officers obey their lord's command; they went out "before the eyes"† of the king.

* [Bib.-Com. (on 2 Sam. xxiv. 1) renders this "an adversary" (otherwise unknown), on the ground that the Art. (found in Job and Zech.) is wanting, and similarly translates here "one (an unknown enemy) moved David." But the absence of the Art. in the late-composed Chron. is explained by the fact that Satan had then become a proper name, and here the natural connection points to Jehovah as subject; if another person had been concerned, distinct mention would have been made of him.—Tr.]

* Indicated by the ׀ before ׀ך, as in 2 Kings iv. 41; Ps. iv. 4 [3], comp. Gen. 155, 1 d. [Against this see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

* Vulg.: obtinuit sermo regis verba Joab.—Instead of אֶל־יָדָיו should perhaps be written אֶל־יָדָיו (Chron.).

† It is unnecessary to write מִפְּנֵי (Vulg., Syr., Ar.) for מִפְּנֵי, for the latter means simply "before the king"

Ver. 5. Exact geographical statement of the beginning of the census. It began beyond the Jordan in Gad, "because military affairs were in an especially flourishing condition there," comp. 1 Chron. xii. 8 sqq., 37" (Then.) Comp. Thénius' remarks on 2 Kings xv. 25. And encamped at Aroer on the right of the city; they encamped in the plain instead of going into the city, because of the large number of men engaged in taking the census, and so they doubtless did hereafter. [Another reading, in some respects better, is: "they began from Aroer and from the city." See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.] In the midst of the brook-valley of Gad, that is, not in the vale of the Jabbok, as the greatest river in Gad (Winer, s. v. Thäler and Aroer, Then., Rüetschi in Herz. s. v. Gad); for it is identical with the Aroer of Josh. xii. 25, which was before Rabbah (= Rabbah of the Ammonites), that is, between it and the Jordan; for this reason and from the statement in Judg. xi. 33 (Jephthah smote the Ammonites from Aroer to Abel Kernaim) it cannot have lain so far north as the Jabbok, but is probably to be sought in the valley noted on the map south of the Jabbok in the middle of the territory of Gad. According to Von Ranmer (p. 259) it is probably the present Ayra southwest from es-Salt, with which Burckhardt also probably identified it (Reisen in Syrien, etc., p. 609). This Aroer in Gad is to be distinguished from 1) Aroer in Judah, southeast of Beersheba, whither David sent a part of the booty of Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 28, and 2) Aroer on the right (northern) bank of the Arnon in Reuben (Josh. xii. 2; Numb. xxxii. 34. [Bib.-Com. holds that Aroer on the Arnon is here meant, on the ground that the description here agrees perfectly with that in Deut. ii. 36 (comp. Josh. xiii. 16), and that if Aroer before Rabbah is meant, the whole tribe of Reuben would be omitted from the census, which is impossible; and this view is the most natural. For a possible city on the Arnon see Art. Arnon in Smith's Bible-Dict.—Instead of "in the valley of Gad," render "towards Gad," they advanced from the southern limit to Gad and Jazer.—Tr.]—They encamped as far as towards Jazer, the plain in which this gathering was held extended from Aroer to Jazer; Jazer cannot, therefore, have been far from Aroer. Jazer, formerly belonged to the Ammonites, conquered from them (Numb. xxi. 32), pertained to Gad (Numb. xxxii. 35, Josh. xiii. 25), a Levitical city (Josh. xxi. 39, 1 Chron. vi. 81); afterwards Moabitic (Isa. xviii. 8); after the exile Ammonitish (Jer. xlviii. 32), conquered by Judas Maccabeus (Macc. v. 8). Burckhardt (p. 609) conjectures that the name of the old Jazer is found in the fine spring Ain Hasi, which he found near the ruins of a very considerable city in the valley south of es-Salt, whose water flows into the Wady Shoeb, which empties into the Jordan. But Gesenius, who agrees with this conjecture (on Burckh. p. 1062), thinks it possible that Jazer is the present Sir, a ruin at the source of the Wady Sir, which without a necessary intimation that the king went along with them.

* [Or, because this point was exactly at the opposite end of the land (going in a circuit) from Judah.—Tr.]
† The "and to Jazer" defines not the verb "came" (Kell), but the "encamped."

flows into the Jordan, and this view is adopted by Seetzen, who found several pools at Sir (comp. Jer. xlviii. 32: "sea of Jazer"), Van de Velde and Keil (on Numb. xxi. 32). According to Eusebius (Onom.), "the city of Jazer extended in Gad as far as Aroer, which is before Rabbah." In accordance with this Von Raumer, who regards Aroer as the present Ayra, to which the valley of Ain Hazir descends, adopts the view that this Ain Hazir is the ancient Jazer, as it is not five English miles from Ayra (p. 263).

Ver. 6. Then they came to Gilead, the mountain-land on both sides the Jabbok, and thence into the land of Tuhtim hodshi. This local expression (regarded as a proper name by Cler. and De Wette, but as such yielding no sense) is variously given by the ancient Versions: Sept.: "land of the Hittites, which is Adasai" [Stier and Theile's text], or "land of Thabason" [Vat., Tisch.], or, "land of Ethaon Adasai" [Alex.]; Symm.: "to the lower way;" Vulg.: "to the lower land of Hodsi." No tolerable sense can be gotten from the words except on the supposition that the text is corrupt. The first part of Böttcher's conjectural emendation "under the sea" is a fortunate suggestion, since it requires no change in the letters, and this designation of the Lake of Gennesareth as a "sea" accords with the usage of the language [it is the "sea of Kinnereth"] and with the local statements of the narrative. But the second part of his conjecture, that hodshi = "like the new moon," in reference to the shape of the lake, is too far-fetched. So also Gesenius' view, that hodshi is a matronymic from the woman called Hodesh in 1 Chron. viii. 9 [= Hodshites]. Ewald's conjecture, to read Hermion for Hodshi, and render: "the lower regions of Hermion" is without support (Thenius). Thenius conjectures that hodshi is for Kedshi,† Denominative from Kedesh, understanding thereby the town in Naphtali near lake Merom, so that it would read: "they came into the land under the lake [sea] of Kedesh [Kadesh]." But this designation of lake Merom is strange, and does not elsewhere occur; nor does the term "under [or, below]" suit, we should rather expect "over [above]." Retaining the "Kedesh," it is more probable that the reference is to the Levitical city of that name in Issachar, southwest of the lake of Gennesareth (1 Chron. vii. 72 (vi. 57); in Josh. xix. 20; xxi. 28 = Kishion). Comp. Raumer (p. 132, Rem. 36 b) and the country below the lake of Gennesareth southwest in Raumer's map. This lake is often called a "sea" (Numb. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3; xiii. 27; Isa. viii. 23), called so in the last passage without further description (comp. "Galilean sea." Matt. iv. 18; xv. 29; Mk. i. 16; vii. 31). Instead of Thenius' adjective form Kadshi ["sea of Kedesh"], it is better to read: "towards Kedesh" (קִדְשֵׁי, comp. Ges. § 90. 2 a. b), understanding the town in Issachar, and rendering: "they came into the land below the sea towards [or, to] Kadesh." Hither they came from Gilead, passing through the Jordan-plain below the Galilean sea.—[For other conjectures about this expression see Smith's Bib.-Dict. s. v., Bib.-

Com. and Philippson: this whole geographical account is omitted in 1 Chron. xxi.—Tr.]—And they came to Dan Jaan; according to Schultz and Van d. Velde (Mem. p. 306, in Von Raumer p. 125) the present ruin Danian between Tyre and Aire near Ras en Nakura. But this does not agree with the statement that Joab went from this region below the sea to Dan Jaan, thence to Zidon, and then first to Tyre, whereas according to that view he would have gone from Dan Jaan by the sea to Zidon. This route would naturally lead us to think of the Dan that formed the extreme northern boundary of Israel (comp. vers. 2, 15), the old Laish (Josh. xix. 47; Judg. xviii. 29); but the objection to this is that the name Jaan is not appended to this Dan in vers. 2, 15, and we must therefore seek another Dan between Gilead and Zidon. So Hengst., Pent. II. 194. Keil looks for it in northern Perea, southwest of Damascus, taking it to be the same that is mentioned in Gen. xiv. 14, which according to Deut. xxxiv. 1 belonged to Gilead; but that is none other than the well-known Dan-Laish. And since no other place suiting the geographical relations can be found, we hold to this (Dan-Laish), which by its position was particularly suited for a mustering [so Wordsworth and Bib.-Com.—Tr.]. But what does the Jaan mean? Bunsen remarks on this passage: "Dan-Jaan, as the name Baal-Jaan on coins shows, is a Phoenician god (literally: Judge, i. e. ruler, the singer,* i. e. player), answering to the Greek Pan, who gave the city its name." But this surname is never elsewhere found with Dan. The Vulg. has: in Dan silvestria, "in Dan of the wood" (עֵץ), which reading Winer, Lengerke, Ewald adopt, and render: "Dan in the (Lebanon) forest." Thenius regards Laish as the original reading.—And about towards Zidon; the "about" [= roundabout] means not the environs of Zidon, but in the direction of Dan; from the northern border they turned around towards the north-western border of the kingdom.†—Ver. 7. From Zidon they went southward, and came to the fortified city Zor (= "rock"), comp. Josh. xix. 29, the fortress Tyre built on a rock on the mainland (now Sur), in distinction from the insular Tyre. They came, therefore, into the territory of Asher, which bordered on that of Zidon and Tyre.—And into all the cities of the Hivites and Canaanites, that is, in Naphtali, Zebulon and Issachar, the region afterwards called Galilee, "in which the Canaanites were not exterminated by the Israelites, but only made tributary" (Keil). [It hence appears that even as late as this these native tribes had cities of their own. The division into Hivites and Canaanites is remarkable; perhaps these were the most prominent of the surviving native races. The Hivite territory extended down near Jerusalem (Gibeon), see Judg. iii. 3; Josh. xi. 3; what the "Canaanite" district was is not clear.—Tr.]—And went out to the south of Judah to Beersheba, passed along the western border throughout the length of the land from Dan to Beersheba.—Ver. 8. The return, after nine months and twenty days. According to 1 Chron. xxi. 6 the census was not extended into Benjamin and Levi, “because the king’s word was an abomination to Joab,” and according to 1 Chron. xxvii. 24 Joab did not finish the numbering “because wrath therefor came upon Israel.” Joab, who had entered unwillingly (ver. 3) on the execution of the king’s command, had not made haste; then David saw his wrong, the plague broke out before the census was finished; the numbering had not yet begun in Benjamin, nor in Levi (which, however, was excepted therefrom by Num. i. 47–49).—Ver. 9. Statement of the total number of the people mustered: Israel had eight hundred thousand arms-bearing men, Judah five hundred thousand. Chron. gives a higher number for Israel, eleven hundred thousand; a lower for Judah, four hundred and seventy thousand. To explain or reconcile this difference in respect to Israel it has been supposed that there were two countings, one according to the private lists in cities and villages (Chron.), the other according to the digests made therefrom for the public registers (2 Sam.) (so Cornelius a Lapide)—or that Joab was less accurate in his numbering than the officers with him (Sanktius)—or that Chron. includes the non-Israelites in the Ten Tribes and the neighboring regions, about three hundred thousand (S. Schmid). Against this last is that only Israelites proper are spoken of in vers. 1, 2; the other suppositions are mere conjectures. Oslander’s opinion that Chron. includes the older men is opposed to ver. 5, and D. Kimchi’s, that Chron. includes also Benjamin and Levi, to 1 Chron. xxi. 6. [Others suppose that the regular army of two hundred and eighty-eight thousand men (1 Chron. xxvii. 1–15) is included in Israel in Chron., and excluded in Sam., and that a corps of thirty thousand men (commanded by the thirty, 1 Chron. xi. 25) is included in Judah in Samuel, and excluded in Chronicles. See Bib.-Com. on 1 Chron. xxi. 5. These conjectures are without foundation, and errors of text or errors of oral tradition must be supposed.—See notes of Wordsw. and Bib.-Com., on our verse.—Tr.] Apart from the fact that we have round numbers here, the differences explain themselves if we remember that the result of the census was not recorded in the State-annals (1 Chron. xxvii. 24), and the statements here must rest on oral tradition. The numbers are not to be taken as perfectly accurate, but there is no good reason to reject them as unhistorically large, since this fertile country was very thickly peopled. “We see this from the various places, whose ruins stand as near to one another, as villages in our most densely populated regions” (Arnold in Herz. XI. 23 sq.). Taking the military population as about one-fourth of the whole, Palestine [Israel] would have contained, according to this census, a population of from five to six million souls, which is not too large a number. Ewald (Hist. III. 196, Rem. 3) refers to other numerical statements about Israel, that seem to us too large, and yet must be accepted as historical, and remarks: “Though the numbers may be in part round, and sometimes exaggerated, yet in general there is no reason for doubting their historical value. If, for example, the present population of Algeria be estimated at three million, and therein from 300,000 to 400,000 arms-bearing men (see Dawson Borrer, Campaign in the Kabylie) Israel in such happy times as David’s with its wide limits might certainly sustain a larger number.” Rüetschi (Herz. VIII. 89): “Considering the general extent of the levies and the almost incredibly dense population of Palestine, the enormous numerical strength of the Israelitish army (1 Sam. xi. 8; xv. 4; 2 Sam. xvii. 11; 1 Chron. xxvii. 1 sqq.) cannot occasion much surprise.”

* [From עָנָן.—Tr.]

† [Instead of וְכָבֵד יַעֲזָן Wellh. proposes to read וְכָבֵד וְיָמָּה, and render: "and they came to Dan, and from Dan turned about to Zidon" (comp. the repetition of Dan in the Sept.), which gets rid of the Jaan.—Tr.]

II. Vers. 10–17. The judgment of the pestilence.—Vers. 10. David confesses his sin before the Lord, and asks forgiveness. David’s heart smote him, that is, his conscience, just as in 1 Sam. xxiv. 6. Comp. 1 Kings ii. 44; Job xxvii. 6; Eccl. vii. 22. With anguish of conscience David sees that his sin is an offence against the Lord. As to wherein it consisted see above on vers. 1–3.—Ver. 11. “In the morning” = the next morning.—David had made his short penitent prayer either as he was going to sleep, or, more probably, after a sleepless night.—The word of Jehovah comes to Gad, see 1 Sam. xxii. 5. He is called David’s seer as being his confidential counsellor, aiding him constantly with direction from the source of divine revelation.—And the word of the Lord . . . this revelation had come to Gad independently of human means or occasion.—Ver. 12. Choice between three judgments set before David. Three things I hold over thee (לִט), not: I lay on thee, but: I hold high over thee, namely, as a load of punishment, which is to be laid on thee according as thou chooseth; the sense in Chron. (לִט) is the same: “I turn [stretch] over thee” [so Eng. A. V. here: offer thee].—Ver. 13. Then came Gad to David.—This is the apodosis to the protasis in verse 11: and when David rose in the morning . . . then came Gad; what intervenes is a circumstantial sentence.* Instead of seven years of famine Chron. (so Sept.) has three, agreeing with the figures in the other plagues. For this reason the reading of Chron. is to be preferred; there correspond, therefore, three years of famine, three months of flight before enemies, three days of pestilence.† [The seven‡ in Sam. may be accounted for by the frequent occurrence of that number, possibly from the seven years’ famine in the history of Joseph.—Tr.]—Ver. 14. “I am in a great strait”—the exclamation of a tortured conscience, whose anguish is heightened by the necessity of choosing between the three punishments. David looks on the pestilence as an immediate stroke of God’s hand, while the other plagues make him and his people dependent on man; at the same time he looks to God’s mercy, whence, if he fall only into God’s hands, he may the sooner hope to draw comfort and help. In view of God’s punitive righteousness his faith holds fast to God's mercy, and verifies itself therein.—At the close of this verse the Sept. has: "And David chose the pestilence [δάσυνος], and it was the days of the wheat-harvest." But this is nothing but an explanatory remark taken from 1 Chron. xxi. 20, designed partly to make a direct statement of David's choice (which is only indirectly stated in the text), partly to account for Araunah's work at the threshing-floor (ver. 18 sq.).

Ver. 16. Beginning, duration and extent of the pestilence.—And the Lord gave a pestilence, it was a divine punishment. From the morning—the morning when Gad came to David (vers. 11, 13). The next words,* giving the terminus ad quem [Eng. A. V.: "to the time appointed;"] Erdmann: "to an appointed time"], offer great difficulties.—The Sept. renders: "till the hour of breakfast," that is, the sixth hour, to which it adds: "and the plague began among the people," which Böttcher and Thenius would receive into the text. But this addition of the Sept. had its origin no doubt in the reflection that the time from morning to breakfast was too short for the effects of the plague (70,000 died) therefore the words "from the morning to, etc.," were regarded as defining the verb gave [Eng. A. V.: sent], that is, the divine arrangement in inflicting the plague, and then the plague itself was made to begin after the sixth hour. But the word "gave" itself includes the destructive effect of the pestilence, and the result is indicated immediately by the word "died."—We have then here the limit of time of the raging of the pestilence. But what is meant? up to what point? The most natural explanation: "to the appointed time" (Cler., De W., Ew.), that is, to the end of the three days (ver. 13) contradicts ver. 16, according to which the pestilence ceased through God's mercy before this time; besides the Def. Art. is wanting, while elsewhere the word in the sense of a time designated has the Art. The Art. may indeed be omitted when the word (כְּלֵי) signifies an assembly for divine service and festival. Hos. ix. 5; Lam. ii. 7, 22. Thus Bochart (Hieroz. I. 2, 38, ed. Ros. I. 396 sq.) renders (after the Chald.), having Acts iii. 1 in mind: "the time when the people used to meet for evening prayers, about the ninth hour of the day, that is, the third hour after noon." Keil adopts this view, and thinks it favors the basis of the rendering of the Vulg.: "to the time appointed" according to Jerome's explanation (tradit. Hebr. in 2 libr. Reg.): "he calls that the time appointed, in which the evening sacrifice was offered." Against this Thenius rightly remarks† that the general expression "time of assembly" could not be used for the afternoon- or evening-assembly. Thenius' conjecture (suggested by the Chald.): "to the time of lighting" (the lamps in the sanctuary or in dwellings) is declared by Böttcher to be contrary to Heb. usage; and Böttcher's reading: "up to the time of food" is unsupported. The same thing is to be said of Hitzig's suggestion: "up to the time of dinner." Instead of adding another to these doubtful, in fact unsuccessful attempts to gain a new text, it seems requisite to return to our masoretic text, which, since the Art. is wanting, is to be rendered: "up to an appointed time." Why should this phrase not give a suitable sense? In view of the fact that the Lord had in mercy determined on a point of time before the expiration of the three days (ver. 16), it is here intimated that the pestilence lasted a shorter time fixed by His gracious will. It must be left undetermined whether this "appointed time" falls in the first day of the plague (which seems to be indicated by the "from the morning," and "that day," ver. 18, though not necessarily, since the "morning" is the same as in ver. 11, and may point out merely the beginning of the pestilence without reference to the same day), or in the second day. In any case, however, the narrator, combining and, in Heb. fashion, anticipating what follows, means by this expression to say that God in His mercy permitted the pestilence to go on only to a determined point of time within the "three days."—Seventy thousand men.—Grotius cites the fact (Diod. Sic. I. 14) that in the siege of Syracuse 100,000 men of the Carthaginian army died within a short time.—[Dr. Erdmann's explanation of the "appointed time" is not a little strained; the fact that he refers to (the shortening of the duration of the pestilence) would hardly have been expressed in this way. The word seems obviously to mean: "time of assembly" (so Wellh., Bib.-Com., and others), and points to some well-known gathering of the people. The most natural suggestion is that the time of evening-prayer is meant, to which some regard it as a fatal objection that the assembly for evening-prayer could not have existed in the time of David, or of the author of the Book of Samuel. But it may be replied that we do not know when the custom of thus gathering began;

xix. 5, 8; 1 Kings xlii. 7; as, then, in Chald. קַעֲרָא means "heartstrengthening" — "food, dinner," so in Heb. כֹּלֵךְ "strengthen" may have meant the first meal of the day (about 11 or 12 o'clock). But against this Böttcher himself says that the form קִימָל is elsewhere used only of acting persons; further, such a designation of breakfast occurs nowhere else; since in the passages cited קַעֲרָא obtains the signification "strengthen" only from the connection (especially by the addition of "heart" and "food"), so much the more ought the connection to show when it is intended to mean breakfast, since it usually means only in general "to strengthen by food."—If breakfast-time is here spoken of, Thenius (following the Sept.) would take the form מִסְקַר; but Böttcher says rightly that "the language would not have used the same word for 'breakfast' and 'furniture' (1 Kings x. 12)." Hitzig (according to Then., p. 290 sqq.), thinks that if the ἀπείρου of the Sept. is not based on a קַעֲרָא, then to מִסְקַר (Then.) is to be preferred מִקְעוֹל (kitchen-cakes, which he tries to show means prandium).

* וְעַתָּה מוֹלֵךְ. Sept.: ἡς ὥρας ἀρίστου, to which it adds: καὶ ἡμέρας ἡ θραύσις ἐν τῇ λαφ, after which Thenius and Böttcher write: וְהַמִּנְחָה בָּעֵם.

† Thenius: וְעַתָּה מוֹלֵךְ, out of which מוֹלֵךְ by change of כ into ו and of ל into ד. Against this Böttcher shows that מוֹלֵךְ is not a Heb. word, and (according to the use of מוֹלֵךְ) would mean burning, comp. Judg. xv. 14; 2 Sam. xxii. 9; he (Böttch.), after the Sept., reads מוֹלֵךְ "strengthen" — "repast," from מִקְעַר "to support, strengthen" by food, comp. Gen. xlvii. 5; Judg.

or, it may be that there was some other regular gathering otherwise unknown to us. It is at any rate better so to render the word, whether it can be satisfactorily explained or not.—Ta.]

Ver. 16. And the angel, namely the angel of the Lord afterwards more exactly described ("that destroyed the people"), the embodiment of His punitive righteousness, the exactor of the judgment, the destroying angel (comp. Exod. xii. 23)—stretched out his hand to Jerusalem to destroy it; thereupon the Lord repented him of the evil.—Chron.: "And God sent His angel to Jerusalem to destroy it." According to both accounts the pestilence ceased at the moment when it had reached Jerusalem through the will of the merciful God. This is the moment meant by the "appointed time" of ver. 15. On God's repentance see on 1 Sam. xiii. 35, "Historical and Theological," No. 1 (to 1 Sam. xiii.).—The Lord's command to His angel:—Enough! now stay thy hand! the "thy hand" refers to the "His hand" above. As yet the pestilence had not attacked Jerusalem itself; for "the angel of the Lord was at the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite." Threshing-floors were usually in the open air, on heights where it was possible, on account of the chaff and the dust, and for the sake of the wind, which was necessary for the purifying of the grain; comp. Judg. vi. 37; Ruth iii. 2, 15. So this threshing-floor was without Jerusalem, northeast of Zion, on the hill Moriah; see on ver. 25. The pestilence had reached the houses lying near this threshing-floor. Instead of the form Awarrah (ver. 16) or Araunah (ver. 18), the name of the owner of the floor is to be read with the Masorites Araunah (vers. 20, 22, 23, 24). Chron. has Ornan (vers. 15, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23); Sept. Orna. Ewald: "This form of the name is un-Hebrew, but perhaps all the more Jebusite." Bertheau: "The form Araunah does not look like Heb., while Orna and Ornan are Heb.; for this very reason the form Araunah seems to rest on an old tradition." Jebusites still dwelt in the land (Josh. xv. 63), and were tributary (1 Kin. ix. 20 sq.). See on 2 Sam. v. 6 sq.; Araunah is here represented as a man of property, see on vers. 22, 23.—Ver. 17. David saw the angel; according to Chron. (whose account is fuller) he saw him standing by the threshing-floor between heaven and earth with a drawn sword in his hand, which was stretched out over Jerusalem. The drawn sword is the symbol of the execution* of the divine judgment, comp. Gen. iii. 24; Numb. xxii. 23; Josh. v. 13.—David said to the Lord: I, etc. By the "I"† he presents himself as the really guilty person before God, in contrast with the people, whom he declares to be innocent. According to Chron. (ver. 16) the elders, clothed in sackcloth and praying, shared with David the vision of the angel; the representatives of the people, therefore, confess that it has part in David's sin; see on ver. 1. "The punishment was sent for the people's own sin (ver. 1), though David's offence was the immediate occasion of its execution" (O. v. Gerl.). David is so penetrated with a sense of his guilt, and with sympathy with the suffering of his people, that he now prays God to visit judgment on "him and his house" alone, and spare the people as "His flock" [comp. 1 Chron. xxi. 17].

III. Vers. 18–25. Appeasement of God's wrath by the purchase of Araunah's threshing-floor, and the erection of an altar thereon.—Ver. 18. God's announcement of grace (contrasted with His announcement of judgment, ver. 13) is the consequence of "the repentance of the Lord" (ver. 16) and the synchronous repentance of David (ver. 17), though this did not cause God's repentance; it occurs at the same time ("that day") that God stops the plague, at the "appointed time" (ver. 15) before the expiration of the three days.—Besides his prayer David has now to make public affirmation of his guilt, and of his willingness henceforth with the people to devote himself as an offering to the Lord, by building an altar. [According to Chron. the angel commanded Gad to go to David; the two accounts do not exclude each other. The relation of time between vers. 16 and 18 is not clear; but God's repentance is represented as independent of David's action.—Ta.]—Ver. 19. And David went up; he shows unconditional obedience to the divine command; whereby the altar was already in spirit built, and the offering of an obedient heart well-pleasing to the Lord, was made in truth. Comp. 1 Sam. xv. 22.—Ver. 20. And Araunah looked forth; the verb (רָאָה) means "to lie out over, bend forward, see, look at, look out"—here, to look into the distance, since Araunah was working in the threshing-floor, and saw David coming from the city. Chron. more fully: "And as Ornan was threshing wheat." [Ver. 21. David announces his purpose to Araunah to buy his threshing-floor.]—Ver. 22 sq. Araunah's unselfish readiness is shown in the fact that he takes for granted the threshing-floor is to be made over to David, does not even mention it, but offers everything on the place to be used in averting the plague: the oxen that drew the threshing-wagon, the threshing-sledges (the Plural is used because a sledge consisted of several connected iron-pointed rollers), and the instruments of the oxen, the wooden yokes; the "wood" (yokes and sledges) was for the fire, as the oxen for the burnt-offering.—Ver. 23. Render: "All this gives Araunah, O king, to the king;" the words are a continuation of Araunah's speech in ver. 22. In the ancient versions (Sept., Vulg., Syr., Ar., Chald.) the first "the king" is omitted, because, taking it as Nominative, they rightly thought it impossible that Araunah should be a king. If the words be taken as the statement of the narrator, and the "king" as Nominative, then [since it says: Araunah gave all this] there is a contradiction with ver. 24, where David buys the threshing-floor, and moreover a historically incorrect statement, namely, that Araunah was king of Jebus before its conquest by David; this view Ewald in fact adopts, against which Thénienus rightly says: "this important fact would not have been stated in a single word, and it is in itself, but especially from v. 8., incredible that David should have suffered the Jebusite king to remain at his side." [For another reading: "all this gives Araunah, the servant of my lord the king, to the king" (which is also a continuation of Araunah's discourse), see "Text.

and Gram."—Tr.]—And Araunah said to the king; before this we must suppose a pause, or the repetition of the announcing formula ["Araunah said"], without intervening discourse, is to be explained by the fact that the following wish is sharply marked off from what precedes as a word of special significance and wholly new content. "The phrase 'and he said' is frequently repeated, where the same person continues to speak, see xv. 4, 25, 27" (Keil). The Lord thy God accept thee; the verb is used of the acceptance of persons by God in connection with prayer and offering, Job xxxiii. 26; Ezek. xx. 40, 41; xliii. 27; Jer. xiv. 12; so also here in reference to the offering that David proposes making. Sept., Syr., Arab. have "The Lord bless thee;" Böttcher proposes to combine these texts and read: "the Lord thy God accept and bless thee" after Gen. xlix. 25; Numb. vi. 24 sqq.; Ps. lxxvii. 2 [1].—Ver. 24. David does not accept Araunah's offered gift (which exhibits him as a propertied man), because the offering would seem incomplete in his eyes if it were not his own property that he offered.—For fifty shekels of silver; Chron.: "shekels of gold in weight six hundred." There would be room for the supposition of an intentional exaggeration in Chronicles (Thenius), only "if it were certain that the Chronicler had before him our present text of Samuel" (Bertheau). Bochart [approved by Bib. Com.], holds that the word (שֶׁקֶל) means here not "silver," but in general "money," that David paid money, fifty shekels in gold-pieces, and, as gold was worth twelve times as much as silver, this was = 600 shekels in silver [according to Bochart, Chron. (ver. 25) reads: "shekels of gold of the weight (value) of 600 (silver shekels)."—Tr.]; but this contradicts the texts of both Sam. and Chron. We have to suppose a corruption of text here. Keil properly points out that, comparing the price (400 silver shekels) that Abraham gave for a burial-place (Gen. xxiii. 15), and especially the smaller value of land in his day, the price here stated, 50 shekels of silver (about 30 American dollars) seems too small. [However, Abraham's purchase was much greater in extent than this (Bib. Com.), and peculiar circumstances may here have affected the price. The sum mentioned in Chron. seems too large, but of this we cannot very well judge. Some suppose that the 50 shekels were paid for the materials of the offering, and 600 for the ground (see note in Bib. Com. on 1 Chron. xxi. 25); but of this there is no hint in the narrative. We cannot with certainty recover the true numbers.—Tr.]

Ver. 25. The building of the altar and the presentation of the offering is the work of humble and obedient faith, whereby David testifies anew his complete devotion of heart and life to the Lord. The burnt-offering precedes, because by it expiation is made, and God's favor, as Araunah wished for David, restored; comp. Lev. i. 3, 4 "for his acceptance before Jehovah" (comp. ver. 23). Thereon follows the peace- and thank-offering (Shelamim). It assumes God's favor and the peaceful relation between Him and man, and on the ground of this relation, expresses thanks for divine kindnesses already received or hereafter to be received (comp. Oehler in Herz. X. 637).—After

"peace-offerings" the Sept. adds: "And Solomon made an addition to the altar afterwards, for it was little at first." It must be left undetermined whether the Alexandrian translators found these words in their text, they being an addition by an editor or scribe (Then.), or added them by way of explanation. Certainly the place on Araunah's threshing-floor, where David built the altar and continued to offer, is the consecrated spot that he chose for the Temple, and on which Solomon built it (1 Chron. xxi. 27—xxii. 1); and this addition of the Sept. agrees with the statement of Josephus, that Araunah's threshing floor was on the hill afterwards occupied by the Temple (so Grotius).—Chr. Rosen has attempted to prove the identity of this threshing-floor on Moriah (comp. Arnold in Herz. XVIII. 625) with the sacred rock in the present Mosques Sakra, which stands on the site of the ancient Temple (Wochenblatt der Johanner-Ordens-Balley Brand. Jahrg. 1860 in the Beilage to No. 12).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The grave sin of proud self-exaltation, which David and the people of Israel here had in common, presupposed the elevation to victory and power that God had bestowed by His gracious might, and its consequence was the judgment that revealed God's anger against the perversion of His favors into plans of self-aggrandizement. God's honor does not permit a king and people to seek their own honor in the power conferred by Him. The aims of God's kingdom cannot, according to God's laws of moral order, be abridged or obscured with impunity by the aims and purposes of human pride. God's judgments fail not against false national honor and ambitious, self-seeking pride of rulers, as is shown by the history not only of Israel, but of all nations to the present time.

2. That God, angry with Israel, incites to the sin of numbering the people, and then punishes it, is no contradiction according to the theology of the Old Testament (J. Müller, Lehre von der Sünde I. 322), since inciting to sin does not set aside the holding one responsible for it. Man's free will is not destroyed by the divine will, and the punishment of the righteous God presupposes man's guilt. Immersed in the thought of God's all-fulfilling efficiency, the human mind does not indeed refer to it "evil as well as good" (Müller, ubi supra), for Old Testament theology is far from presenting the divine causality in this like attitude to good and evil; but the divine activity (in its punitive manifestations) is referred to the external production of evil (already present as an inward fact of man's free will, opposed to God's will), in so far as the circumstances that produce and incite to sin exist under God's government, and are used by Him as means to develop man's sin for the ends of His punitive righteousness. But also, apart from the external realization of sin, God gives man, who freely hardens himself in sin, over to the judgment of the consequence of his sin; Rom. i. 28.—"There is here not mere permission, but real action on God's part, and such as every one may see in his own experiences. He that allows the sinful disposition to rise within him is, however much he may strive against it, inevitably involved in the sinful deed, which draws down the requiting judgment" (Hengst, Hist. II. 130).

3. The root of the sin in this census is already laid bare in the word of the law relating to the numbering of the people. Hengstenberg excellently remarks (ubi sup. 129): "If David's eye had been clear, he would have seen in God's law the special reference to the danger attending the numbering of the people. In Ex. xxx. 11 sq. it is enjoined that in the census every Israelite shall pay expiatory money, 'that there be no plague among them when they are numbered,' by this money they are, as it were, ransomed from the death that they incurred by proud conceit. It recalls the danger of forgetting human weakness, that so easily arises when the individual feels himself a member of a powerful whole. Even the slightest movement of national pride (it is an important lesson for all times) is sin against God, which, if not vigorously repelled, involves the nation in the judgment of God. Indeed the Romans with a similar feeling made an expiatory offering when they took the census."—The greatness of David's guilt increases with the maintained opposition of his will to the voice of God, which he hears in Joab's word, whereby his conscience ought to have been awakened. The degree of man's guilt against God rises with the maintained determination of the will against conscience in the inner life, with the outward resolution to act, with the rejection of counsel and instruction, whereby the attainment of better knowledge is frustrated, and with the final performance of the evil determination in spite of protest and opposition from within and from without.

4. The various steps whereon God leads men that yield their conscience to His Spirit to ever deeper humility in sincere penitence are mirrored in this history of David's repentance. First God rouses David from his sleep of conscience and security by the result of his boastful antigodly undertaking, so that "his heart smote him" (comp. for this expression, 1 Sam. xxiv. 6), that is, his conscience chastised him. So he comes to know that he has sinned and how sorely, and to acknowledge the foolishness of his sin, and to pray for forgiveness (ver. 10). But to the inward voice of his smiting conscience is added the voice of the word of God, which comes to him from without through the prophet Gad with the announcement of punitive righteousness. The penitence of the heart proves itself in humble submission to God's punishing hand, whence David instead of the asked-for pardon takes without murmuring the announcement of punishment, and in the unconditional trustful self abandonment to God's mercy (ver. 14). Under the sorrowful experience of punishment the feeling of personal guilt is deepened, wherefore he acknowledges himself and his house alone to be the proper object of the divine punitive justice (ver. 17). Having suffered himself to be led thus far on the path of penitence by God's hand, he encounters the prophetically announced divine mercy, which stops the punishment (ver. 18), and gives proof of the renewed obedience rising from the depths of true penitence, in the deed (commanded by the Lord) of faith and devotion of his whole life to him (ver. 19 sq.). David's repentance is finished and confirmed by the building of the altar, and his offering on the threshing-floor of Araunah.

On the same spot where once Abraham, the possessor of the primeval promises of salvation, presented the sacrifice of his faith and obedience to the Lord, the royal bearer of the Messianic promises presents his burnt-offering and thank-offering, and therewith consecrates the spot, on which his son was to build a house as the Lord's dwelling amid His people, and this on the ground of his experience of sin-forgiving grace and divine mercy that puts an end to punitive justice.—Hengstenberg: "It is very remarkable that before the outward foundations of the Temple were laid, God's forgiving mercy was by God factually declared to be its spiritual foundation."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The glory of God shows itself in the life of His people, not only through His abounding grace but also through His holy wrath, whose fire is kindled by the sins into which they fall through the temptations of their own flesh or of the world without.—No height of the life of faith in the pious secures from a deep fall; the richer the possession of salvation which they have received through divine grace, the greater the loss if they do not preserve it or wish in self-exaltation to boast of it as their own acquirement.—The perverse self-will of man is the fountain of all sin; its guilt is not removed when through God's action, the evil breaks forth from this fountain, and becomes a deed of disobedience to His holy will; God's manifestations of grace often become, to man fallen into carnal security, the occasion of grievous acts of sin.—God would annihilate the free will of man if he did not allow the sin, which through that free will has already become an inner deed of the heart, to work itself out in its consequences; but He does not allow this to happen without first sending forth to men the voice of warning, and the call to turn from the way on which with the sinful resolve they have entered.—If God's exhortation and warning has been uttered in vain through man's word, His voice afterwards makes itself heard so much the more loudly through the accusation of what is called an evil conscience, but should properly be called a good conscience.

The smittings with which God visits His people, when they have strayed into the ways of sin, are 1) those of conscience, in view of the goodness of God which became the occasion or subject of self-exaltation; 2) Those of the word of God, in view of the holiness of His will against which they have sinned; and 3) Those of outward chastisement, through sufferings in which punitive justice exerts itself.—Whom does the heart smite for his sins? Him who 1) Lets his heart be smitten by God's earnestness and goodness, and takes to heart the greatness of his sin in contrast to God's loving-kindness; 2) Recognizes his sin, in the light of God's word, as a transgression of His holy will; and 3) Maintains in his sinning and in spite of it the fundamental direction of his heart towards the living God, and has been preserved from falling away into complete unbelief.—True and hearty repentance is preserved in the life of God's children, 1) In the penitent confession of their sin and guilt, before the judgment-seat of God, 2) In fleeing for refuge to the forgiving grace of God, 3) In humbly bowing under the punitive justice of God, and 4) In a confidence, which even amid divine judgments does not waver, in the delivering mercy of God.—The gradual succession in the inner life of a penitent sinner under the chastenings of God's love: 1) Reproving conscience, 2) Penitent confession, 3) Hearty prayer for forgiveness, 4) Humble bowing beneath the punishment imposed, 5) Unreserved submission to the divine mercy.—Conduct of an honestly penitent man beneath the blows of God's chastening hand: 1) He bows his head under the divine judgment, yet does not lose his head; 2) He is silent before the word of God which judges him, that the Lord alone may be justified, yet his mouth does not remain closed, but opens itself for the one word he has to utter, "Take away the iniquity of thy servant;" 3) He is grieved in heart in view of the punishment he has deserved from the divine justice, yet he does not cast away his confidence, but places himself in the hands of the divine mercy.—"Mercy rejoices over judgment." 1) The penitent man casts himself into the arms of God's mercy; 2) Mercy falls into the arms of justice, in order to stay its blows; punitive justice must yield to mercy at the command of the Lord, "It is enough: stay now thy hand."—Rear an altar unto the Lord! 1) In obedience to the Lord's command (vers. 18, 19); 2) With dedication of thyself, and what is thine to the Lord's honor (vers. 21-24); 3) For the continual presentation of spiritual offerings, which are acceptable to the Lord (vers. 23, 24); and 4) For the reception of the highest gift of grace, peace with the propitiated God.

OSIANDER: Even the holiest people may sometimes be overtaken by their corrupt flesh (Rom. vii. 13).—SCHLIER: After David had given up his heart to evil thoughts, the Lord gave occasion and opportunity for these evil thoughts to break forth unto the punishment of the king as well as of his whole people. Much depends, for the understanding of the following history, upon our not forgetting this concealed background, upon our keeping well in view, on the one hand the Lord's wrath against Israel, and on the other hand the king's evil thoughts.—[HALL: O the wondrous, and yet just ways of the Almighty! Because Israel hath sinned, therefore David shall sin, that Israel may be punished; because God is angry with Israel, therefore David shall anger Him more, and strike Himself in Israel, and Israel through Himself.—TR.]—F. W. KRUMMACHER: Despite all the purifying processes through which we have passed, there is scarcely anything sinful to be named that cannot, even though conquered, come up in us afresh in the way of temptation. The most assured Christian, if his eyes are not blinded, never attains the consciousness that now he can stand justified before God in his own virtue.—[HALL: The Spirit of God elsewhere ascribes this motion to Satan, which here it attributes to God; both had their hand in the work; God by permission, Satan by suggestion; God as a Judge, Satan as an enemy; God as in a just punishment for sin, Satan as in an act of sin; God in a wise ordina-

VERA. 2-4. DISSELHOFF: Even on the heights of life in God, the favored one remains the child of Adam. The jubilant cry, "according to my righteousness," may easily become the boast, "on account of my righteousness."—STARKE: When kings and princes fall into sin, that means much; let us then not forget to pray for them, that God may preserve them (1 Tim. ii. 2).—SCHLIER: Pride sticks in the flesh and blood of us all; and the difference is only whether pride has power over us, or whether we rein in and subjugate pride. Either thou slayest pride, or pride slays thee.—[HALL: Those actions which are in themselves indifferent, receive either their life, or their bane, from the intentions of the agent. Moses numbereth the people with thanks, David with displeasure.—TR.]—DISSELHOFF: Humility wishes not to know what it is and possesses, and has done. As soon as the human heart wishes to count the fruits it has brought, its trophies and its booty, piles up before itself the proofs of its faith and zeal, and contemplates them with pleasure, humility is flown, pride has returned. From pride there immediately arises self-satisfied boasting. . . . Then the second step also is soon taken that the man no longer trusts in the invisible gracious God, but holds flesh for his arm, and in his heart turns away from the Lord,—that he wishes to see and calculate, and no longer to live by faith.

VER. 10. J. LANGE: God, the great and universal judge of the world, still holds as it were His secret inferior court in the conscience of the man, and summons him continually before his superior court (Rom. ii. 15, 16).—F. W. KRUMMACHER. As the sun always again breaks through the clouds that veiled it, so the conscience once awakened and enlightened by the Spirit of God, however darkened and ensnared it may be, ever victoriously comes forth again, and anew makes efficient its judicial office.—DISSELHOFF: Before God came with the punishment, before He showed him his sin from without, David's own conscience rose up strong and living, and left him no peace till he had poured out his guilt-laden heart in sincere and earnest confession, and had supplicated forgiveness of his misdeed.—FR. ARNDT: How a man behaves after his fault, whether he persists in it, stands to his purpose, seeks to carry through his self-will and follows it out consistently to the utmost, or whether he enters into himself, humbles himself, repents, takes back, and supplicates forgiveness—that is the proof and the touch-stone for the true state of the heart. The former course is indeed apparent progress, but a progress that leads to hell; the latter is apparently going backward, but going back to heaven and blessedness.

VERA. 11-13. STARKE: God is not swift to punish, but corrects in measure, only that we may not reckon ourselves innocent (Jer. xxx. 11).—God is also Lord over the kingdom of nature, and has everything therein under His government (Matt. x. 29).—FR. ARNDT: With His children the Lord is very exact. He is milder towards them, but also stricter than towards others. To whom much is given, of Him much also is required.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: The power to endure ills in proportion as they seem divine manifestation of grace should not serve to obscure the divine justice.—DISSELHOFF: Here lies the sinner a night in confession and supplication, and in the morning God sends him—punishment, and therewith no syllable of grace and forgiveness! We observe it with trembling. To the deeply ruined, and long-lost child the father runs with open arms to meet him, and presses him to his heart. Yet when the favored one, who has tasted the power of atonement, loses himself, when he makes the goodness of God a subject of arrogance and presumptuousness, then the Lord comes upon the penitent with the sharp edge of His sword.—He must punish, the eternal God, when He sees that the old nature is too tough in the new man, too deep-rooted and grown with His growth . . . but above all must He then come with the sword, when His grace and His gifts have been made the cause of the self-exaltation.

Vers. 14 sqq. CRAMER: Nowhere have we a better refuge in extremities than in the gracious hands of the Lord (Ps. xc. 1; xci. 1 sqq.).—S. SCHMID: The mercy of man is nothing in comparison with the divine mercy.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: David is conscious that the Lord "corrects His people in measure," and the cup of His holy wrath, where He neither can nor should spare them. He never extends to them without adding hidden manifestations of grace, while men, even where they are the executioners of God's judgments, too easily mistake their position as instruments, and pass beyond the limits of merciful moderation that were assigned them, and give free course in their bosom to the spirits of rage and vengeance.—[HALL: The Almighty, that had fore-determined his judgment, refers it to David's will as fully as if it were utterly undetermined. God had resolved, yet David may choose: that infinite wisdom hath foreseen the very will of His creature; which, while it freely inclines itself to what it had rather, unwittingly wills that which was fore-appointed in heaven.—Tr.]

Ver. 16. SCHLIER: The Lord our God is a consuming fire to the sinner, and punishes, when it must be, with frightful earnestness, so that it goes through marrow and bone; but in the midst of the most awful judgments the Lord thinks of mercy. He pities us—that is the only reason why He thinks of mercy.—FR. ARNDT: O miracle of mercy! Thus does the Lord in compassion cut short the punishment, when we bow! Thus says He, It is enough, when the evil has first begun to unfold its devastating effects! Thus before the eyes of His omniscience and His compassion do need and help, beginning and end, wonderfully come together!—Ver. 17. F. W. KRUMMACHER: Not from the virtues of God's children, but from their tears for their faults, shines upon us the noblest silver light of their new life.—SCHLIER: We are willing to confess our sin, to acknowledge ourselves guilty, to be nothing, just nothing in our own eyes, and we may certainly yet experience in ourselves also that to the humble the Lord always gives grace.—[On this verse JOHN WESLEY has a sermon.—HALL: These thousands of Israel were not so innocent, that they should only perish for David's sin: their sins were the motives both of this sin and punishment; besides the respect of David's offence, they die for themselves.

—HENRY: Most people, when God's judgments are abroad, charge others with being the cause of them, and care not who falls by them, so they can escape; but David's penitent and public spirit was otherwise affected. As became a penitent, he is severe upon his own faults, while he extenuates those of the people.—Tr.]

Vers. 18 sqq. STARKE: Teachers must not go before God sends them (Jer. xxiii. 21).—CRAMER: As God is beginning to punish, He also thinks how He wishes to end.—SCHLIER: The repentance that comes from the bottom of the heart works great miracles; repentance draws down God's grace, repentance finds nothing but peace and blessing. The more repentance, so much the more blessing—that holds true for heart and house, and also for land and people.—DISSELHOFF: Where the Lord punishes His people, He blesses. Where He chastens is the door of heaven, there is His countenance, there He beholds, there He builds His tabernacle of peace.—Vers. 19 sqq. S. SCHMID: One prophet must hearken to another (1 Cor. xiv. 22).—Vers. 22-24. [HALL: Two frank hearts are well met; David would buy; Araunah would give. . . . There can be no devotion in a niggardly heart; as unto dainty palates, so to the godly soul, that tastes sweetest that costs most: nothing is dear enough for the Creator of all things. It is an heartless piety of those base-minded Christians that care only to serve God good-cheap.—Tr.]—WUERT. B.: Penitent and believing prayer, and obedience to God's command, can accomplish much (Ps. cxlv. 18; James v. 16).

F. W. KRUMMACHER: Were God's faithfulness no more unchanging towards us than ours towards Him, what would become of us all? With this humble confession we draw near to contemplate this new judicial proceeding between Jehovah and the king of Israel, and inquire into its subject, its course, and its issue.

On the whole chapter, J. DISSELHOFF: How God meets the presumptuousness of His favored ones: 1) He comes upon them with the edge of the sword; 2) His sword is not to kill, but to loose the chains of pride; 3) Where the sword of the Lord has done its work, there He builds His temple of peace.

[Ver. 1. Vengeance against a nation often comes through the infatuation of its rulers.—The sin of national pride and vain-glory. "Fourth of July oratory" may be something worse than bad rhetoric.—Ver. 3. Good advice from a bad man. Fas est et ab hoste doceri. Luke xvi. 8. Much of life's best wisdom lies in knowing how to take advice.—Ver. 10. Delusion lasting throughout the process of performing the wrong deed, and ceasing the moment the deed is done.—Often, alas! is there occasion to say, in bitterness and shame, What a fool I have been!—Ver. 10, compared with xxii. 20 sqq. There, rewarded because righteous and wise; here, seeks to be forgiven because sinful and foolish.—Tr.]

[Vers. 12, 13. How sad a consequence of sin and folly, when there is left to us only a "choice of evils," yea, a choice amid terrible calamities.—Which do we find harder to bear, which bringing more wholesome discipline, our less violent but long-continued distresses, or those which are briefer and more intense?—Ver. 14. It is always easier to endure ills in proportion as they seem more directly and exclusively providential, with the least possible intervention of human agency.—Ver. 17. It is a very bitter reflection to a good man, that his folly and sin should have brought evil upon others. And what sin or folly ever fails to have such a result, directly or indirectly?—Ver. 24. People often say, "You can give that and never feel it." If this be true, then a devout man ought to give more, till he does feel it. Here, only what costs will pay. The widow's mite was felt deeply, for it was all she had.—Chap. xxiv. 1) David's sin. 2) His self-reproach and confession. 3) His punishment. 4) His supplication and expiatory offering. 5) His forgiveness.—Tr.]

[Upon the Life of David, the following groups of topics may aid, by way of suggestion, in devising some series of sermons.—David as shepherd, warrior, father, king, psalmist.—David's conflicts: with the enemies of his flock, Goliath, Saul, the Philistines in general, Absalom, himself.—David's friends: Samuel, Jonathan, Ahimelech, Achish, Joab, Nathan, Ittai, Hushai, Barzillai, his own sons, and best friend of all, the Lord God.—David's early piety, series of great sins, bitter repentance, subsequent chastenings, hope in death.—David's impulsiveness, generosity, penitence, trust in God, gratitude, delight in worship.—Tr.]

ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE BOOK OF SAMUEL.

THE Hebrew text of "Samuel" is in the main well supported by internal and external evidence. Yet the biographical and statistical character of the narrative has exposed it more than any other of the historical books of the Old Testament to textual corruption; it is sometimes inaccurate and unclear not only in particular words and expressions, but also in the connection of its parts. Many such cases are referred to in the Commentary and the Translator's Notes; see 1 Sam. vi., ix., xii., xvii., xviii., xx., xxvi.; 2 Sam. iv., v., xxiii. and elsewhere. For the fixing of the Heb. text we have not the Manuscript-evidence that is available for a book of the New Testament. Though there are known a large number of Hebrew MSS. of "Samuel," they seem all to be conformed to the masoretic recension (which was completed about the sixth century of our era, but probably begun some time before), whereby any differences that may have existed have vanished. The recently discovered Odessa MSS. and those brought to light by the Karaite Firkowitsch have not up to this time yielded any readings of importance; the early dates of the latter are now called in question by Strack and Harkavy. The various readings of the Talmud and the Masora present very slight differences from the received text. Assuming, then, the possibility of text-corruption from various causes, we are forced to examine the ancient Versions the more carefully as almost the only sources of materials for text-criticism. But while the Hebrew text is not to be regarded as absolutely authoritative, the text of a version has to be subjected to especially searching criticism for two reasons: 1) because the translator may have given an incorrect or free rendering, and may thus unintentionally misrepresent his original, and 2) because a version is exposed to greater textual corruption (by corrections, marginal insertions, etc.) than a MS. of the original, especially in the case of the Old Testament. The intentional changes in our Versions are few and usually obvious. It need not be remarked that the fixing of the text of a Version as accurately as possible must precede its employment as an instrument of criticism. In order to call the attention of those that have not used them to the critical importance of the Ancient Versions and to furnish a general guide in their use, the following brief account of the value of the versional material at hand for the text-criticism of "Samuel" is subjoined.

I. The Greek Versions.—Of these the only one of any special value is the Septuagint, which represents a Hebrew text of c. B. C. 200, far older than any known Hebrew manuscript. For an account of the Greek MSS. containing it see Tischendorf's Prolegomena to his edition of the Septuagint; the only readings generally accessible (for the Book of Samuel) are those of the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS., of which the latter is critically almost worthless, because it has evidently in many places been corrected after the masoretic Hebrew text. Substantially, therefore, the Vatican text (Tischendorf's edition) must be adopted as the best now obtainable, but must itself be subjected to criticism. The text in Stier and Theile's Polyglot is eclectic, and of no critical value; the various readings of Holmes and Parsons are undigested.

The critical value of the Septuagint (Vatican text) version of "Samuel:"

1) Its honesty. It aims at giving a faithful rendering of the Hebrew, which it follows with servility, closely imitating Hebrew idioms in defiance of Greek usage, rendering particles and other words literally to the exclusion of sense, and guessing at or transferring words whose meaning was unknown. There are marginal insertions, double readings (see below) and those slight divergencies that are unavoidable in a version; but there is no trace of intentional misrepresentation. The translation does not shrink from any difficulties in its original, and may be taken as a fair rendering of the Hebrew text that the Alexandrian translator had before him.

2) Its freedom from halachic, haggadic and euphemistic elements. There is no introduction of later Jewish legal prescriptions (Halacha), even, for instance, in 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, or of legendary statements and superstitious fancies (Haggada). The two supposed cases of the latter cited by Frankel (Vorstudien zu der Sept., pp. 187, 188), 1 Sam. xx. 30; 1 Sam. xxviii. 14, do not warrant his interpretation. In the first passage there is no ground to assume in the phrase: ὡς ἐκπαίειν ἀνθρώπους (deserting) an allusion to the story that Jonathan's mother was one of the maidens carried off at Shiloh (Judg. xxi.), and willingly offered herself to Saul, nor does the ὁρθὸν (ῥῥι), "upright" (not "head-foremost"), of the second passage point to the belief that kings magically conjured up rose head first, while ordinary persons came feet-foremost.—It has no euphemisms for the avoidance of anthropomorphisms and unseemly expressions.

3) Its correctness as a translation. While in general it gives the sense of the Hebrew accurately, it is not merely lacking in smoothness and elegance, but shows a good deal of looseness and ignorance. It not seldom misreads consonants and vowels, mistakes the meaning and construction of words, and distorts the connection of sentences, and thus sometimes makes sad work with the sense, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7 (while 2 Sam. xxii. is well translated). It naturally badly miswrites proper names (apart from differences in the Egyptian and Palestinian pronunciation of Hebrew words), but shows a good acquaintance with the syntax of the Hebrew verb.

4) Its insertions and omissions. While it is true that this version of Samuel is to be considered an honest one, it must be remembered that ancient translators did not recognize the same obligation to their text that is now felt, but thought themselves at liberty to make occasional deviations from it. Still our Version takes few liberties. The shorter insertions and omissions (as of the Nominal or Pronominal subject or object, and of explanatory words and phrases) do not usually materially affect the sense; and they are not always to be referred to the translator or a copyist, but may sometimes be regarded as part of the original Alexandrian Hebrew text. To be especially noted are the duplets or double readings, where a second marginal rendering of a passage, or a rendering from a somewhat different recension has gotten into the text; sometimes also triplets or triple renderings are found, and these different renderings standing side by side are sometimes combined into one sentence by a copyist or a corrector. The longer insertions (1 Sam. ii. 10; 2 Sam. viii. 7; 2 Sam. xiv. 27; 2 Sam. xxiv. 25) are parallel passages or historical notices added by a reader in the margin and then inserted in the text by a copyist; but it is possible that one of these additions (2 Sam. xxiv. 25) was found in the translator's Hebrew text. The more important omissions (1 Sam. xvii., xviii.) are discussed at length in the Commentary.

5) Its utility for the establishment of the true text. Its relation to our present Hebrew text shows that it was not translated from the same text that furnished the masoretic recension. On the contrary, it represents as its original an independent Hebrew text of the 2d or 3d century B. C., and is therefore itself to be regarded as an independent authority for the restoration of the original Hebrew of "Samuel." As is remarked above, its character guarantees its faithful rendering of its Hebrew original, and it thus brings us face to face with a Hebrew MS. older by many hundred years than any we now possess, and, what is more important, independent of the masoretic recension. This is enough to show its great critical value.

The general result of the comparison between the Hebrew and Greek texts of "Samuel" is the maintenance of the former. Usually the Septuagint sustains the Hebrew by its agreement with it (sometimes with Kethib, sometimes with Qeri). Its divergences from the Hebrew do not always or generally make against the latter, but in many cases they do give or suggest a better text, instances of which will be found in the Translator's textual notes; see, for example, 1 Sam. xiv., xviii. and 2 Sam. xiv.

In the study of the Greek of Samuel it is recommended that Schleusner's Lexicon of the Septuagint and the Commentaries of Thenius, Böttcher and Wellhausen be used.

The other Greek versions (fragments of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus) represent very nearly the present Hebrew text, and, being much later than the Septuagint (2d century after Christ), have not much critical value.

II. Latin Versions.—Of the Latin Versions the Old Latin (2d century after Christ) is a translation of the Septuagint, and has therefore only a secondary critical value as a help in settling the text of the Septuagint.

The translation of Jerome, the Latin Vulgate (Codex Amiatinus, edited by Tischendorf) was made from the Hebrew, but not altogether independently of the Old Latin. For several reasons it must be used with caution in the criticism of the Hebrew text: 1) where it coincides with the Septuagint against the Hebrew, it is probable that Jerome or a copyist has adopted the rendering of the Old Latin, and it is therefore not an independent authority; 2) the Hebrew text of Jerome had probably received the emendations of the Masorites, and is in so far identical with that of existing Heb. MSS. and not an independent authority; 3) Jerome's translation is much freer than that of the Septuagint, and frequently obscures the exact form of the Hebrew.

Still the Vulgate gives a certain control over the Hebrew, and in some cases differs from both Hebrew and Greek. In such cases it may represent a variation in Jerome's Heb. text or a variation in the Greek text from which the Old Latin was made.

III. The Syriac Version.—The only known Syriac text of "Samuel" is that of the Peshito Version, given in the Paris and London Polyglots and Lee's edition, and in at least one uncollated MS. in the British Museum.* A trustworthy text from existing MSS. is still a desideratum. For the control of the Polyglot text and that of Lee, we have the various manuscript-readings in Vol. VI. of Walton's Polyglot, the citations in the works of Ephrem Syrus and other Syrian writers, and the Arabic version of "Samuel" in the London Polyglot, which was made from the Peshito Syriac; but, as the biblical quotations of the early Christian writers are often loose and inaccurate (because they quote from memory) and the Arabic does not always hold itself strictly to its original, these authorities must be used cautiously.

The Syriac text of "Samuel" was made directly from the Hebrew, and is in the main a literal and correct translation. It is, however, far less useful than the Septuagint for the criticism of the Hebrew text and the elucidation of its meaning:

1) It was probably not made before the 2d century of our Era, at which time the present masoretic text had been substantially formed, and it has in some places perhaps been corrected after the masoretic recension; it is therefore of little use in reaching a pre-masoretic Hebrew text.

2) It sometimes takes liberties with the Hebrew, abridging or expanding, especially in obscure or corrupt passages, as 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 4; xiv. 13, 25, 26; xvi. 15, 16; 2 Sam. v. 6 sq.; xxi. 16; it omits a verse from homocoteleuton, 2 Sam. xiii. 18, or a part of a verse from breviloquence, 2 Sam. vii. 6; it entirely fails to catch a fine conception, as in 1 Sam. xv. 23; it miswrites proper names, as Ish-boshul 2 Sam. ii. 8, Kolob iii. 3, Adoniram xx. 24, Edom for Aram 2 Sam. x. 6, 8, prophets for Abel 2 Sam. xx. 18; and it sometimes misunderstands the meaning and connection of words.

3) It shows some connection with the Septuagint and the Targum, though it is hard to determine the relation between them. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint against Hebrew and Chaldee, as in 1 Sam. i. 24 (a three-year-old bullock), in the division between chapters iii. and iv., at the end of 2 Sam. iii. 24 and in 2 Sam. xxi. 9.† Very frequently it agrees with the Hebrew against the Septuagint, sometimes varies (commonly slightly) from Hebrew, Septuagint, and Chaldee, and sometimes shows a general agreement with the last, as in 2 Sam. xxiv. 15 and 1 Sam. xvi. 23, where it is with Septuagint and Chaldee against Hebrew. It may be that the translator had the Septuagint before him and occasionally followed it, or that readings from the Greek got from the margin into the text. It is possible also that he followed in some cases the same general Jewish hermeneutical tradition that shows itself in the Targum. For

4) There seem to be in the Syriac a few attempts to avoid anthropomorphisms and unseemly expressions, and a few cases of Rabbinical interpretation. Thus: 2 Sam. xxiv. 16: "the Lord restrained the Angel of death who was slaying the people, and said to him" instead of "Jahveh repented him of the evil and said;" xxiv. 17: "David said to that angel" instead of "David said to Juhveh;" 1 Sam. xxi. 5, 6: "if the young men have kept themselves from the offering (corban). And David said, The offering is lawful for us." In the first clause the Arabic has the full explanation: "if the young men have preserved their vessels from impurity unfit for those that approach the offering." The obscure passage 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, is rendered by the Peshito: "from the morning to the sixth hour" (Hebrew לְבֹקֶר), where the Targum has: "from the time of slaying the stated sacrifice to the time of offering it," while the Septuagint, avoiding the halachic interpretation, renders: "from morning to noon" (ἀπὸ ὀρθρου).*

In general the masoretic text of "Samuel" is supported by the Peshito Version. The Syriac text has to be closely watched throughout. In addition to Thorndyke's emendations above referred to (found in Vol. VI. of the London Polyglot) see the remarks of Rödiger in his monograph on the Arabic Version, pp. 76, 77. The Arabic must all along be compared with the Syriac.

The Arabic Version. As is remarked above the Arabic Version of "Samuel" in the Polyglots is a translation from the Peshito Syriac, and is useful in the criticism of the text of the latter, not of the Hebrew immediately. It deserves a more careful textual examination than it has yet received. Its character is most fully discussed by Rödiger in the work cited above. The same text (unpointed) with a few variations is given in the Arabic Bible printed for the British and Foreign Bible Society by Sarah Hodgson, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1811.

IV. The Jewish-Aramaic (Chaldee) Version.—The text of this version (in the Targum of Jonathan) is given in the London Polyglot and in the edition of P. De Lagarde, Leipzig, 1873.

* Tregelles, Art. Versions in Smith's Bible-Dictionary. Bleek (Introd. to Old Test., Eng. Trans., II. 447, Note) seems to have supposed that this was a Hexaplar-Syriac text. I have not access to the catalogues of Syriac MSS. in the Bodleian Library and the British Museum by Payne Smith and W. Wright, and do not know whether other MSS. of "Samuel" are found among them.

† Nöldeke (Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. morgenländ. Gesellschaft, XXV. 267) remarks that the text of the ancient Syriac Pentateuch MS. in the British Museum sometimes agrees with the Hebrew where our editions approach the Greek more nearly, and that it doubtless preserves the original Syriac more faithfully. The relation between the Septuagint, Syriac and Chaldee calls for closer investigation.

* Porles (Metemata Peschitthoniana, pp. 16-21) adduces other examples, not always in point; comp. Prager, De Vet. Test. Vers. Syr. quam Peschittho vocant Quæst. Critica, Pars I.

† De origine et indole Arab. Libr. V. T. Histor. Interpretationis. Halle, 1829.

This Targum probably received its present form not earlier than the fourth century of our Era (though it doubtless rests on an earlier translation), and is of little use in the establishment of a pre-masoretic text. It is made immediately from the Hebrew, and is in the main a good translation.

It is commonly marked by extreme literalness, but sometimes departs from its text to avoid an anthropomorphic or unseemly expression, to introduce a late legal idea, or to expand and illustrate. The principal additions are in 1 Sam. ii. 1-10 and 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4, 7, 8, where it inserts rambling commentaries, and in 1 Sam. xv. 17, where it explains Saul's elevation by a historical reference on which the Bible is silent (Benjamin's heading the march through the sea). Goliath's braggart speech in 1 Sam. xvii. 8, given in the London Polyglot, is omitted by Lagarde. It ingeniously fills out the corrupt passage, 1 Sam. xiii. 1, and attempts some explanation of the numbers in 1 Sam. vi. 19. Among its Rabbinical features are the substitution of scribe for prophet in 1 Sam. x. 10, 11, 12; xix. 20, 24; xxviii. 6, and the phrase "remember what is written in the book of the law of Jahveh," 2 Sam. xiii. 11; xx. 18. In 1 Sam. xxviii. 13 it avoids the possible irreverence in Elohim by rendering: "angel of Elohim." Its rendering in 1 Sam. xiv. 19 "bring the ephod" instead of the Hebrew "withdraw thy hand," suggests an emendation of the Heb. of verse 18 (see the Textual Notes). Thus, without being of high text-critical authority, it secures a general control over the Hebrew text.

PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

THE Commentary on the Books of the Kings, published in 1868, was prepared by the Rev. Dr. BÄHR, of Carlsruhe, who has been long favorably known as the learned author of the Symbolism of Mosaic Worship (Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus, Heidelberg, 1837-'39, 2 vols., now undergoing a thorough revision), a Commentary on Colossians, a treatise on the Temple of Solomon (1848), and other works.

The translation from the German, with additions, was executed by the Rev. Dr. HARWOOD, of New Haven, Conn., who assumed the First Book, and by the Rev. W. G. SUMNER, Professor in Yale College, who is responsible for the last chapter of the First, and the whole of the Second Book. The textual revision and original grammatical notes on the First Book must be credited to the Rev. Dr. FREDERIC GARDINER, Professor in the Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Conn.

In regard to the principles by which he has been governed in his work, Dr. Bähr says, in his preface:—

“In accordance with the wisely-chosen aim and plan of the BIBLE-WORK of which this volume forms a part, I have taken especial pains to maintain a strict discrimination between the three sections into which the expository matter is divided. In the first section, the Exegetical and Critical, I have collected all which seemed essential to the explanation of the original text, and to the determination, both of the sense of the words and of their grammatical connection . . . As a matter of course, both the other sections are based on the Exegetical. Nothing can properly be made the subject of theological discussion or homiletical treatment which does not rest on a firm exegetical foundation. I have, therefore, omitted from the Homiletical section all which, however edifying it might be, in itself considered, had no foundation in the text when this was correctly understood. I have taken the liberty of giving to the second division of the exposition [Doctrinal and Ethical], a wider, though more exact, title than that which it bears in the other volumes of the BIBLE-WORK. The specific, and, in fact, exclusive contents of the historical books is history, not doctrine or dogma; and this history is, moreover, soteriological, that is, it is the history of the redemptive plan of God; the history of the divine revelation, purpose, and providence; the history of the kingdom of God.”

Hence Dr. Bähr gives to this section the title: Heilsgeschichtliche und Ethische Grundgedanken, i.e.: Chief Points (in the section of text last preceding) which bear upon the Development of God's Plan of Salvation, or have Ethical Importance. In consequence of the impossibility of embodying this idea completely in a concise and convenient English title, the translators, while fully appreciating and coinciding in the author's intention, have retained the title which is used for the corresponding section of the other volumes, only substituting Historical for Doctrinal.

In regard to the Chronology, Dr. Bähr continues:—

"I have adopted a somewhat different method from any yet followed in the treatment of this subject. I start from certain dates which are generally accepted, and which may be fixed with the greatest certainty, and then, by grouping the biblical data into periods which are comprised between these fixed dates, I seek to solve this difficult problem (See Pt. II. pp. 86, 180, 283)."

Professor Sumner has added a brief Appendix on this subject, together with a Chronological Table of the period covered by the Books of the Kings. In Part II. pp. 161, 174, 189, 220, 237, 284 will be found a series of notes on contemporaneous history, so far as it illustrates the references in the text. These notes are based on the results of the latest Assyrian and Egyptian researches.

BOOKS OF THE KINGS.

INTRODUCTION.

NAME, DATE OF COMPOSITION, AND AUTHOR.

THE name מלכים, which belongs to our books in the Canon of the Old Testament, designates (if not imposed by the author himself), briefly and appropriately, the distinguishing contents of this historical work, in contrast with other writings belonging to the same class, the נביאים ראשונים, i. e., propheta priores. It contains, not so much the history of the theocracy in general, whereto "the succession of the kings serves only as the visible thread" (Hävernicks), as the history of the Israelitish monarchy from its ripest bloom on to its destruction, in so far as this history constitutes generally an independent portion of the history of the people Israel. The division of our work into two books is not original—it occurs first in the Septuagint. There it is regarded as an immediate continuation of the book שמואל (Samuel), which precedes it in the Canon, and is itself divided into two books, and these four are then designated as Books of the Kings (Βασιλείων α. β. γ. δ.), (comp. Origen in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vi. 25). This is retained in the Vulgate (comp. Hieron. prolog. galeat.), and came thence, through the printer Dan. Bomberg, in Venice, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, into the editions of the Hebrew Bible. This entire division and designation is just as arbitrary as it is defective. How unfit it is, is shown especially in our own work, the first book of which does not conclude with a paragraph founded in the history itself, but breaks off with a brief account of the reign of king Ahaziah.

The date of its composition is furnished from the conclusion of the work itself, where it is stated that king Jehoiachin was carried away to Babylon in the year 599 B. C., and was held there a prisoner for thirty-seven years—to the year 562—and obtained his freedom from Evil-merodach, the successor of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv. 27–30). The composition, consequently, cannot be set down before the year 562. But it does not admit of supposition that it took place after the return from the Babylonish exile in the year 536; for the author concludes with the deliverance of Jehoiachin as a joyful, hopeful event, and does not utter a syllable about the still more important and joyous matter—the return of the whole people—which is first mentioned in Ezra i. The composition, therefore, is to be assigned to the period between 562 and 536, i. e., during the second half of the exile. But we cannot determine whether it was during the brief reign (two years) of Evil-merodach, or after Jehoiachin's death.

In the Bible itself there is no intimation about the person of the author. The Jewish tradition names Jeremiah. The Talmud says (Baba bathra, f. xv. 1): Jeremias scripsit librum suum et librum regum et threnos. Some of the older theologians, and Hävernicks also, have agreed with this statement; but it is refuted alone from the duration of Jeremiah's life. He began his career as prophet (Jer. i. 2) in the thirteenth year of the reign of king Josiah, and must have been then at least from twenty to twenty-two years old; but since now our books could not have been written before the year 562, he must have composed them when he was at least from eighty-six to eighty-eight years old, which appears all the more incredible since the composition presupposes the employing and the arranging of different older written sources. To this must be added that Jeremiah, after the destruction of Jerusalem, went to Egypt (Jer. xliii. 6), and there spent the last years of his life in continuous, grievous conflicts. It cannot, however, be denied, that in the places especially where the author does not report directly from written sources of information, but inserts his own remarks, as in 2 Kings xvii. sq., his mode of thinking and of expression resembles that of Jeremiah, from which, however, nothing more can be concluded than that the author had been entrusted with the writings of this prophet—was, perhaps, his scholar. Bleek suggests, indeed, Baruch, who apparently had charge of collecting and editing the book of Jeremiah, and added to it the 52d chapter, which is consonant with 2 Kings xxv. But in that case, since Baruch went to Egypt with Jeremiah (see on the place), we must suppose that our history was composed there, which is, in the highest degree, improbable. It can scarcely be doubted, rather, that the author wrote in Babylon. If this be not, with some, susceptible of proof, owing to 1 Kings v. 4, where Palestine is described as lying on the other side of the Euphrates, it is, nevertheless, so much the more certain that the author did not write his work for the little band which fled to Egypt, and was there fallen into idolatry and discord, but for the kernel of the whole people then in exile (see below, § 5). While Jeremiah announces the ruin of his corrupted fellow-countrymen in Egypt (Jer. xlv. 11 sq.), our author concludes with the deliverance of Jehoiachin promising a better day, and gives, at the same time, details which could have been known only to a contemporary living in the exile; but not then to one who was in distant Egypt. There is an absence of all reference to Egyptian situations and relations, which assuredly would not have been the case had the author and his readers lived in Egypt. After all, we must give up the attempt to designate any particular person as the author. He must have stood high in reputation, anyhow, as is conclusive from the reception of his work into the Canon.

The author himself states the sources of his historical work, extending over a period of 453 years, viz.:

- 1) סֵפֶר דְּבָרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה 1 Kings xi. 41.
- 2) סֵפֶר דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יְהוּדָה 1 Kings xiv. 29; xv. 7, 22; xxii. 46; 2 Kings viii. 23; xii. 20; xiv. 18; xv. 6, 15, 36; xvi. 19; xx. 20; xxi. 17, 25; xxiii. 28; xxiv. 5.
- 3) סֵפֶר דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל 1 Kings xiv. 19; xv. 81; xvi. 5, 14, 20, 27; xxii. 39; 2 Kings i. 18; x. 34; xiii. 8, 12; xiv. 28; xv. 11, 15, 21, 26, 31.

Besides these three documentary sources, none else is cited in our books. And since the author refers only to the first, and not to the second or third, for the history of Solomon, and for the history of the kings of Judah only to the second, and for the history of the kings of Israel only to the third, it follows that each one of them was an independent, separate work. The reference is always made with the formula: "The rest of the acts of the king . . . and what he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah (of Israel)?" Thence it follows still farther, that the three documents contained more than the author has incorporated into his work, and were more complete; and that not only were they in existence at the time our books were composed, but they were in the hands, if not of all, of many, nevertheless, and were circulated generally. For if they were only submitted to his inspection, he could not have appealed to them and referred his readers to them. In many respects it is well to bear this in mind.

We obtain now a completer explanation of these documents themselves, through comparison with the citations in the Chronicles, which refers to its own sources with a similar formula. A whole series of paragraphs in our books is repeated word for word in the Chronicles. In this case there is no reference to one of our three documents, but to the writings of given individuals, as their source. So, first of all, with the history of Solomon, in which the following sections are consonant with each other, viz. : 2 Chron. vi. 1-40 with 1 Kings viii. 12-50; 2 Chron. vii. 7-22 with 1 Kings viii. 64-ix. 9; 2 Chron. viii. 2 to the 10th ver. and ver. 17 with 1 Kings ix. 17-23, and ver. 26; 2 Chron. ix. 1-28 with 1 Kings x. 1-28, etc. Here the Chronicles does not, like our author, refer to "the book of the history of Solomon," but to the "דְּבָרֵי of Nathan the prophet, and נְבוֹנָה of the [prophet] Ahijah the Shilonite, and the חֲזוֹנוֹת of Iddo the Seer" (2 Chron. ix. 29). Consequently the book of the "acts" of Solomon must either have consisted of these three prophetic writings, or at least must have contained essential portions of them. So also in respect of our second document, the book of the "acts" of the kings of Judah. The account of Rehoboam in 2 Chron. x. 1-19 is fully consonant with that in 1 Kings xii. 1-19, that also in 2 Chron. xi. 1-4 with that in 1 Kings xii. 20-24, that still farther in 2 Chron. xii. 18 sq. with that in 1 Kings xiv. 21 sq.; but the source is not, as in 1 Kings xiv. 29, called the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah, but "דְּבָרֵי of Shemaiah the prophet and of Iddo the Seer" (2 Chron. xii. 15). In the history of king Abijam, the very much abbreviated account in 1 Kings xv. 1-8 refers for what is more extended, to the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah. The Chronicles, on the other hand, which gives the more extended narrative, refers to the "מִדְּבָרֵי of the prophet Iddo" (2 Chron. xiii. 22). Such, too, is the case in the history of the kings Uziah and Manasseh. Our author, in both instances, appeals to the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah (2 Kings xv. 6; xxi. 17), (but) the chronicler, in the case of the former, to the "כְּתָב of Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz" (2 Chron. xxvi. 22), and in that of the latter to the "דְּבָרֵי חֲזוֹן" (2 Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19). From all these references, it follows plainly that the book of the kings of Judah consisted of the historical writings of different prophets or seers. Still more decisively and unanswerably do the following places confirm this. In the history of king Jehoshaphat, 1 Kings xxii. 2-35 coincides with 2 Chron. xviii. 2-34. As usual, our author here refers to the book of the kings of Judah; but the chronicler to the דְּבָרֵי of Jehu the son of Hanani, אִשְׁמֶר הַעֲלָה עַל-סֵפֶר מַלְכֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, i. e., which are inserted, received into, etc. (2 Chron. xx. 34). So also for the history of Hezekiah, our author appeals again simply to the book of the kings of Judah (2 Kings xx. 20); but the chronicler to the חֲזוֹן of Isaiah, the son of Amoz, עַל-סֵפֶר of the kings of Judah (2 Chron. xxxii. 32). Hence it happens that the purely historical sections in Isaiah, chapters xxxvi. to xxxix., and in Jeremiah, chapter lii., are reproduced in 2 Kings xviii. 30 to xx. 19, and in xxiv. 18 to xxv. 30, since they were certainly regarded as having come from the prophets. But our author, at least in the history of Hezekiah, refers, not to the book of the prophet Isaiah, but to the book of the kings of Judah (2 Kings xx. 20).—After all, if the three documents forming the foundation of our books were not the production of one author, but each of them was made up of the writings of different, and, in fact, prophetic authors, who had recorded the history of their own times, they were historical compilations (comp. Bleek, Einleitung in das Alte Testament, sec. 157 sq.; Bertheau, Die Bücher der Chron. Einl., § 8).

That prophets generally were the historians of the Israelitish people, is universally acknowledged (Knobel, Der Prophet. der Hebr., i. s. 58 sq.), and has its reason in the nature and destiny of this nation. "In order to recognize Jehovah in the directing of His people, and to explain and gather up all the particular facts in the connection of the theocratic guidance, the Spirit of God was the subjective condition. The history was not to be estimated as an aggregate of facts to be gathered by inquiry, and to be set forth with talent, but as a revelation of Jehovah in continuous acts, to understand which, properly, the Spirit of God seemed essential as Organ, just as much as for the comprehension of particular, immediate signs, facts (Geschichte), and oracles of Jehovah" (Winer, R.-W.-B., i. s. 412, Not. 2). The secular historian does not know Hebrew antiquity. The historical books of the Old Testament carry the collective name in the Canon נביאים, and are distinguished from the books strictly prophetic only in this, that the adjective ראשונים, prioris, is applied to them, and to the latter אחרונים, posteriores. But if in any age history would have been written by prophets, this most certainly would have happened when prophecy was in the period of its bloom, and this was in the time of the monarchy (comp. Bleek). The prophets did not write the history of Israel as private persons, but as servants of Jehovah, as "men of God." They are the historiographers of the kingdom of God, of the theocracy, and their narrative has for the people of God an official character, which imparts to their historical, not less than to their strictly prophetic, writings, authority and value in the judgment of the people. Were it not so, our author and the chronicler could not have appealed to them so constantly.

If the three documentary sources of our books consisted, as has been stated above, of several prophetic isolated pieces, the question then arises, when and by whom were the latter collected and combined into each of the three ספרים. In the lack of all specific accounts, this admits only of a conjectural reply. If it were the business of the prophets to write the history of Israel as God's people, and to exhibit in it the threads of divine guidance and revelation, it must, of necessity, have occurred to them that their narrative would not only be continued always, but, also, that the historical material already in hand would be preserved and secured for future generations. This may have been attended to in the smaller prophetic circles, especially in the so-called schools of the prophets. It is hence highly improbable that, as Keil pretends, "just before the fall of the kingdom of Judah," the isolated pieces which had been composed within the period of some centuries, which were scattered about here and there, should have been collected and made up into one whole; for the time immediately preceding the fall of the kingdom was a time of utter disorder, which was least of all fit for such an undertaking, apart from the consideration that the kingdom of Israel perished 180 years sooner, and its history was contained in a special work (Sammelwerk), viz., in the third documentary source. More can be said for the supposition that the compilation was not completed at once, in a given time, but gradually, and that the latter isolated pieces were added to the earlier, which would have been entirely natural and easily done. Since our author, as we have remarked above, carefully distinguishes the three documents in his citations, adduces each one separately, and never, in any one of the thirty-four places, confounds the second with the third, we are justified in the opinion that in his day, the three documentary sources were distinct works. In the time of the chronicler the second and third may have been formed into one whole, since he frequently refers to the book of the kings of Judah and Israel (2 Chron. xvi. 11; xxv. 26; xxviii. 26; xxxii. 32; xxvii. 7; xxxv. 27; xxxvi. 8); once, also, simply to the book of the Kings (2 Chron. xxiv. 27). We cannot deduce anything from this with entire certainty, however, for the Chronicles, although it often names prophetic individual works, does not, in this respect, observe the accuracy of our books, as, e. g., when in the case of Jehoshaphat and Manasseh, kings of Judah, it refers to the "book of the kings of Israel" (2 Chron. xx. 34; xxxiii. 18), where we must assume either an exchange or an omission of the words "and Judah."

Our author, in his use of the three documents, does not give a uniformly continuous extract from them. Sometimes, indeed, in accordance with the special design of his work (see below, § 5), he quotes entire sections literally, as is clear from sections in Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Chronicles, which are duplicates of each other. Sometimes he abbreviates them very much, as, e. g., is shown by a comparison of 1 Kings xv. 1-8 with 2 Chron. xiii. 1-23. If he have not prepared the historical material furnished him in an independent way, special remarks, insertions, and transitions may, nevertheless, have originated with him. But it is very hazardous to attempt to determine this accurately. Of one section only, viz., 2 Kings xvii. 7-23, can we claim with certainty that it is the author's own.

The sections upon the life and activity of the two great prophets, Elijah and Elisha, form no small portion of our books. In these we miss the usual appeal to one of the three documentary sources. Those which relate to Elijah bear certainly an unmistakably peculiar mark (comp., e. g., 1 Kings xvii. with the preceding chapter); but it does not at all follow that they belong to another than the third document, for this, like the other two, was a collection of isolated pieces of different authors. For since those two prophets were felt so powerfully in the history of the monarchy, and they exerted generally, upon the development of the Old Testament theocracy, an influence vastly greater than that of many a king, a narrative devoted to them would scarcely have been wanting in the compilation. Besides, we cannot conceive why our author, who usually adduces his sources so carefully, and refers to them even in the most insignificant portions of the history of the kings, should have been silent, in the most weighty history of the two prophets, as to whether he had derived the same from another source than that he was constantly making use of (comp. Bleek, a. a. O., s. 371). If then of any one portion of our books, of this it is certain and self-evident, that it is the production of a prophet. If prophets have written the history of the kings, how much more their own!

What has thus far been submitted respecting the documentary sources of our books, differs more or less from the view now current. Almost universally, by the cited ספרים are understood "public annual registers" or "annals," which were kept by some royal official, and deposited in the state archives. Besides these chief sources, the author (it is thought) has used others still, viz., prophetic writings. According to Delitzsch (in Drechsler, Der Proph. Jesaja, ii. 2, s. 253, and Commentar über den Proph. Jesaja, s. ix.), the historical composition was both annalistic and prophetic. "The aims of the two are distinct. The aim of the prophetic is to exhibit the inner divine connections of the outward event which the annalistic registers."

. . . . "With David began the official writing of annals, which resulted in those historical works out of which the authors of the book of the Kings and of the Chronicles have chiefly, if not immediately, drawn. We behold David as the supreme chief of the kingdom, exercising the highest authority on all sides, and we find several offices created wholly by him. Under these is included that of the סֹפֵר, i. e., as the Septuagint, frequently explaining, translates, ὑπομνηματογράφος, or (2 Sam. viii. 16) ἐπὶ τῶν ὑπομνημάτων (Hieron., genuinely Roman, a commentarius). . . . The סֹפֵר was required to keep the annals of the kingdom. His office is different from that of the סוֹפֵר or chancellor. It was the duty of the סוֹפֵר (chancellor) to issue the public documents, and of the סֹפֵר (recorder) to preserve them and to incorporate them into the proper connection of the history of the kingdom. Throughout the ancient East both offices existed generally. Reference to the annals begins at 1 Chron. xxvii. 24 with the סֹפֵר דָּבִיד of David, and is continued in שְׁלֹמֹה 1 Kings xi. 41. . . . If we regard the state annals as a completed work, it falls naturally into four portions. The first two treated of the history of the kingdom in its unity, the last two were annals of the kings of Judah and of Israel—the history of the dissevered kingdom. The original of the state archives was destroyed doubtless when the Chaldeans burned Jerusalem. But excerpted copies of it were preserved, and the histories of the reign of David and of Solomon, rich especially in annalistic particulars in the historical books in our possession, show that diligence was devoted conspicuously to the circulation of copies of the annals of these sovereigns, and that they probably appeared in separate tractates." Ewald also (Gesch. Israels, iii. s. 180, 338) maintains that amongst the highest royal functionaries named in 2 Sam. viii. 16, and 1 Kings iv. 3, the סֹפֵר was "he whose business it was to record all weighty incidents concerning the royal house and kingdom, and who, at the close of a reign, gave publicly a résumé of the history of it." He was also "court-historiographer." David created this "court-office," and it was never afterwards "given up." Besides the "public annals" prescribed by David, there were also in the kingdom of Israel "numerous and continuous prophetic-historical summaries," which were fused subsequently into one work, which again was "perhaps retouched and partially enlarged, yet much more sensibly abbreviated." Our author is the "latest elaborator," and "the fifth." We remark, against these very plausible assumption, the following:

(a) There is not a single passage of the Old Testament to show that the מְסִכֵּר was the writer of the court and kingdom records; that he drew up "protocolled" and "original" archives that were deposited among the "state archives." He never appears the least in the light of a historiographer or annalist when mentioned, or when his function is alluded to, but as a civil officer (comp. 2 Kings xviii. 18, 37; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8: comp. Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. s. 309). Thenius justly remarks, on 1 Kings iv. 3, the maskir "received his name from his office as μνηστῆρ, whose duty it was to bring to the king's remembrance the state affairs to be settled, and about which he was consulted." Had David "newly" founded the office of a court and state scribe, David's own history would have been the first to have been written by this official; but 1 Chron. xxix. 29 says of this very history, that it is "written" עַל־יְדֵי of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer." Neither could "the book of the acts of Solomon" (1 Kings xi. 41) have been written by the maskir, for the Chronicles, that has so many parallel sections with this history (see above), says that these acts were written in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the נְבוּאָה of Ahijah the Shilonite, and in the חֲזוֹן of Iddo the seer" (2 Chron. ix. 29). If the office of maskir existed at all in the kingdom of Judah under the kings of David's house, there is not the least trace of it in the separated kingdom of Israel. Here the dynasty was changed nine times, and each was completely cut off by the new ruler. Was then the history of each king written by the maskir of his successor (granting that there was such an official), and preserved among the state archives? Would, for instance, a Jehu, who so unmercifully destroyed the whole house of Ahab (2 Kings x. 11-14) have the history of that house written by a royal official, or have preserved the already-existing annals among the archives of his kingdom? Would a Jezebel have suffered the court-historian to have written yearly accounts of all her shameful acts? Lastly, the assertion that the סוֹפֵר had to prepare the public documents, and the מְסִכֵּר to preserve them, is a pure invention, without any support from a single passage.

(b) That there was a סֵפֶר הַדְּבָרִים הַגְּדוֹלִים of the Medeo-Persian kings (Esth. x. 2), even supposing that archives drawn up by a court-scribe were meant, can never prove that the office of a court-scribe was instituted by David 600 years before, and that this office continued without interruption from that time on in both kingdoms during their separation. But even suppose that there were such archives kept in Israel as well as in Judah, and deposited in the archive-building, yet it must be considered that our author wrote in the latter half of the Babylonian captivity, consequently at a time when the residences of Samaria and Jerusalem had been for a long while destroyed, and when also, as is admitted, the annals that had been preserved in the archive-building no longer existed. The supposition that the Assyrians and Chaldeans kept the archives of conquered dynasties in their capitals, and allowed those exiles who had acquired the favor of the conqueror to make use of them (Stähelin, Einkl. in's Alte Testament, s. 129), is as unfounded as it is arbitrary. At the destruction of Jerusalem, not only the royal palace, but also "all the great houses were burned" (2 Kings xxv. 9). And how could our author refer his readers to writings that either did not exist then, or at least were not within the range of all? But the assertion that excerpted extracts from the originals of the state archives had been preserved, rests on the presupposition that "the annals of each dynasty were made public when it became extinct,"—a presupposition which is again without the shadow of support, and which, though helping out a difficulty, is a purely arbitrary notion.

(c) Least of all can the contents of the book of Kings be adduced to prove that the "archives of the kingdom" were the principal authorities for it. The history of the reigns of each of the nineteen kings of Israel begins with the expression: "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord." The same expression occurs with regard to twelve of the twenty kings of Judah, and it expresses the general character of their rule. It is even told at length how deeply even the greatest and most glorious king, Solomon, fell. The "sin of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin," is represented as the source of all the evils of the kingdom; the conspiracies and murders of a Baasha, a Shallum, a Menahem; the wicked deeds of an Ahab, a Jezebel, and Manasseh, are told unsparingly; and, finally, the chronicler says of king Jehoiakim of Judah: "his abominations which he did, and that which was found in him, behold they are written in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah" (2 Chron. xxxvi. 8). How can we then suppose that all this and much more like it was protocolled by the "court-historiographer" with the knowledge and in the service of the king; that it was recorded in official archives of the kingdom, and then made public? No court-officials could have written books of such contents, none but free-souled prophets who were perfectly independent of the court. Ewald adduces, as unmistakable "remains" of the official archives (a. a. O., s. 182), the sections that refer to Solomon's officers, over his household, and his buildings. But we cannot perceive why these sections only should have been written by a court-official. A man who stood so near Solomon as the prophet Nathan, who, according to 2 Chron. ix. 29, wrote a history of that king, could and must know well what officials and how many he had, how he managed his kingdom and court, and how the temple and palace built by him were constructed. The accounts of the building of the tabernacle are much fuller than those of the temple, and yet are certainly not written by secular officials. There is, in fact, nothing in these books that a סֵפֶר may not have known and written; and it is indeed astonishing that, notwithstanding all this, people should still insist on the supposed "archives of the kingdom," and obstinately object to the prophetic origin of the three documentary sources.

(d) Because there is so much matter that could not possibly have been in the official annals, they have been driven to a wholly unfounded supposition, viz., that the author used other authorities also, which are not named. But this is disproved by the fact that the three authorities used were not official annals at all. The author refers to the sources whence he drew his facts about thirty times, and he refers to them even when he wrote of those kings that only reigned a short time; but he does not once quote any other work. Now, as the greater part of the contents of our books could not possibly have been taken from court-annals, it would be inexplicable that the author should never have named his other authorities. The conclusion that, because everything could not have been found in the archives, the author drew from other sources, is therefore false. We should be much more justified in the inverse conclusion, that because everything may have been contained in the historico-prophetical works of Samuel (and the author only quotes these), they alone, and not such as he never names, were his authorities.

Thenius has put forward a view regarding the sources of the books of the Kings (Comm. über die Bücher der Könige, Einleit. § 3) which differs from the view we have just discussed, and also from our own. He asserts that there are three "different component parts:" namely, the "properly historical," the "traditional," and these passages that were "really written by the elaborator." There were, he thinks, two different sources of the historical parts, and, in fact, "a larger work," which fell into two halves according to the two kingdoms, and "when the official yearly records of both kingdoms were used, may have been principally composed of what was written regarding the influence of the prophets that had so much weight in public affairs; written partly by the prophets themselves, and partly by others of their time, or recorded soon after." There was then an "extract from this larger work," which he supposes our author to have "found," and to which the "summary accounts contained in our books," and the invariable form of quotation, belong. The traditional portions are in part separate "descriptions drawn from tradition," and in part are peculiarly "a book composed by and for the prophets—a sort of prophet-mirror, the chief design of which was to impress on the pupils of the prophets the necessity for the most implicit obedience to the divine exhortations." Whilst all the sections that enter into detail are taken from the first-named "larger work," the narratives of the prophets, as the history of Elijah and Elisha, were taken from the "prophet-mirror." Thenius has tried to determine precisely to which of these different component parts the separate sections and verses of our books belong. Against this view we advance the following:

(a) The author's own statements refute the supposition that one larger work, forming a whole in itself, was his chief authority. The chronicler who wrote much later, refers indeed often to the "book of the acts of the kings of Judah and Israel;" but our author does not do so in one of the thirty-four passages where he quotes his authorities, but he always either names the book of the kings of Judah or that of the kings of Israel. Thus he had two separate, independent books before him, for the very nature of the case required that the history of the two separated kingdoms should be separately designated. But even granted that the three ספרים, so accurately distinguished from each other, were only one larger work, we should then have to ask when it was written, what author wrote it, and from what sources it was derived. As in 2 Kings xxiv. 5 only the book of the Kings of Judah is quoted, the former could not have been written till after the time of Jehoiakim; but against this there are the above-mentioned references made by the chronicler to the separate writings of earlier prophets and seers. The author of the "larger work" (whoever he might have been) is supposed to have used the "official yearly records of both kingdoms;" but the grand question is, whether there were any such records, and particularly in the kingdom of Israel. But if the three ספרים are taken to mean the larger work, the official yearly records cannot be meant at the same time; thus no reference can have been made to them.

(b) That our author should have used an extract from the larger work as well as the work itself, is an extraordinary assertion, which no one thought of making till now. He certainly needed no such extract, as, being in possession of the larger work, he could have made an extract himself, and could get nothing from any such, made by another, that was not to be found in the work itself. But if he had, as proved, two separate ספרים before him, the book of the kings of Judah and that of the kings of Israel, there must have been two extracts, one having been made in each kingdom, and this no one can or will accept. The attempt to determine accurately what belongs to the larger work, what was taken from the extract, and what was the author's own, is, to say the least, very adventurous, and rests alone upon a purely subjective judgment, i. e., is more or less arbitrary. Why, for instance, should not the brief summary statements made in 1 Kings xv. about some kings, be taken from the extended authority cited, which is also quoted in every case, but be borrowed from the supposed extract? Why should the sentence in 1 Kings xiv. 21, "in the city which the Lord did choose out of all the tribes of Israel to put His name there," not belong to the authority used, but have been inserted by the author himself? Why should the same be the case with chap. xv. 4, 5?

(c) The distinction between "truly historical" and "traditional" component parts, each of which is said to have its peculiar sources, is founded on the presupposition that every account in which a miracle, or the fulfilment of a prophecy, in fact anything out of the ordinary course of history, is recorded, cannot be historical, but is "legendary." But those narratives are so closely connected with such as are admitted to be "truly historical," that they can only be forcibly separated from the context and laid to a separate "traditional" documentary source. Why, for instance, should the sections 1 Kings x. 1-13 and xi. 1-13 not be historical, but the first be derived from a written and the latter from oral tradition? Why should 1 Kings xx. 1-34 belong to the supposed larger historical work, and vers. 35 to 43, on the contrary, to the so-called prophet-mirror; in the same way 2 Kings iii. 4-27 to the former, and 2 Kings vi. 24-vii. 20 to the latter? Why should everything in the great section 2 Kings xviii. 13-xx. 19 (Isai. xxxvi. 39) be historical, and only the midway verses of 2 Kings xix. 35-37 (Isai. xxxvii. 36-38) have been taken from another and a traditional source?

(d) There is nowhere the slightest trace in the Bible of a particular book that was used as "a prophet-mirror." If the author cites one of his three authorities in writing of kings of whom there was but little to say (1 Kings xvi. 15; 2 Kings xv. 18), he would certainly not have omitted to give his authority, if he had one, in the important and deeply-interesting history of the great prophets. Apart from this, too, the supposition of such "a book, compiled for pupils of the prophets," is contrary to the sense and spirit of Hebrew antiquity. The old prophets felt themselves indeed called on to record the history of Jehovah's people; but it never entered their minds to compile a book of instruction or examples for their pupils, in order to lead them to "the most implicit obedience."* Modern times, indeed, require instruction for the performance of the spiritual office, &c.; but antiquity had no such books. If the three documentary sources were, as we have proved, collections made from writings that were contemporary with or made soon after the נביאים who lived during the events, all the sections that are said to belong to the supposed prophet-mirror might easily have been drawn from them.

UNITY AND INDEPENDENCE.

If any book of the Old Testament forms a complete and independent whole, the books of Kings, which afterwards and erroneously were divided into two books, are such, notwithstanding their character as compilations. This is apparent in their beginning and conclusion, which are the limits of a certain period of the Old Testament history. They begin with the reign of the most glorious king, for whom the building of the temple was reserved, and they end with the ruin of the whole kingdom, and the destruction of that temple. It is plain from 1 Kings vi. 1 that a former period of the history of Israel terminates with the building of the temple, and a new one begins: "In the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, he began to build the house of the Lord." Why a new period began with the building of the temple by Solomon, is shown in the following passages: 2 Sam. vii. 8-16; 1 Kings v. 3, 4; 1 Chron. xvii. 7-12; xxii. 8-11. The period from the exodus from Egypt to Solomon was the time of wandering (of the "Tabernacle"), of war, and of disturbance; even David was the "man of war." With Solomon, the "man of quiet and peace," the period of full and quiet possession of the promised land, and the period marked by Jehovah's "house," began. With Solomon, also, the "house" of David, i. e., David's dynasty, to whom the kingdom was promised forever, first really began (2 Sam vii. 13; 1 Chron. xvii. 14). This period continues then till the ruin of David's house, which is also the ruin of Jehovah's house, and with this our books conclude (2 Kings xxv).

The unity and independence of these books is shown, not only in their style, but in their contents also. Even De Wette confesses (Einl., s. 289): "a certain unity is manifest in matter, style, and manner of exposition, from beginning to end;" and Thenius says (a. a. O., s. 1): "There are remarks scattered up and down the whole that are all written in one spirit, and are found in no other historical book, as in the books of the Kings (certainly not in the books of Samuel)." A peculiar style and method of historical writings prevails, and such as we find nowhere else. The time of the beginning of each reign and its duration are first stated in the history of each king, then his general character is given, next an account, more or less full, of his acts, after that the date of his death and burial, and finally mention is made of the authorities used. Some forms of expression are indeed employed (in the extracts) which do not belong to the time of their composition, but to a later period (Stähelin, Krit. Untersuch., s. 150 sq.); but they only prove "that the author not only often quoted his authorities, but used them with some freedom" (Thenius).

The arbitrary designation of the books of Samuel as the first and second books of the Kings by the Sept. and the Vulgate (see § 1) may have occasioned the assertion of recent critics, like Eichhorn and Jahn, that both works are by the same author, and properly belong together. Ewald goes still farther; according to him, the books of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, and Kings, are, in their present form, one connected whole, by one author, whom he asserts was the last of five consecutive elaborators on the existing authorities. But all that distinguishes our books from the other historical ones of the Old Testament so clearly, applies to the books of Samuel also. Here all the chronological data that are so carefully repeated with each king, in our books, are completely wanting, as are also the usual expressions descriptive of character and mission. The narrative is much more minute, simply strung together without always preserving chronological order; as, for instance, the entire section 2 Sam. xxi.-xxiv, which is a sequel to David's history. The first two chapters of our books have been especially adduced, as an unmistakable continuation of 2 Sam. xx. 26, and showing the same author's style of narration. These chapters, however, are inseparably and closely connected with the three following; they form the indispensable introduction to Solomon's accession, and are, on the other hand, separated from 2 Sam. xx. 26 by the supplement in 2 Sam. xxi.-xxiv. But the similarity of the style is easily explained by the consideration that they were all derived from a common source (1 Chron. xxix. 29). The similarity of some narratives and modes of expression has also been alleged; but it is difficult to perceive what likeness Ewald can find between Abiathar's banishment (1 Kings ii. 26) and the rejection of Eli's house (1 Sam. ii. 35); between the elevation of Jehu to be king (2 Kings ix. 29) and that of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 29). It is just so with 1 Kings iv. 1-8, and 2 Sam. viii. 15 to 18; there the chief officers of Solomon are given, and here those of David also; but neither the offices themselves, their order, nor the persons, are the same. Neither do the following passages: 1 Kings ii. 11 comp. with 2 Sam. v. 5, and 1 Kings ii. 4; v. 17 to 19; viii. 18, 25 comp. with 2 Sam. vii. 12-16, prove the identity of the author; they only show, what is already clear, that our author knew the books of Samuel, which were written before his time. Least of all should the phraseology in 1 Sam. xxv. 22 and 1 Kings xiv. 16; xvi. 11; xxi. 21; 2 Kings ix. 8 be adduced as proof that the author is the same. It is very natural "that an Israelite who was no doubt intimately acquainted with the documents of his people, should often involuntarily use expressions from memory" (Thenius).

CREDIBILITY.

The question of the credibility of these books concerns not so much themselves as the authorities from which they were compiled. But as these were, as § 2 shows, composed by prophets who were contemporaries of the events described, they are at least as much to be relied on as the pretended annals written by court-historiographers, and therefore accredited. The constant citation of the original documents presupposes that they were accounted regular historical authorities, not only by the author himself, but also by his readers, and the whole people; in fact, by reference to them he guards against every suspicion of relating fiction or doubtful facts. That he carefully and conscientiously chose his matter, is shown especially by all those sections which are parallel with others in Isaiah, Jeremiah, or the Chronicles, though not borrowed from them, but taken from the common source now no longer extant. The accuracy of the dates, which is the basis of historical writing, is evidence of the credibility of the narrative. But besides this there are many precise, genealogical, geographical, and statistical remarks, as well as numerous characteristic traits of individuals, which could not be fictitious, and bear the unmistakable impress of truth. An historical book would scarcely have been placed in the Canon and among the נביאים, if it had not been universally esteemed as the true history after the original documents were lost.

While Eichhorn (Eintl. § 486) recognized the "perfect credibility" of our books, recent critics have only partially and conditionally admitted it. They assert that these books contain "myths" as well as authentic information (De Wette); stories, therefore, which are only the clothing of religious ideas and doctrines, and having no real historical foundation: or else they say that whole sections, especially those relating to the lives and deeds of the prophets, have a "fabulous character" (Thenius); that they are not without historical foundation and substance indeed, but yet are more or less colored and embellished. No books, however, are more free than these, from myths. They do not deal with a prehistoric time, but with a comparatively late historical period, and their design is to give history, and nothing but history, not religious ideas or doctrines in the dress of fictitious history. The history they relate is indeed, in its nature as a part of the history of God's people, of a religious kind, but is not on that account fiction, but is history in the truest and fullest sense of the word. The idea of mythical ingredients has very rightly been abandoned of late, but a fabulous character has been the more insisted on. Proceeding from negative-dogmatic presuppositions, they endeavor to prove, as already remarked above, § 2, that every miracle and every prophecy belongs to the province of fable. But miracles form (comp. for instance 1 Kings xviii.) the very central point of this history, which is indisputably true in all other respects, and admitted to be such; they must therefore fall or stand along with it. In fact, what is stated to be fabulous in these books is so interwoven with what is admitted as historical, that they can only be arbitrarily separated; and every attempt to decide where history ceases and fable begins, appears arbitrary and vain. To set forth the miraculous in the history of the old covenant as unhistorical, is to deny that there was a divine revelation in it; it is rooted in the election of Israel, from among all people of the earth, to be a peculiar people (Ex. xix. 8-6), i. e., the guardians of the knowledge of the one God and His revelations. This election is, as Martensen aptly terms it (Dogmatic, s. 363), the "fundamental miracle which no criticism can explain away," because it is a world-historical fact. The prophets stood alone in Israel, as Israel did among all nations of the earth; all their great and extraordinary deeds and announcements were inseparably connected with their peculiar vocation. They themselves were a greater miracle than all the miracles they performed, as Christ was himself the greatest miracle, and all his wonderful deeds were rooted in the miracle of His own person and mission. Neither were the deeds of the prophets mere wonderful sights caused by divine power, but "signs" (אֵימֹת), that pointed to higher things, and real evidences of the אֱלֹהִים of Jehovah, working through the prophets. That which has been adduced against passages in our books, which do not harmonize with, or which are in direct contradiction with, each other, and tell against its complete credibility, does not amount to much. We refer, also, in this respect, to the commentary upon the passages in question.

OBJECT AND CHARACTER.

As the book was written during the second half of the captivity, and the prophetic writer himself was living among the exiles (§ 1), it is plain that the work must bear the stamp of such extraordinary times and especially refer to them. It was not the author's object to write a historical work that should enrich the Hebrew literature; but he had rather a peculiar object in view, and one that bore upon the times he lived in. No time was so fitting as that of the captivity, to hold before the captive and deeply-humbled people the mirror of their history from the most prosperous period of the kingdom under Solomon to its fall. Such a history would necessarily show them the ways by which their God led them, as well as their great guilt and their fall; and also convince them that the only way to deliverance and freedom, was that sincere penitence and conversion to the Lord their God, and firm adherence to the broken covenant and the promises therewith connected. It was the object of the author to awaken and strengthen this conviction. Now the three prophetic-historical collections that he used, were accessible also to others, otherwise he could not have referred his readers to them so constantly. But it seems, from the formula with which he does so, that they were very minute and voluminous, which must have made their general circulation in the time of the captivity very difficult, or almost impossible. Hence the author undertook to make extracts from them, choosing those events that served the object he had in view. It is very clear that such an historical work was much needed at that particular time.

The style of the history exactly corresponds with the design. The work is anything but a string of historical facts without any plan; on the contrary, the author proceeds from a fixed principle, to which he adheres to the end, through the choice as well as arrangement of the historical matter, and so firmly, that his work bears the character of a pragmatic historical composition more than any other historical book of Scripture. This principle is the fundamental idea of the entire old covenant—the election of Israel from all nations to be a peculiar people

(Ex. xix. 3-6); the fundamental law of this election, i. e., the covenant, declares: "I am the Lord thy God which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt (i. e., made thee an independent people). Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, nor any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments" (Ex. xx. 2-6). This supreme commandment of the covenant lies at the root of the author's historical view and representation. According as the historical facts are directly or indirectly connected with it, he relates them more or less in detail; what is utterly disconnected with it he passes over entirely. To him idolatry and image-worship are the sin of all sins, because they destroyed what alone made Israel a peculiar and independent people, chosen from among all nations, and also destroyed its world-historical destiny. All evil, even the ruin of the entire kingdom, was the natural consequence of contempt and transgression of that chief and fundamental law, as, inversely, all good and every blessing followed adherence to the same. The author himself alludes to this fundamental idea in the long reflections which he makes after the ruin of the kingdom, 2 Kings xvii. 7 sq., and it appears here and there throughout the whole work. David is a pattern for all the kings of God's people, not because he was morally free from blame, but because he held to this fundamental law in every situation, and never departed from it one iota; the promise was therefore given him: "Thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee; thy throne shall be established forever" (2 Sam. vii. 16; comp. 1 Kings viii. 25; ix. 5; xi. 36, 39; 2 Kings viii. 19). This is the reason also that he is so often alluded to in the words: "as his father David," or "he walked in the ways of his father David" (1 Kings iii. 3, 14; ix. 4; xi. 4, 6, 33, 38; xiv. 8; xv. 5, 11; 2 Kings xiv. 8; xvi. 2; xviii. 3; xxii. 2), or: "for David thy father's sake" (1 Kings xi. 12, 13, 32, 34; xv. 3; 2 Kings viii. 19; xix. 34; xx. 6). David, when dying, exhorts his successor with the most impressive words, above all, to hold fast to the fundamental law (1 Kings ii. 3 sq.). But when Solomon permitted idolatrous worship in the latter part of his reign, the kingdom was rent from him, "because he had not kept Jehovah's covenant" (1 Kings xi. 9-13). Disregard of the covenant was the cause of the partition of the kingdom, and, in so far, the germ of its destruction. From the time of the partition, the account of every single king of Judah and of Israel begins with the general characteristic: "He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord" (1 Kings xv. 11; xxii. 43; 2 Kings xii. 8; xiv. 8; xv. 3, 34; xviii. 3; xxii. 2), or: "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord" (1 Kings xv. 26, 34; xvi. 19, 25, 30; xxii. 53; 2 Kings iii. 2; viii. 18, 27; xiii. 2, 11; xiv. 24; xv. 9, 18, 24, 28; xvi. 2; xvii. 2; xxi. 2, 20; xxiii. 32, 37; xxiv. 9, 19). This does not say whether a king lived morally and virtuously, but whether he kept the covenant and first fundamental commandment faithfully; that was the chief thing, and determined the character of his whole reign. The author applies this unfailing test to the conduct of all the kings, as well as of the whole people (1 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Kings xvii. 7, 19). But there is something more. That the kingdom should always remember its duty, not to swerve to the right or left from the fundamental law (Deut. xvii. 19, 20), the prophetic institution came into being, the mission of which was to watch over the keeping of the covenant, to warn against all manner of apostasy, and whenever it appeared, to exhort, to threaten, and promise. The history of the activity of the prophets is therefore intimately connected with that of the kings, and is, in fact, a part which serves to complete the same. The author could not then avoid bringing the history of the most influential prophets into his history of the kings; had he not done so he would have been guilty of a great omission. And when he, though himself of the tribe of Judah, principally describes, after the captivity, the history of the kingdom of Israel, the reason is no doubt this: that the kingdom, from the beginning of its existence, had completely broken the chief covenant-commandment, and persisted in so doing; and therefore that the contest for it and for theocracy generally was carried on by the prophets principally, until the entire people of the ten tribes was undone forever.

After all, it remains unquestionably certain that these books bear throughout a specific Israelitish-religious character, or, as it is generally termed, a theocratic character. This does not imply that this is owing only to the author's views and style; it lies rather in the nature of the history itself. Oehler very truly says (in Herzog's Real-Enc. xvii. s. 247): "The idea of the people of God is, in its very nature, supernatural, this view alone gives the key to the Israelitish history which, if not regarded in the light of divine election and guidance, as it demands, remains a riddle, a 'dark riddle' (comp. what Rosenkranz says in Hegel's Life, s. 49, about the latter's view of the Jewish history: 'it revolted him, and yet fascinated him, tormenting him all his life like a dark enigma')." Later historical writers have (many of them) made it their business to take the so-called purely historical point of view in the history of the kings of Israel: that is, to ignore all special providence in it, or rather to regard it as the religious coloring of the author's mind, and to set it forth, like that of every other ancient nation, in a purely secular light. They trace the fundamental idea of divine election sometimes to egoism, sometimes to the accidentally monotheistic character of the writer, or to the religious genius of the Semitic race, and reduce all special divine influence to priest-rule and priest-craft. What the history represents as great and well-pleasing to God, is insignificant and blameworthy, and what it views as sinful and perverse, is delineated as humanly great and noble: in fact, this history is looked at through the glass of modern political ideas. Their writings take no account whatsoever of a "divine economy," but rather turn it more or less into a thorough caricature. We shall give some examples of this in explanations of particular passages and sections. There are no historical sources regarding the Israelitish monarchy except those of the Bible; we cannot, therefore, compare the facts narrated, with the statements of any other author, who might take a different point of view from our author. To correct the only extant historical source, and to change the facts therein given into totally different ones, according to private judgment and pleasure, is not to write but to make history. He who cannot accept the principle on which this history of the kings is written, or rejects it beforehand as erroneous, can no more write such a history than the most learned Chinaman could write that of Germany; he should, consequently, leave it alone.

REVIEW OF CONTENTS.

The history of the Israelitish monarchy, from its highest splendor on to its destruction, as it forms the contents of our books, has three periods. The first embraces the time of the undivided kingdom under Solomon; the second, which is distributed into three epochs, embraces the time of the divided kingdom down to the fall of the kingdom of Israel; the third embraces the time of the kingdom of Judah down to the Babylonish captivity.

FIRST PERIOD.

THE KINGDOM UNDER SOLOMON.

First Section.—Solomon's elevation to the throne.

- A. Adonijah's effort to obtain possession of the kingdom: Solomon's ascension to the throne (I, i).
- B. David's last words and death (I, ii. 1–12).
- C. Solomon's dealings with his opponents (I, ii. 13–46).

Second Section.—The beginning of Solomon's reign.

- A. His marriage; solemn sacrifice and vision; first judicial decision (I, iii. 1–28).
- B. His officers and court-establishment; his high spiritual culture, I, iv. 1–34).

Third Section.—Solomon's buildings.

- A. Solomon's negotiations with Hiram about the building of the temple (I, vi. 15–32).
- B. The building of the temple (I, vi).

- C. The building of the palace, and the manufacture of the vessels, &c., of the temple (I, vii.).
- D. The dedication of the temple (I, viii.).
- E. Sundry statements referring to Solomon's buildings and ships (I, ix.).

Fourth Section.—Solomon's glory and magnificence.

- A. The visit of the queen of Sheba (I, x. 1-13).
- B. The wealth, splendor, and power of Solomon's kingdom (I, x. 14-29).

Fifth Section.—Solomon's fall and end.

- A. Unfaithfulness towards Jehovah and its punishment (I, xi. 1-13).
- B. Solomon's adversaries and his death (I, xi. 14-43).

SECOND PERIOD.

THE KINGDOM DIVIDED INTO JUDAH AND ISRAEL.

FIRST EPOCH.

Of the division of the kingdom down to the reign of Ahab.

First Section.—The disruption of the kingdom.

- A. The renunciation of the house of David by the ten tribes (I, xii. 1-24).
- B. The founding of the kingdom of Israel by Jeroboam (I, xii. 25-33).

Second Section.—Jeroboam's reign in Israel.

- A. Warning to Jeroboam by a prophet, and the disobedience and end of the latter (I, xiii. 1-32).
- B. The prophecy of Ahijah against the house and kingdom of Jeroboam; the death of the latter (I, xiv. 1-20).

Third Section.—The kingdom in Judah under Rehoboam, Abijam, and Asa.

- A. Rehoboam's reign (I, xiv. 21-31).
- B. Abijam's and Asa's reign (I, xv. 1-24).

Fourth Section.—The kingdom in Israel under Nadab and Ahab.

- A. Nadab's and Baasha's reign (I, xv. 25 to xvi. 7).
- B. Ela's, Zimri's, and Ahab's reign (I, xvi. 8-24).

SECOND EPOCH.

From Ahab to Jehu.

First Section.—The prophet Elijah during Ahab's reign.

- A. Elijah before Ahab at the brook Cherith and at Zarephath (I, xvii.).
- B. Elijah upon Mount Carmel (I, xviii.).
- C. Elijah in the wilderness and upon Horeb; his successor (I, xix.).

Second Section.—The acts of Ahab.

- A. Ahab's victory over the Syrians (I, xx.).
- B. Ahab's procedure against Naboth (I, xxi.).
- C. Ahab's expedition, undertaken along with Jehoshaphat, against the Syrians, and his death (I, xxi. 1-40).

Third Section.—The kingdom under Jehoshaphat in Judah, and under Ahaziah and Joram in Israel.

- A. Jehoshaphat's and Ahaziah's reign (I, xxii. 41-II. 1).
- B. Elijah's departure and Elisha's first appearance (II, ii.).
- C. Joram's reign and his expedition against the Moabites (II, iii.).

Fourth Section.—Elisha's prophetic acts.

- A. Elisha with the widow in debt, with the Shunammite, and with the "sons of the prophets" during the dearth (II, iv.).

B. The healing of Naaman, Gehazi's punishment, and the recovery of a lost axe (II, v.-vi. 7).

C. Elisha during the Syrian invasion, and at the siege of Samaria (II, vi. 8-vii.).

D. Elisha's authority with the king, and his sojourn in Damascus (II, viii. 1-15).

Fifth Section.—The kingdom under Jehoram and Ahaziah in Judah, and Jehu's elevation to be king of Israel.

A. Jehoram's and Ahaziah's reign in Judah (II, viii. 16-29).

B. Jehu's elevation to be king in Israel (II, ix.).

THIRD EPOCH.

From Jehu to the destruction of the kingdom of Israel.

First Section.—The kingdom under Jehu in Israel, and under Athaliah and Jehoash in Judah.

A. Jehu's reign (II, x.).

B. The reign of queen Athaliah and its overthrow (II, xi.).

C. The reign of Jehoash (II, xii.).

Second Section.—The kingdom under Jehoahaz, Jehoash, and Jeroboam II. in Israel, and under Amaziah in Judah.

A. The reign of the kings Jehoahaz and Joash (II, xiii.).

B. The reign of Amaziah in Judah, and of Jeroboam II. in Israel (II, xiv.).

Third Section.—The kingdom under Azariah (Uzziah) and Jotham in Judah, and under Zachariah and Hosea in Israel.

A. The reign of the kings Azariah and Jotham in Judah, and of the kings Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, and Pekah in Israel (II, xv.).

B. The reign of Ahaz in Judah (II, xvi.).

C. The fall of the kingdom Israel under Hosea (II, xvii.).

THIRD PERIOD.

THE KINGDOM IN JUDAH AFTER THE DESTRUCTION OF THE KINGDOM ISRAEL.

First Section.—The kingdom under Hezekiah.

A. Hezekiah's reign: oppression by Sennacherib and deliverance from it (II, xviii., xix.).

B. Hezekiah's sickness and recovery: his reception of the Babylonish embassy, and his end (II, xx.).

Second Section.—The kingdom under Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah.

A. The reign of Manasseh and of Amon (II, xxi.).

B. The reign of Josiah, the discovery of the book of the law, and restoration of the prescribed worship of God (II, xxii. 23-30).

Third Section.

A. The reign of the kings Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (II., xxiii. 81-xxv. 7).

B. The fall of the kingdom of Judah: release of Jehoiachin from prison (II., xxv. 8-30).

LITERATURE.

Passing over commentaries and expositions extending over the entire Old Testament (for a list, see De Wette, Introduction to the O. Test. and the Biblewerk), we confine ourselves to notices of those works which concern themselves especially with our books. On the whole, the literature in question is not so extensive as that of many other and less weighty books, as e. g., The Song of Solomon. For a number of centuries no work could be adduced which was specially devoted to our books.

I. Exegetical treatises. Ephraem Syr. († 378): Explanatio in I. et II. regnorum (Opp. omn. Romæ 1737. Tom. I.).—Theodoret† († 457): Quæstiones in libros III. et IV. regnorum (Opp. omn. ed. Noesselt. Halæ 1709. Tom. I.).—J. Bugenhagen: annotationes in libr. Reg. Basil. 1525.—Seb. Leonhard: ἱπομνήματα in libr. Reg. Erfurd 1606.—Piscator: Comment. in duos libr. Regum. Herborn 1611.—Seb. Schmidt: in libr. Regum annotationes. Argentor 1697.—A. condensed collection of expositions up to the close of the seventeenth century may be found in Poole's († 1679) Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque scripturæ sacræ interpretum et commentatorum. Francof. ad. M. 1694.—K. Fr. Keil: Commentar über die Bücher der Könige. Moskau 1846.—O. Thenius: Die Bücher der Könige. Leipzig 1849 (9. Lieferung des Kurzgefassten Exeget. Handbuchs zum A. T.).—K. Fr. Keil: Biblischer Commentar über die prophetischen Geschichtsbücher des A. T. Dritter Band; die Bücher der Könige. Leipzig 1864.—Einleitung in die Bücher der Könige. Leipzig, Halle 1861 (translation with remarks thrown in by Adolf v. Schlösser).

II. Historical treatises. J. J. Hess: Geschichte David's und Salomo's, und: Geschichte der Könige Juda's und Israel's nach der Trennung des Reichs. 2 Bünde, Zürich 1787.—Niemeyer: Charakteristik der Bibel, 4 ter u. 5 ter Theil, 5 Aufl. Halle 1795.—Leo: Vorlesungen über die jüdische Geschichte 1825 (withdrawn by the author.).—Bertheau: Zur Geschichte der Israeliten, Göttingen 1842.—Menzel: Staats- und Religionsgeschichte der Königreiche Israel und Juda. Berlin 1853.—Ewald: Geschichte David's und der Königherrschaft in Israel. 2 Ausg., Göttingen (the third volume of the history of the people Israel to the time of Christ).—Eisenlohr: Das Volk Israel unter der Herrschaft der Könige. 2 Theil., Leipzig 1856.—Schlier: Die Könige in Israel. Ein Handbüchlein zur heiligen Geschichte, Stuttgart 1859.—M. Duncker: Geschichte des Alterthums. Erster Band. 2 Aufl., Berlin 1855.—Hasse: Geschichte des Alten Bundes, Leipzig 1863.—Weber: Das Volk Israel in der alttestamentlichen Zeit, Leipzig 1867.—To these must be added special articles in Winer: Biblisches Realwörterbuch, 3 Aufl., Leipzig 1847, and in Herzog: Real-Encyclopædie, Gotha 1854–1864. Comp. particularly the article in vol. xvii. pp. 245–305: "the people of God," by Oehler.

III. Homiletic treatises. Only upon the history of the prophets Elijah and Elisha are there sermons and devotional dissertations, which are cited below in the appropriate place. Notwithstanding the rich material of our books in ancient as well as in recent times, there are fewer homiletical treatises, whether of the whole or only of particular sections, than upon any other books of the Bible. We must rest content here with referring to the works which embrace the entire Bible, and have interpreted it more or less practically and devotionally. Cramer: Summarien und biblische Auslegung, 1627, 2 Aufl., Wolfenbüttel 1681, Fol.—L. Osian-der: Deutsche Bibel Luthers mit einer kurzen, jedoch gründlichen Erklärung, herausgegeben von D. Förster, Stuttgart 1600, Fol.—Württembergische Summarien und Auslegungen der ganzen Heil. Schrift. Das Alte Testament, zuerst bearbeitet von J. K. Zeller, Stuttgart 1677; afterwards "diligently revised and enriched with many useful remarks by the theological faculty of the University of Tübingen, Leipzig 1709. 4. (The new "Summarien oder Gründliche Auslegung der Schriften des A. T. ii. Band," by Finkh, Stuttgart 1801–4, are far inferior to the older).—Berlenburger Bibel, anderer Theil, 1728, Fol.—A. Kyburz: Historien-Bet- und Bilderbibel, 2ter Theil, Augsburg 1739. 8.—Joachim Lange: Biblich Historisches Licht und Recht, d. i. richtige und erbauliche Erklärung der sämtlichen historischen Bücher des A. T., Halle u. Leipzig 1734, Fol.—Chr. M. Pfaff: Biblia, b. i. die ganze Heilige Schrift mit Summarien und Anmerk., Tübing. Fol. (8 Ausg. Speyer 1767).—Starke: Synopsis Bibliothecæ exeget. in V. T., zweiter Theil, andere verbesserte Auflage, Leipzig 1745. 4.—G. F. Seiler: Des grössern bibl. Erbauungsbuches Alten Testaments dritter Theil, Erlangen 1791. 4.—Richter: Erklärte Hausbibel. Altes Testament, zweiter Band, Barmen 1835. 8.—Lisco: Das Alte Testament mit Erklärungen u. s. w. Erster Band, die historischen Bücher, Berlin 1844. 8.—O. Von Gerlach: Das Alte Testament mit Einleitungen und erklärenden Anmerkungen, zweiter Band, Berlin 1846. 8 (5 Aufl. 1867).—(Calwer) Handbuch der Bibelerklärung für Schule und Haus. Erster Band, das Alte Testament enthaltend, Calw und Stuttgart 1849. 8.

[The remarks of our author respecting the small number of commentaries and treatises upon the Books of the Kings are true, conspicuously of English theological literature. What we have is of the most meagre description. In fact, there is nothing to be named; we have no special exposition of our books in the English language. Our clergy and laity, who have depended upon English authors, have been compelled to use Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby, or Thomas Scott, or D'Oyly and Mant, or Adam Clarke, and the rest. These works, as is well known, are utterly deficient in critical acumen, and the amount of information they convey is insignificant. Whatsoever may be the merits or demerits of this work, it will certainly meet a need that has been long felt.

The reader can moreover consult Bp. Horsley's "Notes on the Kings," and for the historical review, Dean Stanley's History of the Jewish Church, and Prof. F. W. Newman's Hebrew Monarchy. Dean Prideaux's work, embracing the period from the declension of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah to the time of our Lord, notwithstanding its faulty construction, remains an abiding monument of genuine erudition.

In Bishop Hall's "Contemplations" the reader will find much that is valuable, and of great spiritual practical insight. It is rich in homiletical suggestions, and can be read with profit in connection with the sacred text. Many sermons, too, have been published, which illustrate particular sections of the Books of the Kings, as, e. g., on the temple (chap. vi.), and its consecration (chap. viii.), and on the disobedient prophet (chap. xiii.), and on Elijah (chap. xvii. sq.), &c., some of which will be referred to under the texts in their order.

For particular items: Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (Boston, 1860-1863, enlarged by Hackett and Abbott, in 4 vols. 1870), or an abridgment by Mr. S. Barnum, may be used (see especially art. "Temple," by Ferguson). For the temple in respect of comparative architecture, &c., see K. O. Müller, Archæology of Ancient Art, &c., translated by John Leitch. London, A. Fullarton & Co., 1847. Also, Solomon's Temple, &c., by T. O. Paine, a minister of the New-Jerusalem Church. Boston, 1861.—E. H.]

FIRST PERIOD, (1015 TO 975 B. C.)

(CHAPTERS I—II.)

FIRST SECTION.

SOLOMON'S ACCESSION TO THE THRONE.

CHAP. I, II.

A.—Adonijah's attempt to seize the kingdom for himself; Solomon's elevation to the throne.

CHAP. I. 1—53.

- 1 Now king David was old and stricken in years;¹ and they covered him 2 with clothes,² but he gat no heat. Wherefore his servants said unto him, Let there be sought for my lord the king a young virgin [virgin damsel];³ and let her stand before the king, and let her cherish him, and let her lie in thy⁴ bosom, 3 that my⁵ lord the king may get heat. So they sought for a fair damsel throughout all the coasts of Israel, and found Abishag a [the⁶] Shunammite, and brought 4 her to the king. And the damsel was very fair, and cherished the king, and ministered to him: but the king knew her not.
- 5 Then Adonijah the son of Haggith exalted himself, saying, I will be king:
and he prepared him chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him.
6 And his father had not displeased him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so? and he also was a very goodly man; and his mother bare him after 7 Absalom. And he conferred with Joab the son of Zeruiah, and with Abiathar 8 the priest: and they following Adonijah helped him. But Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and Nathan the prophet, and Shimei, and Rei, and 9 the mighty men which belonged to David, were not with Adonijah. And Adonijah slew sheep and oxen and fat cattle by the stone of Zoheleth, which is by En-rogel [the well of Rogel], and called all his brethren the king's sons, and all 10 the men of Judah the king's servants: but Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, and the mighty men, and Solomon his brother, he called not.
- 11 Wherefore Nathan spake unto Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon, saying, Hast thou not heard that Adonijah the son of Haggith doth reign, and David 12 our lord knoweth it not? Now therefore come, let me, I pray thee, give thee counsel, that thou mayest save thine own life, and the life of thy son Solomon.

*[I am indebted to my friend, Frederic Gardiner, D. D., Professor in the Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Conn., for the accompanying textual revision and original grammatical notes.—E. H.]

13 Go and get thee in unto king David, and say unto him, Didst not thou, my lord, O king, swear unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly [That'] Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? why then doth 14 Adonijah reign? *Behold, while thou yet talkest there with the king, I also will come in after thee, and confirm * thy words.

15 And Bath-sheba went in unto the king into the chamber: and the king was 16 very old; and Abishag the Shunammite ministered unto the king. And Bath-sheba bowed, and did obeisance unto the king. And the king said, What 17 wouldest thou? And she said unto him, My lord, thou swarest by the Lord [Jehovah] thy God unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall 18 reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne. And now, behold, Adonijah 19 reigneth; and now [thou ¹⁶], my lord the king, thou knowest it not: And he hath slain oxen and fat cattle and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the sons of 20 the king, and Abiathar the priest, and Joab the captain of the host: but Solomon thy servant hath he not called. And thou, ¹⁷ my lord, O king, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee, that thou shouldest tell them who shall sit on the throne of my 21 lord the king after him. Otherwise [But] it shall come to pass, when my lord the king shall sleep with his fathers, that I and my son Solomon shall be counted ¹⁸
22 offenders. And, lo, while she yet talked with the king, Nathan the prophet also came in. And they told the king, saying, Behold Nathan the prophet [has 23 come]. And when he was come in before the king, he bowed himself before the 24 king with his face to the ground. And Nathan said, My lord, O king, hast thou 25 said, ¹⁹ Adonijah shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? For he is gone down this day, and hath slain oxen and fat cattle and sheep in 26 abundance, and hath called all the king's sons, and the captains of the host, and Abiathar the priest; and, behold, they eat and drink before him, and say, God
27 save king Adonijah [let king Adonijah live]. But me, even me thy servant, and Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and thy servant Solomon, 28 hath he not called. Is this thing done by my lord the king, and thou hast not shewed it ²⁰ unto thy servant ²¹ who should sit on the throne of my lord the king after him?

28 Then king David answered and said, Call me Bath-sheba. And she came 29 into the king's presence, and stood before the king. And the king sware, and 30 said, As the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, even as I sware unto thee by the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, saying, Assuredly [That ²¹] Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon 31 my throne in my stead; even so will I certainly ²² do this day. Then Bath-sheba bowed with her face to the earth, and did reverence to the king, and said, Let my lord king David live for ever.

32 And king David said, Call me Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. And they came before the king. The king
33 also said unto them, Take with you the servants of your lord, ²³ and cause Solomon my son to ride upon mine own mule, and bring him down to Gihon; ²⁴ and let Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet anoint him there king over Israel: and blow ye with the trumpet, and say, God save king Solomon [let king Solomon live]. Then ye shall come up after him, that he may [and he shall] come 35 and sit upon my throne; for [and] he shall be king in my stead: and I have 36 appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada answered the king, and said, Amen: the Lord [Jehovah] God of my 37 lord the king say so too [so spake ²⁵]. As the Lord [Jehovah] hath been with my lord the king, even so be he with Solomon, and make his throne greater than the throne of my lord king David.

38 So Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, went down, and caused Solomon to ride upon king David's mule, and brought him to Gihon. ²⁶ And Zadok the priest took a horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon. And they blew the trumpet; and all the people said, God save king Solomon 40 [Let king Solomon live]. And all the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them.

- 41 And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him heard it, as they had made an end of eating. And when Joab heard the sound of the trumpet, he said, Wherefore is this noise of the city being in an uproar? And while he yet spake, behold, Jonathan the son of Abiathar the priest came: and Adonijah said unto him, "Come in; for thou art a valiant man, and bringest good tidings. And Jonathan answered and said to Adonijah, Verily our lord king David hath made Solomon king. And the king hath sent with him Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and they have caused him to ride upon the king's mule: and Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet have anointed him king in Gihon:" and they are come up from thence rejoicing, so that the city rang again. This is the noise that ye have heard. And also Solomon sitteth on the throne of the kingdom. And moreover the king's servants came to bless our lord king David, saying, [Thy ""] God make the name of Solomon better than thy name, and make his throne greater than thy throne. And the king bowed himself upon the bed. And also thus said the king, Blessed be the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, which hath given one to sit on my throne this day, mine eyes even seeing it.
- 49 And all the guests that were with Adonijah were afraid, and rose up," and went every man his way. And Adonijah feared because of Solomon, and arose, and went, and caught hold on the horns of the altar. And it was told Solomon, saying, Behold, Adonijah feareth king Solomon: for, lo, he hath caught hold on the horns of the altar, saying, Let king " Solomon swear unto me to [this"] day that he will not slay his servant with the sword. And Solomon said, If he will shew himself a worthy man, there shall not a hair of him fall to the earth: but if wickedness shall be found in him, he shall die. So king Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar. And he came and bowed himself to king Solomon: and Solomon said unto him, Go to thine house.

² Ver. 1.—[בְּנָדִים] bed-clothes (cf. 1 Sam. xix. 13), not garments.

³ Ver. 2.—[The translation of נִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה in vers. 3 and 4 may well stand here also.

⁴ Ver. 2.—In place of the suffix הָ the Sept. has αὐτοῦ and the Vulg. suo, which Thenius prefers to the reading of the text.—Bähr.

⁵ Ver. 2.—[The Alex. Sept., Syr., and Vulg., read our.

⁶ Ver. 3.—[The definite article should be expressed as in ver. 15.

⁷ Ver. 13.—[The particle וְ, as is recognized in all the VV., can hardly give the emphasis of the Eng. assuredly.

⁸ Ver. 14.—[Many MSS. and VV. prefix and.

⁹ Ver. 14.—[אֲנִי־יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל] not complete, fill out, but, as in A. V., confirm; Chald. אֲנִי־יְהוָה, Sept. εγω εἰμι. The phrase is used of the fulfilment of divine utterances. Cf. ii. 27; viii. 15, 24.

¹⁰ Ver. 18.—All the VV. and 200 MSS. [and the early editions] read אֲנִי־יְהוָה, instead of אֲנִי־יְהוָה, as the connection requires.—Bähr.

¹¹ Ver. 20.—Instead of אֲנִי־יְהוָה the Chaldee [Syr. and Vulg.], and some [many] MSS. have אֲנִי־יְהוָה, which Thenius considers right. On the other hand, Maurer remarks that the pronoun stands here first, just as in Gen. xlix. 8, with emphasis, instead of the suffix.—Bähr.

¹² Ver. 21.—[Counted is implied by the connection, but not expressed in the Hbr.

¹³ Ver. 24.—[אֲנִי־יְהוָה, the question is indicated only by the tone.

¹⁴ Ver. 27.—[The pronoun it is better omitted, as in the Hbr. and all VV.

¹⁵ Ver. 27.—[The k'ri has עֲבָדְךָ, also nearly all the translations have the singular; but the reading of the text is preferred.—Bähr. [It is that of many MSS.]

¹⁶ Ver. 30.—[See note ver. 13.

¹⁷ Ver. 30.—[Hbr. and VV. omit certainly.

¹⁸ Ver. 33.—[אֲנִי־יְהוָה in the pl. is rightly rendered by the sing. as referring to David—not to David and Solomon.

¹⁹ Ver. 33.—[The Chaldee and Syr. read Siloa; Arabic, fountain of Siloa.

²¹ Ver. 38.—[The Chald., Syr., and Arab., make the same change here as in ver. 33.

²² Ver. 42.—[The words unto him are unnecessary; not contained in the Hbz. nor the VV.]

²³ Ver. 45.—[Aa. in vera. 38 and 39.]

²⁴ Ver. 47.—The k'tib [כִּי־לֹא] is plainly preferable to the k'ti מִלֵּי־בָהֶרֶם—Bähr [and is followed by the Syriac].

²⁵ Ver. 49.—[The Vatican (not Alex.) Sept. omits and rose up.]

²⁶ Ver. 51.—[The Vatican (not Alex.) Sept. omits king.]

²⁷ Ver. 51.—[Instead of מִיָּד some MSS. read מִיָּדָה, which has been followed apparently by the A. V.—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Now king David was old, &c. Vers. 1-4 introduce the entire narration following, the central point and chief object of which is Solomon's ascension to the throne. Adonijah's endeavor to usurp the throne was the reason why this event took place before the death of David. Adonijah proceeded to carry out his purpose when David was old and infirm, and apparently near his end. The author begins, consequently, with the description of David's condition, and is reminded particularly of Abishag, his waiting-maid, because Adonijah, after the misadventure of his enterprise, sought her for a wife in order to gain the throne by means of her, and so wrought his destruction (chap. ii. 13 sq.). The י at the beginning has no connection with anything preceding; least of all does it connect our books with the books of Samuel (see Introduction, § 3). Nor is it mechanically retained from a passage of the life of David inserted here (Keil); but it stands, as elsewhere so often at the beginning of a book (Jos. i. 1; Judges i. 1; 2 Sam. i. 1; Ruth i. 1; Esth. i. 1; Ezra i. 1; Ezek. i. 1; Jon. i. 1), where the first verse forms the antecedent to the second.—When David was old and infirm, his servants said unto him. David was then seventy years of age (comp. chap. ii. 11, with 2 Sam. v. 4, 5): that his natural warmth then failed him, was not ex nimio mulierum usu (Le Clerc), but was the result of the "extraordinary cares and conflicts of his earlier life" (Ewald).

Vers. 2-4. Wherefore his servants said unto him, &c. Josephus expressly names them physicians (Ant. vii. 14, 3), comp. Gen. i. 2. The remedy which one of them, in the name of the rest, advised when the "clothes" (בְּגָדֵי) as in 1 Sam. xix. 13; Numb. iv. 6) were of no use, was known in ancient times. Without skill in internal remedies, men sought to warm, by means of living vigorous bodies, those whose vital powers were chilled and enfeebled. Galen (Method. Medic. 8, 7) says: "Ex iis vero, quæ extrinsecus applicantur, boni habitus puellus una sit accumbens, ut semper abdomen ejus contingat." Bacon (Hist. Vit. et Nec.): "Neque negligenda sunt fomenta ex corporibus vivis." According to Bartholinus (De Morb. Bibl. 9), a Jewish physician advised the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa to allow young and strong boys to lie upon his breast (comp. Trusen, Sitten, Gebr. and Krankh. der Hebræer, s. 257 sq.). This was not designed here for the gratification of bodily passion, by means of a "concubine," as Winer calls Abishag, but before all, for service and assistance, such as was deemed most effective after the unavailing application of the usual remedies to the aged man confined to his bed. The physicians expressly state this, and it agrees with the words: and let her stand before the king, i. e., let her serve him (Gen. xli. 46; Deut. i. 38), and be his attendant, e., let her wait upon, help him: let her lie in his bosom [not thy, see textual note] that he may become warm. If by these last words they may have presupposed that he would "know" her, they do not state it as the design, as, moreover, בְּרִיךְ שֶׁכֶּבֶר must not be understood necessarily only of cohabitation (comp. chap. iii. 20; Ruth iv. 16). They sought a beautiful maiden "because she was destined for the king" (Thenius), and they found such at Shunem, a city of the tribe Issachar, in the plain of Jezreel, at the foot of the so-called little Hermon (Jos. xix. 18; 1 Sam. xxviii. 4). The text states expressly that the king did not know her: she was, therefore, not his concubine, but his waiting-maid and attendant. In a wholly perverse way Josephus, and after him J. D. Michaelis, adduces impotency, in consequence of old age and weakness, as the reason why he did not know her. In that case the remark would be superfluous (Thenius). It serves, however, "to make it clear how it was that Adonijah could seek Abishag for his wife," chap. ii. 17 (Keil), and go to Bath-sheba for her intercession with Solomon. Older interpreters have maintained that she was the actual wife of David, or at least his concubine, and that the relation also, according to the morality of the time, was unobjectionable. But neither here nor in the second chapter is she so named. Amongst the people she may have well passed for such, since Adonijah, through alliance with her, wished to facilitate his way to the throne (see on chap. ii. 13).*

Vers. 5-6. Then Adonijah the son of Haggith, &c. Of the sons of David born at Hebron, Adonijah was the fourth (2 Sam. iii. 2-4). The first, Amnon, and the third, Absalom, were already dead, and the second also, Chileab, of whom nothing more is said, had doubtless died much earlier. As the eldest living son, Adonijah believed that he had claims to the throne. Besides this, his beautiful person came into the account, as with Absalom, by which, because it was valued in a ruler (1 Sam. ix. 2; 2 Sam. xiv. 25; xvi. 7; Ezek. xxviii. 12), he hoped for the favorable regard of the people. בְּרִיךְ ver. 6 cannot, with some, be translated: "and he was born unto him after Absalom," but only, as in Gen. xvi. 1: "and she had borne him after Absalom," i. e., after the latter had been borne of Maacah. The alteration of the text into בְּרִיךְ—"he had begotten him after Absalom" (Thenius), is wholly unnecessary. The succession to the throne in Israel was certainly hereditary; but no law required that the eldest son, at the time, should be the heir-apparent. From vers.

17 and 20, as also from 2 Chron. xi. 22, it is clear that it was regarded as the right of the reigning king to determine who amongst his sons should succeed him. He could transmit the kingdom to his first-born or to his eldest son, but he was not obliged (2 Chron. xxi. 3) thereto. Adonijah was not at all first-born, but only the fourth son. He himself does not take his age into the account, and appeals, in chap. ii. 13 sq., not to this, but to the voice of the people who had shown themselves favorably disposed towards him. David's designation of Solomon as his successor, has its reason in the promise in 2 Sam. vii. 12-16; xii. 24 sq.; 1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10; he regarded him as the one who, according to the prescript touching a king in Deut. xvii. 15, was chosen by Jehovah. Of a formal "right" to the throne, possessed by Adonijah, which he thought to "assure" himself of (Thenius), there can be no discussion. That he knew well the will of his father, by virtue of which Solomon was to be his successor, is clear from the circumstance that he invited all his brothers, and the men who were employed in the royal service, to a feast prepared by him. Solomon only, and the more confidential friends of David, were not invited. His design was to render null the purpose of his father, and to possess himself of the throne, by conspiracy and force, in opposition to his wish. His undertaking was a formal usurpation, and like that of Absalom, to which the whole narrative manifestly points. Upon this account also the text says: "he exalted himself," i. e., he over-exalted himself—made himself somewhat that did not become him (ἤγειρε used here as in Prov. xxx. 32; Numb. xvi. 3), with this result, that his father left him to his will (ἡγήσατο means from him, Adonijah's days, and is not, with Seb. Schmidt, to be understood first of his attempt at royal sovereignty). The moral infirmity of the royal father, coupled now with bodily weakness, induced Adonijah to enter upon his guilty enterprise. Just as Absalom had done (2 Sam. xv. 1), he provided himself with what, according to 1 Sam. viii. 11, is designated as the first "royal prerogative," chariots, riders, and body-guardsmen, i. e., a brilliant court, in order thereby to impose upon the multitude.

Vers. 7-10. And he conferred with Joab, &c. Through the commander-in-chief, Adonijah hopes to win over the army, and through the high-priest, to secure also the priesthood. Not the conviction "that he had right on his side" (Thenius), induced both men to enter into his plans. Joab had observed that he was sunken in the good graces of David (chap. ii. 5), and consequently could not hope for much for himself from Solomon; but from Adonijah he could hope, especially if made king by his assistance. Abiathar seems to have felt himself set aside by David for Zadok, which priest was at the tabernacle with the ark of the covenant at Zion (see on vers. 33 and 39), and to have feared that the high-priestly family of Eleazar, to which Zadok belonged, would supplant his own, viz.: the family of Ithamar. Upon Benaiab, comp. 2 Sam. viii. 18 and xxiii. 20 sq.; upon Nathan, see 2 Sam. vii. and xii. Shimei is mentioned in chap. iv. 18: Josephus names Ῥεῖ δ' Αὐδιδου φίλος. Doubtless these latter filled high offices. That they were the only surviving brothers of David (Ewald), has nothing probable to rest upon. Upon the heroes of David, comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 sq., and 1 Chron. xi. 10 sq. Adonijah, like Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 8, 12), prepared a great feast, which was ostensibly also sacrificial, in order to impart to the transaction a religious coloring. The well, i. e., the sources of Rogel (Joa. xv. 7; xviii. 16), lay, according to 2 Sam. xvii. 17, southeasterly from Jerusalem, in the loveliest, most fruitful plain; according to Josephus, in βασιλικὴ παραδείσῳ; according to Schulz (Jerus., s. 79), "even now a place of recreation for the inhabitants of Jerusalem." Thenius derives the name Zoheleth from זחל, to crawl—a rock which one must climb with difficulty. This place was in every respect suited for a public festivity. (Comp. Robinson, Palestine, vol. i. p. 333; Boston, 1868.)

Vers. 11-14. Wherefore Nathan spake unto Bath-sheba, &c. According to the custom prevailing anciently in the East, on the occasion of the forcible seizure of the throne, of murdering the dethroned ruler, or the opposing pretenders to the crown, with all their nearest relations (Judg. ix. 5; 1 Kings xv. 29; 2 Kings x. 6, 13; xi. 1), in the event of the success of Adonijah's undertaking, there was very much to fear for the life both of Solomon and of his mother. That David knew nothing of the plans of Adonijah, and that Nathan was first informed of them only at the moment of their execution, shows how secretly the affair had been managed. This would have been unnecessary had Adonijah a recognized right to the throne, and had his own conscience been right in the premises. David, moreover, would not have been so very much surprised at his undertaking. The prophet Nathan also deemed it his duty to prevent, as far as possible, a repetition of the history of Absalom. With great wisdom and prudence, he addressed himself to the mother of Solomon, who was especially beloved of David, begging her to apply to the king, with whom rested the right to designate his successor, to represent to him the mortal peril which threatened both her son and herself, and to remind him of his promise to her. When David's mind should first, by this means, become aroused, than he (the prophet) would, in the name of Jehovah, appear before the king, and place before him his given word (1 Chron. xxviii. 5), in order to incite him to immediate action. "When David first promised Bath-sheba, upon his oath, that her son Solomon should become king, is not known. Obviously it was after the promise he had received in 2 Sam. vii." (Keil).

Vers. 15-27. And Bath-sheba went in unto the king, &c. The statement that king David was old, &c. (ver. 1), explains the words: "into the chamber" (ver. 15), and means he was so feeble that he could not leave his sick-room, and needed constant attention.—From ver. 20, comp. 27, it is most explicit, once more, that no one entertained the thought that Adonijah, as the eldest surviving son of the king, had a right to the succession; but that the right to decide whether of his sons should be king, remained rather with the king, and that his decision was anxiously waited for.—I and my son Solomon shall be counted offenders, i. e., we shall be treated as traitors and offenders guilty of death. After these words Bath-sheba retired, and Nathan, informed in the meanwhile, went unto the king. While the former addressed her statement to the king directly, as a mother, the latter, as prophet, begins with a question in which, upon the one side, a slight reproach was conveyed that David should not have put a stop sooner to the design of Adonijah, and have exposed his own friends to great danger, and on the other side it expressed the confidence that the king would hold to his oath, and carry it out forthwith.—Under “the captains of the host,” ver. 25, the servants of the king (the mighty men) in ver. 10 are included. Kings used to be saluted by the people with the salutation, Live the king! (1 Sam. x. 24; 2 Sam. xvi. 16; 2 Kings xi. 12; 2 Chron. xxiii. 31.) The order of names in ver. 26 contains a climax in which Solomon, as the highest personage, is named last. Nathan’s words are anything else than the expression of wounded vanity—they simply exhibit Adonijah’s hostile sentiment towards the friends of the king, and also the fate in store for them should Adonijah become sovereign.

Vers. 28–38. Then king David answered, &c. The quick and firm resolution of David shows how strong he was yet in mind and will, notwithstanding all his bodily weakness. He repeats his oath, not, however, employing merely the usual formula, as Jehovah liveth! but adding most significantly, who hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, i. e., to the God who has been true to me, and delivered me wonderfully out of so many and great dangers, will I also remain true unto the end. His oath, coming from deep emotion, is likewise a praise and thanksgiving unto Jehovah. Had Adonijah an actual formal right to the throne, such an oath would have been the greatest sin, in so far as David, while appealing to the divine mercy and grace, would have knowingly trodden under foot the right of his son. The added וְעַלֶּיךָ, ver. 31, exhibits the vivacity of the thought. Amongst the Persian kings it appears to have been customary (Dan. iii. 9; v. 10; vi. 22; Neh. ii. 3).

Vers. 33–37. The king also said unto them, Take with you the servants of your lord, &c. As no one but the king himself dared ride his mule, the command to let Solomon “ride” thereon was an actual declaration that he was king (Esth. vi. 8, 9). Gihon is a place near Jerusalem, on the west side, with a spring of water (2 Chron. xxxii. 30; xxxiii. 14). The valley here situated bears still this name (Robinson, Palest., vol. i., p. 346). It was proper for the anointing to take place at a spot where a large assemblage could be gathered, and whence a solemn entrance into the city, which had no open public square, could be made. Gihon, moreover, was considerably distant from the rock Zohaleth, which was on the southeasterly side of Jerusalem, where Adonijah had gathered together his adherents, so that a collision would be avoided. According to the account of the rabbins, kings were anointed only at places abounding in water, and upon that account also much frequented. But they erroneously identify Gihon with Siloam, which spring lies southeast of Jerusalem. Thenius prefers the reading בְּהֶרֶן to בְּהֶרֶן, because the tabernacle was there, from which, according to ver. 39, Zadok took the “horn of oil.” But the three hours’ distance of Gibeon from Jerusalem is conclusive against this. Besides, by אֵלֶּיךָ, in ver. 39, we are not to understand the tabernacle of the covenant, but the tent erected by David upon Zion for the ark of the covenant (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1; xvi. 1). David expressly gave order for the anointing of Solomon, so that nothing appertaining to the investiture of the king should be wanting. The supposition that anointing took place only with those kings “who were not free from exceptions, or who had no historic right to the throne” (Winer and Grotius, after the rabbins), is unfounded, for David, who here ordered the anointing, regarded Solomon in no respect as an exceptional successor. From the fact that he wished this done not simply by the high-priest, but also by the prophet, we learn the high significance he attributed to the prophetic office in Israel. He says purposely, ruler over Israel and over Judah. He had himself, for some time, been ruler only over Judah: then he had conquered Ephraim, which named itself Israel, and had united it again with Judah. The old disunion had again exhibited itself on the revolt of Absalom (2 Sam. xix. 40 sq.); hence, with Adonijah’s like undertaking in view, he deemed it necessary to declare expressly that Solomon should be ruler over Israel and Judah. Benaiah, as the person upon whom the execution of the order devolved, answered David, and declared himself ready to carry it out,—not, as Thenius supposes, to flatter the paternal vanity, but, in the conviction that the king’s command was in conformity with the will of Jehovah, he wished that the divine blessing might rest upon the government of Solomon.

Ver. 38. So Zadok the priest, &c. By the Cherethites and Pelethites we must understand the royal body-guard (Josephus, σμητοφύλακες). On the other hand, the modern interpreters are not agreed whether both expressions are to be understood ethnographically or appellatively. They who urge the former, appeal to 1 Sam. xxx. 14, and hold כְּרִיתִי for the designation of the parent-stem of the Philistines, which had migrated from Crete, and that פְּלִשְׁתִּי, too, is the same with פְּלִשְׁתִּי.

David, who for a long while had remained amongst the Philistines, had collected his body-guard from amongst foreigners and not from his own people, and afterwards the appellation remained (Movers, Hitzig, Bertheau, Ewald). Others derive כְּרִיתִי from כרת, and פְּלִשְׁתִּי from the Arabic, cognate with פלם, &c., understanding by the former, lictors, the royal executioners of the punishment of death, and by the latter, runners who, like the δγγαροι of the Persians, had to carry commands to remote places (2 Chron. xxx. 6). We hold to this latter view, along with Gesenius, Keil, and Thenius, for although the plural form פְּלִשְׁתִּי instead of פְּלִשְׁתִּי for appellations is certainly unusual, we cannot perceive why two designations should be employed side by side, for one and the same people. (We do not say Britons and Englishmen.) So, then, later the royal body-guard were called

הַכְּרִיתִים הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים (comp. 2 Kings xi. 4 sq.), i. e., executioners and runners. And last of all, it is highly improbable that David, who was perpetually at war with the Philistines, would have selected his body-guards from them.—The horn of oil out of the tabernacle (ver. 39). The “oil of holy ointment" (Ex. xxx. 23 sq.) was preserved in the tabernacle in which the ark of the covenant was kept (1 Chron. xv. 1). The pouring of this oil upon the head symbolized the communication of the Spirit (רוח) of Jehovah (1 Sam. xvi. 13). By anointing, the royal office with which Solomon was to be invested was set forth as essentially theocratic. The king of Israel was, upon this account, absolutely the anointed of the Lord (1 Sam. ii. 10, 35; xxiv. 7). The taking of the horn from the "tabernacle" does not force us to the conclusion that the act of anointing took place before or at it and at the same time, also at Gibeon, as Thenius maintains. The great joy and jubilation of the whole people shows that they knew nothing of Adonijah's right to the throne, but that they rather accepted David's decision, who alone had the right to decide. They saw in Solomon's elevation a victory over the unauthorized usurper. Flutes were used at festivals, especially at the feast of tabernacles (Isai. v. 12; xxx. 29; Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. s. 123).

Ver. 40. The earth rent. So according to the Chald., which explains שָׁרַרְרָא by שָׁרַרְרָא. The Sept. has ἰχθυοε; the Vulg. insonuit. Thenius reads שָׁרַרְרָא, the earth was struck = quaked, which seems unnecessary.

Vers. 41-48. And Adonijah . . . heard it, &c. While the assembled guests heard the noise and the cry in the city, the experienced soldier Joab caught the sound of the trumpets especially, and concluded, from this warlike token, nothing good. Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, who here, as in 2 Sam. xv. 36 and xvii. 17 appears as the bringer of news, was probably left behind in the city designedly to observe what was going on. Although scarcely himself a witness of what transpired in the royal palace, he could, nevertheless, as Solomon had already made his entrance, be well informed by eye and ear witnesses. Joab named him a valiant man, i. e., a person whose report could be trusted. The שָׁרַרְרָא at the end of

ver. 47, as David was lying upon his bed, certainly cannot mean that he fell upon his knees; still less is a thankful bow in return to those who were congratulating him meant (Thenius). The king bowed himself with his body as far as he could, before his Lord and God, and spake: Blessed, &c. The בָּרַךְ at the beginning of ver. 48 does not indicate a new, different action, but simply states that besides his bowing, he spake also the words which follow.

Vers. 49-53. And all the guests . . . were afraid, &c. The panic which forthwith seized Adonijah and his followers, shows that their conscience was not upright in their undertaking, i. e., that they themselves were not convinced of the righteousness of Adonijah's claims, otherwise they would, with Joab at their head, have made a stand, and not scattered at once. To save his life, which he, as a usurper of the throne, believed he had forfeited, Adonijah fled to the altar, which stood before the tabernacle upon Zion (chap. iii. 15; 1 Sam. vi. 17). He laid hold of the horns of the altar, as did Joab afterwards (chap. ii. 28), and appealed thereby to the pardoning power and grace of Jehovah (comp. upon the significance of the act, my Symbolik des Mos. Kult., i. s. 473 sq.). This asylum was ordained originally for unintentional man-slayers (Exod. xxi. 12 sq.); but later on it appears to have been made use of by persons who feared punishment by death. Solomon regarded Adonijah's flight to the horns of the altar as a confession of his guilt and repentance, and he exercised an act of clemency which could only produce the most favorable impression upon the people. Yet he adds a warning in the words: Go to thine house, &c., not: Do not come into my presence (2 Sam. xiv. 24), but: Keep thyself quiet, live as a private person, then not the least harm shall befall thee.

• HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL

1. The entire first chapter turns upon the elevation of Solomon to the throne, which is narrated so circumstantially with its immediate occasion and all the attending circumstances, because, as has already been shown in the Introduction, § 3, it constitutes in the highest degree a weighty moment in the development of the history of the Old Testament theocracy. With it begins the period of a blooming of the kingdom of Israel which it never had before, and which never came again. Solomon thereby became elevated to the type of a great, mighty, wise, and prosperous king, which he passes for even to this day in the Orient. The prophets even depict the glory and happiness of the Messianic kingdom with expressions which are borrowed from the description of the kingdom of Israel under Solomon. (Comp. Mich. iv. 4, and Zach. iii. 10, with 1 Kings v. 5.) He is, according to his name, the prince of peace, κατ' ἐξοχήν, and the beloved of God (2 Sam. xii. 25), designations which by the prophets and in the New Testament are applied, in like manner, to the Messiah the son of David in the most eminent sense (Is. ix. 5, 6; Eph. i. 6; ii. 14; Col. i. 13). The reception of "The Song of Solomon" into the Old Testament canon shows that to the Jewish synagogue the typical relation was not unknown, and in the Christian Church it has always been maintained.

2. The brief introductory narrative, vers. 1-4, has been found in many respects very scandalous. This has arisen from the wholly false presupposition that it treats of the gratification of the lustfulness of a worn-out old man by means of a concubine. But of this the text declares so little, that it rather states explicitly, David did not know Abishag. The means which the physicians—not he himself—selected to restore to him his lost natural warmth, were, if not unheard of, at least morally questionable, yea, from a Christian point of view, decidedly objectionable. That they did not hesitate to recommend it, has indeed its ground, not in conscious immorality and frivolity, but in the perverted views prevalent throughout the entire ancient Orient upon the relation of the sexes, or in the deeply-rooted lack of chastity, which even the stern lawgiver Moses was not able to put an end to. Hence polygamy was not only permitted, but it was regarded by kings as somewhat belonging to their royal estate, and it never occurred to any one to object to them upon that account.

* [The translators, after some hesitation, have adopted the above as a caption. It is not a translation of the author's heading. He has it "heilsgeschichtliche," which expresses the conception of the historical process of healing or salvation. It is a term for which we have no available equivalent in English, although the thought embodied by the word is clear enough.]

(Comp. 2 Sam. v. 13; 1 Kings xi. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 21; Judges viii. 30.) This explains the reason why David did not reject the medical advice, and why the matter did not cause any scandal among the people, why even Bath-sheba herself did not feel aggrieved (ver. 15). Whatsoever the narrative has which is repulsive to us, does not adhere to a particular person nor to this particular instance, but to the general lack of conjugal chastity in the Old Testament.

3. Adonijah's undertaking, in which there is so unmistakably a reference to Absalom's, is to be understood throughout as blameworthy. He knew that the decision upon the succession to the throne depended upon his father, and that he had already selected Solomon. He knew also the tragical end of Absalom's attempt. Nevertheless, he would not be warned by it, but set himself up in the way of self over-estimation, making boast of his beautiful figure. King will he be at any cost. He makes his preparations without his father's consent, takes advantage of his infirmity and weakness, and secretly enters into combinations with the most influential men who belonged, more or less, to the class of malcontents. He allows himself to become impatient through his lust for ruling, and to rush into a measure in every respect premature. Upon the first intelligence, nevertheless, of Solomon's accession, a shameful panic seizes him. All courage to risk the least thing for his cause fails him. The whole crowd of his followers scatters like dust, and he himself, in a cowardly way, seeks to save only his life. He anxiously flies to a place of refuge, clings to it, calls himself Solomon's "servant," and salutes him as king. But, scarcely is the danger past, he breaks his pledged word to behave quietly, and starts anew in secret machinations to reach his goal. He flatters the mother of Solomon with hypocritical humility, and seeks to move the heart of the wife (see on chap. ii. 13 sq.). Rightly does Ewald say of him: "A man who, according to all the known features of our memorial of him, has much that resembles Absalom, fine form, airy, and ambitious of power, yet inwardly scarcely fit for governing; of an obdurate mind, and yet afraid to venture upon open battle. That he was no proper sovereign for such a kingdom as Israel then was, must be obvious to intelligent men."

4. Nathan here, as always (2 Sam. vii., xii.), appears right genuinely as prophet. When there is an attempt to bring to completion human self-willed beginnings over-against the counsel and will of God, where the safety and well-being of the chosen people were at stake, then it was the calling of the prophet to interfere, counselling and reminding, warning and punishing. It was not so much personal friendship for David, and love for his pupil Solomon, as rather, and before all, the known will of Jehovah, which had determined that the latter should be king, that induced him to take the step which would have had the most disastrous consequences for himself, yea, might have cost him his life, had Adonijah become king. It was not Zedok, nor Benaiah, nor any of the other friends of David, who brought to nought the ill-starred enterprise. But the same prophet, through whom the great promise had been made to David in respect of the succession, by the providence of God, averted also that which interfered with the fulfilment of the promise. And without his prompt, spirited interference there would have been for Israel no Solomon-era, no glorious age of the theocratic house. He proceeded in the matter with great wisdom and circumspection. First he allows the mother of Solomon to prepare the way, conciliating the infirm and feeble king, then he enters before him himself, with all deference indeed, nevertheless at the same time earnestly reminding and slightly reproving him, and calls upon him as a man and servant of God to fulfil the promise he had given unto the Lord.

5. The conduct of David, when he learns what is going on, corresponds fully with the divine will and with his great calling as the founder of the theocratic kingdom, and of the new dynasty which is to sit forever upon the throne of Israel. He does not stagger irresolutely hither and thither, like a sick, feeble old man without any will of his own, but, as if he were still the strong hero, the undismayed, determined, energetic man, such as in his best years he had so often shown himself amid dangers and in critical situations, he raises himself from his sick-bed, swears to observe his word, issues his orders, and puts them into immediate execution. This resolution and firmness could not have proceeded possibly from their opposite, from an inward infirmity, i. e., from compliance with the supplication of a wife, nor from dislike of Adonijah, whom he had never interfered with (ver. 6), but had heretofore always indulged too much. It is to be explained only by his faith in the promise of Jehovah, by his firm certainty and assurance that Solomon was appointed by Jehovah to be his successor, and that through him as well his own "house," as the house of Jehovah, which it was permitted himself no longer to take care of, should be built up (2 Sam. vii. 11-13). Upon this account also the Epistle to the Hebrews mentions him expressly in the list of the men who have held the faith and obtained the promise (chap. xi. 32). How could he have sworn by Him who had "redeemed his soul out of all distress," and then, in deep humility, have praised and glorified Him, had he been conscious of any injustice towards Adonijah, and had not, in the prosperous issue of his commands, beheld a gracious guidance of the God of Israel? It is clear that under such a man as Adonijah, who was lacking in all the qualities requisite for the head of the theocracy, the kingdom never would have reached the bloom which it reached under Solomon. It would have been the greatest misfortune for Israel had he ascended the throne, while, viewed apart from the promise, the high and extraordinary endowment of Solomon was a clear indication of Providence that he alone of all his brothers was fitted to preserve, indeed to increase, what David had acquired with indescribable toil and great conflict, under the visible assistance of God. David did not deprive Adonijah of what rightly belonged to him, he only did not bestow upon him what he craved in his foolish arrogance and ambition, to the detriment of the kingdom.

6. Of Solomon himself we learn here only this one thing, that he instantly allowed Adonijah to go free, who, by his flight to a place of refuge, was self-convicted of guilt, and, according to the custom in such cases, feared punishment by death. His first act as king was significantly an act of magnanimity and grace, which appears all the more worthy of admiration when we remember "that Adonijah, had he won, would certainly have destroyed his brother and all his chief supporters" (Ewald), as both Nathan and Bath-sheba undoubtedly expected (vers. 12, 21).

7. The new historic criticism sees "in our narrative, distinctly, the fully natural machinery of human actions" (Thenius), a "court-cabal," the "astute manager" of which is Nathan (Köster). "Bath-sheba sought to secure the crown for her son Solomon, although, after Absalom's death, it devolved upon the fourth son of David, Adonijah, whom Hagith had borne to him. One of the two priests at the ark of the covenant, Zadok, supported Bath-sheba's designs, just as Nathan the prophet. . . . Both could expect from the young Solomon a greater complaisance towards priestly influence than from the more independent Adonijah, especially if they helped the young man, against right, to the throne. It was characteristic of Bath-sheba to induce David to swear by Jehovah that Solomon, instead of Adonijah, should be his successor. But Adonijah was resolved not to allow himself to be robbed of his good right through an intrigue of the harem. . . . As David was sinking upon his death-bed, Adonijah believed that he must anticipate his enemies," &c. (Duncker, Geschichte des Alterthums, i. s. 385). Nothing is more certain than that the biblical author did not look upon the matter in such light. This whole exposition is a distinct example of the mode of treating biblical history already described in the Introduction, § 5. It abandons the standpoint of the narrator, arranges the history man-fashion, and then, as is the case here, perverts it into its opposite. The divine promise becomes a fine-spin harem intrigue, the "great prophet," as Ewald also calls him, becomes the intriguing manager of a court-cabal, the true priest is reduced to the level of a self-seeker, the firm believing king, the man after God's heart, the play-ball of a woman and of a court-party, the greatest and wisest king of Israel is a throne-robber, and on the other hand the airy, incapable, deceitful, and cowardly usurper Adonijah becomes a martyr of the right and the unfortunate victim of impure machinations. This entire perverted interpretation rests upon the presupposition, already sufficiently proved groundless, that Adonijah was "the rightful heir," and falls to pieces with it.

8. ["It is true that Adonijah was David's eldest son now remaining, and therefore might seem to challenge the justest title to the crown; but the kingdom of Israel, in so late an erection, had not yet known the right of succession. God himself, that had ordained the government, was as yet the immediate elector; He fetched Saul from among the stuff, and David from the sheep-fold, and has now appointed Solomon from the ferule to the sceptre."—Bp. Hall, Contemplations, Bk. xvii., Contemplation I.—E. H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-4. Weakness and infirmity in old age are: (a) the universal human lot to which we must all consider ourselves appointed (Ps. xc. 10); (b) they should loosen the bands which hold us to the temporal and perishable, and ripen us for eternity (2 Cor. iv. 17 sq.).—WÜRT. SUMM.: They who, through many a cross, and sorrow, and anxiety, expend their bodily powers, should be all the more patient, and console themselves here with the example of David, and know that among the saints of God, also, feebleness of body is found.—We may, and should, follow advice for the relief of our distress and the preservation of our life, in so far as it does not militate against the commands of God; for the Lord says, "it is better," &c. (Matt. xviii. 8).—Old and sick people should, and it is expected of them as a work well pleasing to God that they bear this with a willing heart, with patience, self-denial, and sacrificing love.—Vers. 5-10. Adonijah's attempt to obtain the crown: (a) the ground upon which it rests (upon self-assertion, pride, lust of power, ver. 5, but God resisteth the proud, and a haughty spirit goeth before a fall: upon outward qualities, age, and beautiful person, ver. 6, but 1 Sam. xvi. 7; Ps. cxlvii. 10, 11); (b) the means which he employed (he seeks to impose upon the people by chariots and horsemen, but Ps. xx. 8; he conspires with false and faithless men, but they forsake him in the hour of danger, ver. 49; Ps. ci. 6, 7; he prepares for appearance's sake a religious festival, ver. 9, but 2 Mos. xx. 7).—Ver. 5. The effort after high things (Rom. xii. 16).—How many a person thinks: I will become a great personage, a man of authority and influence, and then scruples at nothing in order to attain his goal. But that which is written in 1 Cor. vii. 20, 24 applies to the individual as well as to entire classes.—WÜRT. SUMM.: Let no one attempt to take an office against God and His will; "and no man taketh this honor unto himself but he that is called of God" (Heb. v. 4).—Ver. 6. The father who allows his son to go on in his pride and in worldly or sinful conduct, and shuts his eyes, not to trouble him, must expect that the son will trouble him and embitter the evening of his life. It is the right and duty of every father to speak to his son about his conduct even when he is no longer a child, and to ask, Why dost thou so? A perverted parental love is self-punished, Prov. xxix. 17; Sir. xxx. 9.—Ver. 7. High personages always find people for the execution of their sinful plans, who, from subservience or desire of reward, from ambition or revenge, will act as counsellors and agents; but they have their reward, and for the most part end with terror.—Ver. 8. With those who are meditating treason and destruction we should never make common cause (Prov. xxiv. 21, 22).—Vers. 9, 10. SELF-SEEKING: He who will not abide his time until God himself shall elevate him, will fall even when he attempts to rise. He who gives the crowd wherewith to eat and to drink, who prepares for them festivities and pleasures (panem et circenses), makes himself popular and beloved for the moment; but all who allow themselves to be gained in such way, to-day shout Hosanna! and to-morrow, Crucify! By not inviting Solomon, Adonijah betrayed his plans, and himself gave the occasion for their frustration (Ps. lxxix. 23; Rom. xi. 9). It is a rule of the divine world-government that the cause of God, through that whereby its enemies seek to thwart and hinder it, is only so much the more promoted.

Vers. 11-27. Nathan, the type of a true prophet: (a) through his watchfulness and fidelity (Ezek. xxxiii. 7), he is not silent when it was his duty to open his mouth (Is. lvi. 10); (b) through his wisdom and gentleness (Matt. x. 16); (c) through his earnestness and courage (Matt. x. 28; see Histor. and Ethical). How grand is this Nathan, how improving to all who sleep when they should be wakeful, who are dumb when they should counsel, who flatter when they should warn.—Ver. 11. It is a solemn duty not to conceal what can prove an injury and evil to an individual or to a community, but to expose it at the right time and in the right place, so that the injury may be averted.—Ver. 12. What Nathan here says to Bath-sheba, Christ and his apostles, in an infinitely higher sense, say to us all, especially to every father and to every mother. He who has come into the world to deliver and to save our souls, cries, Come unto me, &c. (Matt. xi. 28, 29), and the apostle advises the jailor, who asks in terror and alarm, What shall I do to be saved? i. e., delivered, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, so shall thou and thy house be delivered. How many take kindly the good advice of a wise man, for themselves and for their children, in their earthly and outward affairs, but who wish to hear nothing of the best advice which shall bring blessedness to their souls.—Ver. 14. The purity of the counsel is confirmed by the accompanying result.—Vers. 15–21. Bath-sheba before the king. She reminds him of his duty (a) towards God, before whom he had sworn (what one has vowed before God, according to God's will, one must hold to under all circumstances; of this one must remind kings and princes); (b) towards the people whose well-being and whose woe were in his keeping (the great responsibility of him towards whom all eyes are directed); (c) towards the wife and son whose happiness and life were at stake (woe to the father through whose guilt wife and children, after his death, fall into contempt and wretchedness).—Vers. 22–27. As Nathan does not hold back from the fulfilment of his holy calling through consideration of the danger threatening his life, and of the illness of the king, so David is deterred in nothing when it was said, Behold the prophet! from listening to the man of God, though his word, like a two-edged sword, may pierce through his soul. To have a Nathan by one's side, who refers at the right time and in the right way to the will of God, is the choicest blessing for a prince. "He who fears God lays hold of such a friend" (Eccl. vi. 16).—The ministers of God and the preachers of His word should not indeed mingle in worldly business and political affairs, but their calling always requires them to testify against uproar and sedition, for he who resisteth the powers, resisteth the ordinance of God (Rom. xiii. 2).—With questions which lead to a knowledge of self, he who has the care of souls often accomplishes more than by direct reproaches and disciplinary speeches.

Vers. 28–37. David's decision: (a) His oath (vers. 29, 30) is an evidence of his firm faith in the divine promise; (b) his command is a living proof of the truth of the word, Is. xl. 31, and Ps. xcii. 15 sq. (see Histor. and Ethical).—Ver. 30 sq. The word of a prince must stand firm and not be broken. Happy for the king who, under all circumstances, observes what he has promised. Fidelity in high places meets with fidelity from those below.—Ver. 36. Where the government is in firm hands there is found also a willing, joyous obedience. Upon God's blessing all is founded. Without God's Amen our Amen avails nothing. Loyal subjects know that they can wish for nothing greater and better for their prince and ruler than that God, at all times, may be with him.—Vers. 38–40. The typical in Solomon's elevation to the sovereignty: (a) He is established in spite of all machinations against him (Ps. ii. 2; Heb. v. 5); (b) he is anointed with oil from the sanctuary (Is. lxi. 1; Luke iv. 18); (c) he makes his entry as prince of peace amid the jubilee and praise of the people (Zach. ix. 9; Matt. xxi. 1 sq.).—STARKE: My Christian! reflect here upon the trumpet-sounding and the jubilee-shout, when the heavenly Solomon shall take possession of his kingdom (Rev. xi. 16), and see to it that thou also mayest be amongst those who have part in this joy.

Vers. 41–49. The frustration of the schemes of Adonijah (Job v. 12): (a) The intelligence he obtains; (b) the effect produced by this intelligence. To an evil conscience (Joab) the trumpets which announce victory and joy are judgment-trumpets, which sound forth, Thou art weighed and found wanting. The same message in which David expresses himself, Blessed be, &c., ver. 48, works terror and alarm in Adonijah and his party. So still ever sounds the "good message" that the true Prince of peace, Christ, has won the victory, and is seated at the right hand of God, which to some is for thanksgiving and praise, so that they support themselves upon it, but to others it is a stone of stumbling, so that they fall and are confounded (Is. viii. 14; Luke ii. 34).—In the intoxication of sinful pleasure and of God-forgetting, frivolous jubilation, the holy God sends, oftentimes, the thunder and lightning of his judgment, so that the besotted and maddened may thereby be rendered sober and made to experience that there is an holy God in heaven who will not allow himself to be mocked. When Adonijah held a great festivity he had plenty of friends; but when the messenger came with evil tidings, no one, not even the bold Joab, stood by him; they all forsook him (Eccl. vi. 10–12).—Vers. 50–53. Adonijah covered himself with shame (Prov. xi. 2): (a) He was afraid of Solomon (he who does not fear the Lord, must at last become afraid of men). How miserable the contrast between the young, haughty Adonijah and the aged, feeble, but faithful-hearted and humble David; (b) he flies to the horns of the altar and begs for mercy: (he who said, I will be king, calls himself Solomon's servant. Ostentation and boasting, as a rule, end in cowardice and cringing. He can bring down him who is proud (Dan. iv. 34). In the old covenant the horns of the altar were the places of refuge for those who had forfeited life and sought grace; in the new covenant God has directed us to a horn of salvation (Luke i. 69), the cross of the Lord, which all must seize and hold fast to who seek forgiveness and grace, and wish to pass from death unto life. That is the only and true asylum; he who flees thither avails himself of the word of the great Prince of peace, Go in peace, thy faith hath saved thee. The most beautiful prerogative of the crown is to do mercy for judgment; but mercy must never be for a covering of iniquity. Hence by the side of the word: Thy sins are forgiven thee! stands the other word: Sin no more! Kings and princes do well when, after Solomon's example, they begin their reign with an act of grace.

[BP. HALL. "Outward happiness and friendship are not known until our last act. In the impotency of either our revenge or recompense it will easily appear who loved us for ourselves, who for their own ends." Suitable for ver. 7.

BP. HALL, for ver. 41. "No doubt at this feast there was many a health drunken to Adonijah, many a confident boast of their prospering design many a scorn of the despised faction of Solomon and now, for their last dish (ver. 49) is served up astonishment, and fearful expectation of a just revenge.—E. H.]

B.—David's last words to Solomon, and his death.

CHAPTER II. 1-12.

- 1 Now the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he charged 2 Solomon his son, saying, I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong there-3 fore, and shew thyself a man; and keep the charge of the Lord [Jehovah] thy God, to walk in His ways, to keep His statutes, and His commandments, and His judgments, and His testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper¹ in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest 4 thyself: that the Lord [Jehovah] may continue [confirm]² His word which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children [sons]³ take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul,⁴ there shall 5 not fail thee (said he) ⁵ a man on the throne of Israel. Moreover thou knowest also what Joab the son of Zeruiah did to me, and [even]⁶ what he did to the two captains of the hosts of Israel, unto Abner the son of Ner, and unto Amasa the son of Jether, whom he slew, and shed the blood of war in peace, and put the blood of war⁷ upon his girdle that was about his loins, and in his shoes that were 6 on his feet. Do therefore according to thy wisdom, and let not his hoar head go 7 down to the grave in peace. But shew kindness unto the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, and let them be of those that eat at thy table: for so they came to 8 me when I fled because of [before]⁸ Absalom thy brother. And, behold, thou hast with thee Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite [a son of the Jaminite]⁹ of Bahurim, which cursed me with a grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim: but he came down to meet me at Jordan, and I swore to him by 9 the Lord [Jehovah], saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword. Now therefore hold him not guiltless: for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him; but his hoar head bring thou down to the grave with blood.
10 So [And] David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David.
11 And the days that David reigned over Israel were forty years: seven years reigned he in Hebron, and thirty and three years reigned he in Jerusalem.
12 Then sat Solomon upon the throne of David his father; and his kingdom was established greatly.

¹ Ver. 8.—[The Heb. יִשְׁכַּח bears equally well the sense prosper or do wisely; cf. Josh. 1. 7. The VV. generally adopt the former.

² Ver. 4.—[Confirm is the proper sense of וְיָשָׁב, as in all the VV.

³ Ver. 4.—[It is better here to preserve the masculine form as in all the VV., the reference being undoubtedly to the line upon the throne.

⁴ Ver. 4.—[The Vatican Sept. omits the words concerning me, and also with all their soul.

⁵ Ver. 4.—[Do Rossi rejects as spurious the word וְיָשָׁב, which is wanting in Kennicott's MS. 170, and in the Vulg. and Arab.

⁶ Ver. 5.—[Many MSS., the Syr. and Arab., express the conjunction וְיָשָׁב.

⁷ Ver. 5.—[The Sept. have here "innocent blood"—αἷμα ἀθώου.

⁸ Ver. 7.—[Heb. וְיָשָׁב.

⁹ Ver. 8.—[Heb. בֶּן־יָמִינִי—son of the Jaminite, & c., of the descendants of Jamin, a son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 19). The Heb. for the patriarch Benjamin is written in one word; the Gentile name is written separately, but without the article. All the instances cited by Gesenius in verbo, are either without the article, or else refer to this very Shimei. Of the VV., the Sept. and Vulg. have appreciated the distinction; Chald., Syr., and Arab. agree with the A. V.—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Now the days of David, &c. The Chronicles omit the history of Adonijah, but narrate instead, that David ordered a solemn act of homage of the entire people, in the persons of their representatives, towards Solomon when he was anointed "a second time" (1 Chron. xxiii. 1 sq., and xxix. 20-25). Such also was the case with Saul (1 Sam. xi. 12-15), and with David himself (2 Sam. v. 1-3; 1 Chron. xi. 1-3). Solomon's first anointing was rather impromptu, called for by the pressure of circumstances, upon which account it was proper that it should be followed by another done with all solemnity before the whole people. It took place also before that which is narrated in the section to be considered. The words, "a second time," show that the first anointing was well known to the chronicler. His narrative, besides, does not "rest upon liberty with the history" (Thenius), but is a filling-out of our own, with which it agrees very well.

Vers. 2-4. I go the way, &c. The form of expression reminds one of Josh. xxiii. 14; 1 Sam. iv. 9; but especially of Josh. i. 7. The exhortation: Be thou strong, therefore, and show thyself a man! does not mean: be consoled on account of my departure, bear it manfully; but it refers to what follows—be strong and brave in the "charge" of Jehovah, in the fulfilment of His precepts. The expression: שָׁמַרְתָּ מִשְׁמֶרֶת יְהוָה does not convey the sense: consider what Jehovah wills to have considered, i. e., His laws (for then the following would be pleonastic), but rather custodies custodiam Jehovah, keep the charge which thou art bound to Jehovah, to accomplish; be a true watchman in the service of Jehovah and for Him (comp. 1 Chron. xxiii. 32; xii. 29; Numb. iii. 6-8, 38). This charge is fulfilled in walking in the ways of God—in observing His various commandments. The expressions which here, as elsewhere, so frequently standing side by side, denote the latter (Deut. v. 28; viii. 11; Ps. cxviii. 5 sq.), do not admit of sharply-drawn distinctions; but they "denote together the totality of the law upon its different sides and relations to men" (Keil).—לְאֵי־חַיִּים does not mean exactly "to have good fortune" (Gesenius, De Wette, and others), but to be skilful, wise. He who in all things stands upon the commandments of God, and governs himself thereafter, is and carries himself wisely. What he does, will and must have a prosperous issue, and come to a right conclusion (Deut. xxix. 8; Jer. iii. 15 sq.); xxiii. 5; Prov. xvii. 8; 2 Kings xviii. 7).—In ver. 4 the positive promise in 2 Sam. vii. 11 sq. is expressed in negative form, as also in chap. viii. 25; ix. 5; Jer. xxxiii. 17. The לֹא־יִכָּרֵת "does not denote a completely unbroken succession, but only the opposite of a break forever" (Hengstenberg). Thy house and seed shall never be exterminated, what catastrophies soever may happen.

Vers. 5, 6. The charge which David delivers in vers. 5-9, were not, according to Ewald and Eisenlohr, originally made by him; but were first, at some subsequent time, put into his mouth in order to explain and justify Solomon's severity to Joab and to Shimei (chap. ii. 28 sq.). This supposition is as unnecessary as arbitrary.—Upon the double murder of which Joab was guilty, comp. 2 Sam. iii. 27 sq., and xx. 8 sq. The first threw a false suspicion upon David (2 Sam. iii. 37); the second was coupled with scorn and defiance of the royal authority (2 Sam. xx. 11); hence what he has done to me (to my injury).—דָּם־מִלְחָמָה, ver. 5, literally, he shed "blood of war" in peace, i. e., he furnished an unheard of example when he killed Abner and Amasa, not as foes, in open, honorable warfare, but murderously destroyed the inoffensive. Instead of the second "blood of war," Thenius, after the Sept. (αἷμα ἀνδρῶν), reads דָּם־אֲדָמָה, which makes good sense, certainly, but is unnecessary.—Girdle and shoes are not here introduced as "especial parts of oriental costume" (Thenius, Keil); nor is it thereby said, "from the girdle of his loins, to the latchet of his shoes," i. e., over and over (Ewald); but girdle and shoes here are rather the marks of the warrior, as in Isai. v. 27 and Eph. vi. 14 sq., for the sword is fastened to the girdle (2 Sam. xx. 8), and the shoes serve for marching, and provided with both, one enters upon battle. David also means to say: Joab has soiled with murder and blood the insignia of his rank and dignity as a soldier and generalissimo, and covered his office with shame and disgrace.—According to thy wisdom. "David does not wish Solomon to invent a pretext for taking Joab's life; but he exhorts him to observe wisely the right moment and occasion, when Joab shall furnish a reason, to hold him to account also for his blood-guiltiness, so that no murmuring shall arise among the people; but every one can see the justice of the punishment" (Starke).—In peace, i. e., so unpunished as if he had done only good, and committed no crime worthy of death.

Vers. 7-9. Barzillai. Comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 27 sq. At thy table, i. e., not "that they shall have the privilege of eating with the king at the royal table itself" (Keil); but they shall receive their necessary food from the court, like the royal servants (Dan. i. 5). The recollection of the noble service of Barzillai leads to the mention of the crime of Shimei, committed on the same occasion (2 Sam. xvi. 5 sq., and xix. 21).—עָפָרָה (ver. 8) does not mean under thy power (Starke), but near thee. Bahurim, where Shimei dwelt (2 Sam. xvi. 5), was a village in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. 7, 9, 7), about one and a-half hours' (five miles and a quarter) distant from it. David does not say simply, he cursed me; but emphatically, he cursed me with a curse, and adds the epithet, נִמְרָצָה, which, according to Thenius, because the primary signification of נִמְרָצָה is, to be exhausted, sick, means "heinous" in the sense of horrendus. According to Kimchi and Gesenius, the primary signification is, to be powerful, strong, and for this the remaining passages, where the word occurs, decide (Mich. ii. 10; Job vi. 25; xvi. 3; Vulgate, Maledictio pessima).—For thou art a wise man, and knowest, i. e., I leave to thy discretion the how and when of the punishment. An αἰρία εὐλογος (Josephus), will not be wanting. With blood, the opposite of the "in peace" in ver. 6, inasmuch as he has deserved it.

Vers. 10, 11. In the city of David, i. e., in Mount Zion, in which, caves that served as burial vaults were constructed (Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. a. 736). According to Thenius the entrance into these vaults was on the east, in the vale Tyropoeon, in a sloping declivity of the mountain, opposite the spring Siloam. The later kings also were buried here (1 Kings xi. 43; xiv. 31; xv. 8, &c.). The still so-called kings' graves are different, and are situated on the opposite side, to the north of the Damascus gate (Robinson, Palestine, vol. i. p. 240 and 357 sq.). David had, without doubt, prepared these burial-places for himself and his successors. In what high estimation his tomb was held is clear from the circumstance that it was known even during the time of Christ (Acts ii. 29). According to 2 Sam. v. 6, six months were added to the seven years. Ver. 12 is the transition to the next section, where it is told how Solomon's administration was strengthened.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. In the last words of David to Solomon, it is not so much the father speaking to his son, as the king of Israel, the head of the theocratic kingdom, to his successor upon the throne. From this stand-point we must view alike the general and the special portions of the whole discourse. The calling of a king of Israel consisted especially in this: to preserve the "kingdom of Jehovah" (1 Chron. xxviii. 5; xxix. 23); to be not the representative, but the servant of Jehovah, the true and proper king, also to observe "all the words of the Law, and all the ordinances of Jehovah" (Deut. xvii. 14-20); but, before all, that supreme and chief command, Exod. xx. 3-6, to observe completely the covenant which Jehovah had made with His chosen people. With this high calling David's soul was completely filled; and as he had continually "done what was right in the eyes of Jehovah, and had not turned aside from anything that had been enjoined upon him all his life long" (1 Kings xv. 5), so, also, in the last moments of his life, it was his greatest solicitude that his successor upon the throne should stand upon "the charge of Jehovah" (ver. 3), i. e., should take care that the law of Moses, with all its particular precepts, in their entire circumference, should be maintained. This he earnestly and solemnly sets forth as the foundation of a prosperous and blessed reign, and as the condition of the fulfilment of the promise made to him in respect of the continuance of his "house" (2 Sam. vii.). So David appears here, yet once more, in his grand historical significance, namely, as the type of a theocratic king, by which the conduct of all subsequent kings is measured (chap. iii. 3, 6, 14; ix. 4; x. 4-6; xi. 33-38; xiv. 8; xv. 6-11; 2 Kings xiv. 3; xvi. 2; xviii. 3; xxii. 2). The throne of David is Israel's model throne; no king of Israel has left behind him such a testament as David here.

2. It is worthy of remark, that the man who reigned forty years, and whose life as ruler was so rich in experience, should, amongst the counsels he imparted to his successor, have placed this in the fore front; "be thou strong, therefore, and show thyself a man!" He knew what belongs to the office of ruler. Moral weaknesses, swaying hither and thither like a reed moved by the wind; unseasonable pliability is a greater defect in a ruler than if he be overtaken by this or that particular sin in private life. Rightly says the Scripture,

Woe to the land whose king is a child (instead of a man), Eccles. x. 16. Firmness and manliness, however, are not the fruit of caprice, and of an unbroken heart. It is through grace that the heart is made strong (Heb. xiii. 9).

3. The special directions, which refer to individual persons, David likewise communicates, not as a private man, but as king of Israel. Joab's double murder had gone fully unpunished. At the time of its commission David was not in a condition to be able to punish him; but he felt the full weight of the deed, and in his horror of it uttered an imprecation of Joab (2 Sam. iii. 29). In the eyes of the people, nevertheless, the non-punishment must have been regarded as an insult against law and righteousness, the charge of which devolved upon the king. "It was a stain upon his reign not yet blotted out. Even upon his death-bed he cannot think otherwise than that it is his duty, as that of the supreme judge, to deliver to his successor a definite direction about it" (Hess, Gesch. David's, ii. s. 220). It lay upon his conscience, and he desired that this stain somehow ("do according to thy wisdom," ver. 1) should be removed. Moreover, Joab's participation in Adonijah's revolt must have appeared as dangerous for the throne of Solomon. As the punishment of Joab was to him a matter of conscience, so also was Barzillai's compensation. What Barzillai had done, he had done for him as king, as the anointed of Jehovah. Such fidelity and devotion to the legitimate reigning house (Königthum) in a time of great and almost universal falling away, ought to be publicly requited, and to be recognized in honorable remembrance after the death of the king. This compensation must serve, no less than the righteous punishment of Joab, to the firm establishment of the throne of Solomon. In direct contrast with the action of Barzillai was that of Shimei. He did not curse David as a private person, but he cursed him with the heaviest curse as the "anointed of Jehovah," and therein Jehovah himself directly. For blasphemy against the king was on the same level with blasphemy against God (2 Kings xxi. 10). Both were punished with death (Lev. xxiv. 14 sq.; Exod. xxii. 27; 2 Sam. xvi. 9), hence also Abishai thought that Shimei should be put to death (2 Sam. xix. 22). But David wished on the day when God had shown him a great mercy, to show mercy himself, and upon that account spared his life. But "it was no small matter to allow the miscreant to spend his life near him (no banishment was talked of). And to permit him to spend his days quietly under the following reign (which had never been promised him), would have been a kindness that might have been greatly abused as a precedent of unpunished crimes" (Hess). In fact, Shimei was a dangerous man, and capable of repeating what he had done to David. As for the rest, David left Solomon to choose the manner and time of his punishment, only he was not to go unpunished.

4. David's conduct on his dying-bed has frequently been regarded as a great reproach to him. The latest (secular) history passes the following judgment upon it: "If David's life and deeds had not sufficiently shown his mind, these last words of the dying man would leave no doubt about his character. . . . We must turn away from such blood-thirsty desire for revenge which, though innate with the Semitic races, is united here with a concealment of purpose and malice that are peculiar to David. His vengeance, even out of the grave itself, determines to strike, through the hand of his son, an insignificant man, to whom he (David) had once promised forgiveness when he himself was in a strait. Forgetting all the services and victories he owed to Joab, David determines, in order to gratify a long-cherished ill-feeling, to have a man, to whom he owed his kingdom and whom he himself had not ventured to touch, murdered by his son, ostensibly for two acts which Joab did, if not with David's consent, yet by no means against his will; the fruits of which David had willingly accepted, and which acts he had not made the slightest efforts to punish" (Duncker, Gesch. des Alterthums, i. s. 386). In this view it is entirely overlooked that David did not then speak as a private man, but as a theocratic king, and this judgment of him is quite false, no regard being paid to the time and the circumstances. The rough, false assassin Joab, who finally conspires with Adonijah, is made to appear as a man of high merit, and the blasphemous and traitor Shimei, as an insignificant, unfairly-treated man, while David, who departs life without one crime on his conscience as king, and who desires to fulfil the demands of justice as well as of gratitude, is said to have displayed the whole of his wicked and malicious character at the last. "Nothing but an uncritical confusion, which wished to behold in David a saint and a complete model of virtue (which the Scriptures nowhere assert him to be), could call forth, as contrast, the degradation of the king, which is as one-sided as unpsychological" (Winer, R.-W.-B., i. s. 258). [Yes! but our author forgets that David had sworn to Shimei, Thou shalt not die! (2 Sam. xix. 23); and "the king" it was (i. e., David as king) that "swore unto him." Clearly David's act of grace to Shimei was an act of royal right, royal clemency, and nothing but sophistry can justify his dying charge to Solomon not to let the unfortunate man die in peace.—E. H.] When Bunsen's Bibel-werk says: "The vengeance of David can never be justified from the Christian point of view," it is quite overlooked that that point of view is not the fitting one here. David belonged to the Old Testament economy, to the time of the law, not the gospel, and his conduct must be judged in the light of the former. It is an anachronism to measure Old Testament persons by the standard of the sermon on the mount. Besides, the same apostle who exhorts the believers as follows: Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, immediately after, speaking of authorities—and David speaks as such here—tells them that they are "ministers of God, revengers to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil" (Rom. xii. 19; xiii. 4). In the kingdom of God in which the law of earthly punishments prevailed, such a crime (like that of Joab and Shimei) could not remain unpunished. He, too, who, when He was reviled, reviled not again; who, when He suffered, threatened not (1 Peter ii. 23), announced in a parable the final judgment of His enemies: "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke xix. 27: v. Gerlach). We scarcely find as many instances of personal love to a foe, generosity and goodness, in the life of any Old Testament hero, as in David's. It is evident that the author of our books does not relate the commissions objected to, to vilify David at the last, as Duncker does, but on the contrary he tells them, to his honor, to show how entirely king of Israel David was, even on his dying-bed.

5. Chronicles (I., xxix. 28) relates the death of David with the addition that "he died in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honor." We see how much he was honored even in death, from the fact that his weapons were preserved as relics in the sanctuary (2 Kings xi. 10). Compare the eulogy in Ecclesiasticus, chap. xlvii. 2–11. For the character of the great, and indeed greatest, king of Israel, though now so often unjustly judged, by whose name the expected Messiah was designated by the prophets (Ezekiel xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Hos. iii. 5), comp. Niemeyer, Charakteristik der Bibel, iv. s. 107–358, and Ewald, Gesch. Isr., iii. s. 250–257, which says, with regard to the "last (poetical) words" of David (2 Sam. xxiii. 1–7): "No prince, especially one who did not inherit the kingdom, could close his life with more blessed divine peace, or a more assured and cheerful view into the future."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1–9. David's last words to Solomon (a) with regard to the kingdom generally (vers. 1–4), (b) respecting some individuals (vers. 5–9; see Historical and Ethical).—Ver. 2. Various are the paths of men from their birth, yet they all, kings as well as beggars, rich and poor, go the way to the grave (Ecclesiasticus xl. 1–3). And yet so many live as if they had not to travel that road (Ps. xxxix. 5, 6; xc. 11, 12).—The passing nature and vanity of the world, with its allurements and splendor, is a strong exhortation and warning from God to hold fast to the word that lives forever, and shall not pass even when heaven and earth pass away (1 Peter i. 24, 25; 1 John ii. 17; Luke xxi. 33).—Be firm and be a man! What is requisite to be one? how shall one become one? of what use? (Heb. xiii. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 5–8; xvi. 13).—Ver. 3. The last and best will of a father to his son: (a) Trust in God's protection of yourself and all whom God has confided to your care; (b) walk in His ways; let Him lead and guide you, He will do it well (Prov. xxiii. 26; Ps. xxxv. 5); (c) keep His ways and ordinances (Eccles. xii. 13; Ps. i. 1–6; Tob. iv. 6). Such an inheritance is greater and better than all the gold and land he might leave you.—True prudence and wisdom are not born of human thought and much knowledge, but are the fruit of the fear of God, and of walking in His ways and commandments (Ps. cxi. 10; Job xxviii. 28).—God-fearing parents are more anxious about their children keeping close to God and His word, than about leaving them temporal goods.—Ver. 4. The promises of God only proceed from His grace, not our merit; but their fulfilment is always coupled with conditions, which we have to perform if we would enjoy them (Heb. xi. 6; 1 Tim. iv. 8).—Vers. 5–9. We cannot go the way of all the world in peace, as long as we have anything remaining on our conscience, or any debt to justice and grateful love to cancel. We should forgive our enemies from our hearts, as we desire the Lord to forgive us, and especially on our dying-beds. But authority was instituted to "do justice; to prevent and punish wickedness;" it commits a sin and has a crime to answer for so long as it does not do this (Rom. xiii. 4; Gen. ix. 6).—Ver. 6. Gray hairs, if found in the way of righteousness, are a crown of glory (Prov. xvi. 31), adorned with which a man may go the way of all flesh in peace and comfort; but an old sinner, whom even gray hairs have not brought to repentance, goes down to the grave without solace or peace.—Ver. 7. A noble heart does not forget what was done for him in times of trouble especially, and thinks of it even in the hour of death. The world is ungrateful. A blessing rests on deeds of faithfulness and self-sacrificing disinterested love, and it descends to children and children's children.—Vers. 8, 9. A curse rests on those who curse the "powers" which are God's ministers, instead of praying for them, and they are made, sooner or later, to feel the curse (1 Peter ii. 17, 6). The Lord prayed for those who cursed Him; but when they did not repent and become converted, divine judgment came down on them. No doubt a wicked man often goes a long time unpunished for his deeds, but divine justice does not fail to overtake him finally, ere he is aware.—It requires wisdom to punish; a premature ill-judged chastisement does more harm than good.

Vers. 10-12. David's death: (a) He slept with his fathers (STARKE: The death of believers is a sleep, and being gathered to their fathers, who also still live with God, and await the coming resurrection to eternal life, Isai. xxvi. 19); (b) they rest in the grave. (Rest is good to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day forty years long—that rest which God has promised to those who strive after eternal life with patient continuing in good works. Rom. ii. 7; Isai. lvii. 2).—David's grave is a pledge that the memory of the just is blessed (Prov. xl. 7; Acts ii. 29), and that the blessing of the father builds the children's houses (ver. 12; Ecclesiasticus iii. 11).

CHAP. II. 13-46.]

- 13 AND Adonijah the son of Haggith came to Bath-sheba the mother of Solo-14 mon.¹ And she said, Comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably. He 15 said moreover, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And she said,² Say on. And he said, Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is 16 become my brother's: for it was his from the Lord [Jehovah]. And now I ask 17 one petition of thee, deny me not. And she said unto him, Say on. And he said, Speak, I pray thee, unto Solomon the king, (for he will not say thee nay,) that 18 he give me Abishag the Shunammite to wife. And Bath-sheba said, Well; I will speak for thee unto the king.
 19 Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adoni-
 jah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and she 20 sat on his right hand. Then she said, I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay. And the king said unto her, Ask on, my mother; for I 21 will not say thee nay. And she said, Let Abishag the Shunammite be given 22 to Adonijah thy brother to wife. And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah?
 ask for him the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and 23 for³ Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruiah. Then king Solomon swore by the Lord [Jehovah], saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Ado-24 nijah hath not spoken this word against his own life. Now therefore, as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, which hath established me, and set me on the throne of David my father, and who hath made me a house, as he promised, Adonijah 25 shall be put to death this day. And king Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; and he fell upon him that he died.
 26 And unto Abiathar the priest said the king, Get thee to Anathoth, unto thine own fields; for thou art worthy of death: but I will not at this time⁴ put thee to death, because thou barest the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] God before David my father, and because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was 27 afflicted. So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord [Jehovah]; that he might fulfil the word of the Lord [Jehovah], which he spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh.
 28 Then tidings came to Joab: for Joab had turned after Adonijah, though he turned not after Absalom.⁵ And Joab fled unto the tabernacle of the Lord [Je-29 hovah], and caught hold on the horns of the altar. And it was told king Solomon that Joab was fled unto the tabernacle of the Lord [Jehovah]; and, behold, he is by the altar.* Then Solomon sent Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, saying, 30 Go, fall upon him.' And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the Lord [Jehovah], and said unto him, Thus saith the king, Come forth. And he said, Nay; * but I will die here. And Benaiah brought the king word again, saying, Thus said 31 Joab, and thus he answered me. And the king said unto him, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him; that thou mayest take away* the innocent 32 [omit] blood, which Joab shed [without cause], from me, and from the house of my father. And the Lord [Jehovah] shall return his blood¹ upon his own head, who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword, [and] my father David not knowing thereof [knew it not¹¹], to wit, 33 Abner the son of Ner, captain of the host of Israel, and Amasa the son of Jether, captain of the host of Judah. Their blood shall therefore return upon the head of Joab, and upon the head of his seed for ever: but upon David, and upon his seed, and upon his house, and upon his throne, shall there be peace for ever from 34 the Lord [Jehovah]. So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him, and slew him: and he was buried in his own house in the wilderness.

 35 And the king put Benaiah the son of Jehoiada in his room over the host: ¹² and Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar.¹³ 36 And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Build thee an house in Jerusalem, and dwell there, and go not forth thence any whither.
 37 For it shall be, that on the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die: thy blood shall 38 be upon thine own head.¹⁴ And Shimei said unto the king, The saying is good: as my lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do. And Shimei dwelt in 39 Jerusalem many days. And it came to pass at the end of three years, that two of the servants of Shimei ran away unto Achish son of Maachah king of 40 Gath. And they told Shimei, saying, Behold, thy servants be in Gath. And Shimei arose, and saddled his ass, and went to Gath to Achish to seek his ser-41 vants: and Shimei went, and brought his servants from Gath. And it was told Solomon that Shimei had gone from Jerusalem to Gath, and was come again.
 42 And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Did I not make thee to swear by the Lord [Jehovah], and protested unto thee, saying, Know for a certain, on the day thou goest out, and walkest abroad any whither, that thou shalt surely die?¹⁵ and thou saidst unto me, The word that I have heard is good.
 43 Why then hast thou not kept the oath of the Lord [Jehovah], and the command-44 ment that I have charged thee with? The king said moreover to Shimei, Thou knowest all the wickedness which thine heart is privy to, that thou didst to David my father; therefore the Lord [Jehovah] shall return thy wickedness upon 45 thine own head: and king Solomon shall be blessed, and the throne of David 46 shall be established before the Lord [Jehovah] for ever. So the king commanded Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; which went out, and fell upon him, that he died.
 And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon.¹⁶

² Ver. 14.—[Two MSS. and some editions (followed by the Sept., Vulg., and Syriac) add ἐν = to him.

⁴ Ver. 26.—[The Sept., without authority, alters the place of the conjunction so as to read αὐτῷ θανάτου ἐν ἐν τῷ ἡμέρᾳ ταύτῃ, καὶ οὐ θανάτωσιν αὐτῷ.

⁶ Ver. 29.—[The Sept. add "And king (Alex. omit king) Solomon sent to Joab, saying, What has been done to thee that thou hast fled to the altar? And Joab said, Because I was afraid of thee, and I fled to the Lord."

⁷ Ver. 29.—[The Sept. add "and bury him." See ver. 31.

⁸ Ver. 30.—[One MS., followed by the Sept., Vulg., and Syr., adds ΝΥΝ after ἐν.

⁹ Ver. 31.—[The Sept. add σήμερον and translate ὅτι accurately "without cause." The Chald. gives both senses.

The Vatican Sept. omits the name of Joab.

¹⁰ Ver. 32.—[Sept. = the blood of his iniquity.

¹⁴ Ver. 35.—[The Sept. add καὶ Σαλωμών υἱὸς Δαυὶδ ἐβασίλευσεν ἐπὶ Ἰσραὴλ καὶ Ἰουδα ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. (Thus far Alex. omits) καὶ ἔδωκε κύριος φρόνησιν τῷ Σαλωμῶν καὶ σοφίαν πολλήν σφόδρα καὶ πλάτος καρδίας ὡς ἡ ἄμμος ἡ παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν. (See iv. 29.) Then follows the first verse of chap. iii. much altered, and a long interpolation which may be thus translated: "And the wisdom of Solomon was increased greatly above the wisdom of all the ancients and above all the wise men of Egypt (see iv. 30), and he (iii. 1) took Pharaoh's daughter, and brought her into the city of David, until he had made an end of building his own house and the house of the Lord in the first place, and the wall of Jerusalem round about: in seven years he made and finished them." V. 15 follows then. . . . "And Solomon made the sea and the bases and the great lavers and the pillars and the fountain of the court and the brazen sea. And he built the citadel and battlements upon it, he divided the city of David. So Pharaoh's daughter went up from the city of David into her own house which he built for her. Then he built the citadel. And three times in the year Solomon offered whole burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon the altar which he built to the Lord, and he offered incense before the Lord, and finished the house. And these were the chiefs (v. 16) which were set over the works of Solomon: three thousand and six hundred rulers of the people that wrought in the work. And he built Aashur and Magdo and Gezer (ix. 15, 17, 18) and Beth-horon the upper and Ballath. Besides his building the house of the Lord and the wall of Jerusalem round about, after these he built these cities." Then follows, with some variations, ii. 8, 9, which form the junction again with ver. 36.

¹⁶ Ver. 42.—[The Vatican Sept. omits the rest of ver. 42. The last clause is sometimes pointed, "The word is good: I have heard."

¹⁷ Ver. 46.—[Here follows in the Sept. a passage made up of extracts from chap. iv. and containing about one-fourth of that chapter, most of which is omitted from its place.—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

Ver. 13. And Adonijah . . . to Bath-Sheba, &c. What Adonijah really aimed at in his petition to Bath-Sheba is made apparent in ver. 22. He did not care about the fair Abishag, but about the kingdom, which he hoped to acquire through possession of her. In the ancient East, after a king died, or his kingdom passed from him, the harem fell to the new ruler. On the other hand, also, he who took to himself the king's wives, was regarded as having taken to himself the rights of the king. The claim to the possession of the women of the harem was understood to mean the claim to the throne. It was so also with the Persians (Herodot. iii. 68; Justin x. 2: occiso Cyro Aspasiam pellicem ejus rex Artaxerxes in matrimonium acceperat. Hanc patrem cedere sibi, sicuti regnum Darius postulerat). When Absalom went, according to Abithophel's advice, into the king's harem and to his concubines in the sight of all the people, it was a public, practical announcement that he had assumed the king's rights (2 Sam. xvi. 20-23; comp. xii. 11). When, therefore, Adonijah demanded Abishag for his wife, ostensibly from love to her, it was a secret claim to the throne; for Abishag was looked on by the nation as David's last wife, although he had not known her. He did not venture to make his request personally to Solomon, but, as Grotius says: aggre-ditur mulierem, ut regnandi ignaram, ita amoribus facilem. He plays, before Bath-Sheba, the part of an humble saint who has been set aside—who is resigned to God's will, thus softening her woman's heart. His assertion that all Israel wished him for their king, if not exactly a lie, showed great self-deception and boasting. He very wisely and prudently says, instead of: through thy intercession my brother became king (chap. i. 17)—the kingdom is turned about, and it was his from the Lord, which he of course did not believe, because he wished himself to be king. Bath-Sheba may have thought that a discontented subject might be satisfied by granting his request, and the kingdom made thus more secure to her son.

Vers. 19-21. Bath-Sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, &c., ver. 19. Solomon received his mother as מלכה (chap. xv. 13). The queen-mother was in great honor; and therefore the name of the king's mother is always expressly given in the account of the commencement of a new king's reign (chap. xiv. 21· xv. 2, &c.). The מלכה offered her was not literally a throne, but only a particular seat of honor. The seat at the right hand was the one of highest distinction (Ps. cx. 1; Joseph., Antiq. vi.-xi. 9). Bath-Sheba calls her petition a small one, because she thought it was only about a love-affair, and did not think of its political results.

Vers. 22-25. And King Solomon answered, &c. Solomon instantly detected the intrigue. He says, in asking Abishag for Adonijah, you indirectly request the kingdom for him too. He is my elder brother, and thinks that the kingdom belongs to him on that account; if he gets Abishag as wife, he will be further strengthened in his imaginary claims, and his entire party will have a firm footing. The ה beginning the concluding statement in ver. 22, cannot be understood otherwise than the preceding ה, and the ה in the following words must consequently mean the same. The meaning is this then: In asking the kingdom for him, thou askest it at the same time for Abiathar and Joab; they who have joined themselves to him, would reign with and through him; but they are well known to be my enemies. It follows, then, that both are included in Adonijah's plan. We cannot, therefore, translate like the Sept.: καὶ αὐτῷ Ἀβιάθαρ καὶ αὐτῷ Ἰωᾶβ ἑταῖρος, or with the Vulg.: et habet Abiathar et Joab; there is therefore no reason to strike out, with Thenius, the ה before Abiathar and Joab. Solomon's anger, which appears in ver. 23, was the more natural, because Adonijah had dared to gain over and abuse the queen-mother. The oath, which means: may God punish me continually if Adonijah be not, &c., is a usual one (Ruth i. 17; 1 Sam. xiv. 44; xx. 13; Jer xxii. 5).—The words of ver. 24: and who hath made me an house, are not to be understood, with Keil and others, as if Solomon had then had issue (his marriage did not occur till afterwards, chap. iii. 1); the meaning is this rather: Adonijah demands Abishag to wife, to found a dynasty through his union with her; but Jehovah has determined that David's dynasty and line of kings shall come from me (2 Sam. vii. 11 sq.).—The execution of Adonijah was performed by Benaiah, as captain of the Cherethites and Pelethites (chap. i. 38). מַנְיָא does not mean exactly with "his own hand"

lon, by the king's guard, the captain of which was therefore called שָׂר (רַב) מַבְחִים, Gen. xxxvii. 36; 2 Kings xxv. 8; Dan. ii. 14.

Vers. 26-27. And unto Abiathar the priest, &c. The proceedings now commenced against Abiathar and Joab, were no doubt caused by the share both had taken in the new plans of Adonijah to usurp the kingdom.—Anathoth, a priests' town in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 45), about one hour and a quarter's distance northeast of Jerusalem (Robinson, Palestine, vol. i. p. 437-8). Abiathar had possessions there.—To strike out the י before בְּיָוִם with Thenius (according to the Sept.), and place it before לֵא, is unnecessary: the meaning remains the same.—Bearing the Ark, on the occasion of David's flight from Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 24). That Abiathar and Zadok went with David then, bearing the ark of the covenant, showed great veneration and fidelity, upon their part, to him. Of course they did not carry the ark themselves; but it was borne by the levites, whose office it was to do so (Num. iv. 15; 1 Chron. xvi. 15), and who did it at their command. It is therefore quite unnecessary to read, with Thenius, מִפְּנֵי instead of מִן.—It does not follow from the banishment of Abiathar, that every king has the right to set up and depose a high-priest at pleasure. This case was a peculiar one. A high-priest who had repeatedly conspired against the anointed of Jehovah, had thereby become incapable of filling his office, and, strictly speaking, deserved death.—לֵא is an addition of the narrator, not the intention of Solomon; it is the ἐκ παραβολῆς of the New Testament. The divine threatenings upon Eli's house, from which Abiathar was (through Ithamar) descended, were now fulfilled; for when Saul slew the priests, Abiathar alone, of all his house, escaped (1 Sam. xxii. 20). With his deposition the hereditary high-priesthood passed over to Eleazar's house, to which Zadok belonged (Numb. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. xxiv. 5-6).

Vers. 28-35. Then tidings came to Joab, &c. The parenthesis means that Joab, who was formerly such a decided enemy of Absalom, who promised much more than his brother, had twice conspired with the pretender, Adonijah, and now feared for his own life, as he heard of his death, and of Abiathar's punishment. All old translations, except the Chaldee, have Solomon instead of "Absalom," and Ewald and Thenius declare the former to be the right reading; this, however, is not sustained by any Hebrew MS., and would, besides, make the sentence superfluous; for when Joab was on Adonijah's side, it follows of course that he was not on that of Solomon.—If Joab, who had been unpunished for his share in the first conspiracy, had felt free from all share in the second, he would not have fled to a place of refuge (chap. i. 50).—The Sept. adds, before Solomon's words, ver. 29: "What has happened to thee, that thou hast fled to the altar? And Joab said: I was afraid of thee, and have fled to Lord." Surely this is only a gloss; but it explains the passage. When Joab saw that Benaiah did not venture to kill him at the altar, he defied him, either because he hoped that Solomon would not dare to give the order, or that if he did, he (Solomon) would be guilty of desecrating the altar. But according to the law (Ex. xxi. 14; Deut. xix. 11-13), the altar was only an asylum for those who had killed unwittingly, and Joab was no such person. He had sinned grievously against Israel and Judah by a double assassination (ver. 32), and yet had gone hitherto unpunished. This guilt could not rest upon David and his house, if the kingdom was to continue in his line (ver. 33). Not to add the utmost disgrace to the punishment (chap. xiv. 11; 2 Kings ix. 35; Jer. vii. 33; xxii. 19), and in consideration of his military achievements, Solomon commanded that Joab should be buried with his fathers in the wilderness of Judah, which was not far from Bethlehem, near Tekoa, and was a rocky district containing some towns (Josh. xv. 61; Judges i. 16).

Vers. 36-46. And the king sent and called for Shimei, &c., ver. 36. As Adonijah and his faction had made such repeated efforts to seize the helm of state, Solomon deemed it needful to keep a watch on all suspected persons. Now the restless Shimei was the principal of these; he was a close adherent of the house of Saul, and a bitter foe of David's house. Solomon, therefore, in order to keep him in sight, and test his obedience, ordered him to settle in Jerusalem, and to leave it only under penalty of death. The brook Kidron is scarcely named as the exact limit of his confinement (Ewald); but Shimei was not to cross it, because, in doing so, he went towards Bahurim, in his native district, where he had most influence (2 Sam. xix. 16 sq.).—Thy blood, &c.—the usual mode of the death sentence, Levit. xx. 9-16.—Shimei declared he was satisfied to observe the king's command, for he knew right well that according to the ideas of that time, no king, not even Solomon, need feel himself bound by the promise of his predecessor (2 Sam. xix. 23), (Ewald, Gesch. Jer., iii. s. 271).—The Philistine king Achish, of Gath (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 8), may be the same who is mentioned in 1 Sam. xxi. 11; xxvii. 2; he must have certainly attained a great age; if so, Shimei, then, in spite of his solemn vow, not only left Jerusalem for his native place, not distant, but even went into the far-off land of the Philistines, thus giving proof of his disobedience and obstinacy. Solomon now reproaches him with his old crime, and says to him: thy measure is full; the Lord has turned thy curse into a blessing, as David hoped (2 Sam. xvi. 12).—The Vulgate, Thenius, Bunsen, and others place the concluding sentence of ver. 46 at the commencement of chap. iii.: "and when the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon, he made affinity," &c.; it seems, however, to refer back to ver. 12, and in the manner of Semitic histories, as Keil remarks, concludes the whole section of Solomon's throne-ascension. Thus the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon, i. e., under him.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The repeated attempt of Adonijah to gain the throne throws real light on his character. Though his enterprise came to a lamentable and disgraceful end, he immediately began to concoct new plans in spite of the favor and the warning he had received. As he once sought to obtain his purpose by collecting chariots, horsemen, and soldiers, through making fortified places, in short, by grand and showy preparations, he now pursued the opposite plan of fawning and artifice. He steals alone to Bath-sheba, placing his hopes on woman's influence. When she is astonished at his visit, he utters the most peaceful sentiments, acts as one deeply disappointed, but now humbly and piously resigned to God's will, and as an unhappy lover. If anything deserves the name of a "harem intrigue," through which, according to Dunccker, Solomon came to the throne (see above), it is Adonijah's device. He could not have shown more clearly that he was not the chosen of Jehovah (Deut. xvii. 15). What would have become of the kingdom which David had at last brought to tranquillity and its proper position, if a man like Adonijah had succeeded him?

2. Adonijah and his faction show the truth of what is often found, namely, that revolutionary men are not discouraged by the failure of their plans, and even disgraceful defeat, but they always brood over the means of attaining their ambitious views and gratifying their thirst for power. Pardon and forbearance do not change them, but generally harden and embolden them. If they do not succeed by open force, they choose deceitful ways, notwithstanding all the promises they may have given; and they feign submission until they think their opportunity has arrived. Every one, however, to whom God has confided the government, should hear the words of David to Solomon (chap. ii. 2): "be thou strong, therefore, and show thyself a man!" for weakness is, in this respect, sin against God and man. The old Württemberg summaries say: "let authorities learn from Solomon to punish such crimes severely, if they wish to have a happy, peaceful, and lasting reign. If they wink at such things, God's anger and punishments come down on them, on their land and people."

3. Solomon's treatment of his foes, has often been called great cruelty, or at least extreme severity. "Solomon," says Dunccker, "began his reign with bloody deeds. . . . He first promised Adonijah he should be spared, then had him slain by Benaiah. Joab fled to the sanctuary and caught hold of the horns of the altar. Benaiah trembled to stain the altar with blood, but Solomon tells him to go and stab him there! . . . Benaiah also killed Shimei at Solomon's command." In reading this imperfect and detestable view of the circumstances, we must remember that there is not to be found in the forty years of Solomon's reign, one single trace of barbarous tyranny or cruelty, such as are here said to have characterized him, though these qualities rather strengthen than otherwise with age. We cannot judge Solomon any more than David in the light of the sermon on the mount, but should recollect what the time and circumstances were. The vital point was to establish the kingdom, and in order to avert the dangers that threatened it, "every firm and sagacious ruler had to act so, for the artificial means now used in similar cases, for instance, imprisonment for life, were wholly unknown" (Ewald). As to Adonijah, the whole East knew but one punishment for such plans as he cherished, viz., death. Had his enterprise succeeded he would doubtless (see above, on chap. i. 11) have destroyed Solomon and his principal adherents, in accordance with the usual practice hitherto. Solomon, on the contrary, did not follow this custom, but showed forgiveness and generosity; in fact, he avoided all persecution of Adonijah's partisans. Only when Adonijah, contrary to his word, and notwithstanding his humble homage (chap. i. 51), again appeared as pretender to the throne, and sought to reach his end by deceit and hypocrisy, did he order the affixed punishment. He had allowed Abiathar, too, to go unpunished at first, which scarcely any other eastern prince would have done. But when the repeated attempt of Adonijah to seize the kingdom was discovered, Abiathar could no longer be passed over. Yet instead of inflicting death on him, he deprived him of his influential office, and let him live at liberty on his estate, on account of his former good behavior. Here was no severity, but gratitude, kindness, and generosity. Joab was the most formidable opponent, because of his position at the head of the entire army, and his well-known military roughness and unscrupulousness; he was also unpunished after Adonijah's first attempt, and the last was certainly not planned without his consent, but more likely, as some suppose, originated by him. The fact that he instantly fled to the horns of the altar, on hearing of Adonijah's death, shows that he knew himself to have deserved death. Besides this, the guilt of a double murder rested on him, and should be washed out. "When this was superadded," says Ewald (s. 271), "Solomon did not venture to show him any further grace," and adds in the note with great truth: "A superficial observer alone can charge Solomon with needless cruelty here." Finally, with regard to Shimei, nothing was more natural than that Solomon, in the circumstances attending the beginning of his reign, should have kept especial guard over such a restless, suspected person, who one day cursed the king, calling him a bloody man, and the next fawned upon and flattered him, and who besides was not without partisans (2 Sam. xvi. 7, comp. with xix. 16-20). Shimei was himself quite content with his confinement to Jerusalem, and Solomon let him live there "many days" (ver. 38), placing his fate in his own hand. After three years (not before), (ver. 39), when Shimei broke his solemn promise, what his king had threatened him with upon oath came upon him. "Surely, every one must at that time have seen in such fatal oblivion of the oath which the old arch-traitor had sworn against David, a divine sign, that that old sin still rested on him and that he must be punished; otherwise he would not have acted with such defiance of God and with such madness. Solomon had him also executed, evidently not out of revenge nor any other passion, but from the belief that the last of those who had sinned greatly against David, should fall under divine Providence" (Ewald, s. 272). How weak and forgetful of his word would the king have seemed to all the people if he had let Shimei now go free, particularly with the notions then entertained about a king! (Prov. xvi. 12-15; xx. 2, 26). It is worthy of remark that the settlement of Shimei at Jerusalem was coincident with Solomon's elevation to the throne; that his punishment did not at once follow that of Adonijah and Joab, but was three years later. We cannot therefore possibly reckon this among the "bloody deeds" with which Solomon is said to have begun his reign. The union of mildness and firmness, generosity and official justice, in the conduct of the young sovereign, must have deeply impressed the people, have increased his authority, and established his rule.

4. The establishment of Solomon's kingdom (ver. 46) is the result of all that chapters i. and ii. relate, and is therefore expressly stated again at their close. Our author evidently does this, not only from purely historical, but also from religious and theocratic grounds. In fact, throughout the whole of the genuine Old Testament history of Solomon's succession to the throne, the guiding hand of the living God is made apparent, far above the ferment of human passions and inclinations. He knows how to fulfil his threatenings, and to lead the way which each chooses for himself, to a goal where he shall find retribution of his deeds (Job xxxiv. 11).

'HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 13-25. Adonijah's repeated attempt to gain the throne: (a) Wherein this attempt consisted (vers. 13-18); (b) how it ended (vers. 19-25).—Vers. 13-18. Adonijah before Bath-sheba: (a) The feigned sentiment, in which he comes (vers. 13-15); (b) the request he brings (vers. 16, 17); (c) the answer he receives (ver. 18).—Ver. 13. Ambitious and power-loving people do not scruple to reach the ends which they cannot obtain by open force, by means that are mortifying to their pride; when they can no longer demand, they beg.—Those are least to be trusted who have proved themselves enemies, and suddenly appear with tokens of peace. Joab met Amasa with the words: Peace be to thee! and while kissing him, ran him through the body (2 Sam. xx. 9). Judas betrayed the Lord with a greeting and a kiss (Luke xxii. 48).—Ver. 15. Adonijah's boast and hypocrisy: (a) He boasts, like most rebels, of having all the people on his side, but his few adherents were some faithless men, who were won over by good eating and drinking, and who would desert him with the first change of the wind (chap. i. 41, 49). (b) He speaks and acts as a pious man, who humbles himself under God's hand (Job i. 21), while he resists His will in his heart, and seeks to overthrow His purpose (Matt. vii. 21; Prov. xii. 22).—Ver. 16 sq. The most presumptuous character is often hid under the mask of unassuming deportment.—Ver. 17. He who has an honest and just request to make seeks no roundabout ways, but goes openly and courageously with it to the person who can grant it. The serpent addresses the woman first, in order to gain the man, in paradise (Gen. iii. 1, 6; 1 Tim. ii. 14).—Ver. 18. Bath-sheba's consent to Adonijah's request shows want of sagacity, experience, and knowledge of human nature, but at the same time shows that her heart was free from revenge and bitterness, and was willing to serve even one who had caused her great anxiety and sorrow (chap. i. 21).—Kind and unsuspecting persons are apt to yield to their first feelings and impressions rather than reflect calmly and deliberately; it is therefore the more needful for them to guard against being led away by flattering speeches into promises and actions that may greatly injure themselves and others.—We ought not to refuse to intercede for others, but to take great care not to do it for the unworthy, thus injuring those who are deserving.—Those who are high in favor with the powerful are often used, without their wish or knowledge, for unworthy ends.

Vers. 19-25. Bath-sheba before the king: (a) How she was received by him (vers. 19, 20), but (b) was refused her petition (vers. 22-24).—Ver. 19. Solomon, when on the throne, did not forget what he owed his mother. How often do children forget their parents and nearest relations, and even become ashamed of them, when they attain to great riches and honor; but no position or rank dispenses with our observance of the fourth commandment, the first with promise (Ephes. vi. 2; Prov. xix. 26).—Ver. 21. STARKE: Even pious Christians are often ignorant of what they ask (Rom. viii. 26), and are therefore often unheard (Matt. xx. 22).—Ver. 22. Kings and princes should not grant even an apparently small petition, that interferes with the welfare of the kingdom and people committed to their charge. Seeming severity is in such cases sacred duty.—HALL: Considerations arising from personal relationship must be laid aside in the official acts of rulers.

Ver. 25. Punishment of Adonijah, how far it was (a) according to law, (b) just and deserved.

Vers. 26-46. Solomon's treatment of his enemies (see Historical).—Vers. 26, 27. Ecclesiastical office can be no protection from just punishment of crime (see Luke xii. 47; 1 Cor. ix. 27).—Former fidelity cannot efface later treachery. It is most lamentable that a man who was faithful in times of trouble should end his career as a sinner (1 Cor. x. 12).—[BP. HALL: No man held so close to David, . . . yet now is he called to reckon for his old sins, and must repay blood to Amasa and Abner.—E. H.] When circumstances permit, mildness and forgiveness should go hand in hand with justice.—Children should not forget kindness shown to their parents, but look on it as done to themselves; this is fulfilling the fourth commandment.—The promises of God are yea and amen; but so are also His threatenings, which are often executed when men have forgotten them.

Vers. 28-34. The terrible end of Joab: (a) He dies conscious of his guilt, without peace and pardon; (b) even in the very jaws of death he is defiant, rough, and proud; (c) he does not leave the world like a hero, but like a criminal. How differently David dies! (ver. 2).—Ver. 28. An evil conscience can put to flight a hero who never yielded to the enemy in a single bloody field.—STARKE: It is thus the wicked act when they get into danger; though they never before cared about God and His children, they will seek their protection then.—Ver. 30. What good is there in dying in a sacred place if one has not a sanctified heart and pure conscience? Prov. iii. 21-26.—Ver. 31 sq. STARKE: God has no sanctuary or city of refuge for an intentional murderer (Ex. xxi. 14).—LANGE: If a ruler leaves shed blood unavenged, the guilt attaches to himself; through just revenge it is averted.—Ver. 33. Only that throne stands firm upon which justice, without respect of persons, is exercised (Prov. xxv. 5).

Vers. 36-46. Shimei's fate plainly proves the truth of the word Job xxiv. 11; Ps. cxli. 10; Prov. v. 22.—Ver. 39. Avarice, i. e., covetousness, is the root of all evil. The loss of two servants led Shimei to disobedience, even to forget his oath and to risk his life. [Ver. 40 sq. BP. HALL: "Covetousness, and presumption of impurity, are the destruction of many a soul: Shimei seeks his servants and loses himself."—E. H.]—Vers. 41 sq. Divine justice at length overtakes those whose crimes have long been unpunished, and when they least expect it.—Those also who have cursed the anointed of the Lord, the eternal king of God's realm, and who have shot their poisoned shafts at Him, shall hereafter say to the mountains: Fall on us! and to the hills: cover us! (Luke xxiii. 30).

SECOND SECTION.

THE BEGINNING OF SOLOMON'S REIGN.

CHAP. III.-V. 14.

A.—Solomon's marriage, solemn sacrifice and prayer; first judicial decision.

CHAP. III. 1-28.

- 1 AND Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter, and brought her into the city of David, until he had made an end of building his own house, and the house of the Lord [Jehovah], and the wall
- 2 [walls] of Jerusalem round about. Only the people sacrificed in high places, because there was no house built unto the name of the Lord [Jehovah], until
- 3 those days. And Solomon loved the Lord [Jehovah], walking in the statutes
- 4 of David his father: only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places. And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there; for that was the great high place: a thousand burnt-offerings did Solomon offer upon that altar.
- 5 In Gibeon the Lord [Jehovah] appeared to Solomon in a dream by night:
- 6 and God¹ said, Ask what I shall give thee. And Solomon said, Thou hast shewed unto thy servant David my father great mercy, according as he walked before thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that thou hast given him
- 7 a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day. And now, O Lord [Jehovah] my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father: and I
- 8 am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in. And thy servant is in the midst of thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people, that cannot
- 9 be numbered nor counted for multitude. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad:
- 10 for who is able to judge this thy so great a people? And the speech pleased
- 11 the Lord,² that Solomon had asked this thing. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies;
- 12 but hast asked for thyself understanding to discern judgment; Behold I have done according to thy words: I have given thee a wise and an understanding heart; so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall
- 13 any arise like unto thee. And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches, and honor: so that there shall not be any among the kings like
- 14 unto thee all thy days.³ And if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as thy father David did walk, then I will lengthen thy
- 15 days. And Solomon awoke; and, behold, it was a dream. And he came to Jerusalem, and stood before the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah],⁴ and offered up burnt-offerings, and offered [made]⁵ peace-offerings, and made a feast to all his servants.
- 16 Then came there two women that were harlots,⁶ unto the king, and stood
- 17 before him. And the one woman said, O my lord, I and this woman dwell in 18 one house; and I was delivered of a child with her in the house. And it came to pass the third day after that I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also: and we were together; * there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house. And this woman's child [son]¹⁸ died in the night; because she overlaid it. And she arose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, while thine hand-maid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child [son]¹⁹ in my bosom. And when I rose in the morning to give my child [son]²⁰ suck, behold, it was dead: but when I had considered it in the morning, behold, it was not my son which I did bear. And the other woman said, Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son. And ²¹ this said, No; but the dead is thy son, and the living ²² is my son. Thus they spake before the king. Then said the king, The one saith, This is my son that liveth, and thy son is the dead: and the other saith, ²³ Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living. And the king said, ²⁴ Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the ²⁵ other. Then spake the woman whose the living child was unto the king, for her bowels yearned upon her son, and she said, O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it. But the other said, Let it be neither mine nor ²⁶ thine, but divide it. Then the king answered and said, Give her ²⁷ the living child, and in no wise slay it: she is the mother thereof. And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 7.—[Some MSS., followed by the Sept. and Vulg., prefix the conjunction and].

³ Ver. 10.—[Many MSS. read ליל instead of לילה, and are followed by the Chaldees.

⁴ Ver. 12.—[Many MSS. and editions, followed by the Vulg., have בכרי in the plural.

⁶ Ver. 15.—[The Sept. add ἐν ζυγῷ.

⁷ Ver. 15.—[The Hbr. עֹלֶת is the same before "peace-offerings" and before "feast," and is quite different from the עֹלֶת before "burnt-offerings." The distinction is accurately preserved by the Sept. and the Vulg.

⁸ Ver. 16.—[This translation is sustained here, as in Josh. ii. 1, by all the VV. except the Chald., and is undoubtedly the invariable and distinctly-marked sense of the frequent Hbr. word. The Chald. renders inn-keepers. The author's objection to the sense of harlots seems insufficient.

⁹ Ver. 18.—[Many MSS., followed by the Sept. and Vulg., prefix the conjunction and].

¹⁰ Ver. 19.—[It is better to retain throughout the passage the same rendering of the same Hbr. word.

¹¹ Ver. 22.—[One MS., followed by the Vat., Sept., and Arab., omits the second clause of ver. 22.

¹² Ver. 27.—[The Sept. remove any possible obscurity by paraphrasing, "Give the child to her that said, Give her," &c.—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. And Solomon made affinity. After the rule of Solomon was established by the removal of his enemies from within (chap. ii. 46), he sought to make it outwardly strong, also, by a family alliance with the king of Egypt. After David's great victories over the surrounding nations, and especially after the Philistines were rendered powerless, Egypt was the nearest and most powerful neighbor of the kingdom of Israel. As the latter had increased so much in extent and power, the king of Egypt may also have desired an alliance with the king of Israel (Ewald, Gesch. Isr., iii. s. 279); but such an alliance secured Solomon against other nations, and was even productive of an enlargement of his territory (chap. ix. 16). The Pharaoh named here "belonged certainly, following the synchronism, to the 21st Tanaitic dynasty, and may have been its last king, Psusennes or Psusennos, who reigned thirty-five years" (Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. s. 363).—This marriage with an Egyptian was not contrary to the law, since it only prohibited union with the daughters of the Canaanite tribes (Ex. xxxiv. 11–16; Deut. vii. 1–3). The supposition of some rabbins, that the Egyptian had become a proselyte, is unnecessary; it is certain, besides, that Egyptian worship was not introduced by her into Jerusalem; and even later no trace of it is found (chap. xi. 4–7).—By the city of David we are to understand the ancient and fortified Jerusalem, the citadel of David—the upper city. The dwelling for the queen was but temporary; when the new palace was built she inhabited it (chap. ix. 24).—"He made," says Josephus, "the walls wider and firmer than they had been." David had only fortified the upper city (2 Sam. v. 7, 9).

Vers. 2–4. Only the people sacrificed in high places, &c. Vers. 2 and 3 do not pronounce a judgment in general upon the condition of public worship in the beginning of Solomon's reign (Keil), but form an introduction to verses 4–15. The connection is this: when the rule of Solomon was established from within by the extirpation of his foes, and outwardly by an alliance with Pharaoh, Solomon held a great festival for all Israel (2 Chron. i. 2, 3), not only to implore Jehovah's further aid to his successful government, but also in gratitude for the past. But as Jehovah's house was not yet built, and as the people, for want of a central sanctuary, still sacrificed on high places here and there, Solomon followed this custom, but chose the greatest, i. e., the most important height, that at Gibeon, where the ancient tabernacle and the altar of burnt-offering stood. Vers. 2 and 3 serve then to explain how it was that Solomon, who loved Jehovah, and, like David, kept the law, celebrated his great inauguration-festival on a high place. [Bishop Horsley remarks on ver. 3: This is not mentioned as a circumstance of blame either in the people or in the king. For had they not sacrificed and burnt incense on high places, they could not have sacrificed or burnt incense at all. And it appears by the sequel that the sacrifice at Gibeon was acceptable.—E.H.]—The high places are very often used in these books in the same sense; but not always. That בָּמֹת does not mean "barred entrance," and then "sacred forest" grove (Thenius, Böttcher), is easy to see from Mic. iii. 12, where it is synonymous with הָר, mountain; comp. Mic. i. 3, 4; Jer. xxvi. 18, with Amos iv. 1, where בָּמֹת stands for בָּמֹת. The fundamental meaning is and must be: height, high place. Among all ancient nations, heights and mountains were naturally chosen as the fit places for offering-up to the Deity who dwells on high, far above earth. But as all prayer to and worship of the Godhead took the form of sacrifice, for which an altar was requisite, בָּמֹת became the expression for high places upon which altars were erected. By degrees, however, the use of the term became more extended, so that places of sacrifices, even if not on high places, but in towns, and even in valleys, were also called "high places" (2 Kings xvii. 9; Jer. vii. 31; xxxiii. 35). In heathen worship, besides the altars for sacrifices, they had many dwellings for the Divinity, not regular temples, but cells, chapels, tents, in which the image of the Deity stood, and these also were named בָּמֹת

(Ezek. xvi. 16); hence the expressions בָּמֹת הַבָּמֹת (1 Kings xiii. 32; 2 Kings xvii. 29), and בָּמֹת בָּנָה (1 Kings xi. 7; xiv. 23). Because the worship at the high places so easily became entangled with idolatry, the Mosaic law commanded that sacrifices should only be offered at Jehovah's dwelling-place—the tabernacle (Levit. xvii. 3). For the unquiet times of the Judges, however, this precept could not be obeyed; and as the patriarchs sacrificed on high places before the law was given (Gen. xii. 8), their example was followed; even Samuel did this (1 Sam. ix. 12 sq.). Thus it happened that this more convenient practice took deep root, and it was not until much later that it was found possible to abolish it (2 Kings xxiii. 4-23); it was always, however, an abnormality, though unavoidable, so long as an house for Jehovah's name, i. e., a central sanctuary, was wanting (for this last expression see below on chap. vi.).—A thousand burnt-offerings. In the entire ancient world, the greatest number of animals possible were collected for sacrifice at great festivals (see below on chap. viii. 62). The feast must have at least lasted more than one day. The passage we are considering has very unfairly been selected to prove that the king himself sacrificed, i. e., exercised priestly functions. Even the great number of animals offered contradicts this; so does chap. vi. 2; where king Solomon is said to have built the house of the Lord and made windows, &c., no more means that he performed masons' and carpenters' work than that he himself offered the animals in sacrifice.

Vers. 5-10. The Lord appeared to Solomon, &c. The expression נִרְאָה does not mean that Solomon saw Jehovah in any bodily form, but that Jehovah revealed himself to him. If the reading here and in ver. 10 be not יְהוָה, but מַלְאֲכֵי is to be subjoined to it; the last more general term serves to designate the words which Solomon understood to be really divine communications. For it is evident that the word יְהוָה does not specifically belong to the appearing, as Thenius thinks, from examination of the parallel passage in 2 Chron. i. 7, where נִרְאָה מַלְאֲכֵי occurs.—Solomon grounds (ver. 6) his request that Jehovah would grant him the gifts needful for a sovereign, upon the mercy shown his father David, to whom God had performed His promises, and raised up his son to sit upon the throne of Israel. He humbly calls himself a little child, not only as if he were just twelve years old, as some rabbins say, but because his youth was unfitted for the great and arduous task laid on him. Solomon died after a reign of forty years, and was named before (chap. xi. 4) יִזְבֵּן, which makes him, as is also the general opinion, twenty years old at least.—Going out and coming in is, like Deut. xxxi. 2; 1 Sam. xviii. 13, 16; 2 Sam. iii. 25; Ps. cxxi. 8, descriptive of the entire manner of life. The conclusion, from ver. 8, clearly refers to Gen. xxxii. 13; xiii. 16.—The שֹׁמֵר with לֵב (like Job xii. 3; xxxiv. 10; Prov. xv. 32, the seat of thought and knowledge, ver. 9), as is to be seen from לִשְׁמֹר מִשְׁפָּח (ver. 12), must be connected with the following לִשְׁפֹּחַ, and is not to be translated, as Luther has it, obedient heart; or as the Vulgate, cor docile. A right sentence depends upon the hearing, that is, the trial of the parties, and for this, understanding and judgment are most requisite for the judge (comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 17). Ver. 7 refers to ruling, but ver. 9 to judging: the two conjoined form the kingly office (1 Sam. viii. 6, 20; 2 Sam. xv. 4. Artemid. Oneir., ii. 14: κρίνειν τὸ ἀρχεῖν ἐλεγὼν οἱ παλαῖοι).

Vers. 11-15. And God said, &c. Instead of the life of thine enemies (ver. '1), ver. 13 reads כְּבוֹד; it is, therefore, military glory, victory which is meant. לִשְׁמֹר מִשְׁפָּח does not mean: "to exercise divine right" (Keil), but: to dispense justice.—Behold—it was a dream, not that he only knew on awaking that it was but a dream; and not that he remembered distinctly on awaking what he had dreamed (Seb. Schmidt), but: "that it was more than a dream (an ordinary one)—something really divine; of this he became so convinced on awaking, that immediately after his return to the capital, he went to the place where the sacred ark stood, and worshipped the Lord anew with many sacrifices and thanksgiving-offerings. The thank-offerings were for this extraordinary proof of divine favor" (Hess). The sequel showed that it was not a mere dream.

Ver. 16. Then came there two women, &c. This story is meant to show, by one instance, that Solomon had really received what he had prayed for, and what God had promised him (Theodoret: ἐπιδείξαι τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως ἐβουλήθη σοφίαν). Thenius counts the whole among those passages which the writer gave from oral tradition; but we must not overlook the fact that he did not take it, like other narratives, from the "book of the Acts of Solomon" (chap. xi. 41). [The writer of the Book of the Kings refers only at the end of Solomon's reign to the book of the Acts of Solomon, and not at each step in his career.—E. H.]—The rabbins derive נָתַן from נָן, to feed, nourish; and explain it thus with the Chaldee, here as in Josh. ii. 1, by פִּנְדָּקִין, i. e., hostesses, evidently to avoid some offence. On this account, it can scarcely allude to harlots, because they, as Calmet remarks, seldom have many children, and if they have, do not usually care much about providing for them. As נָתַן is generally spoken of intercourse which is extra-matrimonial, or adulterous, so this passage refers to "those who have had children, being unmarried" (Gerlach).

Vers. 17-23. And the one woman said, &c. She alleges that the other can persist so obstinately in her denial, because there was no one else in the house. The latter probably took the child away to avoid the just and heavy reproach of having killed her own child, and the consequent disgrace she would incur. This is at least more probable than that she wished to continue nursing for her health's sake (Thenius), or that she thought to inherit something in the future from the child (Hess); or, finally, that she intended to sell it afterwards for her support (Le Clerc).—In ver. 21, at first the time given is the morning, in a general way; but next, the expression is the same as clara luce (Vulgate), or, "as it was becoming brighter and brighter" (Thenius).

רַחֲמִים (ver. 26) is the New Testament σπλῆγχα (2 Cor. vi. 12; vii. 15). Comp. Gen. xliii. 30. Luther: "for her motherly heart yearned upon her son." The words: neither mine nor thine, &c., do not only show want of maternal love, but also envy and dislike of her accuser.—They feared. Comp. Luke iv. 36; viii. 25.

The sentence made a deep impression; אֱלֹהִים is here the same as in Ps. lxxviii. 16; lxx. 10.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Solomon's marriage with a daughter of Pharaoh was, strictly speaking, a political alliance; but it has, nevertheless, also significance in the history of redemption. The great and mighty king of the land, which for Israel had been "the house of bondage" in which it had eaten "the bread of affliction" (Exod. xx. 2; Deut. xvi. 3), gives now to the king of this once despised and oppressed people, his daughter in marriage, and must, in the providence of God, contribute to the strengthening of the Israelitish throne, and to the increase of the power and glory of the Israelitish kingdom. Thus was this marriage a witness for the divine beneficence in the deliverance from Egypt, to the goal of which Israel had come in the reign of Solomon—the period of the richest bloom of the kingdom: It was likewise a divine seal upon the independence of the people, which had begun with the exodus from Egypt, and now had reached its completeness. [We beg leave to dissent from the position here taken by our author. (Comp. Ereget on ver. 1). Solomon's alliance with the Egyptian princess for political purposes was after the fashion of worldly princes, and in direct hostility with the theocratic spirit. Egypt was quite as much an "abomination" as "Canaan," and we are surprised that our author should apologize for Solomon in the matter.—E. H.]

2. That sacrificing and burning of incense in high places was forbidden in the Mosaic law rests, not upon the grounds of outward regulation, but was a natural, necessary consequence of the Mosaic fundamental principles. Jehovah is one, and beside him there is no God. He has chosen Israel, out of all the peoples of the earth, to be His people; He has made a covenant with them, and as a sign and pledge of this covenant will He dwell in the midst of His people. As He himself is one only, so also is and can His dwelling-place be only one. This is the place where He "meets" His people, i. e., exercises the covenant relation (Exod. xxix. 42 sq.). The concentration of the Jehovah-cultus is connected as inseparably with monotheism, as is the worship in high places, i. e., in any favorite spot, with polytheism. From the Mosaic standpoint, the worship in high places appeared as an ignoring, yea, as a denial, of the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of His people, and, consequently, of the election and of the covenant of Jehovah, whereof it was the witness and pledge (cf. Josh. xxii.). If the law in question could not be carried out in times of unrest and of convulsion, nevertheless, as soon as the period of the undisturbed possession of Canaan was entered upon, it would remain the business of every truly theocratic king, as the servant of Jehovah, to put an end, as far as possible, to worship in high places. Hence, also, was David, after he had won for Israel victory over all enemies, most earnest to erect an enduring central sanctuary, for which the old tabernacle, especially since the removal of the ark of the covenant from it, was no longer serviceable. Since this, however, was denied him, he laid the charge of it upon Solomon, his son and successor, and made the building of a "house of Jehovah" the first and most pressing duty of his reign (1 Chron. xxviii. 2 sq.). After the building of the temple, sacrificing in high places should have disappeared totally; but it forever kept emerging, even under kings who in other respects adhered firmly to the worship of Jehovah. Nevertheless, it is constantly spoken of as a defect or an abnormality (1 Kings xv. 14; xxii. 44; 2 Kings xii. 4; xiv. 4; xv. 4, 35; xxi. 3).

3. The divine revelation which Solomon received, came, as in so many other instances both in the Old and also even in the New Testament, through the medium of a dream. In itself the dream is, according to the Scripture, something wholly idle and vain (Eccles. v. 6; Job xx. 8; Is.

xxix. 7. 8); in so far, however, as man is then removed entirely from the sensible and outward world, and is in the condition of a pure psychical intuition, he can, more than in the natural, wakeful condition, become a more receptive soil for divine influences and communications. Hence, in Ecclesiasticus xxxi. (xxiv.) 2 sq., while the nothingness of dreams is taught, yet in ver. 6 this statement follows: ἐὰν μὴ παρὰ ὑψίστου [sc. τὰ ἐνύπνια] ἀποσταλῇ ἐν ἐπισκοπῇ, μὴ ὅπως εἰς αὐτὰ τὴν καρδίαν σοῦ. Dreams of the latter description are placed, consequently, on a level with prophecy and visions, which are the operation of the רוח of Jehovah

(Joel iii. 1). But these invariably presuppose a certain spiritual temper upon the part of the dreamer. "The prophetic dream of the night, as a rule, is connected with the moral reflections and presentiments of the day" (Lange, on Gen. xx. 3). A soul directed towards God and divine things in its wakeful state, is peculiarly fitted, in the stillness of the night, in its involuntary expressions, i. e., in its dreams, to receive purely spiritual, inwardly divine influences. Such was the case with Solomon. His dream shows what then agitated and filled his soul, and that the festivity he then held was not an empty political ceremony, but resulted from an actual religious need. An Adonijah, at his feast at the spring Rogel (chap. i. 9-25), would never have been able to dream so. If ever dream contained nothing chimerical (visionary), it was Solomon's dream at Gibeon. [Bp. Hall, beautifully: "Solomon worships God by day: God appears to Solomon by night. Well may we look to enjoy God when we have served him.—E. H.]

4. The prayer of Solomon unites in itself all that belongs to a true prayer. It affords evidence especially of the genuine theocratic spirit in which this son of David had been educated, and was now entering upon his royal office. He recognises the greatness of the task to be the king of the people which Jehovah has chosen from among all peoples of the earth, and his first and greatest anxiety is to comply with this demand. He feels that he, especially in his youth and inexperience, cannot do this of his own strength, and he prays for enlightenment from on high, not so much for himself as for the sake of the people. It is not his own merit which gives him courage for this prayer, but he rests it upon the divine grace and mercy which his father had so richly experienced. His words are not many, but the few he utters are the expression of a living, child-like faith, as simple and substantial as it is inward and true.

5. The history of the two women "is genuinely Oriental, in which we must dismiss from our minds wholly, our forms of justice and processes of proof: since an accurate, striking flash, which solves the difficulty, in living, immediate insight with one stroke, as with the sharpness of a sword, is far loftier than a regular consideration and balancing of the grounds advanced, for and against. Therefore, this wisdom, as belonging to the period, to the land, and to the whole people, must be looked upon as a high gift of God, as, indeed, it actually was" (Gerlach). Examples of similar judicial decision are not wanting in antiquity. Grotius observes: Non dissimile illud Ariopharnis regis Thracum, qui de tribus filiis æ Cimmeriorum regis dicentibus eum pro filio habuit, qui jussu cadaver patris jactis noluerat, incessere. Oua historia est apud Siculum Diodorum. Another instance "is adduced by Robertson from an Indian book. A woman in bathing left her child on the bank of a pond. A female demon who was passing by carried it off. Both appear before the goddess with their claims. She commands that each shall seize an arm and a leg and pull at it. The mother of the child is recognised by her refusal" (Philippson). Solomon demonstrated his capacity as judge in the case in hand, in so far especially that, in the absence of witnesses and of outward means of proof, he knew how to bring the secret truth to light in such way as to convince the contestants themselves. The words of Prov. xvi. 10 are here confirmed. While Niemeyer, in the judgment of Solomon, recognises, if not "God's wisdom," at least "rapid decision, presence of mind, and an accurate insight into human nature," other theologians of the illuminati period, have seen nothing more than "the proceeding of an Oriental despot, a fancy which would not do much to subserve the interests of a European prince" (G. L. Bauer in Keil on the place). He who judges so unwisely, only shows in the act, that in like or similar circumstances he would scarcely have reached so wise a judgment as Solomon's. Little as Solomon's procedure may correspond to our present notions of the administration of justice, formally considered, nevertheless that which for all time remains the chief point was not wanting, ver. 12—the divine gift of bringing to light the secret, inward fact, and of awakening the sleeping conscience, so that falsehood and misrepresentation vanish, and the truth comes forth. Without this gift all forms and rules of investigation avail nothing; yea, as experience has so often shown, they serve to pervert the conscience and to conceal the truth.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. CRAMER: Although marriage with persons of unlike faith be allowed, and is in itself no sin (1 Cor. vii. 14), it is, nevertheless, better that one avoid it, because the unbelieving perverts the believer more frequently than the believer converts the unbeliever.—STARKE: God has the hearts of all men in His hands, and can bring it to pass that they who have been inimical to us, and have despised us, shall hold us in great honor (Prov. xvi. 7; Gen. xxxi. 24).—As soon as Solomon saw his existence secured, he proceeded to matrimony.—Ver. 2-4. Solomon's Sacrificial Festivity: (a) When he celebrated it (at the beginning of his reign to return thanks for the past assistance of God, and to implore its continuance); (b) where he kept it (upon the high place at Gibeon, because no temple was built as yet: the place of prayer in the Old and in the New Testament).—Though God dwell not in temples built by human hands, yet it is needful for each congregation to have an house, where with one mouth it praises the name of the Lord. Where this need is not felt, there is a defect in faith and love for the Lord.—Ver. 3. He loved the Lord. This is the best and greatest thing that can be said of a man. So, every one who loves the world, has not in him the love of the Father: this is only where God is loved above all things, His word observed, and His commandments fulfilled with joy and delight (1 John ii. 5, 15; v. 3). Happy is he who, to the question of the Lord: Lovest thou me?

can return the answer of Peter (John xxi. 17). Because Solomon loved the Lord he honored also his father, and walked in his ways. The want of filial piety in our day comes from want of love to the Lord.—Ver. 4. If we should begin our daily work with the sacrifice of our prayer, how much more our life's calling, and every weighty undertaking upon which our own and the well-being of other men depends (God grant it, He who can help, &c.).

Vers. 5–15. The Prayer of Solomon: (a) Its contents (ver. 6–9); (b) its answer (ver. 10–14).—Ver. 5. STARKE: Those who love God (ver. 3), God loves in return, and reveals himself to them (John xiv. 21).—HALL: The night cannot be otherwise than holy to him whom the previous day has been holy.—In our dreams we often speak and act in such way that we must be frightened, upon awaking, at how much that is impure and corrupt is still within us. Upon this account we should pray in the evening: Ah! may my soul in sleeping also do that which is good, or, if I dream, be it from thee, so that my senses even in sleep may acquire love for thee, &c. (Ps. lxxiii. 7).—[One is here reminded of Bp. Ken's beautiful evening hymn: "Glory to thee, my God, this night."—E. H.]—A dream like Solomon's does not happen when the day just past has been spent in revel and riot, in gross or in refined sin.—LISCO: What happened here in dream, Christ commands in "Our Father."—STARKE: God well knew what Solomon needed; but he bid him ask, (1) to show how negligent men are in praying for what is spiritual; (2) that he would only bestow His gifts in the ordinance of prayer; (3) that great personages might have an example of what they should ask of God, above all others. Ask what I shall give thee: (a) a test-word, for as man wishes and prays, so does he show of whose spirit he is the child (Ps. cxxxix. 23); (b) a word of warning, for we not only may, but we should also ask for all which we have most at heart (Ps. xxxvii. 4).—Ver. 6–10. When is our prayer pleasing to God? (a) When we pray in the feeling of our weakness and helplessness, and in confidence in the mercy of God and His promises; (b) when before all things we ask for spiritual blessings and gifts (Matt. vi. 33; Eph. i. 3).—The true wisdom for which we have to ask God (James i. 5), does not consist in manifold and great knowledge, but in the understanding of what is good and bad (Job xxviii. 28; James iii. 17; Eph. v. 17), and is a fruit of the renewal of our mind (Rom. xii. 2).—A ruler who does not ask God for an obedient heart for himself, can and ought not to hope for or expect that his people will yield him a submissive heart.—Youth, which as a rule places freedom in lawlessness, needs before all things to ask God daily for an obedient heart.—Vers. 8, 9. PRAFF: Subjects are not simply creatures of the authorities, nor are they designed for the exercise of their pleasures and the splendor of their position (Hoheit); but they are God's people, and as such, are to be governed and judged.

Ver. 11–14. The granting of Solomon's prayer teaches and assures us: (a) That God grants more than they request, over and above praying and understanding, to those who call upon him with earnestness, and for spiritual gifts (Eph. iii. 20; Matt. vi. 33); (b) that God gives to him upon whom He confers an office, that is, to one who does not rush into an office or calling, but is called thereto by God, the necessary understanding, if he humbly seek it.—Where there is wisdom, there comes, indeed, also gold and silver (Prov. iii. 16 sq.), but not the reverse.—Ver. 15. HALL: A heart conscious in itself of the living evidences of a special grace of God, cannot forbear feeling that it should be authenticated through outward signs, and especially through munificence.

Vers. 16–28. LISCO: Solomon's Wise Judgment: (a) The question in dispute (vers. 16–22); (b) the decision (vers. 23–28).—Vers. 17–22. Such sin brings together, but it unites only for a short time; for it produces discord, wrangling, and controversy. Abiding peace dwells only in the house where the God of peace binds hearts together.—He who takes from the heart of a mother her child, or estranges or deprives her, will not escape the righteous tribunal of the judge to whom the mother (das Mutterherz) calls and appeals.—Litigation is generally associated with envy, falsehood, and unrighteousness, hence the Lord says, be ready, &c. (Matt. v. 25; Luke xii. 58).—Ver. 26. If an immoral woman be merciful for the son of her body, and cannot forget her little child (kindleins), how much more should every Christian mother be ready to offer, when necessary, the heaviest sacrifice to deliver her child from moral ruin.—SEILER: If in the hearts of sinners the love of father and mother be so strong, how strong must the fatherly love of God be (Isai. xlix. 15)?—Envy hardens all human feeling, and makes one hard and heartless.—Ver. 27. When a child, apparently given over to death, is restored to its parents by divine providence, so much the more must their chief solicitude be to educate and bring it up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.—Not power and force, not great pomp, and pride, and tyranny, but wisdom and righteousness, give to the government authority, and call forth genuine fear and the voluntary obedience of the people.—If it were given to a Solomon to bring to disgrace lying and misrepresentation, by judicial wisdom and knowledge of the human heart, and to deliver a righteous judgment, how much less shall liars and hypocrites stand up under the tribunal of Him who could say, A greater than Solomon is here! who, without needing witnesses and judicial examination, will bring to light what is hidden in darkness (1 Cor. iv. 5), and before whose judgment-seat we must all appear (2 Cor. v. 10).

CHAP. IV. 1-34 (IV. 1; V. 14).

1, 2 So king Solomon was king over all Israel. And these were the princes
 3 which he had; Azariah the son of Zadok the priest.¹ Elihoreph and Ahiah, the 4 sons² of Shisha, scribes; Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud, the recorder. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the host: and Zadok and Abiathar were 5 the priests; and Azariah the son of Nathan was over the officers: and 6 Zabud the son of Nathan was principal officer, and the king's friend:³ and Ahishar was over the household: and Adoniram the son of Abda was over the tribute.

7 And Solomon had twelve officers over all Israel, which provided victuals for 8 the king and his household: each man his month in a year made provision. And 9 these are their names: The son of Hur, in mount Ephraim: The son of Dekar, in 10 Makaz, and in Shaalbim, and Beth-shemesh, and Elon⁴ beth-hanan: The son of 11 Hesei, in Aruboth; to him pertained Sochoh, and all the land of Hepher: The son of Abinadab, in all the region [highlands⁵] of Dor; which had Taphath the 12 daughter of Solomon to wife: Baana the son of Ahilud; to him pertained Taanach and Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, which is by Zartanah beneath Jezreel, from Bethshean to Abel-meholah, even unto the place that is beyond Jokneam 13 [Jokneam]: The son of Geber, in Ramoth-gilead; to him pertained the towns of Jair the son of Manasseh, which are in Gilead;⁶ to him also pertained the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, threescore great cities with walls and brazen bars:
 14, 15 Ahinadab the son of Iddo had Mahanaim: Ahimaaz was in Naphtali; he 16 also took Basmath the daughter of Solomon to wife: Baanah the son of Hushai
 17 was in Asher and in⁷ Aloth: ⁸Jehoshaphat the son of Paruah, in Issachar:
 18, 19 Shimei the son of Elah, in Benjamin: Geber the son of Uri was in the country of Gilead, in the country of Sihon king of the Amorites, and of Og king of 20 Bashan; and he was the only officer which was in the land. ⁹Judah and Israel were many, as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking and making merry.

21 And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river¹⁰ unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and 22 served Solomon all the days of his life. And Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures [cor] of fine flour, and threescore measures [cor] of meal.
 23 Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep, be-24 sides harts, and roebucks, and fallow deer,¹¹ and fatted fowl. For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphseh even to Azzah, over all the kings on this side the river: and he had peace on all sides round 25 about him. And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and 26 under his fig tree, from Dan even to Beersheba, all the days of Solomon. And Solomon had forty¹² thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve 27 thousand horsemen [saddle-horses]. And those officers provided victual for king Solomon, and for all that came unto king Solomon's table, every man 28 in his month: they lacked nothing. Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries [coursers¹³] brought they unto the place where the officers were, every man according to his charge.

29 And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and 30 largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea shore. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the 31 wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men; than Ethar the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol: and¹⁴ his fame was in 32 all nations round about. And he spake three thousand proverbs: and his songs 33 were a thousand and five.¹⁵ And he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also 34 of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, which had heard of his wisdom.¹⁶

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—[Our author translates הַכֹּהֵן "war der höchsten" for reasons given in the Exeg. Com. Kell also takes the same view of the word. On the other hand, all the ancient VV. (the Vat. Sept., however, omits the word) give the usual rendering, priest; so also Luther, and the A. V. The question really turns upon which of the names, Azariah or Zadok, the word is to be placed in apposition with. By the Masoretic punctuation, by the Chald., and by the Sept., (ὁ ἱερεὺς in the nominative), it is placed in apposition with Azariah, which, according to ver. 4, cannot be correct, if the translation priest be retained. Hence the adoption of the other sense by our author and Kell. But by the Vulg. (sacerdos in the Gen.), by the Syr., and the A. V., it is placed in apposition with Zadok, and the difficulty is thus removed, while the ordinary sense of the word is retained. In this way, too, the absence of the l before Elihoreph is accounted for. The sense will then be, Azariah (the son of Zadok the priest) was one of the scribes with Elihoreph and Ahiah.

² Ver. 3.—[Three MSS., followed by the Sept., write בן in the singular, thus making Ahiah only the son of Shisha.

³ Ver. 5.—[Here again we have the same question of translation as in ver. 2, but differently solved in the A. V. The

Heb. expression הַכֹּהֵן זָבֻד בֶּן־נָתָן is rendered by the author as well as by Kell, in the same way as in the

A. V. It is urged that בֶּן־ cannot be in apposition with Nathan because it is without the article (see Nordheimer's Heb. Gr., § 816). Admitting that the Heb. usage requires בֶּן־ to be regarded as a predicate, it is further urged that it cannot mean priest, because Zadok and Ahiah were "the priests." They certainly were the high-priests; but Zabud also may have been a priest. The Chald., Syr., and Vulg., all retain the sense of priest, and there seems no sufficient reason for rejecting it. "Zabud, the son of Nathan, was a priest, and the king's friend." Twelve MSS. and the Syr., for בֶּן־ read וְ.

⁴ Ver. 9.—[Eleven MSS., followed by the Vulg., prefix the conjunction וְ to בֵּית־; the Sept. supply its place by καὶ, and so our author translates. The Arab. uses the relative, "Elon which is in Beth-hanan." The locality is quite unknown.

⁷ Ver. 16.—[The Vulg., Sept., Syr., and Arab. make the preposition part of the name, and read Baaloth. This cannot be right. See Exeg. Com.

⁸ Ver. 17.—[The Vat. Sept. omits ver. 17 here, and gives it afterwards instead of the last clause of ver. 19. It also omits verses 20–26 (cf. chap. iii.). This whole list of proper names is variously modified in the VV.

⁹ Ver. 20.—[Most printed editions of the Heb. begin chap. v. at this point; so our author, and hence his note.—F. G.] The Sept., the Vulg., and Luther [also the A. V. and Walton's Polyglot] reckon chap. v. 1–14 as belonging to chap. iv., and begin chap. v. with its 15th verse.—Bähr.

¹⁰ Ver. 21.—[There is here no preposition in the Heb., although it is supplied in the parallel place, 2 Chron. ix. 26, וְהָיָה מִן־הָרִירָא מִן־הַנְּהַר הַזֶּה עַד־לְמַגְדֵּי הַיָּם. The Chald. has made up the deficiency by translating "from the river Euphrates unto the land of the Philistines and unto the border of Egypt," but the Vulg. (a flumine terra Philistinum usque ad terminem Ægypti), Syr., and Arab. reduce Solomon's empire to nothing. The Alex. Sept. has ἀπὸ τοῦ ποταμοῦ ἕως ἀλλοφύλων καὶ ἕως ὁρίων Ἀιγύπτου.

¹² Ver. 26.—The parallel place 2 Chron. ix. 25 shows, that not אַרְבָּעָתָּה אַרְבָּעָתָּה should be read, with which also Chron. x. 26 and 2 Chron. i. 14 accord.—Bähr. [The author accordingly rightly translates "four thousand;" but there is no variation in the MSS. nor in the VV.]

¹³ Ver. 28.—[הַרְשָׁתִּים, a superior kind of horse to the chariot-horses just mentioned. None of the VV. sustain the translation dromedaries. Kell translates "runners."

¹⁴ Ver. 31.—[The Vat. Sept. omits this clause.

¹⁵ Ver. 32.—[Sept.: five thousand.

¹⁶ Ver. 34.—[The Vat. Sept. here adds iii. 1, and continues: τότε ἀνέβη Φαραὶ βασιλεὺς Ἀιγύπτου, καὶ προκατέλαβε τὴν Γαζερ, καὶ ἐνεπύρσεν αὐτὴν καὶ τὸν Χανααντὴν τὸν κατοικοῦντα ἐν Μεργάβ· καὶ ἔδωκεν αὐτὰς Φαραὶ ἀποστολάς θυγατρὶ αὐτοῦ γυναικὶ Σαλωμών, καὶ Σαλωμών ψεφόμενος τὴν Γαζερ.—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. So king Solomon was, &c. According to Thénien, the section from chap. iv. 1 to 28 is borrowed from two different sources, and the contents of both are so woven together that the proper connection is now lost. Chap. iv. 2–19 may belong to the older and purely historical source; chap. iv. 1 and 20 to the later traditional one, as may also vers. 21, 24, 25, 26. "Vers. 22, 23, 27, 28 (probably in the following order: vers. 27, 28, 22, 23) contain the continuation of the account of the functionaries (taken from the more ancient source)."

It is true that a perfect accordance is obtained by this arrangement of the text, which is partly founded on the Septuagint; but the question is whether the text, as it lies before us, is so disconnected as to require such a forced alteration of style. We must presuppose the author possessed of enough understanding not to take what he found in good order, in his documentary sources, tear it apart, weave it together, and render the whole without connection. In chaps. i.–iii. he related how Solomon's kingdom became established and respected; in chap. iv. he tells how it was constituted, and in what a well-ordered and flourishing condition it was. Then he proceeds with the words of ver. 1: So king Solomon was king over all Israel, i. e., with the rule of Solomon over all Israel, such was its estate. Now comes the account of the regular government and management of the entire realm, by the various civil officers of different degrees (vers. 2-19); then the court establishment, which represented the prosperous state of the kingdom (22-28); and lastly, that of the extraordinary acquirements of the king himself (29-34). The first section is very naturally followed (ver. 20) by remarks on the great population and prosperous condition of the kingdom; and this leads to the further remark (ver. 21) that Solomon's dominion not only extended over the populous nation of Israel, but over the neighboring tribes, that were brought under tribute. His court establishment was equally brilliant, and it (vers. 22-28) corresponded with his extended sovereignty (ver. 24), and with the peacefulness which his subjects enjoyed (ver. 25). There is no want of connection in such a narrative.

Ver. 2. And these were the princes, the dignitaries (comp. the double list of those under David, 2 Sam. viii. 16-18, and ibid. xx. 23-26, where they are not, however, named הַכֹּהֲנִים), and there are two more here. The order of the offices is different in each of the three lists, so that we cannot therefrom form an opinion of their rank. It is characteristic that the military officers are named first in both of David's lists, and the civil offices are first in Solomon's. The Jewish expounders, the Vulgate, Luther, and Thenius, take הַכֹּהֲנִים in ver. 2 to be in the genitive case: "Azariah, the son of Zadok the high priest; Elihoreph and Ahiah the sons of Shisha, were scribes." But against this view are the accents (silluk with sophpasuk), according to which, a new sentence begins with Elihoreph; also "the omission of the copula ו before Elihoreph, which was absolutely necessary, if Azariah had been joined in the same office with the brothers Elihoreph and Ahiah" (Keil); finally, the son of the high-priest Zadok is named Ahimaaz in 2 Sam. xv. 27; xviii. 27; and 1 Chron. vi. 8, 9, and then his son Azariah זָבֻד must therefore certainly be translated here by: grandson. This, however, is not suitable here, because son is used six times consecutively in the following verses, so that we cannot understand why the writer does not say the son of Ahimaaz. It was scarcely possible either for a grandson of the priest Zadok to have been old enough then to stand at the head of the body of high dignitaries. All things considered, הַכֹּהֲנִים must here be understood like הַמְּלָכִים, ver. 3, as predicate-nominative, according to the opinions of Piscator, Le Clerc, Keil, and others. We may not translate like Ewald and Bunsen: "Azariah, the son of Zadok, was the high-priest," for according to ver. 4, Zadok himself, and also Abiathar, were; but there never were three high-priests at the same time. We are rather compelled, on the contrary, to take כֹּהֵן in the sense it bears in 2 Sam. viii. 18, and xx. 26, where it signifies a secular office. The Chron. (i. 18, 17) gives instead of כֹּהֲנִים in the first place לִיד הַמֶּלֶךְ, that is, the first at the king's side, those whom we now name ministers, or privy counsellors. The word in ver. 5 must necessarily have this meaning; where it stands without the article, Zabud was כֹּהֵן. If now Aza-riah is introduced in ver. 2 as הַכֹּהֵן, wholly analogous to the way in which the high priest, contrasted with the other priests, is absolutely הַכֹּהֵן (Exod. xxix. 30; Lev. xxi. 21; 1 Kings i. 8, 38; 2 Kings xi. 9, 16, etc.), so is he designated as the first or chief of the secular כֹּהֲנִים, upon which account he stands first in the list of the great office bearers. "Among the trusted privy counsellors of the king, he held the first place" (Keil). It is not necessary to suppose that Zadok, whose son he was, was the high-priest, for this name occurs very often (2 Kings xv. 33; Neh. iii. 4-29; xiii. 12; xl. 11), as well as the name Azariah (1 Chron. v. 36-40; ii. 39; 2 Kings xv. 30, &c.).

Vers. 3-6. Elihoreph . . . were scribes, &c.

סֹפְרִים means generally any one whose business it was to write or to count. The סֹפְרִים, as the highest civil officers, had, no doubt, the care of all clerical as well as financial matters; two are therefore specified.—For the office of מְסֻבֵּר see

Introduc. § 2. It is plain that he was not the "highest minister of state," as Winer thinks, because he is not the first, but the third in the list. As the copula is wanting before Josaphat, we cannot conclude, with Thenius, that he was above the

סֹפְרִים, to whom Azariah must in that case also have belonged.—Shisha must be the same as Shavsha in 1 Chron. xviii. 16, and Seriah in 2 Sam. xviii. 7. The office of the father under David, passed to his two sons under Solomon.—For Benaiah see chap. ii. 35.—Ewald thinks the words: And Zadok and Abiathar (were) the priests a mere unnecessary repetition of Sam. xx. 25, because, according to chap. ii. 26 and 35, Solomon deposed Abiathar and put Zadok in his place. However, there is no sufficient ground for this view. Abiathar is again introduced as a priest here, either "because he had officiated in the beginning of Solomon's reign" (Philipson), or because, as Grotius remarks, though he was no longer re yet he was nomine high-priest, and though the ἀρχή was taken from him the ἐπισκοπή nevertheless remained to him (Theodoret). It is highly improbable that Solomon afterwards pardoned and restored him to office (Le Clerc).—Azariah and Zabud (ver. 5) were not the sons of the prophet Nathan (Thenius), but of the son of David, mentioned in 2 Sam. v. 14, therefore Solomon's nephews (Keil). The former had the officials enumerated in vers. 7-19 under him, the latter is designated as כֹּהֵן הָעֵצָה הַמֶּלֶךְ. Ewald looks on this in a very modern way, and thinks it was a "special house-priest" of the king's, "who was his peculiar minister in spiritual affairs." However, there is no more mention of a priest here than in 2 Sam. viii. 18; רֶעָה explains כֹּהֵן, and both words form together one conception; Zabud was a "privy counsellor, i. e., friend of the king's" (Keil). Luther's translation: the son of Nathan, the priest, is quite false. Abiathar (ver. 6) was not "minister of the king's household" (Keil), but "master of the palace and household" (Thenius), chap. xviii. 3; 2 Kings xviii. 18; Isai. xxii. 15. This office did not exist under David; but was required by the larger and more splendid court of Solomon. Adoniram is the same as 2 Sam. xx. 24 and 1 Kings xii. 18, where he is called Adoram. He was not tithe-master (Luther), but overseer of the hirelings that had to overlook the public works, for מַדְנָה nowhere means vectigal or impost. Ewald and Thenius think the addition of the Sept.: καὶ Ἐλῆάζρ υἱὸς Σάφ ἐν τῇς παρτίαις, original, but it is easy to see that it is a gloss.

Ver. 7. Solomon had twelve officers. The wholly general expression נְצִיבִים (from נָצַב to place, i. e., people in office), is made clearer by the word: the provided for, &c. Hence they were not ἡγεμόνες καὶ στρατηγοὶ (Josephus), neither "court cooks" (Winer), but "chief rent-receivers" (Rosenmüller); whether they were regular chiefs or governors of provinces, the providing for the king being only a part of their office (Thenius), is uncertain. Probably their districts were not arranged with reference to the lands of the tribes, but to the fertility of the soil. Their number, twelve, has no relation to the twelve tribes, but to the twelve months of the year, in each of which one of them had to supply his quota. The list of the districts in vers. 8 to 19 is perhaps made with reference to the time of delivery, and makes no account of the geographical position.—The proper names of five of the twelve officials are not given, but only their fathers' names. It is uncertain whether they bore those names with the prefix of Ben, as the Vulgate supposes (Benhur, Bendecar, &c.). Ben-abinadab (ver. 11) is scarcely a proper name. As these men have no further historical importance, it matters little about their names. Two sons-in-law of Solomon being among them, only shows that the list gives us a view of the civil offices during the middle period of his reign.

Vers. 8-22. The son of Hur, in mount Ephraim. We give here only what is most necessary about the situations and nature of particular districts. Thenius on this place, speaks at length of both. (1) Mount Ephraim, in Central Palestine, one of the most cultivated districts of all Palestine (Winer, R.-W.-B., s. v.). (2) Makaz (ver. 9) is named only here, but must belong, like Shaalbim, Beth-shemesh and Elon, to the tribe of Dan (south of Ephraim and west of Judah). (3) Aruboth (ver. 10) also does not appear elsewhere, probably a place in the tribe of Judah, to which Sochoh in the south must also have belonged (Josh. xv. 48). Hepher cannot be the town Gath-Hepher in Zebulun, but only a southern district, probably west of Sochoh, where a Canaanitish king had reigned before (Josh. xii. 17). (4) Dor (ver. 11), a town on the Mediterranean, nine Roman miles north of Caesarea (Josh. xvii. 11). Naphat (i. e., heights) Dor is the hilly stretch of country towards the south of the town, and to this Thenius reckons the whole very fertile pasture-plain of Sharon to Joppa. (5) Megiddo, and close to it, in a southeasterly direction, Tuanach (ver. 12); two towns, that lie on the slope of the Carmel mountains, at the edge of the plain of Jezreel in the tribe of Manasseh. Beth-shean, on a straight line, east of Megiddo, where the plain of Jezreel ceases and that of the Jordan meadows begins. Zartanah lay near in a southerly direction, and Abel-meholah still more south the latter was the birth-place of the prophet Elisha. Jokneam, according to 1 Chron. vi. 53, a levite town, the situation of which is doubtful, perhaps it was the same as Kibzaim (Josh. xxi. 22). The district must then have included the whole land of the tribe of Manasseh on this side (west of) Jordan. (6) Ramoth-gilead (ver. 13), a town of the levites beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Gad, which stretched northwards along the tribe of Manasseh, and southwards along that of Reuben (Josh. xxi. 38; Deut. iv. 43). Upon הַיָּר of Jair, comp. Numb. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xiii. 30. Our passage says as plainly as possible that they were in the land of Gilead, but the country of Argob was in the land of Bashan. The sixty fortified cities that belonged to the last can therefore not be identical with הַיָּר (Keil), as Bashan is always made quite distinct from Gilead (Deut. iii. 10; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11; xvii. 1; 2 Kings x. 33; Mic. vii. 14), the translation: the "towns of Jair" is not correct either, "because: הַיָּר here does not mean to live, and the German: living in a given place does not signify vita but mansio" (Cassell, zu Richt., iii. 4). The land of Bashan with Argob lay northeast of that of Gilead. The brazen bars mean that the gates of the cities were protected with brass. (7) Mahanaim (ver. 14), a town beyond Jordan (2 Sam. xvii. 24-27), on the borders of the tribe of Gad and the further portion of Manasseh on the Jabbok (Josh. xxi. 38). We have no further information about this district of Abinadab. (8) Naphthali (ver. 15), the region of the tribe of this name, was quite in the north of Palestine, on this side Jordan, west of Asher's inheritance and bordering, on its south, the tribe of Zebulun. (9) Asher's (ver. 16) inheritance lay along the coast of the Mediterranean, northward of the tribe of Issachar (Deut. xxxiii. 24 sq.). בְּעֵלוֹת in בְּעֵלוֹת must certainly be understood as in בְּעֵלוֹת (Luther), but Aloth, like Bealoth, is a quite unknown name, for the latter cannot be Bealoth in Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Thenius boldly conjectures עַד מַעְלָה צוֹר to the road leading to Tyre. (10) Issachar (ver. 17); its country lay on this side Jordan, between Zebulun on the north and Manasseh on the south (Josh. xix. 17 sq.). (11) Benjamin (ver. 18); its inheritance was between Ephraim on the north and Judah on the south, and east of Dan (Josh. xviii. 11 sq.). (12) Gilead (ver. 19) is used here for all the east-Jordan lands in general, but it could only apply to that part which remained over after taking out the sixth and seventh districts, that is, the southern. The kingdom of Sihon originally extended from the river Jabbok in Manasseh to the river Arnon, which empties itself into the Dead Sea (Numb. xxi. 24), and passed over to the tribes of Gad and Reuben. Bashan lay northeast of Sihon (Numb. xxi. 33). The addition: an officer, &c., means: that although this district was perhaps the largest (probably because of the barrenness of the soil), it had only one officer. Ewald would insert יְהוֹדָה after בְּעֵלוֹת, which is very incorrect, because instead of twelve officers, according to ver. 7, there would have been thirteen. The expression in ver. 20: as the sand which is by the sea, clearly refers to the promise in Gen. xxii. 17; xxxii. 12. For עַד

ing and drinking, &c., comp. 1 Sam. xxx. 16; Prov. v. 17. One must either add קָרָךְ before מִן (chap. v. 1) like the parallel passage in 2 Chron. ix. 26, or bear in mind the מִן from the preceding passage, as Keil does. Presentis, a mild expression for tribute, as in 2 Sam. viii. 2-6; 2 Kings xvii. 3-4.

Vers. 22-25. And Solomon's provision, &c.

Ver. 22. כֶּרֶךְ (called חֶמֶךְ before) is the largest measure, and contains, according to Josephus, ten attic medimni [medimnus—nearly twelve gallons.—E. H.] which Böckh reckons at 19857.7 Paris cubic inches; however, it seems from exact calculations made by Thenius (in the Stud. u. Kritik, 1846, s. 73 sq.), that Josephus is wrong,* and that the measures only contained 10143 Paris cubic inches. According to this, the 30 + 60 measures of meal make 171 bushels, from which 28,000 pounds of bread were baked. "If we allow two pounds of bread to each person, Solomon's court must have contained 14,000 people" (others compute them at only 10,000), a number which does not seem too great for the middle period of this reign. Let us think, for instance, of the great harem, the numerous servants, the body-guard, &c., and consider besides, that the families of all the court officials belonged to it, and that there were only payments in provisions. "If we take the flesh of a slaughtered ox to weigh 600 (according to the calculation of those who understood the matter), that of a cow 400, and that of a sheep 70 pounds," the total consumption of meat would be 21,000 pounds, that is, one and a half pounds for each person; and "this is not reckoning the game and fowl for the king's table." There are similar accounts of expenditure at other oriental courts. "According to an ancient author (Athen. Deipn., iv. 10), Alexander found on a column at Persepolis a placard containing an account of the daily consumption at the court of Cyrus; from this list we give the following: 1,000 bushels of wheat of different qualities, the same of barley-meal, 400 sheep, 300 lambs, 100 oxen, 30 horses, 30 deer, 400 fat geese, 100 goslings, 300 pigeons, 600 small birds of various kinds, 3,750 gallons of wine, 75 gallons of fresh milk, and the same of sour milk. Besides this, there was a quantity of maize, that was gathered in single rations for the cattle. . . . Tavernier reckons the number of sheep daily consumed in the seraglio of the Sultan, in his time, at 500, besides a number of fowls, and an immense quantity of butter and rice" (Philippson; comp. Rosenmüller, A. u. N. Morgenland, iii. s. 166). For יִתְּמוֹד (comp. Deut. xiv. 5) see Winer, R.-W.-B., I.

s. 494. כְּרִיזִים only occurs here, and is variously interpreted; Kimchi thinks it means capons; Gesenius, geese; Thenius, guinea-hens; and Ewald, swans. The splendor of the court is accounted for by vers. 24 and 25. The extent of Solomon's dominion is defined according to the two towns named in vers. 24 and 25. Typhsah, i. e., Thapsesus, was "a large and populous town on the west bank of the Euphrates; it was a place where armies crossed over that river, and a place for landing and shipping wares coming from or going to Babylon on the Euphrates" (Winer, ii. s. 612). While this town was the extreme northeasterly point, Gaza in the Philistines' land, about three miles (nine and a half or ten Eng.) from the Mediterranean, formed the extreme southwesterly one. It does not necessarily follow, from the expression: all the region (land) beyond the river [i. e., west], that our author dwelt on the east side of the Euphrates and wrote there (see Introd. § 1), as is to be learned from Ezra iv. 10 sq.; the expression belonged to the time of banishment, but was retained after the return, and, as it seems, without regard to its geographical signification, just for instance as the expression Gallia transalpina. Living under the vine and fig tree (2 Kings xviii. 31) describes the happy and blissful state of peace, but was not, however, taken from the description of Messiah's reign (Mic. iv. 4; Zach. iii. 10) (Ewald), but on the contrary was woven into the latter. From Dan to Beersheba, boundaries of Palestine north and east (Judges xx. 1; 1 Sam. iii. 20; 2 Sam. iii. 10).

Vers. 26-28. And Solomon had 40,000 stalls of horses, &c. In ver. 26 the description of the court appointments, which had been interrupted by the remarks in vers. 24 and 25, is continued. מִרְוֹת are horse-stalls, stables, mangers (Bochart: locuti in stabulis distincti). According to chap. x. 26, Solomon had 1,400 chariots; each of these was, as the representations on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments show, drawn by two horses, making 2,800 of these; the remaining 1,200 were reserves, for if one fell it was usual to attach a third horse (Xenophon, Cyrop., vi. 1-27). מְרִשִּׁים does not mean riders here, but saddle-horses in contrast with harnessed horses, as in 2 Sam. i. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 14. The opinion that Israel lived in peace (ver. 26) because Solomon had made great warlike preparations (ver. 26) with which he protected his kingdom (Thenius, Keil), is quite a wrong one; the question is not of war here, but to what the מִרְוֹת refers, namely, the maintaining of harness- and saddle-horses, and the expenses of the court. In ver. 27, therefore, it is again said that the twelve officers who had to provide for the sustenance of all the persons in the court, had also to provide for this great number of horses; ver. 28 then gives the kind of provision the latter received, namely, barley and straw. Oats were not cultivated in the East, therefore barley was the usual food for horses: the poorer classes alone used it for bread also (Judges vii. 13, and Cassel on the place. Comp. Winer, I. s. 410). For רָכָשׁ see Esther viii. 10, 14. The coursers served to carry "the king's orders to the different districts" (Thenius). To מְרִשִּׁים the Sept., Vulgate, and Thenius supply as subject: the king, which is certainly false, for if Solomon sometimes changed his residence, he did not travel about with 16,000 horses (ver. 26). According to chap. x. 26, the horses were placed in different towns, into which the barley and straw were brought, as Keil says: "where they (barley and straw) should be, according as the horses were distributed about."

Vers. 29-30. And God gave Solomon wisdom, &c. Hitherto the narrative treats of the organs by means of which the order and happy condition of Solomon's kingdom was conditioned, but now it turns to the head of the realm, the king himself, and remarks that in him which particularly distinguished him and qualified him to be the ruler, namely, the wisdom he had received from God. "While חִכְמָה denotes more the entire spiritual com-dition, תבונה designates sharpness of insight, but in רחב לב the ingenium capax is set forth" (Thienius), the talent to take up and comprehend all, even the most diversified objects of knowledge. Hence the addition: as the sand which is by the sea, which is a figurative description of an innumerable multitude (chap. iv. 20; Gen. xli. 49; xxxii. 13; Ps. cxxxix. 18). Luther's translation, a comforted heart, is wrong.—All the sons of the east, that is, not only those Arabians distinguished for their skill in proverbs, but all the tribes living to the east of Palestine (also the northeast), who were famous in any branch of knowledge (Jer. xlix. 28; Gen. xxix. 1; Num. xxiii. 7; Job i. 3). Opposite these, in the west, was Egypt, the wisdom of which was almost proverbial in the ancient world (Isai. xix. 11; Acts vii. 22; Joseph., Antiq., viii. 2-5; Herodot., ii. 160). There were no other lands distinguished for wisdom in Solomon's time; the Greek learning only commenced 400 years later.

Ver. 31. The sons of Mahol, not the poets (Luther), for מְחֹל means as appell. dance, round dance (Ps. xxx. 12; cxlix. 3); but here it is a proper name. It must remain uncertain whether these four men were celebrated persons of more ancient time, or whether they were contemporaries of Solomon; we have no further information about them. Ethan and Heman, named in 1 Chron. xv. 17 and 19 among the musicians appointed by David, but it is scarcely to be supposed that the wisest men of the time were among them. The headings of Ps. lxxxviii. and lxxxix. are more likely to refer to our Heman and Ethan, as they are there called Ezrahites. All four names are close together 1 Chron. ii. 6: "the sons of Zerah (the sons of Judah); Zimri, and Ethan, and Calcol, and Dara;" Grotius and Le Clerc believed them to be identical with these; as also Movers and Bertheau, more recently; but even if דָּרָד is the same as דָּרָד, and Ezrah the same as Serach, the difficulty still remains that Chalcol and Darda are here named sons of Mahol, and that there is nowhere else any intimation of the wisdom of Zerah's sons. The rabbinical book Seder Olam (ed. Meyer, p. 52 sq.), alone says of them: "these were prophets that prophesied in Egypt."

Ver. 32. And he spake three thousand proverbs, &c. Prov. i. 1-6 explains what proverbs are and what their use is. He spake is as much as: he originated them. The fixed number, 3,000, certainly shows that they were written down and collected, possibly only in part, or possibly not at all, by himself. Unfortunately, the greater number of these proverbs are lost; for if we admit that all those in the biblical book of Proverbs were composed by Solomon, yet there are only 915 verses in the book, and these are not all proverbs. There remains still less of the thousand and five songs. It is doubtful if Canticles be one of those. The lxxiiid and cxxviii Psalms have Solomon's name at the beginning, and there is no real reason to doubt the genuineness of the heading; many think he was the author of the cxxxiiid Psalm; Ewald thinks he wrote only the iiii Psalm.

Ver. 33. He spake of trees, &c. His wisdom was not only in spiritual, religious, and social matters, and displayed in doctrine and poetry, but in natural things, the entire kingdoms of plants and animals. Josephus is wrong in saying that he derived his proverbs (parables) from all these things. The cedar is the largest, most beautiful, and useful of trees, and the hyssop the smallest and most insignificant plant. The hyssop which grows on the wall is a particular kind of wall-moss (Thienius), the other hyssop is a stem-formed plant, that grows to one or two feet high (comp. Winer, R.-W.-B., s. v.). The many kinds of beasts mean the whole animal kingdom, divided according to the manner of motion: four-footed (בְּרֵמֶה), flying, creeping, and swimming (Gen. vi. 20; vii. 8). This passage can scarcely mean that Solomon also wrote works on all plants and animals, but only that he understood these subjects and could "speak" of them. We need not suppose that such works, because they may have had no significance for God's kingdom, should not also have been preserved.

Ver. 34. There came of all people, &c. The greatness and extent of Solomon's fame for wisdom are shown by the fact that he not only continued to be the type and model of all wisdom to his own people; but is so regarded in the East, even at the present day. The Koran (Sur. xxvii. 17) praises him as knowing the languages of men and demons, of birds and ants; these all, it says, he could hold intercourse with. The Turks still possess a work of seventy folio volumes, which is called the book of Suleiman, i. e., Solomon. The whole of the wisdom and secret learning of the East is connected with his name.—From all kings, certainly means, as Thienius maintains, that they sent ambassadors, who did him homage, or received more certain information about him; comp. the narrative, chap. x.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. To represent Solomon's kingdom in its greatness and in its prosperous, well-ordered condition, is the plain design of this entire section, and upon this account the lists of officers, &c., which in themselves are dry, acquire a higher, historical (heilsge-schichtliche) signification. The period of the judges was the time of public crudeness in which there was an absence of order, and of organic unity of the kingdom. The age of David was that of continuous wars and battles, in which indeed victory over all enemies at last came, and with it at the same time the beginning of a well-ordered condition; but not complete peace for the kingdom. This first came with Solomon's reign (1 Chron. xxii. 8, 9). The reign of Solomon is the result of all preceding conflicts and divine teachings. It is the kingdom of Israel in its highest maturity. To represent it as such, it needed the authentication which our section supplies, and which in like manner in the whole history of the kings does not occur again. At this highest reach this kingdom was, upon the one side, the fulfilment of the divine promise (Gen. xxii. 17, and Exod. iii. 17 sq.; cf. with chap. iv. 20, and chap. v. 5), and, upon the other side moreover, it was itself a promise, an historical prophecy, a σκιά τῶν μελλόντων. As the whole Old Testament economy in its sensuousness and outwardness points beyond itself, to the New Testament in its spirituality and inwardness, so especially is Solomon's kingdom the type of the Messiah's. What the former is κατὰ σάρκα, the latter is κατὰ πνεῦμα. For the delineation of the latter, the prophets borrowed words from the delineation of the former in our section here (Mich. iv. 4; Zach. iii. 10. Cf. above, on chap. i.).

2. The great expensiveness of Solomon's household is brought into the closest connection with the happiness, the prosperity and peace of the whole people (chap. iv. 20, and v. 5). It is hence an entire perversion when recent writers sever one passage from the connection, and cite that expensiveness among the things with which the people under Solomon were burdened, and which by and by had excited dissatisfaction and restlessness (Ewald, Gesch. Isr., iii. s. 376; Duncker, Gesch. des Alterthums, i. s. 389). In absolute states, namely, in the ancient oriental, the king is the nation in person. The splendor of the royal household represents the splendor of the entire people. Far from being a sign of the oppression of the people, it shows rather their happiness and prosperity. The account does not say: the king lived in luxury while the people were poor and felt oppressed, but: as the people, so the king, and as the king, so the people; both were satisfied and enjoyed prosperity and peace.

3. The delineation of Solomon's wisdom follows immediately the delineation of the outward and material well-being of the kingdom, and shows in this connection that as Solomon was the representative of this well-being, so also from him, in consequence of special divine endowment, a rich, higher spiritual life, such as hitherto had not been, proceeded, and poured itself like a stream over the whole land (Eccles. xlvii. 14 sq.). "All may be ready in a given time and people," says Eisenlohr (das Volk Isr., ii. s. 110), "for a spiritual elevation and living action, but one only has the mind and the power for it. Hence we cannot set sufficiently high the influence of the creative personality of the highly-gifted king Solomon." And Ewald observes (Gesch. Isr., iii. s. 350), "so there was for the people in this noble time a new age also for science, poetry, and literature, whose rich fruits continued long after the sensuous wealth and superabundance which this time brought, together with the powers of the nation, had melted away." It was just this high condition of spiritual culture which procured for the king, and indirectly for the people, great authority, and which attracted men from all neighboring lands to hear this "wisdom." But also in the connection in which the material and the spiritual well-being of the people are brought together, there is a reference to the truth that for the glory of a king there must be something more than greatness, power, wealth, quiet, or "eating and drinking and amusements," and that where there is not spiritual culture and a higher life, where, for the furtherance of material interests, spiritual interests are thrust aside or neglected, the thought of a glorious condition cannot be entertained. Solomon himself says (Prov. iii. 13, 14): "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold."

4. The wisdom of the East and of Egypt is not so much below that of Solomon in its outward circumference (extensive), as in its most inward, characteristic being (intensive). While the former, in its deepest ground, rests upon the identification of the world with God, and at last discharges itself in pantheism, and, in consequence, is deprived almost wholly of the ethical element, this proceeds from the principle which is expressed in the words which form the title of Solomon's proverbs: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction" (Prov. i. 7; cf. with chap. ix. 10). "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and the knowledge of the holy is understanding." (Comp. Umbreit, Commentar über die Spr. Sal. Einleit., s. 1-65.) It rests upon the knowledge of the one God of heaven and earth, who hath chosen Israel and made with them a covenant, i. e., has revealed himself to them through His word, viz., "the Law." Consequently it is essentially monotheistic, ethical, and, therefore, practical. It does not exclude the knowledge of nature, for which Solomon was also renowned (ver. 13); but the latter is only true and right when it rests upon the former, and is permeated by it. In so far the wisdom of Solomon stood unrivalled throughout the whole of the ancient Orient, and was like an oasis in the desert to which men from all the neighboring countries made pilgrimages, a radiating light which attracted all involuntarily who loved light rather than darkness. "Only forth from the soil of the spirit watered by the spring of religious faith can the tree of wisdom grow strong, and spread out its branches into all regions of life" (Umbreit, a. a. O., s. 5). But as Solomon's kingdom refers generally to that of the Messiah (see above), so especially does Solomon's wisdom (monotheistic-legal) point to the wisdom of Him who is greater than Solomon (xii. 42), who is the light of the world, and to whom all kings both from the West and the East shall come, and upon whom all the heathen shall call (Ps. lxxix. 10, 11; Isai. lx. 1-3).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. iv. The Kingdom of Solomon a type of the Messiah's (1) in its greatness and extent; (2) in its prosperity and peace; (3) in his wisdom and knowledge.—Chap. iv. 1 to chap. v. 1. WUNT. SUMM.: Fortunate is the government where all goes orderly. Their eyes shall look around after the faithful in the land, and pious subjects are loved and esteemed; but false people and liars, and those of a perverse heart, who have proud ways and haughtiness, and who calumniate others secretly and maliciously, it will not have nor endure about it, but will clear away and destroy after the example of David (Ps. cx.).—A well-ordered state constitution is the condition of the growth and prosperity of every kingdom; but all ordinances and institutions avail nothing when requisite and proper persons are wanting for their administration and execution. To select such, and to entrust them with different administrative offices, is the first and most difficult task of a ruler. Happy the prince to whom God grants the grace to find the right persons, who can counsel him and deserve his confidence (Eccles. x. 2-5).—STARKE: As a court, where it is beset with flatterers, backbiters, carousers, &c., generally goes down, so also it prospers, on the other hand, when pious servants are there.—Chap. iv. 20. STARKE: Not the multitude of a people causes a scarcity in the land, but the wickedness and avarice of men.—Food and drink and amusement are a gift of God (Eccles. iii. 13), when used in the fear of God (Eccles. xi. 9) and with thanksgiving (1 Cor. x. 31; Col. iii. 17); but they become sin when, in the gift, the giver is forgotten, the belly made a god of, and serves the lust of the flesh. Chap. iv. 21.—CHAMBER: The kingdom of Christ is still far greater. He rules from one end of the sea to the other, from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof (Zach. ix. 10). All kings shall call upon Him: all the heathen shall serve Him (Ps. lxxii. 8-10).

[E. HARWOOD: Chap. iv. vers. 4-5. Comp. 1 Chron. xxii. 7-10. David, the man of action; Solomon, the man of rest. The man of active life usually has more conspicuous virtues and more conspicuous faults than the man of rest. David proposed to build the house—the man of action was the founder: Solomon carried the plans of his father into execution. David was the founder: Solomon the builder.]

Chap. iv. 22.—As, by divine providence and ordering, there are always different conditions, high and low, rich and poor, so their manner of life cannot be the same, but must be conformable to the rank and position which has been assigned to every one by God. The household of a prince who stands at the head of a great and distinguished people ought not, indeed, give to the people the bad example of extravagant show, luxury, and riot; but it must, in abundance and splendor, surpass every private establishment, and ought not to appear needy and impoverished. Ver. 24, 25 (chap. iv. ver. 20). The Blessings of Peace. (1) Wherein they consist; (2) to what they oblige. Peace nourishes: disturbance consumes. Only in peace, not in war, does a nation attain to well-being, therefore should we offer prayer and supplication for kings and all in authority, &c. (1 Tim. ii. 2). Happy the land where goodness and truth are met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other (Ps. lxxxv. 10). May the eternal God grant us, during our life, an heart ever joyous, and give us noble peace! It must be regarded as an unspeakable blessing of God when, under the protection of a wise and righteous government, every one in the nation, even the least, can remain in the undisturbed possession of his property, and can enjoy the fruits of his industry in the bosom of his family.

Ver. 29-34. The Wisdom of Solomon. (1) Its origin, ver. 29 (Prov. ii. 6; Dan. ii. 21, 6); (2) its greatness (ver. 30 sq.); (3) its result (ver. 34).—Ver. 29. Not every one receives from God an equal measure of spiritual endowment; but every one is obliged, with the gift he has received, to dispose of it faithfully, and not to allow it to be fallow (Luke xii. 48; Matt. xxv. 14-29). In the possession of high spiritual endowment and of much knowledge, man is in danger of over-estimating himself, of becoming proud and haughty, hence the highly-gifted Solomon himself says: "Trust in the Lord" &c. (Prov. iii. 5, 6). Not to elevate one's self above others, but in order to serve them, does God bestow special gifts of the Spirit (1 Peter iv. 10).—Ver. 30. Heathen wisdom, great as it may be in earthly things, understands nothing of divine, heavenly things, and is therefore far below the wisdom whose beginning is the fear of the personal, living God, who has revealed himself in His word. This wisdom alone yields true, good, and abiding fruit (Jas. iii. 15, 17).—Ver. 32. All those who have received special gifts of spirit and understanding, act inexorably and sin grievously when, instead of giving God the honor, and of applying them to the good of their fellow-men, they promote, by doctrine and treatise, forgetfulness of God and unbelief, and the love of the world, and the lusts of the flesh, or gross or refined immorality (Eccles. xii. 9; Jer. ix. 23, 24). The glory which is obtained in the world through bad books, is shame and disgrace before Him who demands account of every idle word.—Ver. 33. STARKER: Far better would it befit lords and princes to find their enjoyment in study rather than to seek satisfaction in dramas, plays, and in immoderate drinking. A man may be able to speak of all possible things, and, at the same time, be without wisdom, for this does not consist in varied knowledge and widespread acquirements, but in recognition of the truth which purifies the heart and sanctifies the will. Observation and investigation of nature is only of the right kind, and fraught with blessing, when it leads to the confession of Ps. civ. 24; xcii. 6, 7.—Mark what the man who was wiser than all the men of his generation declares as the final result of all his wisdom and research: It is all vanity! Fear God, and keep His commandments (Eccles. i. 2; xii. 2, 13).—Ver. 34. To Solomon came from all nations people to hearken unto his wisdom; but to Him who is greater than Solomon, the wise men of to-day will not listen (1 Cor. i. 19-21).—How many travel over land and sea to seek gold and silver, but stir neither hand nor foot to find the wisdom and knowledge of the truth, which lie close at hand, and are better than gold and silver (Prov. viii. 11; xxiv. 14; Job xxviii. 18). It is not enough for a wise prince that his people eat, drink, and make merry, and dwell in safety, each one beneath his own vine and fig-tree (chap. iv. 20; v. 5); but he aims likewise at this, that spiritual education, science, and recognition of the truth should be extended and fostered, for this brings more consideration than power or wealth.

THIRD SECTION.

SOLOMON'S BUILDINGS.

(CHAP. V. [V. 15]-IX. 28.)

A.—Treaty with Hiram in regard to the building of the Temple.

CHAP. V. 1-18. [15-32].

- 1 AND Hiram king of Tyre sent his servants unto Solomon; ¹ for he had heard
 2, 3 that they had anointed him king in the room of his father: for Hiram was ever 2, 3 a lover of David. And Solomon sent to Hiram, saying, Thou knowest how that David my father could not build a house unto the name of the Lord his God, for the wars ⁴ which were about him on every side, until the Lord put 4 them under the soles of his ⁵ feet. But now the Lord my God hath given me 5 rest on every side, so that there is neither adversary nor evil occurrent. And, behold, I purpose ⁶ to build a house unto the name of the Lord my God, as the Lord spake unto David my father, saying, Thy son, whom I will set upon thy 6 throne in thy room, he shall build a [the] house unto my name. Now therefore command thou that they hew me cedar trees out of Lebanon; and my servants shall be with thy servants: and unto thee will I give hire for thy servants according to all that thou shalt appoint: for thou knowest that there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians.
- 7 And it came to pass, when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, that he rejoiced greatly, and said, Blessed be the Lord ⁸ [Jehovah] this day, which hath 8 given unto David a wise son over this great people. And Hiram sent to Solomon, saying, I have considered the things which thou sentest to me for: and I will do 9 all thy desire concerning timber of cedar, and concerning timber of fir. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea; and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them: and thou shalt 10 accomplish my desire, in giving food for my household. So Hiram gave Solo-11 mon cedar trees and fir trees according to all his desire. And Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures [oor] of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures [cor ¹²] of pure oil: thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year.
- 12 And the Lord gave Solomon wisdom, as he promised him: and there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together.
- 13 And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty 14 thousand men. And he sent them to Lebanon, ten thousand a month by courses: a month they were in Lebanon, and two months at home: and Adoni-15 ram was over the levy. And Solomon had threescore and ten thousand that 16 bare burdens, and fourscore thousand hewers in the mountains; besides the chief of Solomon's officers which were over the work, three thousand and three ¹⁷ 17 hundred, which ruled over the people that wrought in the work. And the king commanded, and they brought great stones, costly stones, and hewed 18 stones, to lay the foundation of the house. And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stonesquarers: so they prepared timber and stones to build the house.

² Ver. 8.—[The A. V. has here exactly preserved the incongruity of the Heb. of an abstract noun מְלַחְמָה, war, followed by the personal pronoun אֲנִי. The Chald. avoids the difficulty by reading קְרָנָא עֲבָרָא קְרָנָא = those making war. It has been suggested that the Heb. might have read originally עָשִׂי הַמְלַחְמָה.

³ Ver. 8.—The k'tib רָנָא is here decidedly to be preferred to the k'ri רָנְלִי.—Bähr. [It is also the reading of many MSS., editions, and VV.]

⁴ Ver. 5.—אֲמַר אֲמַר לְבָנוֹת, followed by the infinitive, expresses purpose. Q. Ex. ii. 14; 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

⁵ Ver. 7.—[The Sept. here read Θεός, not Κύριος. Q. the parallel place 2 Chron. ii. 11, יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל.]

⁶ Ver. 11.—[The Sept. enormously multiply this by writing καὶ εἰσεὶ χιλιάδες βαῖθ δαίον, so also the Heb. in the parallel place. 2 Chron. ii. 9. The Syr. and Arab. still ten times more, by making it twenty thousand cor.

⁷ Ver. 16.—[Q. 2 Chron. ii. 17, שָׁשׁ מֵאוֹת.]

⁸ Ver. 17.—[The Vat. Sept. omits ver. 17 and the first half of 18. Both recensions of the Sept. add to ver. 18, ἐπεὶ ἐτα—F. G.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-6. And Hiram king of Tyre, &c. After the general description of Solomon's government in the preceding section, the narrative now proceeds to give an account of his great and important undertaking, the building of the Temple (comp. the parallel account, 2 Chron. ii.). Hiram is called חִירֹם in ver. 7 and 19, and חֲרָם in Chron., and Εἰρωμος twice in Josephus. It is uncertain whether of these be the original form. According to 2 Chron. ii. 2, and the present passage also, this Hiram was the same as he who had sent David wood to build his house (2 Sam. v. 11), and it is unnecessary, on the ground of the unreliable chronology of Josephus, to reckon him to be the son of that Hiram (having his father's name) as Le Clerc, Thenius, and others do (Antiq., viii. 31; comp. Contr. Apion., i. 18). If, according to Josephus, the beginning of the building of the Temple, which took place in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, occurred in the eleventh year of Hiram, it follows that the latter must have reigned several years contemporaneously with David, and may very well have reigned twenty years more, simultaneously with Solomon (chap. ix. 10 sq.).—The purpose of his embassy to Solomon was to congratulate him on his accession. (The Syriac adds אֲתִי יִבְרַךְ, which Thenius, without reason, deems original). It was evidence that he desired Solomon to continue in the same friendly relations to him as David had maintained; and it was the easier for Solomon to make that request to him, mentioned in ver. 6. On vers. 7-9, comp. 2 Sam. viii. 13, and 1 Chron. xxii. 7-11. According to Ewald and Thenius, מְלַחְמָה, ver. 3, is equivalent to enemies (surrounding him); but in Ps. cix. 3, כָּבַד is also found with the double accusative: they compassed me about also with words of hatred. Upon שָׁשׁ יָהוָה, see on chap. vi.—פָּנַע רָע, i. e., an unhappy event, as, for instance, rebellion, famine, plague, or other suffering. It appears, from ver. 6, that the part of Lebanon where the best cedars for building grew, belonged to Phœnicia; it was on the northwestern part of the mountain range (Robinson, Palest., vol. iii. pp. 588-594). The Sidonians are not the inhabitants of the city of Sidon simply, but of the entire district to which that part of Lebanon belonged. They knew how to hew and prepare wood for building, for they were skilled in ship-building beyond all other nations, and built their own houses also of wood (Schmase, Gesch. der bildenden Künste, i. s. 249). We see from ver. 8 and chap. vii. 13, that Solomon desired cypress-wood, and a Phœnician artisan besides (comp. 2 Chron. ii. 7, 13).

Vers. 7-8. And it came to pass when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, &c. "The king of Tyre must have been very desirous of remaining on good terms with Israel, because the land of Israel was a granary for Phœnicia, and the friendship of the former was very important to the Phœnician commercial interests" (Keil). The chronicler adds to יְהוָה (2 Chron. ii. 12), the God of Israel that made heaven and earth. It does not follow, however, as older commentators say, that Hiram acknowledged this God as the only true God, or had become a proselyte. Polytheism is not exclusive: it allows each nation to retain its divinity, and recognizes his power, when it thinks it perceives his workings or his agency and benefactions, without rejecting the specifically national gods. When Hiram, therefore, names Solomon חֲרָם, because he is about to build a temple to Jehovah, it is evident that the idea of wisdom (chap. v. 7), essentially includes that of religion (fear of God). Cypress is, indeed, inferior to cedar; but is also fitted for building, because "it is not eaten by worms, and is almost imperishable, as well as very light" (Winer). According to 2 Chron. ii. 16, the wood for building was sent down on rafts (on the Mediterranean) to Joppa (i. e., Jaffa, coast-town on the borders of the tribe of Dan, Josh. xix. 46). Thence it was conveyed overland to Jerusalem, which is situated southeast thereof.

Vers. 9-13. And thou shalt . . . in giving food, &c. Every year, as long as Hiram furnished building-materials and workmen, he received, for the sustenance of his court, 20,000 * (cor) measures

* The cor (כֹּר, κορος) equals the homer, and the homer was ten times the bath. 20,000 cors = 200,000 baths. This, at a rough calculation, amounts to 260,000 bushels = between 85 and 90,000 barrels. In liquids, again, 20 cors = 200 baths. This would amount to about 1,666 or 1,670 gallons of oil. The computation must be in the rough for obvious reasons.

of wheat, i. e., by Thenius' reckoning, 38,250 Dresden bushels, from Solomon; also 20 (cor) measures of oil, i. e., 100 casks, the cask containing 6 buckets. Pure oil is the finest, not going, after the usual fashion, through the press, but is obtained by pounding olives not quite ripe in a mortar (my Synbolik des Mos. Cult., i. s. 419). The chronicler does not mention this delivery to the court of Hiram; but he gives, in 2 Chron. ii. 10, the reward of the laborers promised in our 6th verse: "I will give to thy servants, the hewers that cut timber, 20,000 (cor) measures of beaten wheat, and 20,000 (cor) measures of barley, and 20,000 baths of wine, and 20,000 baths of oil." The narrative here concerns a different thing, and no one has a right, as Thenius, to turn the 20 (cor) measures of the finest oil, destined for the court, into 20,000 of ordinary quality, and to suppose, with Bertheau, that the quantity of wine and oil is added by the chronicler according to his own whim. "Because the quantity of the wheat which Solomon gave Hiram for the use of the court was as large as that which he delivered for the Sidonian hewers of wood, it does not follow that we are justified in identifying the two accounts" (Keil). Besides, as Bertheau remarks, it appears that the account in the Chronicles does not, like our own, speak of an annual, but only of one delivery. The one account, as often happens, supplements the other. The addition, ver. 12, means: Solomon, by virtue of the wisdom he had received from God, came to the conclusion that it would be well to accept Hiram's propositions, and to enter into terms of friendship with him. Keil also thinks that the verse refers to the wise use he made of the working capacities of his subjects, which is referred to in the following verses, and that this verse, therefore, leads on to them.

Vers. 13-15. And king Solomon raised a levy.

לָקַח, strictly adscendere fecit, to take out, to take away (Ps. cii. 25). All Israel does not mean here the whole territory, but, as often elsewhere, the people (chap. i. 20; viii. 65; xii. 16, 20; xiv. 13). In ver. 13 it is expressly said that these 30,000 men were (born) Israelites. Of these, 10,000 were always one month in service, and free the two following, when they cultivated their fields and took care of their houses. For Adoniram, see chap. iv. 6.—Besides these 30,000 men, who were not sufficient, there were (ver. 15) 70,000 that bore burdens, and 80,000 hewers in the mountains. וְהָעֹצֵר is, "according to all Versions, to be understood of stone-cutters alone, not of wood-cutters (Gesenius, Ewald), for the (easier) working in wood was sufficiently provided for by the changing 30,000 laborers" (Thenius). The בְּנֵי can be understood only of Lebanon, from the context, and not, as Bertheau thinks, of the stone-quarries of the mountains. The 70+80,000=150,000 men (2 Chron. ii. 18) were not changed, but were in constant service; they were not Israelites, but, on the contrary, זָרִים (as the parallel passage alluded to expressly says), i. e., strangers in the land of Israel; those of the Canaanites that remained when their land was conquered, and who were made servants (Judg. i. 27 to 30; Josh. xvi. 10). In contradistinction to these 30,000 Israelites, they are named, in chap. ix. 21, אֲנָשֵׁי עֹצֵר, i. e., servants (2 Chron. viii. 7-9). The assertion of Ewald and Distel that these 150,000 servants were of the "people of Israel," and only "came later when the several buildings became enlarged," is utterly erroneous.—The total number of these workmen is great, but not surprising when we consider those times, when there was no machinery, and everything had to be done by the human hand. According to Pliny (Hist. Nat., xxxvi. 12), 360,000 men had to work twenty years long at one pyramid (comp. Calmet on the place).

Ver. 16. Beside the chief, &c. Thenius: "literally the chief of the overseers, and hence the usual expression, overseer: but there are no subaltern overseers mentioned. How great, then, must the number of these have been, when the chief overseers numbered several thousands? The שְׂרָפֵי הַנְּעָרִים as a description of the substantive (Vatablus: principes, qui praefecti erant) is properly connected therewith by the Stat. construct. (comp. Ewald, § 287 b); so, the chiefs not reckoned, those who were appointed by (or for) Solomon, and who oversaw the works."—Chron. gives, instead of the number 3,300 (chap. ii. 17), 3,600, which Thenius thinks the right one, and he would have the text altered accordingly; but Ewald, on the other hand, declares our number to be correct, and that of Chron. wrong. But both numbers are right, as J. H. Michaelis has proved; the difference comes from the different division of the offices of superintendence. In chap. ix. 23, 550 שְׂרָפֵי הַנְּעָרִים are named; these, with the 3,300, make 3,850. The parallel passage of Chron. (chap. viii. 10) mentions only 250, which, added to the 3,600, gives the same number, 3,850. This coincidence cannot be chance; the number 550 evidently contains the 250, and the 300, by which the 3,600 exceed the 3,300: 250 of the whole number of overseers were, as appears from the context in 2 Chron. viii. 10, native Israelites; but 300 were foreigners. The chronicler, however, no doubt includes the latter among the subaltern overseers (3,300+300=3,600), because they were not on the same footing with the Israelitish overseers.

Vers. 17-18. And the king commanded. The great stones should be יְקָרוֹת, not "weighty" (Thenius), for that is, of course, understood, nor "precious" (Keil), for why should the value of these stones be especially insisted on? but glorious, splendid, fine stones (Ps. xxxvi. 8; xlv. 9; Esth. i. 4). It is plainly said here, as in 2 Chron. iii. 3, that these stones were for the foundation of the building, and not, therefore, for the "consolidation of the Temple structure" (Thenius). Of the latter kind, which Josephus (Arch., 15, 11, 3) so minutely describes, the Bible-text makes no mention. The בְּנֵי אֲבֹנֵי are nothing else than the splendid great stones, which were shaped after being hewn out of the quarry. Vulgate: ut tollerent lapides grandes, lapides pretiosos, in fundamentum templi et quadrarent eos.—The Giblites, ver. 18, are the inhabitants of גִּבְלִית (Josh. xiii. 5), a Phœnician town near the part of Lebanon, where the largest cedars were found; i. e., the Byblos of the Greeks. [The Engl. Vor has simply for this word, "stone-squarers."—E. H.] It appears, from Ezek. xxvii. 9, that the Gibeites were remarkable for their technical skill in ship-building especially. Thenius reads סִבְיָיִם, and translates: "they wreathed the stones—put a border round them." Robinson stated (Palest.) that he had found stones carved in that manner. Böttcher rightly names these conjectures "ill-founded." Comp. what Keil, on the passage, says against them.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Solomon's undertaking to build a "house" to the name of Jehovah was not an arbitrary, self-devised act, nor was it prompted solely through the wish and will of his father David, but rested upon a divine decision (v. 5), and, as already shown in the Introduction, § 3, has its inward, necessary reason in the development of the Old Testament theocracy. The assertion that "the thought to build a magnificent temple to Jehovah in Jerusalem proceeded from the sight of the temple-service of the Phœnicians and Philistines, and of their ostentatious cultus" (Duncker, Gesch. des Alt., i. s. 397), is entirely without foundation and contradicts all historical records. When Stephen, in his discourse before the Sanhedrin, says: "Solomon built him an house. But the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands," &c. (Acts vii. 47), he does not mean in any way to blame Solomon's undertaking, or to say, as Lechler supposes (in his Bibelwerk on the place), the tabernacle was set up at God's will and command; but the design of building a temple and the completion of it is only a human design and a human performance. For that the Most High cannot be shut up within a house, Solomon himself expressly declared at the consecration of the Temple (1 Kings viii. 27). Stephen was opposing rather, from the stand-point of the New Testament, the stiff-necked, Jewish authorities, who, when the promised Messiah appeared, and the New Covenant was introduced along with Him, rejected the same, and clung with tenacious unbelief to the outward sign of the Old Covenant, to the Temple as the permanent central-point of all divine revelation. The accusation, he would say, that this Jesus of Nazareth would destroy this holy place, was in so far correct, as that He certainly had taken away the Old Covenant, and with it had abolished its sign and pledge (John ii. 19). For the day of the New Covenant, the temple at Jerusalem has lost all significance. For the dwelling of God in the midst of His people conditioned through natural descent, has become transferred into a dwelling in the midst of the people who are believers in Christ, to whom the apostle appeals: Ye are the temple of the living God, in you is fulfilled, in truth, the word spoken once by God unto Israel: I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people (2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 21; 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5). To cling now to the Old Testament temple built by human hands, and to reject the living temple of the living God, Stephen pronounces as a striving against the Holy Ghost (Acts vii. 51).

2. It is one of those significant divine providences in which the history of Israel is so rich, that as in the development of the "sacred history" the time had come for "the house of the Lord" (or for Jehovah), in the land which alone possessed those means and agencies for the execution of the undertaking in which Israel was wanting, a king ruled who entertained a friendly sentiment towards David and Solomon, and was prepared gladly for every assistance, so that even heathen nations, whether friendly or conquered, took part in the building of the house for the God of Israel, and so contributed indirectly to the glorifying of God. It was a setting forth in act of the word: "The earth is the Lord's, and all that therein is" (Ps. xxiv. 1); "For the kingdom is the Lord's, and He is governor among the nations" (Ps. xxii. 28); and "all the heathen shall serve Him" (Ps. lxxii. 11). And as Solomon's kingdom, as the most complete outward kingdom of peace, is frequently, with the prophets, a type of the Messiah's kingdom (see above, Historical and Ethical on chap. iv.), so do they behold, in the participation by the heathen in the building of the temple, a type and prophecy that the Messiah "shall build the temple of the Lord . . . and that they who are far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord," &c. (Zech. vi. 12-16).

3. In the very time of their highest earthly splendor the people of God, in respect of worldly art, pursuit, and skill, were inferior to the neighboring Phœnicians" (Gerlach). Solomon had no one amongst his people who could execute a work of art such as the temple was to be (v. 6). As to individual men (1 Cor. vii. 7), so also to nations, God has distributed divers gifts, powers, and destiny. It was not the office of Israel to exercise the arts, but to be the bearer of divine revelation, and to communicate the knowledge of the One living and all-holy God to all nations. To this end God has chosen this people out of all peoples; and their entire mode of life and occupation, yea, their whole development and history, are closely connected with it. To the achievement of this its destiny must even other nations serve, with the especial gifts and powers conferred upon them. High as the Phœnicians stood above Israel at that time in technical and artistic accomplishments (cf. Duncker, a. a. O., s. 317-320), so nevertheless did Israel, notwithstanding all its sins and errors, excel the Phœnicians in the knowledge of the truth. Distinguished as Phœnicia was for its art and commerce, its religion was the most depraved, and its worship most crude (Duncker, s. 155 sq.).

4. The genius of the Jewish people never achieved anything eminent in plastic art. Skill in architecture, and in sculpture, and in painting, seems to have been denied them. Their religion forbade it, and the hereditary feeling of the race was one of aversion to all arts of the "graver," to images and forms cut in stones or upon stone, and so in their want of appreciation of beauty of form they were unable to conceive of grand structures; and when Solomon's great buildings were undertaken, the skilled workmen and the artists connected with the work were foreigners. Dr. Prideaux quotes Josephus to this effect (Antiq., Bk. 18. c. 7): "When Vitellius governor of Syria was going to pass through Judæa with a Roman army to make war against the Arabians, the chief of the Jews met him, and earnestly entreated him to lead his army another way; for they could not bear the sight of those images which were in the ensigns under which they marched, they were so abominated by them. The ensigns therefore, for the sake of those images in them, were abominations to the Jews; and by reason of the desolations which were wrought under them by the Roman armies in conquered countries, they were called desolating abominations, or abominations of desolation, and they were never more so than when under them the Roman armies besieged and destroyed Jerusalem." Poetic feeling, the power of song, belonged to the race; and these, under God, have impressed themselves upon the heart of the nations, so that to this day the "songs of Zion" are sung in temples which the Jewish people never could have built.—E. H.]

Vers. 1-5. Solomon's purpose to build a house to the Lord. (1) The motive. Vers. 2-5. Not ambition, the love of glory, the love of pomp, but the divine will, and the charge of his father. In every weighty undertaking one must examine and be assured that it do not proceed from selfish motives, but is the good, acceptable, and perfect will of God (Rom. xii. 2). (2) The time, rest and peace (ver. 4). A time of peace is the time for building in general, but especially for building houses of God, which are a memorial of thanksgiving for the blessings of peace and prosperity. (3) The request for assistance, ver. 6. In important undertakings which are agreeable to the will of God, and propose His honor, we may and should not hesitate to trust in Him who directs men's hearts, like the water-brooks, to ask others for aid and assistance.—Vers. 1-2. True friends whom parents have gained, are an invaluable legacy for the children, for whom the latter cannot be sufficiently thankful (Eccles. xxx. 4). To a God-fearing man like David, if he have many enemies, yet there will never be wanting those who love him his life long, and who prize and honor him after his death, even in his children.—Ver. 3. With every son it should be his earnest business, and likewise pleasure, to fulfil the will of his father, and to complete the good work which he had begun, but could not carry out.—Ver. 4. When God has granted rest and peace, health and happiness, prosperity and blessing, an opportunity is thus at hand to do something for His great name.—Ver. 5. If it cannot come into the mind of every one to build a house of wood and stone unto the Lord, nevertheless, every one to whom God has given wife and children is in condition to vow and to build a house unto the Lord out of living stones. I and my house will serve the Lord (Josh. xxiv. 15).—Ver. 6. STARKE: One man needs another; on this account one should always serve and be amiable towards another, ministering to his good (1 Pet. iv. 10).—The superfluity of one must minister to the need of the others, in order that hereafter, also, the superfluity of the latter may serve for the wants of the former (2 Cor. viii. 14).—Israel knew not how to plan great buildings, especially works of art, but they did know how to serve the living God. Better to live without art than without God in the world.

Vers. 21-25. The heathen king Hiram: (1) His rejoicing over Solomon and his undertaking; (2) his praise of the God of Israel; (3) his willingness to help. How far stands this heathen above so many who call themselves Christians!—Ver. 6. WÜRT. SUMM.: When we see that it goes well with our neighbor, we should not envy him such prosperity, but rather rejoice with him and wish him good-luck. Since Hiram, although a heathen king, has done this, how much more does it befit Christians to act thus towards each other? It proves a noble heart when a man, free from envy and jealousy, sincerely praises and thanks God for the gifts and blessings which He grants to others.—STARKE: When God wishes well to a nation He bestows upon it godly rulers; but when He wills to chastise it He removes them. Hiram praises God that He bestows upon another people a wise monarch; how much more should that people itself thank God since He bestowed upon it a wise, viz., a pious king?—Ver. 9. How pleasing it is when the assistance of those who can help is not wrung from them, but offered in friendship, and they are ready and heart-willing to do what lies in their power (2 Cor. ix. 7).—WÜRT. SUMM.: No house, even though it be the church and temple of God, should be built to the hurt and oppression of one's fellow-creatures.—Ver. 12. The league between Solomon and Hiram: (1) Its object: a good, God-pleasing work begun in the service of God. Like kings and nations, even so individual men should unite only for such purposes. (2) The conditions of the league: each gave to the other according to his desire; neither sought to overreach the other; the compact was based upon honesty and fairness, not upon cunning and selfishness: only upon such compacts does the blessing of God rest, for unjust possessions do not prosper.

Vers. 13-18. The workmen at the temple-building: (1) Israelites. Solomon acted not like unto Pharaoh (Ex. ii. 23), he laid no insupportable burdens upon his people, but permits variety in the work, and Israel itself undertakes it without murmurs or complaints. How high do these Israelites stand above so many Christian communities, who constantly object or murmur when they are about to undertake any labor for their temple, or must needs bring a sacrifice of money or time. (2) Heathen (Ps. xxii. 29; vide Historical and Ethical). Jew and heathen together must build the temple of God, according to divine decree—a prophetic anticipation of fact as set forth Eph. ii. 14, 19-22; iii. 4-6.—SEILER: The great preparations of Solomon must naturally remind us of the far greater preparations and arrangements which God has made for the building of the spiritual temple of the New Testament. How many thousand faithful laborers, how many wise and good men, has he placed in every known part of the world; how has he furnished them with wisdom and many other gifts of the Spirit, so that the great work of the glorious building may be completed! . . . O God! do thou still prosper thy work! Help the faithful workers in thy Church, that they may enlighten many men to thy glorification, &c.—RICHTER: Well for us if we serve the true Solomon in the preparations for His eternal temple. But still better is it if we are ourselves prepared as living stones to shine forever in the living temple (1 Pet. ii. 45).

CHAP. VI. 1-38.

- 1 AND it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth¹ year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that² he began to 2 build the house of the Lord [Jehovah]. And the house which king Solomon built for the Lord [Jehovah] the length thereof was threescore cubits, and the 3 breadth thereof twenty cubits,³ and the height thereof thirty cubits. And the porch before the temple of the house, twenty cubits was the length thereof,
 4 according to the breadth of the house; and ten cubits was the breadth thereof before the house. And for the house he made windows of narrow lights [with fixed lattices⁴].
 5 And against the wall of the house he built chambers⁵ round about, against the walls of the house round about, both of the temple and of the oracle: and
 6 he made chambers round about. The nethermost chamber was five cubits broad, and the middle was six cubits broad, and the third was seven cubits
 7 broad: for without in the wall of the house he made narrowed rests round about, that the beams should not be fastened in the walls of the house. And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither:⁶ so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of
 8 iron heard in the house, while it was in building. The door for the middle⁷ chamber was in the right side of the house: and they went up with winding
 9 stairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third. So he built the house, and finished it; and covered the house with beams and boards of cedar. And then he built chambers against all the house, five cubits high: and they rested on the house with timber of cedar.
 11,⁸ 12 And the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came to Solomon, saying, Concerning this house which thou art in building; if thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; then will I
 13 perform my word with thee, which I spake unto David thy father: And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will not forsake my people Israel.
 14, 15 So Solomon built the house, and finished it. And he built the walls of the house within with boards of cedar, both [from] the floor of the house, and [unto] the walls⁹ of the ceiling: and he covered them on the inside with wood, and covered the floor of the house with planks of fir. And he built twenty cubits on the sides of the house, both [from] the floor and [unto] the walls with boards of cedar: he even built them for it within, even for the oracle, even for the most 17 holy place. And the house, that is, the temple before¹⁰ it, was forty cubits long.
 18 And the cedar of the house within was carved with knops and open flowers: all
 19 was cedar; there was no stone seen.¹¹ And the oracle he prepared in the house
 20 within, to set there the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah]. And the oracle in the forepart was twenty cubits in length, and twenty cubits in breadth, and twenty cubits in the height thereof: and he overlaid it with pure gold; and so
 21 covered the altar which was of cedar [overlaid the altar with cedar.¹²] So Solomon overlaid the house within with pure gold: and he made a partition by the 22 chains of gold before the oracle; and he overlaid it with gold. And the whole house he overlaid with gold, until he had finished all the house: also the whole altar that was by the oracle he overlaid with gold.¹³
 23 And within the oracle he made two cherubims of olive tree, each ten cubits
 24 high. And five cubits was the one wing of the cherub, and five cubits the other wing of the cherub: from the uttermost part of the one wing unto the uttermost 25 part of the other were ten cubits. And the other cherub was ten cubits: both 26 the cherubims were of one measure and one size [form]. The height of the one

- 27 cherub was ten cubits, and so was it of the other cherub. And he set the cherubims within the inner house: and they stretched forth the wings of the chernubims, so that the wing of the one touched the one wall, and the wing of the other cherub touched the other wall; and their wings touched one another in 28, 29 the midst of the house. And he overlaid the cherubims with gold. And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubims
 30 and palm trees and open flowers, within and without.¹⁴ And the floor of the house he overlaid with gold, within and without.¹⁴
 31 And for the entering of the oracle he made doors of olive tree: the lintel and 32 side-posts were a fifth part of the wall. The two doors also were of olive tree; and he carved upon them carvings of cherubims and palm trees and open flowers, and overlaid them with gold, and spread gold upon the cherubims, and upon the 33 palm trees.¹⁵ So also made he for the door of the temple posts of olive tree, a 34 fourth part of the wall. And the two doors were of fir tree: the two leaves of the one door were folding, and the two leaves¹⁶ of the other door were folding.
 35 And he carved thereon cherubims and palm trees and open flowers: and covered [overlaid] them with gold fitted upon the carved work.
 36 And he built the inner court with three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar beams.
 37 In the fourth year was the foundation of the house of the Lord [Jehovah]
 38 laid, in the month Zif: and in the eleventh year, in the month Bul, which is the eighth month, was the house finished throughout all the parts thereof, and according to all the fashion of it. So was he seven years in building it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—[The Sept. here read fortieth instead of eightieth—for which there is no authority whatever. In the comparison of this date with Acts xiii. 20 it is to be remembered that the best critical editors, following the MSS. N, A, B, C, etc., adopt the reading which places the words kai meta tauta after, instead of before, the clause os erous tetrakosious kai wutakosia, so that the passage has no longer any chronological bearing upon the statement of the text.

² Ver. 1.—[The Vat. Sept. here interposes the omitted verses 17, 18 of the last chapter, and immediately subjoins verses 37, 38 of the present chapter. In the former verses both reconstructions have transformed בְּנֵי, builders, into בְּנֵי, sons.

⁶ Ver. 7.—[אֵבֶן שְׁלֵמָה מִפֶּסַע נִבְנָה] was built of "all unviolated stones of the quarry." Kell.

⁷ Ver. 8.—In place of הָיָה לָהֶם must necessarily be read (cf. ver. 6) הָיָה לָהֶם, as Ezek. xii. 7 stands, and the Tar. gum and the Sept. have read (Böttcher, Ewald, Merz, Thenius).—Bähr. [There is no various reading of the Heb. MSS., and the construction indicated by the text as it stands is sufficiently clear: the lower tier of chambers being easily provided for by doors, nothing is said of the entrance to them; but there was a winding stairway from the ground, with a door at its foot, leading to the middle chambers, and thence to the third story. Ezek. xii. 7 can hardly be considered as bearing on the point in question.

⁸ Ver. 11.—[The Vat. Sept. omits here verses 11-14.]

⁹ Ver. 15.—The true reading, according to 2 Chron. iii. 7, is here as in ver. 16 קִירוֹת [beams] not קִירוֹת [walls] (Thenius, Kell).—Bähr. [Accordingly our author translates by Balken, supported in this by the Sept. The emendation of the text (for which there is no manuscript authority) is required by the author's conception of the construction of the הֵיכָל as 30 cubits high in the interior. Against this is the fact that the height of the cedar wainscoting in ver. 16 is expressly said to have been 30 cubits, and yet no stone was seen (ver. 18). If now a chamber above is supposed, no emendation is necessary here, and verses 16 and 18 become consistent. The wainscoting was carried up 30 cubits to where the ceiling met the walls, and above this the "walls of the ceiling" or of the room above were left bare. A space of two cubits is thus left for the windows, and access to the "upper room" may have been had from the porch. 2 Chron. iii. 7 does not decide this point. In ver. 16 the words "from the ceiling" are to be supplied from the previous verse. In any case the A. V. is certainly wrong in covering the floor (which was of fir, ver. 15) with cedar.

¹⁰ Ver. 17.—The עַל at the end of ver. 17 is to be understood either adverbially, before (De Wette), or adjectivally anterior (Ewald, Kell), unless with Theodorus, upon the authority of the Sept., we suppose that לְפָנֵי has fallen out "That is the (so-called) Hechal before the Debir." Upon the figures upon the cedar, ver. 18 sq., see on ver. 29. In ver. 19 לְפָנֵי is hence to be understood that the Debir was between the Hechal and the side structure. The difficult words לְפָנֵי הַדְּבִיר , ver. 20, Theodorus will have removed from the text peremptorily, as a gloss placed here from ver. 17, although they are in all MSS. and ancient VV. Kell explains לְפָנֵי , with Kimchi, for the noun לְפָנִים , occurring also in ver. 20—the inner, inward. With זָהָב , the same gold is designated which in Ex. xxv. 11 sq. is called קָהָר , and in 2 Chron. iii. 6 זָהָב (Vulg.: purissimum).—Bähr.

¹¹ Ver. 18.—[The Vat. Sept. omits ver. 18.]

¹² Ver. 20.—[See Exeg. com.]

¹³ Ver. 22.—[The Sept. omit the last clause of this verse, and throughout this whole description omit many clauses and modify others.]

¹⁴ Ver. 29.—[That is in the Holy of Holies, and in the holy place, as the author notes in his translation.]

¹⁵ Ver. 32.—[The author, in his translation, adds: "and over the open flowers." The Vulg. has et ostia.—F. G.]

¹⁶ Ver. 34.—[Instead of קָהָר must here necessarily be read, with the Sept., זָהָב , which stands immediately before.—Bähr.]

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

The account of Solomon's temple, before us, together with the continuation in chap. vii. 13–51, is the oldest, and, at the same time, the most complete in our possession. Hence all knowledge of this world-historical building must adhere to it and found itself upon it. Next to it is the parallel account in 2 Chron. iii. iv., which agrees with it in all essential particulars, and, as indeed the most recent criticism acknowledges, comes from an ancient source, perhaps from the same with our own here. Although significantly briefer, it gives, nevertheless, some supplementary details the accuracy of which is undoubted, and which deserve all consideration. In addition to these two historical accounts, there is also the delineation in "vision" of the prophet Ezekiel (chap. xl. sq.), which indeed is very explicit in respect of the ground-plan and its measurement. In an earlier period this delineation was regarded as an essential completion and explanation of the historical accounts; later this was abandoned, because the prophet himself repeatedly explains it as "a vision" (chap. xl. 2; xliii. 2, 3); but most recently it has again been claimed that "it is a description which, upon the whole, differs only slightly and immaterially from the temple before the exile" (Theodorus). And the reason assigned is twofold: the one is the style of the description, "thoroughly jejune, deficient in all taste, giving single measurements even to the width of the doors and the strength of the walls,"—the other is the object of it, which was, according to chap. xliii. 10, 11, that "the temple (then destroyed) should be rebuilt according to Ezekiel's model." To this, however, it must be objected, (a) That the statement of the numbers and the measure of the foundation, extending itself to the minutest particulars, instead of taking away from the description the character of a vision, rather confirms it. The exact measuring off and bounding according to definite numbers and measurements is, as has been fully shown in my Symbole des Mosaischen Kultus (i. s. 127 sq.), the first requisite for every space and structure which has an higher, divine destination, and imparts thereto the impress of the divine. Hence, in the description of all holy places and buildings mentioned in Scripture, the measurement and numbers are so carefully given, and especially in the visions which concern the one divine edifice, ever first a heavenly being, a "man with a measuring-chain appears, who measures off everything" (Ezek. xl. 3, 5; xlvii. 8; Zech. ii. 5; Rev. xi. 1; xxi. 16). The more the measuring goes into detail, so much the more is the whole pronounced to be out and out divine. (b) In general it contradicts the being and nature of a vision to be nothing more than a pure building-description or an architectonic direction. But here, it must be added that it contains phases which do not admit of execution in reality, as, e. g., the great stream flowing from the temple emptying itself into the Dead Sea (Ezek. xlvii. 1–12). If the purpose of the entire delineation had been to serve as a building-direction for the reconstruction of the temple after the return from the captivity, it would be inexplicable that it should have been disregarded as well by Zerubbabel as later by Herod. (c) As little as the delineation is purely historical, just as little also is it, as many have supposed, a mere picture of the fancy. Rather, "as Ezekiel elsewhere loves the finishing out of long allegories (see chap. xvi. 23), so also we have here a very extended symbolical representation prophetically delivered by him" (Hävernick, Commentar, s. 623; cf. Umbreit, Commentar, s. 257). Certainly it rests upon an historical basis, yet not upon the temple as originally built by Solomon, but upon it after many additions and alterations, as it existed just before the captivity. Yet it is and must remain a vision, and, as such, it has an ideal character, from which every effort to separate with certainty the historical basis is futile (comp. Winer, R.-W.-B., ii. s. 570). It is abundantly clear that in the inquiry upon the temple of Solomon, only the most cautious use of Ezekiel's description should be made, and in no case is a votum desiderium due to it.

Besides the biblical accounts, we have from antiquity only that of Josephus (Antiq. viii. 3), of which, however, Le Clerc properly says: templum edificat, quale animo conceperat, non quale legerat a Salomone conditum. As he is not wholly trustworthy about the transactions of his own time, he is still less in matters of antiquity; particularly "when he enters upon special descriptions, and claims to communicate detailed incidents, and measurements of heights and size, we are fully justified in doubting the accuracy of his statements" (Robinson's Palestine, vol. i. p. 277). In no instance does he deserve confidence when he does not agree with the biblical accounts, and that which he adds, as, e. g., the levelling of Moriah and the surrounding it with a wall, he did not derive from good ancient sources. Just as untrustworthy are the statements of the later rabbins (comp. Talmudischen Traktat Middoth, i. c., Measure, Malmonides, Jak. Jehuda Leo, and others), since they almost exclusively refer to the temple of Herod, which was very different from that of Solomon, and mingle both together, as also with that of Ezekiel.

The Christian literature respecting our temple is not insignificant. The older essays, from the middle of the sixteenth to the middle of the eighteenth century, like those of Villalpando, Lundius, B. Lamy, and others, embrace the Ezekilian and Herodian temples, without distinguishing sharply what belongs to the one or to the other. From the designs adduced by them, executed in Greco-Roman style, it is clear that their results are totally untenable. While, up to a given time, men believed that they must represent the temple to have been as grand and splendid as possible, in the period of the "illumination" (Aufklärung), they fell into the opposite extreme, and made it as small, unsightly, and insignificant as possible (J. D. Michaelis, Jahn, and others). But subsequently there has been a return to the historical, biblical account, and a simple adherence to it (Warnekros, Baner, and others). The treatise composed by Hirt, simply in the interests of archaeology and art-history (Der Tempel Salomo's mit drei Kupfertafeln, Berlin, 1809), gave occasion to later and more exact researches, in pure archaeological and historico-æsthetic interests. Hereupon followed the Inquiries by J. Fr. Von Meyer (Bibeldeutungen, 1812, and Blätter für höhere Wahrheit, IX. and XI.); Stieglitz (Geschichte der Baukunst, Nürnberg, 1827); Grüneisen (Revision d. jüngsten Forschungen ü. den Salom. Tempel, Kunstbl. 1831); Kopp (Der Tempel Salomo's, Stuttgart, 1839, mit Abbild.); Keil (Der Tempel Salomo's, Dorpat, 1839); Kugler (Kunstgesch., Berlin, 1841); Schnaase (*Antiq. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year, &c. This chronological statement, the first which occurs in Scripture for the determination of an entire period, has given much occupation to the older chronologists, because it does not agree with the statements of the book of the Judges and with Acts xiii. 20. The

Septuagint also has 440 instead of 480. If one add together the chronological figures of the book of the Judges, the result is, for the period of the judges alone 410 years, to which must be added 65 for Moses and Joshua, 60 for Saul and David, and 4 for Solomon, so that there are 539 years in all. According to Acts xiii., the period of the judges embraced about 450 years; 65 for Moses and Joshua, 40 for Saul (ver. 21), 40 for David, and 4 for Solomon reckoned in, would give in all 599 years. Still farther, Josephus, when he speaks of the building of the temple (Antiq. viii. 2, 1), instead of 480 gives 592 years; and in two other places (Antiq. xx. 10; Contra Apion. ii. 9) 612 years. Most recently Lepsius and Bunsen have used the Egyptian and Assyrian chronology against the number 480, and have sought to prove at length, that it is to be reduced to some three hundred and odd years. Finally, Bertheau and Böttcher maintain, with reference to 1 Chron. vi. 35 sq., where the generations of the high-priests from Aaron to Ahimaz, a contemporary of David, are given, the number 480 is the sum-total of twelve generations, 40 years to the generation ($40 \times 12 = 480$); consequently there is no chronologically exact, but rather a probable, round number. Uncertain and doubtful, all things considered, as the statement of the text may seem, we must nevertheless, with Ewald (Gesch. Israels, ii. s. 462 sq.), Winer (R.-W.-B. ii. s. 327), Thénius (Commentar, s. 56-58), and Bösch (das Datum des Tempelbaues im Ersten Buche der Könige. Studien u. Kritiken, 1863, iv. s. 712-742) adhere to it because, (a) the precision of the statement is a voucher for its accuracy. Not only is the whole number of the years given, but also the year of the reign of the king, even the month itself; and since after the captivity the months had other names, in order that the month itself might not be mistaken for any other, to the name Zif (יִזְרְהֵל) it is expressly added, "which is the second month." In all Scripture there is no chronological statement more carefully prepared; and hence, if any one can claim authority, it is this. It is unnecessary, therefore, to correct it by others more or less vaguely and generally acknowledged, but we are justified, on the contrary, in considering it as the standard for the rest. This holds especially (b) in reference to the chronological figures of the period of the judges, which are not critically and historically above all suspicion, and cannot be added together simply, but must be understood as contemporaneous in part, and standing side by side, even if it be not demonstrably clear in how far, and with what particular numbers, this must be done. Compare the different attempts at a proof by Keil (Dörpliche Beiträge, ii. s. 308 sq., and on Judges iii. 7), Tiele (Chronologie des A. T. s. 54), Werner (Rudolbach's Zeitschrift, 1844, iii. and 1845, i.), and Cassel (Das Buch der Richter im Bibelwerk, Eñl. s. xvi.). (c) The number 460 (Acts xiii. 20) is not given as chronologically precise, but only as approximate (ὥς), and nothing can be determined by it.* The numbers of the period of the judges appear simply to be added together in it, and the 40 years of Eli also (1 Sam. iv. 18) are computed with it. (d) The statements of Josephus can all the less be taken into account, since he contradicts himself, and gives at one time 592, and at the other 612. The first number, adopted also by the Chinese Jews, rests doubtless upon the rabbinic notion that in the 480 years those only are to be reckoned in which Israel was under Israelitish judges, and that those on the other hand are to be thrown out (amounting in all to 111), when the nation was subject to foreign heathen rulers—480+111=591. This conception of the matter is destitute of all proof. The reason for the number 612 is unknown. (c) The calling in question of the number 480 upon the ground of the Egyptian or of the Assyrian chronology, proceeds upon the assumption that this chronology is assured, which, it is known, is by no means the case, and which can only be restored through a series of combinations and of unproved hypotheses. How feebly the definite statement of our text can be attacked by it, has been thoroughly and completely shown by Röscher on the place. (f) The reading of the Sept. (440 instead of 480) is not supported by any ancient version or MS., and rests either upon the confounding of the sign $\text{B}=80$ with $\text{D}=40$, or upon some peculiar and even arbitrary reckoning. (g) The view that 480 is the product of 12×40 , is inadmissible, because in that event the four years of Solomon's reign are not in the estimate, and must be added to the 480 years, while in fact they are included within them. Had the reckoning been made according to generations, the author would have written 484. Apart from this, twelve generations are supplied us from 1 Chron. vi. only when Aaron himself, who, according to Exod. vii. 7; Numb. xxxiii. 38 sq., was eighty-three years old at the time of the departure from Egypt, is taken into the account. Besides, there is no proof that in the computation of long periods of time human age is regularly set down at forty years. As Moses was 120 years, Aaron 123, Joshua 110, Eli 98, &c., and generally, a great age was then usual, the average of human life must certainly be placed higher than at forty years. Comp. Thénius.

Ver. 2. And the house which king Solomon, &c. The place where the temple was built, was, according to 2 Chron. iii. 1, Mount Moriah (comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 18 sq.), which our author presupposes as sufficiently known. [The uneven rock of Moriah had to be levelled, and the inequalities filled by immense substructions of "great stones," "costly stones," "hewed stones." Stanley, Jewish Church.—E. H.] In vers. 2–10 the measurement and single portions of the structure are given. The measurements are determined according to the cubit, and indeed the older (2 Chron. iii. 3), which Thénius reckons at one foot six inches Rhenish, and one foot four inches Paris, measure [= 1 foot six inches Eng. measure]. Here, and in all the subsequent statements, they refer to the interior spaces. The component parts of the structure are the house, the porch, and the "chambers round about" (Umbau). The first is the building proper, to which both others are attached as additional and subsidiary. The whole was situated according to the points of the compass. The front, or entrance-side, was towards the east, the rear wall was towards the west, the two sides towards the south and north (1 Kings vii. 39; Ezek. viii. 16), which also was the position of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 18 sq.; xxxvi. 33 sq.). The main building, the house (הַבַּיִת), was built of thick stone walls (vers. 6, 7, and had within two compartments: the front is called in ver. 3 "the temple of the house" (הַיֵּל הַבַּיִת), and the rear, in ver. 5, "the oracle" (חֲדָרִי). The word הַיֵּל comes from the Arabic, to be large, high (2 Chron. iii. 5), hence the front compartment was "the great house" (הַבַּיִת הַגָּדוֹל) in contradistinction with the rear, which was the shorter half, and also lower. The Vulg., after Jerome, translates the word חֲדָרִי by oraculum, i. e., oraculi sedes, and the Lex. Cyrilli explains the δασίπ of the Sept. by χαρματιστήριον. It is, however, not derived from חֲדָר = to speak, but from חֲדָר in its primary signification = to adjoin, to follow after (comp. Dietrich in Geesen.), and signifies, also, simply the compartment in the rear, following upon the large room. The windows which the house had (ver. 4), were certainly placed high, where it overtopped the "chambers round about" (Umbau) with their three stories. How many windows there were, whether upon all the four sides of the house, or only upon three, or only upon the two length-walls, we do not gather from the text. The designs of Thénius and Keil place them all around the house, with the exception of the façade, where the porch was. Nor is the size of the windows given, but it is added שְׁקֵפִים אֲמִתִּים, i. e., not "wide within, narrow without" (Luther, after the Chald.), but "windows with closed beams," i. e., windows the lattice of which could not be opened and shut at pleasure as in ordinary dwelling-houses, 2 Kings xiii. 17; Dan. vi. 11" (Keil). The lattice consisted of strong cross-pieces, and not of wickerwork. The window-opening may have been, certainly, according to the account of the Chaldee and of the rabbins, inasmuch as the walls were very thick, wider on the inside than on the outside, as is the case in the windows of Egyptian buildings, and answers for the purposes of admitting light and air, and of letting off smoke, only there is nothing of it in the words of the text.

Vers. 3–4. And the porch before the temple of the house, &c. As the word אֹמָל comes from אָל, i. e., to go before, it signifies also a projection: but we are not, as in 1 Kings vii. 6, where הַמְּזוֹזִים (pillars) is expressly added, to represent it as a portico or a colonnade. It stretched across the entire façade of the house, and its length was equal to the breadth of the house, viz., 20 cubits. Its breadth, i. e., its depth, measured 10 cubits. The text does not mention the height, but 2 Chron. iii. 4 gives it at 120 cubits, which is certainly incorrect; for, as Thénius properly remarks, (1) "a structure of this sort could not have been designated as an אֹמָל, but must have been called a מִגְדָּל (tower); (2) the chimney-like proportions: 20, 10, 120, are not only inconsistent with (the notion of) the pylon of a temple, but are also statically impossible. [If it were but 10 cubits (15 feet) deep, it seems impossible that it could have been 120 cubits (180 feet) high: and the theory of Mr. Ferguson that the height refers to a "superstructure on the temple," would make the temple itself a very grotesque building. See the art., however, on the TEMPLE in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iv. New York, 1870.—E. H.] From these considerations we cannot, with justice, suppose the chronicler to be guilty of arbitrary exaggeration, but we must rather suspect the text of corruption, which is all the more probable, since the verse in question bears even elsewhere marks of corruption." According to v. Meyer's probable conjecture, instead of מִצָּדָה וְעַל־קִירָיו, we should read: אֲמוֹת עֶשְׂרִים, i. e., 20 cubits (in Ezek. xlii. 16 also, whether the reading be אֲמוֹת or מִצָּדָה is uncertain). The latter is adopted by the Syr., the Arab., and the Sept. (Cod. Alexand.). Thenius and Bertheau maintain, on the other hand, that as the house was 30 cubits high, the sign ל=30 was originally in the text, but that through the obliteration of the upper portion of the letter it became כ=20. And certainly, in behalf of the supposition that it was 30 cubits high, we may urge, in part, the absence of any statement of the height in our text, which is the more easily explicable if the height of the "porch" and of the temple were the same, and, in part, the circumstance that the side-building was 20 cubits high on the outside, consequently the "porch" would not have been especially distinctive or prominent had it been of the same height (Keil). That the "porch" had thick stone enclosure-walls with a wide entrance (Thenius), cannot be concluded from the obscure passage of Ezek. xli. 26; still less is the view established that each side-wall had a window. To me it seems that the "porch" had only side-walls and a ceiling, but to have been entirely open in front, so that windows were unnecessary. The extremely inadequate description of the "porch," contrasted with the very careful description of the house and of both its compartments, can only be founded in the fact that it did not belong especially, or as an integral part, to the sanctuary, but was only a subordinate addition thereto.
